turn out spoiled or indifferent dishes, and do daily destruction among the utensils provided by the long-suffering mistress.

Oysters are now at their best. The "divine bivalve," according to the gourmets, should never be cooked when it is really divine—that is, when its celestial home was located off Whitstable. But that oysters from other places can and even should be nicely dressed has been certain even long before one of the immortals described their costume:—

> Their coats were brushed, their faces washed,
> Their shoes were clean and neat—
> And this was odd, because, you know,
> They hadn't any feet.

Here is another way of dressing them—Oriental, to judge by the headgear!

Turban of Oysters.—Pound 6 ozs. of raw whiting, to which add 2 ozs. of butter and 2 ozs. of cold thick bread sauce, season with salt and pepper, work in an egg and two yolks, and when these are thoroughly mixed rub all through a wire sieve. Work the quenelle briskly in a basin, adding a gill of cream gradually. Steam it in a buttered border mould which has a sunk top. When the turban is turned out, pour the sauce over and fill the centre with the oysters, prepared in this way:—Blanch and beard twenty-four oysters, toss them in flour, dip them in well-beaten egg, then into breadcrumbs, and fry them in a stew-pan of hot fat. The liquor must be converted into creamy sauce nicely seasoned.

The following two recipes would have satisfied even the walrus, who "sorted out those of the largest size" behind his handkerchief.

Vol au Vent aux Suprême de Huitres.—Remove the beards from thirty blanched and strained oysters. Sweat a couple of minced shallots with 2 ozs. of butter, mix in a tablespoonful of flour, the liquor from the oysters, and half a gill of consommé. When it is boiling, add the yolks of two eggs, a gill of cream, salt, pepper, a pinch of cayenne and a teaspoonful of lime juice. Add to this sauce the bearded oysters and about two dozen small quenelles. To make these:—Pound 6 ozs. of raw chicken or veal, adding 2 ozs. of butter and 4 ozs. of panada (made by simmering 3 ozs. of breadcrumbs in a gill of stock until it is a stiff paste). Well mix, and work in two eggs, salt and pepper, and rub all through a wire sieve. Work the farce with a gill of cream, and form it into quenelles with two tea-spoons dipped in hot water. They must then be blanched in a sautépan, with a little stock to moisten them, and covered with a greased paper, until they are firm to the touch. Fill the vol au vent case, and dish it on a napkin garnished with fried parsley.

For the Vol au Vent Case make ¾ lb. of butter and ¾ lb. of flour into puff pastry. Roll and fold it until it is an inch thick. Place a plain mould, 5½ ins. in diameter, on the top, and with a sharp knife, dipped in hot water, cut round the mould through the pastry, slanting inwards; brush the top with beaten egg, make an incision nearly through the pastry with a cutter dipped in hot water, leaving about an inch margin. Bake it for three-quarters of an hour, then remove the soft interior.

Oysters à la Duchesse.—Dissolve 1 oz. of butter in a stewpan, and in it cook a finely minced shallot. Mix in a spoonful of flour, the liquor from twenty-four strained oysters, and two tablespoonfuls of white wine. When boiling, add cream, lime juice, salt, pepper, and cayenne to season. Stir in carefully the yolks of two eggs and the oysters. Pour them into a buttered fireproof dish, mix an ounce of grated Parmesan with a little cream, pour it over the top, and bake about ten minutes a delicate brown colour. Serve very hot.

The copyright of the Encyclopaedia Britannica has been taken over by the # University of Cambridge,

and an entirely new (11th) edition will be issued from the Cambridge University Press about the end of the year.

☞ Prospectus and specimen pages post free from The Cambridge University Press (London Office), Fetter Lane, E.C.

It is now 142 years since there appeared in Edinburgh the first part of a book, to be completed in 3 modest volumes, of 900 pages each, under the ambitious title of the Encyclopaedia Britannica. Limited in its scope to the arts and sciences, the product of a "Society of Gentlemen in Scotland," none of whose names have come down to us, it contained, for the best of reasons, no heading "Steam Engine," and could still combat, in its article "Botany," the theory that sex existed in the world of plants.

The 11th edition to contrast it with the first, consists of 28 volumes and an index. There are 27,000 pages of text, 40,000 articles, over 41 millions of words, more than 7,000 illustrations and maps. Its 1,500 contributors include the most eminent authorities in every department of knowledge. Its scope has been enlarged to supply information under whatever word may reasonably prompt a question as to the person, place, object, action or conception for which it stands—and this information (the result of a fresh survey of the world) is given up to the year 1910.

The new edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, which the Cambridge University Press is now about to issue, is, indeed, a representative product of the day—to which it belongs in virtue of its writers, its information, the improved method of its preparation, the revolution in its physical production; but it is also the result of a long development, and can well be introduced only by a backward glance.

Past editions of the Encyclopaedia Britannica have been published at the dates shown in the following table. As every edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica has hitherto been issued in parts, and its publication, therefore, extended over a series of years, the interval between one edition and the next must be measured from the mean date of each. It will be seen that, whereas successive editions have hitherto appeared at intervals, on an average, of 14 years, a period of 28 years separates the publication of the present edition from the last entirely new edition, viz., the 9th.

| 11th edition (Cambridge University Press) | 29 ,, | .. | December, 1910 | |

The title of the first edition was ambitious, for the word "encyclopaedia" promised a complete circle of instruction, and this the modest three volumes fell far short of supplying. But, if the first Encyclopaedia Britannica failed to complete the circle, it clearly showed that instruction was its main purpose. For its articles upon the chief arts and sciences were long and comprehensive treatises intended for study and reading, and to this feature—which characterises the Encyclopaedia Britannica to this day—the book owes its reputation as something apart from the many other encyclopaedias, British and Foreign, which serve a slighter purpose.

The new (11th) edition—besides being new, i.e., the result of a fresh survey of the world—carries forward the famous characteristics of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, while developing others which were latent. For the first time in its history, an edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica has been written, and will be issued, as one consistent whole from A to Z. It would be impossible to exaggerate the importance of this radical change in the method of production. With previous editions—as indeed with every other considerable publication whatever—the custom has been to produce and publish the work volume by volume. In the present case—in respect both of the exhaustive character of its survey and of its well-considered distribution under some 40,000 headings—simultaneous preparation has brought to the new work the advantage of such a thorough organisation and control as is unattainable under the ordinary conditions of piecemeal production. This development, while enhancing the value of the Encyclopaedia Britannica as a book for study and for reading, greatly increases its usefulness as a work of reference. For, by virtue of the better arrangement of its matter, the new work contains in the same space a far greater amount of information than any previous edition. One other striking innovation may be noted. By the employment of India paper, a book of which the contents have always been intended for reading has been rendered physically readable at last in the shape of light and slender volumes.

The preparation of the 11th edition (at a cost, before a single volume was printed, of £230,000) has occupied for eight years a permanent editorial staff of 64 members, and it embodies the special knowledge of leading authorities in every field, e.g., Lord Rayleigh, Sir Joseph Thomson, Sir Philip Watts, Prof. Ewing, Prof. Nernst, Sir Clifford Allbutt, Sir E. Ray Lankester, Sir Walter Phillimore, Sir Elidon Gorst, Dr. Arthur Evans, Prof. Haverfield, Prof. Vinogradoff, Prof. Oman, Dr. Driver, Dr. Estlin Carpenter, Mr. Sidney Colvin, Mr. Donald Tovey, Captain Brinkley, Colonel Maude, Mr. Horace Hutchinson, to name but twenty out of some fifteen hundred. But of all these details of the work the reader may best judge for himself from the prospectus and specimen pages for which this announcement invites him to inquire.

In conclusion, it may safely be asserted that at no time in its history has the need of a new Encyclopaedia Britannica been more urgent than it is to-day. The past fifteen years have been marked by extraordinary multiplication of special studies, and, at the same time, they have seen a notable growth of the belief that information tells—tells not only indirectly, and in a quickening of general interests, but, also, most practically, in the increased efficiency which a man brings to the pursuit of his own business or profession, whatever that may be.

In coming now under the control of the University of Cambridge, the Encyclopaedia Britannica, as a most comprehensive exhibition of exact knowledge, will be regarded as having found a natural abiding place. On its side, in assuming the charge of a most powerful instrument of general instruction, the University takes a step in fulfilment of its responsibility towards a wider circle than that of its own students during the short years of their residence.

The first copies (a small number) of the new Encyclopaedia Britannica, 11th Edition, will be ready, it is expected, in January.

This preliminary announcement is made with the object of inviting applications at once, in advance of publication. From these advance applications it will be possible to estimate in what proportion the two forms of the new edition (the one on India paper and the other on ordinary paper), and the various styles of binding, will be in demand, and thus to effect a considerable economy in the subsequent manufacture of the book.

Since, at this juncture, information on this head is of importance to the Cambridge University Press, advance applicants are offered the benefit of a greatly reduced price, as well as the advantage of securing a copy of the book as soon as any are printed.

Applicants in advance of publication will be accepted at the rate of 15/10 a volume (containing 1,000 quarto pages) instead of 30/-, which was the original published price of the 9th edition, and is intended to be the ultimate price of the new edition.

15/10 instead of 30/-

Advance applications call for no remittance until the volumes are actually delivered, when payment may be made in cash, or in monthly instalments of 21/-

A form for the use of advance applicants, showing in detail the special terms offered to them, will be sent with a prospectus of the new edition, post free upon request. Please write name and address below, tear off this corner, and post to the London office of

The Company has been formed for the purposes set forth in the Memorandum of Association, and particularly to acquire, as from 1st July, 1910, and work the Rubber Estates known as Malam and Matang Batu, situate in the Larut District of the State of Perak, Federated Malay States, adjoining the well-known Jebong Estate, and in close proximity to both the Matang and Simpang Railway Stations of the Taiping-Port Weld line, which runs through the property. Mr. Knight, Manager of the Jebong Estate, has consented to act as Visiting Agent, so that the Company will have the benefit of expert local knowledge.

The two Estates form one block of 1,289 acres.

The Estate has been inspected by Mr. Thomas Boyd, General Manager of the Gula-Kalumpong Rubber Estates, Limited, and President of the Malay Peninsula Agricultural Association, and by Mr. R. G. Palmer, Visiting Agent of Brieh Rubber Estate and Alor Pongsu Rubber Estate. Mr. Palmer values the property at £60,050, and in concluding his Report (dated 19th May, 1910) states:—"This is a most desirable property, and will give good results. It has been carefully planted and attended to, under the supervision of the present owner, who is an experienced planter. I have based my estimate of returns on the appearance and growth of the trees, and have been guided in my figures by the actual results obtained on the neighbouring Estates, to which Malam will form no exception. If anything, I think the actual result will be rather better than my estimates."

Mr. Boyd states:—"I have visited the Malam and Matang Batu Estates, and have seen Mr. Palmer's report on the property. I think his Report and valuation a very fair one, and in my opinion his estimates of production for the next five years ought to be easily obtained."

320 acres are planted with 38,800 Para Rubber Trees, approximately 20 by 20 and 17 by 17, as follows:—

| | 400 trees 7–8 years old (in May, 1910). | |
| 15,600 | „ 3–4 „ „ „ | |
| 2,800 | „ 2½ „ „ „ | |
| 20,000 | „ 2 „ „ „ | |
| 38,800 | | |

With regard to the growth of the trees and the condition of the Estates, Mr. Palmer in his Report states:—"The trees are well grown and even throughout, and look rather older than their age; quite a number of trees, I should say about 4,000, could be tapped at once; but I understand that, apart from the 400 trees which have been tapped for some time, it is not intended to start regular tapping before 1st January, 1911, when about 7,000 or over should be ready for the knife. About 200 lbs. of Rubber a month could be collected at present from the 400 trees 7–8 years old. With the exception of 45 acres under lalang, but which is now being scythed and the trees circled, the whole Estate is clean weeded."

On 28th October, 1910, Mr. Palmer cabled as follows:—

"Visited Batumatang yesterday; good progress since May, entirely clean weeded, about 3,000 new trees marked for tapping, sixty acres jungle burnt, further 300 being drained; all will be planted by June. Labour plentiful, estimates production unchanged, three cases rubber shipped twentieth."

The production of Rubber from the present planted area for the years from 1911 to 1915 is estimated as follows:—

which at 2s. 6d. net per lb. gives over £50,000 of profit for the first five years. From 1915 onwards the output should continue to increase from the production of the newly planted areas.

The purchase price of £56,000, which is £4,050 below the valuation, has already been paid in cash for the properties by the Vendors, who have resold to the Company at the same price, there being no promotion profit.

Application for Shares and Debentures must be made on the forms accompanying the full Prospectus.

The List for Cash Applications will CLOSE on or before WEDNESDAY, 23rd November, and for Conversion Applications on MONDAY, 28th November, 1910.

THIS PROSPECTUS HAS BEEN FILED WITH THE REGISTRAR OF JOINT STOCK COMPANIES.

THE MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY OF WESTERN AUSTRALIA

LIMITED AND REDUCED.

The words "and reduced" are used pending the application to the Court to confirm the reduction of Capital referred to below.

Issue of £600,000 Four per Cent. First Mortgage Debenture Stock at 95,

Forming part of an Authorised Amount of £700,000, of which £100,000 is reserved for future Issue.

A FULL HALF-YEAR'S INTEREST WILL BE PAYABLE ON JULY 1, 1911.

Holders of the Four per cent. Debentures, guaranteed by the Government of Western Australia, repayable January 1, 1911, can exchange for an equal amount of this Stock on the terms stated below, and applications from such holders will receive preferential allotment.

This Debenture Stock will be secured by a Deed of Trust, containing a Specific First Mortgage, in favour of the Industrial and General Trust, Limited, on the Railway and 1,922,850 acres of Land of the Company remaining unsold on the 30th June last, and also on 80 per cent. of the instalments, the total of which on 30th June last amounted to £306,438, then remaining due for principal in respect of Lands already sold. Power is reserved to the Company to dispose of all or any part of the 1,922,850 acres, subject to applying 80 per cent. of the net proceeds, received in respect of principal, in the redemption of the Debenture Stock either by drawings at par on three months' notice or by purchase in the market under par. The remaining 20 per cent. of such proceeds will form part of the general funds of the Company. Power is also reserved to the Company to redeem the Stock on like terms out of the general funds of the Company. No Stock which is redeemed can be re-issued.

The stock will be transferable in any amount not involving a fraction of £1, and will be registered at the Company's Head Office in London. Interest will be paid half-yearly on the 1st July and 1st January.

Messrs GLYN, MILLS, CURRIE, AND CO., as Bankers of the Company, are authorised to receive Subscriptions for this Stock at 95.

|---|---|
| On Application | £5 per cent. |
| On 7th December, 1910 | £25 per cent. |
| On 2nd January, 1911 | £25 per cent. |
| On 27th January, 1911 | £40 per cent. |
| | £95 per cent. |

Allottees will have the option of paying up in full on 7th December, 1910, or 2nd January, 1911, under discount at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum.

Scrip Certificates will be issued by the Company's Bankers in exchange for the Allotment Letters and the receipts for the amounts payable on allotment. These can be exchanged for Definitive Debenture Stock Certificates on or after February 27, 1911. A full half-year's interest will be payable on July 1, 1911. Interest will be chargeable on overdue instalments at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

The failure to pay any instalment when due will render all previous payments liable to forfeiture.

Where the amount allotted is less than the amount applied for, the surplus deposit will be applied towards the amount payable on 7th December.

Cash applications for multiples of £100 should be lodged, with a deposit of £5 per cent. on the amount applied for, with Messrs Glyn, Mills, Currie and Co., 67 Lombard street.

Holders of the £300,000 of the Company's guaranteed Debentures, which are to be paid off at par on 1st January, 1911, can convert their holdings into this issue of Four per cent. First Mortgage Debenture Stock on the terms that they retain the Coupon for the half-year's interest due on 1st January, 1911, which will in due course be paid, and receive for every £100 of such Debentures:—(1) £100 of fully-paid Four per cent. First Mortgage Debenture Stock, carrying interest from 1st January, 1911, and (2) £5 in cash. Receipts for these Debentures will be given by Messrs Glyn, Mills, Currie and Co., and, together with Allotment Letters, can afterwards be exchanged for fully-paid scrip certificates.

The Company was incorporated in June, 1890, for the purpose of constructing a Railway in Western Australia under a Concession from the Government of that State, in consideration for which a free grant was made of selected lands within a belt of 40 miles on either side of the Railway.

The Company's Railway starts from Midland Junction (12 miles from Perth), where it joins with the Government line from Fremantle and Perth, and thence runs northwards to Walkaway, at which place it connects with the Government lines to Geraldton and to the Murchison Goldfields, thus forming a direct route between North and South, passing through a district in which land settlement is being vigorously carried on.

The total length of the line is 277 miles. The Railway is in an efficient state of repair, while the Locomotives and Rolling Stock are now being increased to meet the requirements of an increased traffic.

A map is enclosed in the prospectus showing the route of the Railway and the position of the Company's lands.

Of the Company's lands 895,284 acres have already been sold for the sum of £580,328; of this £273,890 has been received and the balance of £306,438 is payable by instalments spread over 15 years, carrying interest at 4 per cent. per annum. The lands remaining unsold on the 30th June last amounted to 1,922,850 acres. It is the intention of the Directors to continue the periodical sales which, in the past, have brought a material addition in the number of settlers in proximity to the Railway and a consequent increase in the traffic returns.

According to the published Balance-sheets of the Company, the net profits for the past four years have been as follows:—

| | £ | s. | d. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Year ending 30th June, 1906 | 27,634 | 4 | 6 |
| Year ending 30th June, 1907 | 37,991 | 6 | 9 |
| Year ending 30th June, 1908 | 40,966 | 4 | 7 |
| Year ending 30th June, 1909 | 48,866 | 2 | 11 |

The amount required annually to provide the Interest on the present Issue of Debentures is £24,000.

The proceeds of the Issue will be used to pay off:—

On the 1st January, 1911:—

£300,000 Four per Cent. Guaranteed Debentures, being the balance of an issue of £500,000, of which £200,000 has already been redeemed by the Company.

On 31st January, 1911:—

£77,404 Five per Cent. Prior Lien Debenture Stock at 115.

£129,923 Five per Cent. Cumulative Income Debenture Stock at 105.

The balance will be available for the provision of additional rolling stock and the general purposes of the Company.

The present issue has been underwritten at a commission of 2 per cent. A commission of ½ per cent. is payable to the Brokers for the issue, and a commission of ¼ per cent. to Brokers on allotments made in respect of applications bearing their stamp.

The draft of the proposed Trust Deed and the form of Debenture Stock Certificate can be seen at the Office of the Solicitors of the Company, Messrs Markby, Stewart and Co, 57 Coleman street, London, E.C., and applicants will be deemed to have notice of their contents. Prints of the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the Company, the Annual Reports and Accounts, are also open to inspection there.

An official quotation on the London Stock Exchange will be applied for in due course.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application can be obtained from Messrs Glyn, Mills, Currie and Co., 67 Lombard street, London, E.C.; Messrs R. Nivison and Co., Bank Buildings, Princes street, London, E.C., and at the Offices of the Company.

The following particulars relate to the Debenture and Share Capital of the Company, in respect of which a Scheme of Arrangement and Reduction of Capital has recently been approved by the Proprietors.

The Capital of the Company is £1,240,000, divided into 200,000 Ordinary Shares of £6 each, of which the sum of £1 has been paid, and 40,000 Founders' Shares of £1 each fully paid. By resolutions passed at an Extraordinary General Meeting of the Company, held on 29th September, 1910, and confirmed at a meeting held on 14th October, 1910, a Scheme of Reorganisation was approved whereby, subject to the confirmation of the Court, this capital was reduced to £80,000, and the uncalled liability of £5 on each Ordinary Share cancelled. Pending such confirmation, each Ordinary Shareholder has, at a General Meeting of the Company, one vote in respect of each Share, and each Founders' Shareholder has one vote in respect of every six Shares.

Under the Scheme £600,000 4 per cent. Second Mortgage Cumulative Income Debenture Stock and £519,781 Ordinary Stock (which is to be consolidated with the above-mentioned £80,000 into an Ordinary Stock of £599,781) will be issued to the holders of the existing 6 per cent. Cumulative Income Debenture Stock at present ranking next after the Debenture Stocks which are to be repaid out of the present issue.

Application has already been made for the confirmation by the Court of this reduction of Capital, and will be heard early next year. Should it not be sanctioned, which there is no reason to anticipate, the Capital of the Company will remain at £1,240,000, and the existing 6 per cent. Cumulative Income Debenture Stock will rank after the new Four per Cent. First Mortgage Debenture Stock now offered for subscription, which will have no charge on the uncalled capital.

Under the Scheme when sanctioned the reorganised Debenture Stocks and Share Capital of the Company will be as follows:—

£600,000 4 per cent. First Mortgage Debenture Stock (part of £700,000 authorised).

£599,781 Consolidated Ordinary Stock.

THE PROSPECTUS NOW BEING ISSUED BY THE

Anglo-Continental Supply Company, Ltd.

Incorporated under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908,

Proprietors of Les Etablissements "AU PLANTEUR DE CAÏFFA,"

States (inter alia) that:

THE SUBSCRIPTION LIST IS NOW OPEN, and will CLOSE on or before THURSDAY, the 24th November, 1910.

THE CAPITAL IS - £1,600,000

in 160,000 8 per cent. CUMULATIVE PREFERENCE SHARES OF £5 each and 160,000 ORDINARY SHARES of £5 each.

The Preference Shares are Preferential as to capital, and are also Preferential and Cumulative as to dividends. After payment of a dividend of Eight per cent. on the ordinary Shares one-third of the surplus profits in each year will be set aside as a Special Reserve until such Reserve amounts to £64,000, at which amount it is to be maintained. Such fund will be held exclusively as a guarantee for the payment of the Preference Dividend.

The Profits for the Year ending June, 1910, amounted to more than two and a-half times the sum required for the Eight per cent. Cumulative dividend on the Preference Shares.

There are no Mortgages, Debentures, or Debenture Stock, and none for a sum in excess of £80,000 can at any time be issued without a Resolution at a meeting of Preference Shareholders specially summoned for the purpose, passed by a majority consisting of not less than three-fourths of the votes given upon such Resolution.

Both classes of Shares may be converted into Bearer Shares on payment of the Stamp Duty.

The whole of the Ordinary Shares (£800,000) and 24,000 Preference Shares (£120,000) are taken by the Vendors as part of the purchase consideration.

ISSUE OF THE REMAINING 136,000 EIGHT PER CENT. CUMULATIVE PREFERENCE SHARES OF £5 EACH AT PAR

(of which 40,000 Shares, representing £200,000, have already been applied for, and will be allotted in full).

Payable as follows:—10s per Share on application, £2 10s per Share on allotment, and £2 per Share three months after allotment—total, £5.

The Shares may be paid up in full on Allotment, under a rebate at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum.

The accounts of the Company will be made up annually to the end of December, and Dividends on the Preference Shares will be payable half-yearly, in April and October. The dividends will be calculated from the due dates of the several instalments; the first dividend, calculated to the 31st December, 1910, will be payable in April, 1911.

The proceeds of this issue will be applied in completing the cash portion of the purchase consideration, and over £330,000 will then be available as Working Capital and for the further development of the business.

This Company has been formed to acquire as a going concern, and to further develop in France and other continental countries, the well-known business of Mr Michel Cahen, founded by him in Paris in 1890, and carried on under the name of

LES ETABLISSEMENTS "AU PLANTEUR DE CAIFFA."

Mr Cahen decided to convert his business into an English Limited Company because he considers that the development of the business in other continental countries will be best attained by the formation of English subsidiary companies.

The success that has attended the well-organised distribution of goods on a large scale from a central establishment to a number of retail shops is well known. Mr Cahen further improved upon this system by dispensing with retail shops and delivering the goods direct to the customers' own doors against payment in cash. This system of cash sales with no expenditure on retail shops proved so extraordinarily successful that the business, which was originally confined to the sale of freshly roasted coffee, has since been extended to include many other articles of grocery, and the firm is now one of the most important commercial organisations in France. In the course of twenty years' experience, and as a result of large expenditure, the firm's organisation has been so perfected that it has been found practicable to extend the direct delivery of goods to many districts which are out of reach of ordinary retail establishments or of other competitors. This development of the business has placed the firm in an exceptionally strong position with regard to competition. A large expenditure of time and money would be necessary to create a rival organisation.

The following figures show the phenomenal progress of the business:—

CASH SALES FOR LAST 10½ YEARS.

| | | | |
| Year ending December, | 1900 | £270,373 | |
| ,, ,, ,, | 1901 | £426,373 | |
| ,, ,, ,, | 1902 | £675,489 | |
| ,, ,, | 1903 | £979,589 | |
| Half-Year ending June, | 1904 | | £587,837 |

| ,, ,, ,, | 1909 | £2,195,579 | |
| ,, ,, ,, | 1910 | £2,586,449 | |

The nature and volume of the business are shown by the following statement of the chief Sales of Goods for the year ending June, 1910:—

8,100 tons of Coffee.
2,660 tons of Pâtes Alimentaires (Macaroni, &c.)
1,900 tons of Chicory.
1,900 tons of Chocolate.
2,813,000 tins of Biscuits.
1,690,000 tins of Pepper.
337,000 tins of Mustard.
246,000 tins of Cream.
950,000 bags of Rice.
75,000 bags of Tapioca.
236,900 bags of Semolina.
847,400 bottles of Perfumery, Scent, &c.
499,000 bottles of Salad Oil.
397,000 bottles of Soup Flavouring.
1,198,000 packets of Washing Powder.

The following Report from Messrs W. B. Peat and Co. shows the profits of the business:—

11 Ironmonger lane, London, E.C.,
10th November, 1910.

To the Directors of the ANGLO-CONTINENTAL SUPPLY CO., LIMITED.

Dear Sirs,

"AU PLANTEUR DE CAÏFFA."

We have examined the Books of the above firm, and certify that the profits of the business for the four years ending 25th June, 1910, have been as follows:—

| | Francs. | At Francs 25 to £1 |
|---|---|---|
| Year ending June, 1907 .. .. .. | 3,128,373 | = £125,134 18s 5d |
| ,, ,, 1908 .. .. .. | 3,593,203 | = £143,728 2s 5d |
| ,, ,, 1909 .. .. .. | 3,605,067 | = £144,202 13s 7d |
| ,, ,, 1910 .. .. .. | 4,227,661 | = £169,106 8s 10d |

These Profits are arrived at after charging against the Revenue of each year all maintenance and working expenses, all discounts claimed in each year, and in addition all Capital and other expenditure incurred during these four years in establishing 43 new depôts and in enlarging or improving 32 other depôts, but before providing for interest on Capital, unclaimed discounts, reserve for depreciation, and partners' remuneration.

In accordance with your request for a statement as to our opinion of the organisation of the business, we beg to inform you that we found the same to be very well arranged. In order to cope with its development the business has been divided into departments in a most complete manner, and the supervision of each department is in capable hands. These facts, while simplifying the general management, materially strengthen the position of the undertaking as a whole.

Yours faithfully,
W. B. PEAT and CO., Chartered Accountants.

From the above it will be seen that the profits of the business have steadily increased, and that for the year ending June, 1910, they were sufficient to have paid the Preference Dividend, amounting to £64,000, with a surplus of £105,106 8s 10d. The gross sales from the 26th June to the 1st October, 1910, show an increase of £146,619 over the corresponding period of last year, which represents more than 23 per cent.

A brokerage of 1s per Share will be paid on all Shares allotted on application forms (other than underwriters') bearing the Stamp of a Broker or other approved Agent.

The Prospectus contains particulars of Contracts and other information to satisfy the requirements of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908.

Prospectuses, upon the terms of which Applications will alone be received, and Forms of Application can be obtained from the Registered Office of the Company, or from the Bankers, Brokers, Solicitors, and Auditors.

Dated 10th November, 1910.

This Company has been formed to acquire (inter alia) the Petroleum Estate, known as Maily Say, of the late Prince Khilkoff, formerly Minister of Russian Highways and Communications.

According to the report of M. Eugene Glouchkoff, the Estate was granted by virtue of the Imperial Decrees of May 7th, 1905, December 30th, 1906, and August 11th, 1907, and possession of the Concession was taken by the late Prince Khilkoff on October 6th, 1907, being an Imperial Grant to him for a period of forty years from that date. It will be seen, therefore, that the Concession has still thirty-seven years to run. Under the will of the late Prince Khilkoff the Concession was transferred to Madame Valoueff, and the transfer was in due course approved by the Russian Ministry of Commerce and Industry under date of 10th June, 1909.

With a view to the exploitation of the field, Madame Valoueff has agreed to assign the Concession to an English Company and has executed through her Attorney a preliminary contract to that effect. The Directors are informed that subject to the number of Russian and English Directors being equal, and other formalities, the Russian Government will, as a special favour, agree to the transfer of the Concession to an English Company. The benefit of this contract has been acquired by the G. M. Oil Fields, Limited.

The property has been thoroughly inspected and reported upon for the G. M. Oil Fields, Limited, by Mr. J. R. Falkowicz, M.E., of 20, Copthall Avenue, London, E.C.

ESTIMATED NET PROFITS.—The daily production of five wells will be 11,000 poods, or 176 tons, which at 25 copecks per pood, less 7½ copecks per pood for handling, 20 per cent. Royalty, 20 per cent. amortisation and the placing to the reserve of the sum of £17,500 for the drilling of five new wells, would leave £30,282 net profit from the first year's work.

The daily production of 10 wells will be 21,000 poods, or 336 tons, which at 25 copecks per pood, less 7½ copecks per pood for handling, 20 per cent. Royalty, 20 per cent. amortisation and the reserve of £17,500 for five new wells, would leave £73,720 net profit from the second year's work.

The daily production of 15 wells will be 31,000 poods, or 496 tons, which at 25 copecks per pood, less 7½ copecks per pood for handling, 25 per cent. Royalty, 20 per cent. amortisation and the reserve of £17,500 for five new wells, would leave £108,743 net profit from the third year's work.

The daily production of 20 wells will be 41,000 poods, or 656 tons, which at 25 copecks per pood, less 7½ copecks per pood for handling, 25 per cent. Royalty, 20 per cent. amortisation and the reserve of £17,500 for five new wells, would leave £149,465 net profit from the fourth year's work.

The daily production of 25 wells will be 51,000 poods, or 816 tons, which at 25 copecks per pood, less 7½ copecks per pood for handling, 25 per cent. Royalty, 20 per cent. amortisation and the reserve of £17,500 for five new wells, would leave a net profit of £190,190 from the fifth year's work, which would be the average yearly net profit for each succeeding year.

| First year | .. | 5 wells, | 176 tons daily, | yearly net profit | .. | £30,282 |
| 2nd " | .. | 10 " | 336 " | " " | .. | £73,720 |
| 3rd " | .. | 15 " | 496 " | " " | .. | £108,743 |
| 4th " | .. | 20 " | 656 " | " " | .. | £149,465 |
| 5th " | .. | 25 " | 816 " | " " | .. | £190,190 |

After providing for an adequate sinking fund for the replacing of the Capital of the Company, the foregoing statements (compiled upon Mr. J. R. Falkowicz' letter of 28th September, 1910) show an average net profit for the first five years' working of 18 per cent. per annum upon the issued Capital of the Company, exclusive of the profits that may be derived from the Pipe Line and Refinery. Upon the same basis, for the 26 years (which is the estimated life of the first oil horizon) the net profits would show an average of 29 per cent. per annum for that period upon the issued Capital of the Company.

Upon the basis of Dr. S. von Pilat's (Head Manager of the Austrian State Refineries, Drohobycz) estimate, annexed to Mr. J. R. Falkowicz' Report, the net profit on a Refinery dealing with 60,000 tons of Crude Oil per annum would be 520,782 Roubles, which, at 2s. 1½d. per Rouble, would equal £55,337.

The minimum subscription on which the Directors may proceed to allotment is 20 per cent. of the shares offered.

A copy of the Company's Memorandum of Association, with the names, addresses and descriptions of the Signatories, and the number of Shares subscribed for by them respectively, will be found within the fold of, and forms part of, the Prospectus.

A brokerage of 6d. per Share will be paid by the Company in respect of all allotments upon applications identified as coming through Brokers and other Agents approved by the Directors.

Copies of the Memorandum and Articles of Association of the Company, and of the above-mentioned Contracts, Letters and Full Reports, and of the Concession, can be inspected at the Offices of the Solicitors to the Company at any time during business hours while the subscription list is open.

Application will be made to the Committee of the London Stock Exchange in due course for a special settlement of the Shares of the Company.

Applications for Shares must be on the form accompanying the Prospectus, and be forwarded to the Bankers of the Company or any of their branches, together with the amount payable on application. Where no allotment is made the deposit will be returned in full, and where the number of Shares allotted is less than the number applied for the surplus so paid will be applied towards the amount due on allotment, and any balance remaining will be returned. Failure to pay any instalment on the Shares allotted when due will render previous payments liable to forfeiture.

Full Prospectuses (upon the terms of which alone applications will be received) and Forms of Application for Shares can be obtained at the Registered Offices of the Company or from the Bankers, Solicitors, Brokers or Auditors.

This form may be used and sent with deposit of 5s. per Share payable on application to the LONDON CITY & MIDLAND BANK, LIMITED, Threadneedle Street, London, E.C., or Branches. If remittance be made by cheque, the same should be drawn in favour of the Company or Bearer, and crossed to the Company's account.

To the Directors of THE FERGHANA OIL FIELDS, LIMITED.

"TRUTH" PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best EPIGRAM, CONUNDRUM, LIPOGRAM, BOUTS-RIMÉS, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this Journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the TRUTH Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a quarter to the same competitor.

7. ALL NEW CONTRIBUTORS ARE REQUIRED TO FORWARD WITH THEIR FIRST ANSWERS THEIR REAL NAMES AN ADDRESSES FOR REGISTRATION; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed twelve, and must under no circumstances consist of more than fourteen, letters.

9. COMPETITORS MUST ON NO ACCOUNT CHANGE THE NOMS-DE-PLUME THEY HAVE ONCE ASSUMED.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed:—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," CARTERET STREET, QUEEN ANNE'S GATE, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 1658.

A correspondent writes to point out to me that though TRUTH's weekly Puzzles deal with a great variety of topics, we have never yet had a competition that makes special appeal to our musical readers. My correspondent further goes on to suggest the particular form that such a competition might take; and as the suggestion appears to me to be a good one, I have adopted it with slight modifications.

The competition (for which the usual weekly Prize of Two Guineas is offered) will be as follows:—

TO DRAW UP A PROGRAMME OF INSTRUMENTAL MUSIC SUITABLE FOR PERFORMANCE BY A CRACK ORCHESTRA; SUCH PROGRAMME TO CONSIST OF SIX ITEMS, ONE EACH FROM THE WORKS OF BEETHOVEN, WAGNER, BACH, GRIEG, DVORAK, AND TSCHAIKOWSKY. THE TIME OF THE CONCERT TO BE LIMITED TO 2 HOURS.

The Prize award will be determined by plébiscite.

No competitor may submit more than one programme; and all programmes must reach TRUTH Office not later than by the first post on Monday, December 5th.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

 The real name, with the address, of NYMPH, winner of one-seventh of TRUTH Prize No. 1647, is Mrs. Woodfin, 51, Sutherland Avenue, W.

KORAH.—Many thanks for your suggestion, which you will see I have adopted.

AMUINN and KROY.—I am greatly obliged by suggestions, of which I hope to be able to avail myself in due course.

RIGOR MORTIS.—Your change of address duly noted.

YES TOR.—I have taken a note of the misprint to which you call my attention.

VARIOUS PRIZE AWARDS WILL BE ANNOUNCED NEXT WEEK.

THE OPERATIONS OF THE COMPANY EMBRACE ALL BRANCHES OF INSURANCE.

DEATH DUTIES.—Special forms of Policies have been prepared by the Company providing for the payment of Death Duties, thus avoiding the necessity of disturbing investments at a time when it may be difficult to realise without loss.

INCOME TAX.—Under the provisions of the Act, Income Tax is not payable on that portion of the Assured's income which is devoted to the payment of annual premiums on an assurance on his life or on the life of his wife. Having regard to the amount of the Tax, this abatement (which is limited to one-sixth of the Assured's income) is an important advantage to Life Policyholders.

Full particulars of all classes of Insurance, together with Proposal Forms and Statement of Accounts, may be had on application to any of the Company's Offices or Agents.

ENTRE NOUS.

I HAVE to acknowledge with many thanks a number of useful contributions to the Truth Toy Fund and the Tress Barry Fund. At the same time I hope I may be excused for again pressing the claims of these two funds upon all sections of Truth readers. I do not suppose for a moment that any one would wish that the annual Truth treat to the children in the London workhouses and hospitals should be shorn of any of its delights by a general election. At the same time a political crisis is apt to put other things out of people's heads, and it also takes away from London a large number of regular subscribers and makes other financial demands upon them just at the moment when Truth is asking for their money. Circumstances consequently compel me to entreat every reader again to send in his or her contribution without further delay, and to make it as big as possible. The following are the amounts that have been received during the past week:—

This year's Christmas Number of Truth has been received with more than usual favour, and requests have been made from all parts of the country for copies of the coloured cartoon "Tariff Reform" for electioneering purposes. It was impossible at first to comply with these requests, the stock on hand being only sufficient to meet the demand for the Christmas Number itself. The cartoon, however, has now been reprinted, and, though this is contrary to all precedent, out of consideration for the special circumstances of the moment it can now be supplied separately at the price of 3d. per copy (including postage) or 4s. the quire of 26 copies, carriage paid. As the number available is limited, applications for the cartoon should be made as soon as possible. I may add that as these copies will be rolled, not folded, they will be specially suitable for framing.

I have much pleasure in publishing the following communication:—

Tom Smith and Co., Limited,
Manufacturers of Christmas Crackers, Fine Confections, etc.,
Wilson Street, Finsbury Square, E.C.

London, November 28, 1910.

Dear Truth,—I am again reserving some fifteen to twenty thousand Christmas Crackers for the Truth Toy Fund.

Wishing you every success in your good work.—I remain, yours faithfully, Tom Smith.

Mr. Tom Smith has made this handsome contribution to the Truth Toy Distribution for more years than I can count at the moment, and I have been repeatedly told that the parcels of crackers give unspeakable delight to the children in the Poor Law Institutions.

The King and Queen have returned to Sandringham for the celebration of Queen Alexandra's sixty-sixth birthday to-morrow. Their Majesties will probably spend most of next week at Buckingham Palace. The arrangements of the Court have been very uncertain, partly owing to the confusion in public affairs, and also on account of various private matters.

The King will decide this week, after consultation with Queen Alexandra, whether the memorial service in the Frogmore Mausoleum on January 22 is to be continued. King Edward changed the date of the service from December 14 to January 22, and it has been proposed that in future it should be held on May 6.

Their Majesties' first "circle" of guests at Windsor Castle included the Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife, Prince and Princess Louis of Battenberg and Princess Louise of Battenberg, the Archbishop of York, the Duke and Duchess of Devonshire, the Duke and Duchess of Teck, Mr. and Mrs. Asquith, Lord Morley of Blackburn, Mr. and Mrs. Winston Spencer-Churchill, Lord Chesterfield, Lord Spencer, and Sir Gerald and Lady Lowther. There will be another series of guests at Windsor Castle during the first and second weeks of January, when there will be several days' shooting in the Great Park.

The King had four days' shooting last week in Windsor Great Park, and excellent bags of pheasants and ground game were obtained. On Wednesday there was drenching rain with a dense fog, which stopped the shooting. The King and his guests drove in the morning to the Flemish Farm, but heavy rain came on, so shooting was given up for the day. The statement in a daily paper that "record bags" were obtained during the week is rubbish. Game was plentiful, but there was not a sufficient number of guns to realise huge bags.

It is expected that during one of his visits to Sandringham the King will shoot at Holkham with Lord Leicester, and probably on another day his Majesty will be the guest of Mr. Neumann at Rainham, Lord Townshend's place. The King had a day's shooting during his late stay at Sandringham on the Houghton preserves, which are among the best in Norfolk. The shooting at Houghton has been renowned since the days of Sir Robert Walpole. Houghton Hall has been let to Cora Lady Strafford and Mr. Kennard since Colonel and Mrs. Ralph Vivian terminated their tenancy. The Walpole estates now belong to Lord Cholmondeley.

The Houghton Hall estate was offered for sale in 1886, but no purchaser could be found for the property. If this estate had been in the market in 1862 it would have been purchased for King Edward (then Prince of Wales), and inquiries were made as to the possibility of its being sold by the then Lord Cholmondeley. The place was in every way more suitable for a Royal residence than Sandringham, and the estate was in good order, whereas everything on the Sandringham property had been dreadfully neglected by Mr. Spencer Cowper only excepting the preserves.

The Empress Frederick had a great liking for Houghton, and she usually visited this place when staying at Sandringham. When the Empress was in England a few months after her husband's death she seriously contemplated becoming the tenant of Houghton Hall, but when she returned to Germany she decided to build herself a château on the Taunus Hills, and the idea of making a settlement in England was abandoned.

The Duke and Duchess of Teck have given up the small place at Holkham, which they have occupied for several months, and they will spend the winter in town. It is very likely that they may go to the Isle of Wight for a few weeks later on, in which case the King is to lend them Barton Manor.

A weekly contemporary prints a story about Prince John, the youngest son of the King and Queen, which is, of course, complete fiction. It is most discreditable that such abominable trash should be published in any newspaper, for it is hard that a boy of five should be represented in so odious a light. It is inconceivable that any one except an idiot could believe that any child of that age would talk in such a way. Whatever slackness there may be in trade generally, there is always a brisk manufacture going on of anecdotes of the "lie circumstantial" kind about Royal personages in all countries, but they are not usually taken such liberties with when still in the nursery.

The Duchess Dowager of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha is now residing at Coburg, and about the middle of January she will proceed to the Riviera for a stay of several months at the Château de Fabron, her property near Nice. It is possible that the Duchess may come to England in January for a week or two on a visit to Queen Alexandra at Sandringham Hall.

The Empress Marie has been staying at Copenhagen during the last three weeks, and she will return shortly to Russia, intending to spend the early part of the winter at the Castle of Gatchina, her favourite residence near St. Petersburg. It is very likely that the Empress Marie and Queen Alexandra will go for a cruise in the Mediterranean in one of the Russian Imperial yachts during the early spring months. It is expected that the Empress will pay a short visit to the Grand Duke and Grand Duchess of Mecklenburg Schwerin at Ludwigslust when on her way back to Russia from Denmark.

The King of Norway arrived in England on Saturday, and he at once joined the Queen at Appleton House, near Sandringham, where she had been staying since the 12th. It is expected that their Majesties will reside at Appleton until about December 15, when they will come to town on a visit to the King and Queen at Buckingham Palace. The King and Queen of Norway are to leave London on Monday, December 19, or Tuesday, the 20th, for Copenhagen, where they will pay a short visit to the King and Queen of Denmark before returning to Christiania.

Prince and Princess Nicholas of Greece, who arrived in London from Paris on Saturday, the 19th, were last week on a visit to Lord Howe at Gopsall Hall, where there was a small shooting party. This is the first Royal visit to Gopsall since King Edward and Queen Alexandra spent a week there about seven years ago.

The house at Gopsall was built during the reign of George II. by Charles Jennens at a cost of over £100,000. There is a fine Corinthian front and portico, and the principal rooms are very handsome. Handel frequently resided at Gopsall, and some of his music is preserved in the library, but the rare and splendid collection of the early editions of Shakespeare has been dispersed. The gardens are well laid out, and the deer park of 500 acres is richly wooded. The principal lodge is a model of the Arch of Constantine.

The Gopsall copy of the Shakespeare First Folio (1623), which was sold by Lord Howe some time ago for over £2,000, has since been purchased privately by Mr. James Glen, of Glasgow. It is in all respects a perfect copy, with the fly-leaf containing Ben Jonson's lines on Shakespeare's portrait, and the title-page with the Droeshout portrait. This copy was acquired by Charles Jennens, the intimate friend of Handel, and when he died in 1773 he bequeathed his valuable collections to the first Baron Howe, who inherited his immense property.

A weekly contemporary announces that the Duc d'Orléans has rented the Château St. Michel at Cannes for the season, and that he will be accompanied to the Riviera by Queen Amélie and King Manuel. Of course, this is all nonsense, as the Duc d'Orléans is not permitted to enter France. The Château St. Michel (which was for some seasons the residence of the late Lord Glenesk) has been sold to the Duc de Nemours (the son of the late Duc d'Alençon). It is probable that Queen Amélie and King Manuel will leave England shortly on their way to Italy, in which case they are to be the guests for some time of Queen Maria Pia (the Queen Dowager of Portugal) at Naples.

The office of Clerk Comptroller in the Department of the Board of Green Cloth, under the Lord Steward, has been placed at the King's disposal by the sudden death of Captain Webster, late Coldstream Guards, who was appointed to this post by King Edward in 1901. Captain Webster had been transacting business at Windsor Castle on Tuesday, and he died in the evening at Frogmore Cottage from heart disease.

Lieutenant-General the Earl of Dundonald, Colonel of the 2nd Life Guards, is to be the Gold Stick-in-Waiting on the King during December, replacing Field-Marshal Lord Grenfell, Colonel of the 1st Life Guards.

---

A contemporary stated the other day that the Duke of Argyll has been "reappointed" Governor of Windsor Castle, and another journal states that he has been "confirmed" in that post by King George. Both statements are incorrect and founded on absolute ignorance of the conditions under which this office is held. The Governor or Constable of the Round Tower (this is the proper title) does not lose his place on a demise of the Crown, as the office is held for life. When William the Fourth died in 1837, Lord Munster, was Governor of Windsor Castle, and he delivered up his keys of office to Queen Victoria. Shortly afterwards, however, Lord Melbourne discovered that the post was held for life, so the keys were returned to Lord Munster. The late Queen had already appointed her uncle, the Duke of Sussex, and he got the post when Lord Munster died in 1841. The Duke of Sussex was replaced by Prince Albert, after whose death Prince Victor of Hohenlohe-Langenburg (Count Gleichen) was appointed, and he was succeeded in 1892 by the Duke of Argyll. There is a salary of £1,200 a year, which is paid out of the Civil List.

My Dublin correspondent writes:—

Poor old Father Christmas is meeting with a very upsetting and unexpected hustling as he makes his usual early approach. Here, although we have never been much given to the British National Anthem—which, indeed, has always been worked as a "party tune," and mostly played with the accompaniment of a waving flag showing fine splashes of Orange in its flutterings—not a few would join heartily in singing "Confound their politics." They certainly—no matter of what sort—do not tend to the promotion and development of these amiable feelings, which get their best chance of the year, within the human heart, at Christmas-time. We are all in the same boat, however, which is a consolation.

Last week shooting parties and sport went on as usual through the country, and what might be called odds and ends of unpolitical gatherings in Dublin. The end of the week, however, brought the first bayings of the dogs of war. Lord Herbert's appearance as the Unionist candidate for the St. Stephen's Green division of Dublin was somewhat of a surprise. His father, Lord Pembroke, an Englishman, has never resided in Ireland, nor even paid many visits to the country. He is, however, the owner of a very large property in Dublin and its near environs, Merrion and Fitzwilliam Squares, the best residential parts of the town and its southern suburbs mostly belonging to him. The Pembroke estate is very well managed, and Lord Pembroke, if he enjoys the rights, fulfils generously the duties of a landlord. Lord and Lady Pembroke have lately been in Ireland staying at Mount Merrion with their daughter, Lady Beatrix Wilkinson. She and her husband have left Ireland, and are going to Ceylon for the benefit of Captain Neville Wilkinson's health, which has been bad for some time. The duty of proclaiming King George in Dublin, at various places, was performed by Captain Wilkinson, who is "Ulster King of Arms," which gives Lord Pembroke a further connection with Ireland.

The Duchess of St. Albans left Dublin, where she had been making a short stay, for Newtown Anner, her Irish residence in the South. Lord and Lady Granard also paid it a passing visit. The Dowager Lady Granard, with her daughters, has been staying for some time in Dublin.

Lady Gregory's "At Home" at the Abbey Theatre was a leading social event last week, and had a business side as well. Lady Gregory and Mr. W. Yeats have at last been successful in arousing the interest of society, and the attendance at the "At Home" was highly fashionable. Amongst those present were Lady Ardilaun, whose party included Lady Kenmare, Lord and Lady Plunket, Lady Lyttelton—who frequently brings parties to the "Abbey" plays—Mrs. E. Guinness and Countess Metternich, Lord O'Brien, Hon. G. O'Brien, Lady Walker, Lady Robinson, and Sir J. Barton. The question of the public paying for the upkeep of a theatre in any other than the usual way through attending its performances, is a difficult one. The majority do not go to theatres for instruction, but for amusement. Individualism is very strong in the matter of amusement—it is impossible to persuade people that they are amused when they are not, and in that case they will not go to a theatre. Just as with a woman's will:

> "If she will, she will, you may depend on't;
> And if she won't, she won't, so there's an end on't."

Lady Betty Balfour has again been in Dublin speaking in the Woman's Suffrage cause. She is a strong advocate of it, being a good speaker and a clever and cultured woman, though it may be that her well-reasoned and eloquent addresses are not so compelling as less ladylike methods and rougher force.

This year has been a very quiet one in Viceregal circles—in fact, there has been practically little or no viceregal entertaining, and hence much open grumbling in Dublin, with regard to the long depression in the society industry. Some weeks ago the official announcement was made at Dublin Castle that Lord and Lady Aberdeen would not begin the "season" as usual, in January or February, no reason being given. It is not easy to understand why there should be a Lord Lieutenant with a large Viceregal establishment and State residence, except with the object of giving some industrial advantages of a Court to the Irish capital. The Chief Secretary, as everyone knows, and not the Lord Lieutenant, is the Governor of Ireland. The Lord Lieutenant who understands that his duties are mainly ornamental makes the best "King" at Dublin Castle. Such duties play an important and useful part in the modern world. Lord Aberdeen was in residence last week at the Viceregal Lodge, Lady Aberdeen paying a short visit to the other side of the water. Lord Aberdeen made a few public appearances during the week and some sympathetic speeches. This week he presides at a dinner at the Corinthian Club.

The Grand Duke Michael Michailovitch and Countess Torby were staying last week at Walcot Park, Lord Powis' place in Shropshire, which is let to Captain and Mrs. Quintin Dick, along with about 9,000 acres of excellent shooting. Walcot is a large, plain house of red brick, without any architectural merit, though the grounds are beautiful. Lord Clive purchased the Walcot estate from the Walcots after his return from India, and he astounded the inhabitants of the district by turning out a herd of buffaloes into the neighbouring Forest of Clun, which during the sixteenth century was a noted preserve for roes and red deer. The Grand Duke Michael and Countess Torby are this week on a visit to Lord and Lady Craven at Combe Abbey, near Coventry.

The late Mr. Mitchell Henry was at one time a prominent figure in Irish politics. He sat in the House of Commons from 1871 until 1885 as a Home Ruler of the Isaac Butt school, and at the general election of 1885 he was returned as a Liberal. He joined the Unionists during the spring of 1886, but his Parliamentary career ended with the general election a few months later, and this closed his public life. Mr. Mitchell Henry was a practising surgeon in London in early life, but abandoned his profession in 1862, when he was offered the chance of becoming a partner in a flourishing business at Manchester. He afterwards purchased a large estate (part of the vast property of the Blakes) in Galway, and expended a great sum of money in building Kylemore Castle and laying out the garden and grounds at that place. He also planted extensively. The Kylemore property was sold some years ago to the Duke and Duchess of Manchester.

Mr. Markenfield Addey, whose death, at the age of ninety-two, was announced last week, was actively concerned in literary enterprises for nearly twenty years, and when failing sight obliged him to give up business, in 1857, he went to the United States, where he founded a newspaper which proved most successful. He returned to England in 1898, and had since resided at Louth. He traced his descent from one of the oldest Yorkshire families, the Markenfields of Markenfield, and defaced effigies of members of the family who died during the reign of Edward III. are to be seen in one of the chapels of Ripon Cathedral. A Markenfield distinguished himself at Flodden Field. The family estates were confiscated by Queen Elizabeth, as their then owner was actively concerned in a plot for the release of Mary Queen of Scots.

The late Mr. John Tate, of Alnwick, was one of the best known residents in Northumberland, and for over fifty years he had been a prominent figure in the county. Mr. Tate was agent for several large estates in Northumberland, and he was actively concerned in county business and in several branches of public affairs.

Mr. Walter Scott Seton-Karr, who died last week at his residence in Kirkcudbrightshire at the age of eighty-eight, was a son of Mr. Andrew Seton-Karr, of Kippilaw, Roxburghshire, who was a friend and neighbour of Sir Walter Scott, who was his son's godfather. Mr. Seton-Karr was educated at Rugby under Arnold. He had a distinguished career in the Bengal Civil Service, and Lord Dalhousie entertained a very high opinion of his capacity for public business, but towards the close of Lord Canning's Government he encountered a serious reverse in connection with the troubles arising out of the indigo riots of 1860-1, and it was generally thought that he had been badly treated. Mr. Seton-Karr was afterwards a judge of the High Court at Calcutta for six years, and for ten years before he left India he was the Foreign Secretary to the Indian Government. On returning to England he occupied himself with all kinds of public work of a practically useful kind, and he made three attempts to enter the House of Commons.

The Duchess of Westminster has taken up her residence at Eaton Hall for the winter. The Duchess proceeded to Germany on a visit to her sister, the Princess of Pless, after her yachting cruise in the Mediterranean, which terminated at Venice. The Duke of Westminster is expected back from South Africa early in January, and there will be a party at Eaton directly after his return for pheasant and wild-fowl shooting. The Duke will reside at Eaton during the remainder of the hunting season, but the Duchess will probably go to the Riviera in February to join the Princess of Pless, who has been ordered to pass the winter in the south of Europe.

The Pope has conferred the historic Order of St. Sylvester upon the Duke of Norfolk. This decoration, formerly known as the Order of the Golden Spur, is said to have been founded by Constantine the Great and continued by the Pope Sylvester. The authentic records of the Order do not go further back than the middle of the sixteenth century.

THE VILLAIN OF THE PIECE.

(By Himself.)

J*HN K*DM*ND (soliloquises).

I hardly know myself, I say;
By Fate's most strange caprice,
It seems that I am cast to play
The villain of the piece.

I don't feel like a villain much—
(I'm harmless as a lamb);
Yet as the Tories dub me such—
Well, I suppose I am.

To H. H. Asquith I dictate
(The thing is quite untrue);
Yet thus the Tory papers state;
So I suppose I do.

Lloyd George is on his knees to me—
A fact, no jesting quiz;
On this the Tory Press agree;
So I suppose he is.

Vile treason's schemes within my mind
Are hatched (from truth 'tis far);
Yet there those schemes the Tories find,
So there, no doubt, they are.

I scan the Mail, and every time
My wonder doth increase,
To learn new facts, which prove that I'm
The villain of the piece.

The paper showing expenses at the Parliamentary election of January, 1910, was published most opportunely a few days ago. As we are promised a Bill dealing with this subject, as well as payment of members, next session, there will be an unusual interest shown in these masses of figures and data. The first observation to be made on them is that they do not show what a general election costs. The money disbursed privately and that spent by auxiliary bodies, such as the Tariff Reform League, the Free Trade Union, the Budget League, and so forth, is not shown, and cannot be given. The second observation is that in most cases the total disbursed by candidates exceeded, often substantially, the maximum allowed under the Corrupt Practices Act of 1883. A candidate's legal maximum is shown at £770 in a certain borough; his return shows that he spent £856.

In January last the total cost of the election is returned at £1,296,382, of which about £230,902 was returning officers' expenses. This casts a light on the problem of paying the expenses by the State. To pay the returning officers' expenses only would be but a very small relief. The average cost of each vote appears to have been 3s. 10d. in England and Wales, 4s. 5d. in Scotland, and 2s. 11d in Ireland. Such averages are apt to be misleading, and they are so in this case; for a little examination shows that there were many cases where the cost of each vote did not exceed 1s.; whereas in the College Green Division Major O'Connor's votes cost 11s. 9d. each; in Peebles Mr. Younger's cost 10s. 5d. each; in Ross Mr. McLean's cost 16s. 2d.; and in Orkney Mr. Hemsley's cost 29s. 6d. each. These disparities are explained by local circumstances in some cases, but not in all.

Election expenditure, however, is a trifling matter to-day in comparison with a hundred years ago. A contemporary mentioned the other day that the great contest between the families of Lascelles and Wentworth Fitzwilliam for the county of York about a century ago cost £100,000. This is far under the mark. This election lasted fourteen days, and its total cost was nearly £300,000. In the same year Wellesley Pole expended £80,000 in contesting Wiltshire, his bill for ribbons alone amounting to over £4,000.

A lady named Mary Mortimer Maxwell, who has lived in this country and also in the United States, has just contributed six articles to the Evening News on the cost of living, and whether it is easier in England or the United States. She comes to the conclusion that one can be more comfortable in the United States on the same amount of money. Not only does this conclusion surprise me, but it is contrary to the conclusions of all our Consuls, and other people, who probably have better means for comparison than Mrs. Maxwell. She has confused two things, as it seems to me. That wages are higher no one disputes, but prices of nearly all necessaries and of all luxuries are much higher also. But the article is presumably only produced for electioneering purposes.

TO POLITICIANS AND ELECTION AGENTS.—Copies of the popular coloured cartoon "Tariff Reform" in the TRUTH Christmas Number can now be supplied, carriage paid, at the price of 3d. each, or 4s. the quire of 26. Orders accompanied by remittance should be addressed to the Manager, TRUTH Office, Carteret St., London, S.W.

For some time past I have avoided, as far as possible, references to the begging letters issued by the Rev. George Brooks in connection with the various "works" which he undertakes. It seems to me that his colossal egotism and the ill success of his endeavours to quarter himself on the benevolence of the wealthy classes have so affected this gentleman's mental balance that his utterances are best passed over in silence. My attention has been called, however, by one or two well-known people to Mr. Brooks's most recent manifesto, which really seems to challenge comment. It seems that his latest idea has been to take the British Monarchy under his wing. For this purpose he has formed a "Royalist League of Royalists" "to uphold the Monarchy as an essential part of the British Constitution; to defend the Throne and the Royal Family against Socialist and Republican attack; to exact retribution, swift and sure, for insults offered to his Majesty the King or other Royal personages," etc., etc. Lord Suffield, in a misguided moment, seems to have consented to become the president of this serio-comic organisation.

It further appears that Brooks has had the impertinence to write to Queen Alexandra, calling her Majesty's attention to some offensive anti-monarchical utterances that he has got hold of, with the result that on August 5 Lord Knollys wrote acknowledging his letter and enclosures, and stating that her Majesty was "shocked and distressed at the utterances." It is outrageous enough that a man of Brooks's type should take upon himself to "shock and distress" Queen Alexandra in the first months of her widowhood by obtruding this offensive matter upon her notice for no other purpose but to advertise himself and his subscription-hunting movement. But, not content with this, Brooks is now circulating the letter thus obtained from Lord Knollys in connection with an appeal for funds for his preposterous league, and this notwithstanding that the letter is marked "Private." It is not likely that this latest Brooks movement will be more successful in drawing subscriptions than its predecessors; but the letter from Lord Knollys and the appearance of Lord Suffield as "president" of the scheme may induce a certain number of foolish people to part with money in response to this particular appeal, and Lord Suffield is very much to blame for allowing Brooks the use of his name. His lordship would do well to procure a copy of the "TRUTH Cautionary List" and acquaint himself with the record of the distinguished mendicant with whom he has associated himself.

The sale on Friday, at Puttick and Simpson's, of a panel of Arras tapestry for £6,600 affords further proof of the folly of owners of such property who are so infatuated as to sell it in the country instead of sending it to London. This tapestry, which was once owned by Cardinal Wolsey, was long the property of the Rev. Francis V. J. Arundell, who died in 1846, and it was one of the but little regarded pieces of furniture in Landulph Rectory, Cornwall. The contents of this house were sold after the rector's death, and this panel realised about £2. It has been for many years in the possession of the Misses Bray, of Bude, who had no idea of its value until recently. The vendors were very wise in refusing the offers they had lately received to sell privately, as the tapestry realised more than twice the highest bid which had previously been made for it.

The rejection of the Greek statute at Oxford is attributed to the singularly unfortunate wording of the preamble, which proposed universal exemption from Greek. If it had provided for the partial abolition of Greek the preamble would probably have been carried. Professor Murray (who holds the Greek chair) made the best speech, and he was quite willing to abolish compulsory Greek in the Schools of Science and Mathematics. The inevitable result of universal exemption from Greek would be the absolute extinction of the study of that language before many years had elapsed. Professor Murray takes the sensible view that a man desirous of being examined in only one ancient language should have the choice of Greek or Latin.

The King Edward Chair of English Literature at Cambridge, which Sir Harold Harmsworth has endowed with £20,000, is to be in the gift of the Crown. The professorship is not to be in Language and Literature, but is to deal with the subject "on literary and critical rather than philological and linguistic lines."

The President and Fellows of Trinity College, Oxford, have presented the Rev. J. H. Jaques, vicar of St. Nicholas, Plumstead, to the living of Newbold Verdon, near Leicester, which is of the net value of about £450 a year, with residence. Newbold Verdon has some interesting associations, as the ancient manor house was the residence of Lady Mary Wortley Montagu, and previously of Lord Crewe, the celebrated Bishop of Durham.

Professor Flint, who died at Edinburgh on Friday, was the most distinguished theologian in Scotland, and his philosophical reputation was quite as high. He succeeded Ferrier in the chair of Moral Philosophy at St. Andrews in 1864, and was transferred to the Chair of Divinity at Edinburgh in 1876. He filled both Chairs with brilliant efficiency, and he was most popular among the students. His career as a professor ended in 1903, as he wished to devote himself exclusively to literary work He never took any active part in Church affairs, and he refused to accept the office of Moderator of the General Assembly. He was an admirable preacher of the severely intellectual type, but with no special graces of delivery. His Baird Lectures on Theism and Anti-Theistic Theories attracted attention all over the world, and were warmly praised by the late Dr. Liddon, who was not given to eulogise the productions of Presbyterian divines. Flint's works on the Philosophy of History were also most successful. He was a man of wide sympathies and large views, and at Edinburgh he exercised a most valuable influence upon theological students and young ministers.

Dr. James MacGregor, who also died on Friday, had long enjoyed the reputation of being one of the most eloquent preachers in Scotland, and he was quite as effective as a platform speaker. Wherever he was announced to preach the church was densely crowded, and at a public meeting he always excited tremendous enthusiasm. Dr. MacGregor had been a Royal Chaplain "in Scotland" since 1886, and in 1891 he was Moderator of the General Assembly, succeeding his intimate friend "A.K.H.B." in that office. He was minister of St. Cuthbert's, Edinburgh, for thirty-seven years, and resigned his parish only three months ago. He was a model clergyman, and laboured with untiring energy, every branch of the parish work being thoroughly organised. At the same time he had a most attractive personality, and exercised a magnetic influence over people of all classes. Not the least of his gifts was a fund of dry wit, and he was once described as "a hogshead of well-refined good stories."

Westminster Abbey is to be closed early in March, in order that the arrangements for the Coronation may be carried out in good time. There will be some special galleries for a part of the company, and a temporary building is to be erected just outside the west door. The Earl Marshal and the Great Chamberlain will have the management of the whole affair.

Lord Clinton has presented the Rev. C. E. Burkitt, curate-in-charge at Littleham (the mother church of Exmouth) to the rectory of Langtree, North Devon, which is of the net value of about £330 a year, with residence.

Some amazing nonsense was printed lately in a Church newspaper about Palmerstonian bishops, who were described as "good worthy men . . . who had piety, but little intelligence, and no force of character." This criticism of Lord Palmerston's appointments can only be described as grotesque, considering that his nominations to the episcopal bench included such highly distinguished prelates as Archbishops Tait and Thomson and Bishops Harold Brown, Jeune, Ellicott, Baring, Jacobson, and Phillpott. For some years Lord Palmerston offered nearly every see which became vacant to Dr. Vaughan, who was understood to have refused (i.a.) Durham, when Bishop Longley was translated to York, and Ely, when Bishop Turton died. At least four of the bishops I have mentioned were men of great learning and the authors of valuable standard works.

The Augustinian Fathers of the Church of St. John the Baptist, Thomas Street, Dublin, may be interested to learn that my wastepaper basket is being daily gorged with packets of tickets for the lottery they are promoting. The lottery is fixed for next June, and, judging from the scale on which the tickets are already being sent out, the Fathers intend to offer them to the whole population of Great Britain. It is a pity these holy men cannot realise what a very unfavourable impression this method of raising church funds by an illegal gamble creates in the minds of the majority of people in this country. In particular, the practice of addressing lottery tickets to the "junior clerks" in business houses is rightly regarded as a most reprehensible and disgraceful proceeding on the part of ministers of religion.

The Indian papers report that General Sir E. Barrow, commanding the Southern Army, whilst en route from his retreat at Ootacamund to attend the Quetta manœuvres, was prevented by indisposition from proceeding beyond Karachi. Nor has any later news come to hand regarding the arrival at Quetta of this distinguished officer. No one can refuse sympathy to a distinguished public servant in such a case, but there is a point at which sentiment must yield to public interest. General Barrow's case has caused much comment in India for a long time, and, though no name was mentioned, reference was made to it in TRUTH several months ago. The time seems therefore, to have arrived when plain speaking is necessary.

A year ago General Barrow left Ootacamund for Aden. He became seriously ill at that place, but eventually returned to Ootacamund. Throughout the remainder of the training season he was unable to carry out any further inspections. Is the same thing to happen this year? This officer receives the highest military salary obtainable, with the exception of that drawn by the Commander-in-Chief. Practically his sole duty is to move about amongst the troops and inspect. If he is unable to do this he should be called upon to resign. The other Army commander in India, who was very energetic throughout last season, has recently resigned on account of ill-health. If Sir O'Moore Creagh from kindly motives of camaraderie is unwilling to act, perhaps some one else will. It seems a question for Lords Crewe and Hardinge.

Sir O'Moore Creagh is not proving a strong Indian Commander-in-Chief. Although he recently recommended that officers when going on leave to the hills should be allowed to use Form E, which confers the privilege of travelling first class at second class fare, his recommendation was overruled by the Government of India owing to the opposition of the Railway Board. The refusal is both dog-in-the-manger and short-sighted, for the many empty carriages now running at considerable haulage expense on the Indian State Railways would fill up with officers and their families if effect were given to the Commander-in-Chief's proposal. I understand that Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson led the opposition in the Viceroy's Council to granting the indulgence in the same pettifogging spirit of cheeseparing economy which made him so unpopular with the Army when he was Director-General of Finance at the War Office.

"SANITAS" is the Brand or Hall Mark of value for Disinfectants of all kinds, for use in the House, Stables, Kennels, &c. Pamphlet free. The Sanitas Co., Ltd., Limehouse, London, E.

The matter after all is one of business, not favour. The Great Western Railway Company does not issue cheap tickets to naval and military officers from philanthropic motives, but because it pays the company to grant facilities which are sufficient to tempt officers to make use of them. So it would be in India if Sir Guy Fleetwood Wilson and his friends had big instead of small minds. A young officer stationed in Bengal has now to think twice and thrice before starting off to shoot ibex in Kashmir, but if he could make the 1,000-mile journey there and back for half the present cost, off he would go without thinking once.

I have received a letter from an officer of the General Staff in India complaining of the number of generals and staff officers who hold high appointments in the Indian Army, and who are not Staff College graduates. The list which he forwards in support of his complaint shows that from the Commander-in-Chief down to brigade major there are forty-six p.s.c. men employed, as against sixty-five "common" officers. "I submit," he writes, "that no officer should hold command of any unit from and including a brigade upwards who has not been through the Staff College, and that no officer should hold a staff appointment, more especially on the General Staff, unless holding the some qualification."

---

I do not think the Indian Army will endorse my correspondent's proposal, which would cut out of office such good soldiers as General Sir O'M. Creagh, V.C., Major-General Sir A. Barrett (Adjutant-General), Lieut.-General Sir J. Wodehouse, Lieut.-General Sir A. Martin, and Major-General Bannatine-Allason, besides many other junior men who have won their spurs in the field, and are now holding staff appointments in India. An ounce of practice is worth a ton of theory. The Staff College is necessary as a peace substitute for war training; but it is nothing more. War is the best school for soldiering, and the Commander-in-Chief in India is right to select as staff officers men who have proved their worth in the field, whether or not they have p.s.c. after their names.

The Staff College is more useful in bringing mediocre officers of the South African "stupid" kind up to the necessary standard of average efficiency than in developing the military qualifications of first-class men. The former want direction; the latter can direct themselves. The best soldiers of the present day are not Staff College men, and have never wanted to be such. It would have been a wanton waste of time for such men as Lords Roberts and Wolseley, Lords Kitchener and Grenfell, Sir Henry Brackenbury and Sir John French to give up three of the best working years of their lives to academic study when their services were wanted for practical work.

During the South African War the non-certificated officer often came to the front where the p.s.c. man had to take a back seat. As I write I can recall the names of at least three generals, graduates of the College, who have been relegated to the obscurity which is the penalty of failure in the field. It would be cruel to put these men into the pillory; but the fact remains that a Camberly certificate is no guarantee of professional worth, and if its possession were made a condition of appointment the effect would be to lower the standard of staff efficiency throughout the Army.

From a communication received the other day I gather that during the past two years no less than nine barrack-wardens have been appointed to the barracks at Chester, not one of whom has eventually been confirmed in his appointment. These two years represent the time which the present barrack officer has been at the station. The natural inference seems to be that the failure of so many men to give satisfaction is attributable to the officer under whom they have to serve rather than themselves, for it is impossible to suppose that out of nine men sent to the station in two years not one is fit for his job. This barrack officer—a ranker, of course—is apparently in hopes of securing an angel as a barrack-warden. He ought to be instructed to modify his ideals and content himself with ordinary humanity, for his search after superhuman perfection is disastrous to the men and is calculated to increase the number of unemployed, whom the rest of us have to look after.

Many strange disclosures have been made in TRUTH respecting the "limpets" of the Army—the men who here and there contrive to hang on to the Service for ten or twenty years beyond the period allotted to ordinary mortals. A statement, however, which reaches me from Aldershot, if it be authentic, caps all records in this direction. It is said that there is still serving in the military police a non-commissioned officer who enlisted in 1869, and who has actually held his present rank for thirty years. The usual rule in the military police being that a man takes his discharge at twenty-one years' service, it would seem to follow that this veteran possesses such superhuman gifts as a policeman that for twenty years his superiors have felt that the Army would sustain an irreparable loss by his retirement. One would like to know more of the grounds for this opinion. It is almost superfluous to add that this military phenomenon has never, in all his forty-one years, served outside the United Kingdom. That is the usual rule in these cases. Apparently it is only by sticking closely to his native land that a soldier is able to convince his superiors that he is absolutely indispensable.

Captain Phillpotts, who has been for nearly two years flag-captain to Vice-Admiral Prince Louis of Battenberg and in command of the battleship Prince of Wales, has been appointed to the command of the Signal School at Portsmouth, in succession to Commander Edwards.

Captain Sir Arthur Henniker-Hugan has been appointed to the command of the Scottish Coastguard District, in the place of Captain Grant. He was last employed as flag-captain to Sir Assheton Curzon-Howe, when Commander-in-Chief of the Atlantic Fleet.

---

Fleet Surgeon Browne, who has just retired on the age limit, was at the top of the list of his rank, having joined the Navy as a surgeon in 1878. He has seen a great deal of active service, and narrowly missed receiving one of Lord Charles Beresford's "Well done Condor!" scarf-pins, joining that ship during the Egyptian war, but after the Alexandria bombardment.

The absorption of the Atlantic Fleet into the Home Fleet command is but a logical outcome of transferring the permanent base of this force from Gibraltar to Dover. When Sir John Jellicoe succeeds Prince Louis of Battenberg in the Atlantic command on December 20 next, the six battleships and affiliated cruiser squadron will come under the orders of Admiral Sir William May. The very diminished group which nowadays represents the Mediterranean Fleet will then be the only independent battleship squadron outside of the great home guard. Apart from the sound strategic reasons for the present policy of concentration, the mobility of our latest ships is a further justification for the new arrangement. A battle fleet of to-day can steam further in two days than its predecessor of even ten years ago in three.

If conclusive disproof is needed of the story that the battleship about to be laid down in Portsmouth Dockyard will be driven by internal combustion engines, it may be found in the fact that the turbines, of 31,000 i.h.p., have definitely been ordered for this ship. Taking the ratio between horse-power and displacement as a standard, it is evident that no increase of speed is to be attempted in the battleships of the 1910-11 programme. The Dreadnought, of 17,900 tons, has 23,500 i.h.p., for a contract speed of twenty-one knots, and the following are the figures for later ships designed for the same speed:—Collingwood, 19,250 tons, 24,500 i.h.p.; Neptune, 19,900 tons, 25,000 i.h.p.; Orion, 22,680 tons, 27,000 i.h.p. As the new ships are to be circa 26,000 tons, it will be seen that the previous ratio between burthen and turbine power is just about maintained.

Speaking at a political meeting at Barnstaple the other day, Captain C. N. Chichester, R.N., told his audience that "as he belonged to his Majesty's service, his tongue was somewhat tied." He succeeded, however, in unloosing it to the following extent:—

They might take it from him that "all is not well with the Navy." He had the pleasure of spending a week on board one of his Majesty's latest Dreadnoughts in the summer, and he was afraid he could not tell them all he saw there. He knew of a battleship that was going to carry out her battle practice. She went to Plymouth, but the ammunition was not there to draw, and she had to kick up her heels for a fortnight before she could get it. He also saw the destroyers off Scotland, and "a more shoddy lot of d——d ships I never saw."

When the gallant officer can get out as much as this with his tongue tied, one can only wonder what he would do if he were really able to let himself go.

It so happens that I have come into possession of some information relating to the only definite point of fact contained in Captain Chichester's tongue-tied babbling—namely, that a battleship due to carry out her battle practice was detained at Plymouth for a fortnight owing to want of ammunition. It appears that the only conditions under which such an occurrence would be possible—and there is no record of its having occurred at all since the comparatively recent introduction of battle practice—is in the event of a ship coming to the wrong port. Every warship is borne for 'completion of stores" at one of the great dockyards. If a Chatham ship called at Plymouth to draw ammunition for battle practice she would not get it. But this would not be, as Captain Chichester endeavours to suggest, because there is not at all times plenty of shot in the lockers of this arsenal. It is a pity that when tongue-tied officers get up on political platforms to "crab" their own Service for party purposes they should not first acquaint themselves with information which is accessible to a mere landlubber of a journalist in London.

In the course of a court-martial at Chatham last week, which sentenced a second-class writer named South to eighteen months' hard labour, an ingenious system of obtaining money by false pretences was disclosed. Fortified with blue papers and a calculating eye, South would interview stokers, telling them that they had been overpaid, and getting them to refund money, which he pocketed. No possible blame can be attached to the accountant officers of the ship. But the mystery to me is that even if the stokers victimised (and apparently South made a big bag) had not sufficient capacity of ready reckoning to know whether they had received too much money or not, they should not have smelt a rat in the suggestion that the paymaster had delegated the explanation of such serious blundering to a second-class writer.

In reference to the case of the boy Churchill, of H.M.S. Carnarvon, which was the subject of remarks in last week's TRUTH, I have received a letter from Captain Sclater's solicitors, from which it appears that the facts were somewhat incorrectly stated. Although the boy was in the first instance sentenced to twelve strokes with the cane, he did not actually receive them, his court-martial for the second offence of striking the yeoman of signals having apparently superseded the original sentence. It was therefore incorrect to suggest that his account with his superiors had been squared by the caning. Captain Sclater's solicitors also point out (1) that the captain did not bring the boy to a court-martial, though it is not stated who did; (2) that the captain only prosecuted on being detailed for that duty by the Commander-in-Chief; (3) that he did not give the boy an indifferent or any other character; (4) that the boy was originally charged with leave-breaking as well as insolence to a superior.

I cheerfully give publicity to these corrections; but as it is suggested that I have "seriously attacked and grievously wronged" Captain Sclater, I must demur to that view of the matter. My observations were made upon the whole case, but more particularly upon the "judicial ferocity" of the sentence which condemned this boy of under eighteen years of age first to imprisonment for six months and secondly to dismissal from the Service.

---

As regards the sentence of flogging, for which alone Captain Sclater can be held responsible, although it was not carried out, it seems to me a very severe punishment for the original offences, and it was the immediate cause of the boy losing his temper and incurring his further punishment. The point is that this boy at seventeen years of age is branded as a gaol bird and a hopelessly bad character, and condemned to the prospect, in all human probability, of becoming nothing but a nuisance and an expense to society for the rest of his days. Among them the naval authorities have brought him to this pass, and, however the blame is apportioned among individuals, the rest of us may fairly object to their collective method of dealing with troublesome boys. People who take children into their service for their own convenience must remember that they are children, and deal with them accordingly. If it is said that the interests of discipline require children to be dealt with on the principles applied to this boy Churchill, the answer is that if that is true, then the naval service is no place for children. But personally I do not believe it to be true.

The draconic methods of naval courts-martial have received another illustration in the case of Sub-Lieutenant Foster, of H.M.S. Gossamer, who has been sentenced to be deprived of six months' seniority and to be dismissed his ship for ordering sail to be made in the whaler of which he was in charge at Weymouth on November 6 The boat capsized and Surgeon Watt and Gunner Carter were drowned. The officer in charge seems to have made a mistake, but why punish a mere boy, who only got his single stripe on June 15 of last year, for having done what, in his judgment, was best? He was in the boat and shared the risk. The truth seems to be that he was young and inexperienced, and on that view of the matter the real blame rests on whoever put him in charge of a boat, and men's lives, in stormy weather. It seems to me a case in which responsibility should have been traced further back.

I am much obliged to officers in India who have drawn my attention to the new pamphlet which Mr. E. Piercy Henderson, the insurance broker, is now circulating, but I hardly think that the vapourings of this egregious gentleman about TRUTH and its staff are worthy of further notice. Besides advertising his own business and raging furiously all the time against TRUTH, Mr. Henderson now introduces into this pamphlet on life insurance an appeal to his readers—largely naval and military men—to follow his own noble example in the present "deadly crisis of the Empire's destiny" by joining the Navy League and the National Service League! "The general tone of the pamphlet," writes a Service correspondent, "shows him to be a person of no balance or poise of mind—a man to whom I should hesitate to entrust my affairs;" and I fancy Mr. Henderson will find that he really is doing himself no good by the distribution of this extraordinary effusion.

> Would it be impossible for Mr. Henderson to carry on business without publishing instances of officers who have acted dishonestly by him? To begin with, they may have done so by mistake, or it may be Mr. Henderson who is mistaken. But even supposing they really were dishonest, why write of it? Such a thing as dishonesty is to be found even in the Army. Yet would not a doctor or solicitor who published the fact of some client's defalcation be considered by everybody as a complete outsider? Or fancy a tailor, who, in a circular setting out his terms, stated that he much regretted that So-and-So had found it compatible with his honour to do such-and-such a thing. Would anyone deal with such a man? Yet the Services are said to consider this blatant pamphleteer as a boon!

The following extract from the Pioneer apropos of the retirement of Mr. Brajendranath De, Collector of Hooghly, the second officer in point of seniority of the Civil Service in Bengal, has been sent to me by an Indian correspondent. Coming from the columns of the leading THOS. GOODE & CO.—Exhibition of old and modern WEDGWOOD, including many specimens never previously exhibited.—South Audley Street, London.

Anglo-Indian journal, it seems to be well worth quoting for the cogitation of those who take illiberal and retrograde views with regard to the fitness of the Bengali to play a prominent part in the administration of his country. After mentioning that Mr. De has on three occasions officiated as Commissioner, "but permanent promotion has passed him by"—an implied rebuke for the Bengal Secretarial—the Pioneer says:—

Since 1905 Mr. De has been Collector of the Hooghly District, and it can hardly be accidental that, while the other environs of Calcutta have been seething in disturbance and disorder, Hooghly, only twenty-four miles distant, has known nothing worse than a few petty cases of boys shouting "Bande Mataram." When some of these youths once took to throwing mud at Europeans, the people themselves took them in charge and brought them before the Collector for such punishment as he should award. If it had been possible to multiply Mr. De sufficiently there would have been no trouble in Bengal; but these are the men who glide out of the service unnoticed, while the person who is chiefly responsible for the mischief probably makes his exit under salutes in a coat covered with ribbon and stars.

There are income-tax grievances without number—to many people the very existence of the tax is a grievance—but they rarely receive such frank official recognition as in the following case. Anticipating that his income would, as usual, exceed £2,000 for the year, one of my readers did not claim to be assessed below the maximum rate of 1s. 2d. He made his return in April, and the claim to the lower rate has to be sent in before September 30. Too late he found that, owing mainly to certain unexpected reductions of dividends, his income for the year fell short of £2,000, and he thereupon put forward a claim. The authorities were sympathetic, but powerless, the claimant's solicitor eventually receiving the following letter:—

Mr. Lloyd George, while admitting that Mr. —— is suffering under an undoubted hardship, regrets that, in view of the explicit terms of Section 19 (4) of the Finance Act, 1907, he is unable to authorise the Board of Inland Revenue to grant him the relief which he seeks.

What happened in this case must often happen in the case of taxpayers who honestly estimate their incomes when making their returns, and the refusal of any relief if the loss of income does not occur before September 30—six months before the end of the financial year for which the tax is levied—is plainly calculated to encourage the making of—well, let us say, very conservative estimates. In the long run that must be detrimental to the revenue. Apart, however, from this last consideration, it is monstrous that a taxpayer, admittedly "suffering under an undoubted hardship," should be unable to obtain redress owing to the provisions of the Act. Mr. Lloyd George, or whoever may be Chancellor of the Exchequer when the next Finance Act is passed, ought to see to it that the necessary amendment of the law is made.

The Town Clerk of Bath has sent me the following report, which was adopted at the last meeting of the Bath Education Committee. TRUTH is the "London paper" to which the sub-committee refer:

The sub-committee have considered the two paragraphs which appeared recently in a London paper, to the former of which Mr. Workman referred at the last meeting of the Education Committee, with regard to street collections in Bath, and particularly to that which was made on October 8 in aid of the Seamen's and Boatmen's Friend Society. Careful inquiries have been made, with the following results: Out of 39 departments, 6 departments only were concerned in the matter, and out of 402 boys and 773 girls attending those six departments, only 27 boys and 41 girls took boxes. The Education Committee were not informed of the proposal to make a street collection, neither were the managers of the schools. All the arrangements were made by the head teachers on their own responsibility. The local education authority can only control the Council schools; from these schools only thirteen children took part in the collection.

The sub-committee disapprove of school collections generally and the methods adopted by the promoters in this instance in obtaining the assistance of scholars, and recommend that instructions be issued to Council schools which will prevent any connection between them and similar collections in future. They recommend, also, that the managers of the non-provided schools be asked to give similar instructions to their head teachers.

Of course, I never suggested that the Bath Education Committee or the managers of the schools were responsible for what occurred. I did, however, express surprise at the tone of the remarks which fell from certain members of the committee when they discussed my first paragraph on the subject, and I am glad to learn that collectively the committee has now recorded its disapproval of the employment of school children in such street collections. The steps now very properly taken to prevent the repetition of a most reprehensible proceeding show that my criticisms, though resented by some individuals, were fully justified.

THE BRICK THAT FOUND ITS BILLET.

("Of sixteen shots aimed by the Suffragettes at a window of Sir E. Grey's house, only one struck it."—Daily Paper.)

Then up an Amazon and spake
In fierce exultant strains,
"The time has come for you to break,
Brave girls, yon window's panes."

Then forth they stood alert and quick,
And each fair damsel trains,
With careful aim, her poised half-brick
Upon that window's panes.

The range was five whole yards; their pride
A lesser length disdains;
So, from that distance long, they shied
All at that window's panes.

The shower of bricks, too low, too high,
To left, to right, it rains;
Yea, fell they anywhere forbye
But on that window's panes.

But lo! At length, the sixteenth brick,
When only that remains,
Hurled by Miss Crackshot, did the trick
And found that window's panes.

What wild huzzas that instant rose!
What cheers the deed it gains,
Which once, in only sixteen throws,
Had struck that window's panes!

No one who read the article in TRUTH of November 9 on "The Charing Cross Bank Trusteeship" will need to be told that I regard the appointment of Messrs. W. B. Peat and W. Plender as the best that could have been made in the interests of the unfortunate creditors. The result of the voting was a nasty rebuff for the Depositors' Protection Committee, and those newspapers, including the Times and the Daily Mail, whose columns were used to further a candidature which could not be deemed satisfactory in the case of a trusteeship involving a business of such magnitude and difficulty. In opposition to that misguided movement I singled out Messrs. Peat and Plender as two men pre-eminently fitted to undertake the trusteeship, and the creditors may rest assured that they have placed the administration of the bankrupt Carpenter's estate in the most skilful and experienced hands.

I was asked the other day whether I had any information relating to the Rampart Unemployment and General Insurance Company, Limited, of 255, Birkbeck Bank Chambers, High Holborn. The request came from a correspondent who, having answered an advertisement, was favoured with various papers, including a booklet which gives prominence to the statement, "authorised capital £10,000," but fails to mention how much is paid up and also omits to give the names of the directors or any other officials. He wrote for these particulars, and in reply he was informed that for the time being the company was being worked privately, that the paid-up capital was "ample to meet any obligation," and that

> At the commencement the majority of companies are worked on the same lines, and until such a time as the company is put before the public no particulars as to directors, etc., are given.

Comment upon this absurd excuse for the reticence of the company—a company which for months past has been seeking to induce people to pay it premiums for insurance against unemployment—would be superfluous. So far as the management is concerned it has previously been explained in TRUTH that the promoter of the company (Mr. W. G. Leslie) is appointed managing director for life. As to the paid up capital, a mere statement that it is ample is not good enough in the case of a company soliciting subscriptions on insurance policies—especially a company undertaking a new and untried scheme of insurance against unemployment. Will Mr. Leslie say not only how much the paid-up capital is, but what proportion of it has been provided by individuals whom he has appointed as assistant secretaries, superintendents, and so on, and also what experience of insurance work these individuals possess to qualify them for such berths? It might likewise be interesting if Mr. Leslie would say where and when he qualified himself as an insurance expert. Meanwhile I strongly advise my readers not to become policy-holders in this company, and I must add that it seems to me a strange example of legislative ineptitude that the Assurance Companies Act of last year cannot be applied to the case of a company dealing with unemployment insurance.

The Tunbridge Wells Advertiser records an instructive instance of the abuses that are growing up under the present law of libel. A postmaster at a village called Golden Green, close to Hadlow, in Kent, was indicted at assizes for misappropriating cash, and three local papers headed their report of the case, "Hadlow: Serious defalcations by a Postmaster," without making it clear in the report that the prisoner hailed from Golden Green. Thereupon the postmaster at Hadlow brought actions for libels against all three papers, claiming £250 damages from each. The first case tried resulted in a verdict for the defendants, and the other two were not proceeded with. In default of the payment of costs the plaintiff was made a bankrupt, and his assets have now been discovered to be worth 50s. The Tunbridge Wells Advertiser refers to statements which he made at his public examination reflecting upon the solicitors who conducted his case. I do not know what they may have been; but it is obvious from the facts stated above that the three actions were a flagrant example of purely speculative libel actions.

Another case of a very similar type came before Mr. Justice Scrutton at Manchester Assizes. A Mr. Waller, of Rochdale, who seems to have been a well known man in his neighbourhood and occupying a good position, borrowed money of a moneylender, and made default in the payment of one instalment. At this juncture he went to the South of France for his health, and in his absence the moneylender obtained an order against him for substituted service of a bankruptcy notice. Owing to a postal strike in France Mr. Waller was unaware of what was going on. He came back and the bankruptcy petition was subsequently withdrawn. When he came back the Rochdale Observer mentioned the fact, and announced on its contents' bill "Mr. Waller Returns." On these words Mr. Waller brought an action for libel. After he had given his evidence at the trial, the Judge held that there was no case, and the jury agreed with him.

In this second case no doubt the defendants will recover their costs; but except in that particular the case is an even stronger example of the absolutely frivolous libel action than the three previous cases in Kent. Why are such actions brought, and brought with a frequency of which the public has not the slightest knowledge? Because, as I have said again and again, plaintiffs and their solicitors have been brought to the belief that any complaint against a personal remark in a newspaper, no matter how trumpery and frivolous, is good enough to ensure a verdict for damages, and, above all, costs. What the public do not understand—nor, I fear, the judges either—is that for every one of these frivolous actions that comes into court a dozen are settled outside, the newspapers and their advisers being as conscious as the other side of the dangers that await them when they come before a jury. In plain English, newspapers—the small and struggling papers especially, but not these alone—are systematically blackmailed with impunity.

As a result of this state of things a cry is being raised for an amendment of the law of libel in the interest of newspapers. No newspaper proprietor would be sorry to see it, but I maintain confidently that the chief fault lies, not with the law, but with the spirit in which it is administered. The Courts have in recent years ceased to exercise, in the case of libel actions, the control which they ought to exercise over juries, more particularly in regard to the measure of damages. A verdict for a thousand pounds is now given, and allowed to stand, where a verdict for a hundred would have been the outside that would have been allowed twenty years ago. The result is that when anything that the ingenuity of a pleader can construe into a libel is published in a newspaper, the party aggrieved and his solicitors regard themselves as having discovered a gold mine, while the newspaper proprietor feels himself to be at their mercy, and can only ask how much they will take. No mere amendment of the law will cure this state of things.

A pair of rival tradesmen appeared before Mr. Mead at Marlborough Street last week, one charging the other with assault. One of them was an organ-grinder, the other T. Bowden Green, of the Street Noises Abatement Association (No. 48, TRUTH Cautionary List). Green was in Mount Street, Grosvenor Square, collecting signatures to a petition, and incidentally, no doubt, subscriptions to the Association, when he heard the organ being played, in defiance of one of the Bowden Green notices, "Organ and street cries prohibited." Green commanded the organ-grinder to move on, and the organ-grinder shook his fist in Green's face. The organ-grinder was bound over to keep the peace, and Green was admonished that he had no right to interfere, and if he did so in future he would only have himself to thank for being assaulted. Evidently Mr. Mead appraised Green at his true value. Of the two nuisances, Green is far the worse.

One of those kindly actions which go far to explain the enduring hold of the House of Lords upon the hearts and imaginations of the inhabitants of these favoured isles was performed last week by Lord Arundell of Wardour. The recipient of his lordship's gracious attention was a widow named Mrs. Blacker, who had been in his lordship's service as housekeeper. During that period she had been presented with some vegetables. She took them to her home in a basket. A month elapsed. The basket was not returned. The absence of the basket troubled my Lord Arundell of Wardour. He applied to the magistrates for a warrant. Mrs. Blacker's house was searched. The basket was found with potato peelings in it. Mrs. Blacker was arrested and taken to the police station charged with stealing the basket. She was brought before a magistrate at Bridgwater. My lord, in answer to the magistrate's clerk, said he had never asked Mrs. Blacker to return the basket. The magistrates dismissed the charge. Is it not easy to imagine the good dame in the fulness of her heart crying aloud,

> "Let wealth and commerce, laws and learning die,
> But leave us still our old nobility"?

After a lengthy trial at the Old Bailey, John Dazeley Theobald, who traded at Hounslow as the National Home Employment Association, was found guilty of fraud last week and sentenced to six months' imprisonment. The conviction is useful, not only as putting a stop to the operations of one of the most active and artful of the home-employment harpies, but as a notification to others of the same kidney that the net of the law is wide enough to gather them into its meshes. Theobald's trick was to sell an outfit for the purpose of making magic-lantern slides, under the pretence that those who became proficient could make their living at the industry. The purchasers, however, found that their work was almost invariably declared to be defective, and that there was no chance of earning anything substantial at it.

TRUTH has continuously warned the public against Theobald, and for the past four or five years the name of the National Home Employment Association has appeared in TRUTH Cautionary List. It was also stated by Mr. Muir for the prosecution that his name had been circulated in the l'olice Gazette since 1897 as that of a "doubtful trader," and that since 1906 the police have been inundated with complaints about him. Under these circumstances it seems amazing that it is not until 1910 that the Public Prosecutor should have taken action against him. As counsel for the prosecution also pointed out, this is a class of case which can only be taken up by the Public Prosecutor, because the persons defrauded are not in a position to bear the expense of setting the law in motion. All the more reason, therefore, why the earliest possible endeavour should have been made to limit the number of victims. Instead of this Theobald has been allowed to go on robbing the public year after year before any action is taken. No wonder men of his type abound.

Very much on all fours with this trick is the home employment at making incandescent gas mantles, which is advertised from various addresses. In this instance the advertisers require payment of a sum of money for a licence to work a secret process, for which a complete formula, working plan, and material are provided, and they undertake to find a market for all the mantles made. One of the most active of these firms is the London Incandescent Co. (No. 528 TRUTH Cautionary List), which has recently removed from Dulwich to 65, Station Road, Camberwell, S.E. It states that from £1 to £4 a week can be earned at mantle-making, and it asks for 6s. for particulars and materials. It ought to be obvious to anyone that if this were the case the company would not find it necessary to continuously advertise for fresh employees.

In connection with this home-employment business a new dodge for extracting shillings from the pockets of the unwary has been invented by some individual who calls himself "The Literary Beaureau" (sic). The "Beaureau" announces that it has investigated every plan of the kind on the market, and has found two firms who regularly employ home-workers, and upon receipt of a postal order for one shilling it will place the would-be employees in communication with these firms. It dates its circulars from 17, Ranelagh Avenue, Fulham, which is one of the addresses of the Imperial Art Supply Co. (No. 525 TRUTH Cautionary List), which has been working on the same lines as Theobald for several years. Whether the Imperial Art Supply Co. is one of the genuine firms to which the "Beaureau" introduces its clients I do not know, but the fact that the address is the same points to a pretty close connection. No doubt the result of the Theobald case will make some of these gentry think of shifting their quarters, and I should like to see the police lay their hands on the Ranelagh Road nest before the birds are flown.

The London Jewel Company, of Lambert Chambers, Acre Lane, London, S.W., have recently been extending their marvellous offer of a casket of jewels, "absolutely free"—for 21s. 9d.—to residents in South Africa. Indeed, in order "not to be behind the times," and "to celebrate the historical occasion," the company makes a Special Colonial Celebration Offer. There is really nothing very special about it. It is only to supply the caskets at 16s. 9d. each—cash down—and a bonus of a cuckoo clock or a pair of sleeve links to any one who will remit the cash for three caskets. One would hardly have imagined that there is likely to be much demand for the London Jewel Company's Akra gold and Burma diamonds in the country where the real thing comes from. Even a Kaffir nowadays might be expected to turn up his nose at such shoddy imitations.

Another of the shoddy jewellery firms which are at the present time devoting a good deal of attention to South Africa is the London General Supply Association, of 72, Finsbury Pavement. These people run infantile prize competitions, in which the lucky winners can become possessed of a "Famous Real Lever Simulation Gold Watch" by purchasing a "simulation gold" chain for 6s. 6d. I am told that our brother Boer is particularly credulous in regard to advertising tricksters and advertising quacks, and I would suggest to some of my South African contemporaries that they should put him on his guard against these humbugs.

Attention was drawn in TRUTH recently to a marvellous hair restorer from the U.S.A. called Crystolis, and distributed here from the Creslo Laboratories, 6 and 8, Bouverie Street, London, E.C. I fancy that the principal products of these laboratories are follow up letters, of which a choice assortment are in my possession. No. 2 is particularly attractive. "We have your courteous letter of recent date," writes one of the Cresto chemists, "and were glad to notice that you were interested in Crystolis, for if there is anything I admire in a person it is to see them show a spirit of tidyness and pride, not false pride, but pride of refinement." Neither the chemist's admiration nor the "Guarantee" offered by the Laboratories to return the money if Crystolis did not fulfil expectations induced one inquirer to invest 10s. in the treatment. Instead, he offered to purchase, if the Laboratories would give him a legal guarantee that the money should be returned, or alternatively be promised to give a stamped guarantee to pay the sum demanded if in any time agreed on Crystolis would make his hair grow. Needless to say the offer was not accepted.

Meanwhile I have been learning something more about Crystolis from investigations made in the United States. The proprietor is a man named Sweet, living in Scranton, Pennsylvania. In America he issues a sheet of testimonials identical with one issued from Bouverie Street. One purports to be from a Mrs. Rose, another from a Mr. Lawson, a third from a Mr. Pierson. Registered letters addressed to the two latter for special delivery through the U.S. mails were returned to the sender. The inquiry addressed to Mrs. Rose as to the correctness of her testimonial elicited the reply that it was "all wrong," that she "knew nothing of their goods," and that she had "been after these people," and had been promised that the "testimonial will be withdrawn." Whatever its effect on the scalp, Crystolis seems to have most uncanny effect on testimonialists to its virtues. It has made two of them disappear altogether, and caused the third to forget that she had ever used it.

Edgar Park, a touting bookmaker of 47, Brick Street, Mayfair, lately sent circulars to a boy of sixteen and to the boy's guardian, both names being apparently obtained from a golf club list of members. In reply to a remonstrance, Park offered a feeble apology for addressing a minor, but the guardian's own personal objection to his unwelcome attentions was ignored, and he has since received several more invitations to open an account. It has often been suggested that the distribution of betting circulars through the post should be made illegal, and the conduct of such pests as Park is a strong argument in favour of that course.

In common with many touting bookmakers, H. V. Goodman, 9, Carrington Street, Mayfair, intimates that he does not require references from officers in his Majesty's Services. This exhibits a proper confidence in the honour of the Services, but one would think that by this time every mess must be familiar with experiences proving how foolish it is for officers to return the compliment by trusting any unknown betting circulariser. Yet fresh cases are frequently reported to me, and some of the latest come from subalterns who have been unable to obtain the winnings Goodman owes them. This individual states that he was "established 1881." Where, and in what name or names? He has only been at his present address about six months, paying 7s. 6d. a week for a small office, which appears to be used mainly for the receipt of letters and telegrams.

Belmont and Son, 3, White Horse Street, Piccadilly, are the subject of a similar complaint by an Army officer. As no cheque arrived on settling day the officer wrote asking for it, whereupon Belmont's clerk (or perhaps it was the "son") wired: "Belmont away on Northern circuit. Will rectify on return. Meanwhile continue commissions." Perhaps something happened on the circuit to detain Belmont in the North—at any rate, if he has returned he has failed to "rectify," and further letters requesting a settlement have been unanswered. The aggrieved customer says he considers that the public ought to be warned against Belmont and Son, but they were warned in this year's TRUTH Cautionary List.

"I do not profess to be a philanthropist," writes William Lloyd, 14, New Oxford Street, W.C., but in spite of this modest disclaimer his money-lending circular has the usual philanthropic ring. Lloyd is a new acquaintance. The fact, however, that he is addressing his offers to railway station-masters shows that he is already a tout of a peculiarly noxious type.

Norfolk has been amused and astonished by the progress through its villages of a body of hunger-marchers headed by that philanthropic wind-bag William Pooley (No. 6, TRUTH Cautionary List) and Stewart Gray. The ostensible object of the march was to present a petition to the King at Sandringham, and when the marchers started about a hundred men tramped behind the trap in which Pooley faced the discomforts of the road. By the time Lynn was reached, however, Pooley's army had dwindled to ten, who were accommodated in the workhouse, while their leader provided himself with a more comfortable sleeping place. The worst that can be said about Gray is that he is a crank, but Pooley is one of those unpleasant parasites who batten on the misfortunes of others, and sooner or later his most recent exploit will no doubt be made to serve as a fresh excuse for sending round the hat.

Recipients of appeals for assistance from William Tyler, of 1, Cambridge Place, Kilburn, N.W., need not allow their sympathies to be unduly harrowed by the story he tells of his necessities. Tyler is an old soldier in both senses of the phrase. He has been in difficulties ever since 1886. His starving children, the wife who is nearing her confinement, and the bailiffs waiting round the corner to throw the family into the street have between them managed to keep him going for some little time, and no doubt will continue to do so just as long as he can find soft-hearted people to respond to his appeal without inquiry.

That discredited old reprobate Canon McLarney, Rector of Clonfert, Galway (No. 89, TRUTH Cautionary List), has just issued one of his periodical appeals for assistance. He states that his case is "a very exceptional one." It is. So far as I am aware he is the only example in existence of a canon of the Church degenerating into a professional begging-letter writer.

As the touts for the Royal Hungarian Lottery are very actively on the warpath just now, it may be interesting to give the experience of a winner in the last of these gambles. He bought a quarter-ticket and assented to the proposal of the agents—the Benko Bank of Budapest—that if he drew a prize in the earlier drawings the money or part of it should be applied to the purchase of a "substitution ticket," so that he might remain interested in the "play" in the later classes. In the preliminary drawings the prizes are for the most part quite paltry in amount, merely sufficing as a rule to pay the entrance fee for the succeeding stage of the lottery. This particular ticket-holder, however, won 400 crowns, one-fourth of a prize of 2,000 crowns, but instead of debiting him with the cost of one quarter ticket for the next drawing and forwarding the balance—which, in view of the terms of their original proposal was what he had a right to expect—they charged him with the price of two whole tickets, thereby reducing the balance to his credit to 80 crowns. He protested, but he had to be content with the 80 crowns, and I should think he was lucky to get so much. British patrons of these foreign lotteries are, of course, always at the mercy of the ticket agents, having no means of redress if they are victimised.

A variety of articles have been sold on the snowball system at one time and another, and now Messrs. Jacobs and Co., Limited, of Cwmbran, Monmouthshire, are disposing of boots in this way. The plan is simplicity itself. The person who wishes to possess a pair of boots sends Messrs. Jacobs 2s. for a set of four coupons. He disposes of these to his friends at 6d. a time, and when the latter have each remitted 2s. he receives a pair of boots. Messrs. Jacobs and Co. would do well to consider the objections to a system of trading which must ultimately end in a large number of persons being landed with worthless pieces of paper. They are also presumably ignorant of the fact that the trick had a great vogue a few years ago until the police dropped on a gang who had raked in a large amount of money by it. Verb. sap.

One of the disadvantages of ever having figured in Guy Roslyn's Biographer is that it gives this worthy an opportunity of begging from the persons he has biographed. One such recent letter is in my possession in which, after penning a striking picture of his misfortunes, Joshua Hatton—for this purpose Roslyn drops his pseudonym—announces his intention of setting out on tramp to Plymouth from his present address at 74, Dalmatia Road, Southchurch, Southend-on-Sea, calling at all the newspaper offices on the way in search of journalistic employment. Forewarned is forearmed, but all the same I do not think he will include TRUTH Office in his visiting list.

In view of a letter which I have received from the City Engineer of Fort William, Ontario, I shall be glad if any of my Glasgow readers can give me information regarding the sale in that city of the "lots" of a townsite called Rosslyn, situated about thirteen miles from Fort William near a track on the Canadian Northern Railway. The sellers, I am told, are the Strathcona Coal and Exploration Syndicate, of 83, Mitchell Street, Glasgow. In particular, I should like to have copies of any plans, prospectuses, etc., which have been issued in connection with the offer of these "lots" at Rosslyn.

Several communications have reached me from the Leeward Islands regarding my comments some time ago upon the Montserrat Newspaper Surety Ordinance. It seems that the editor of the Montserrat Herald, whose case I mentioned, got round the definition of a newspaper in the original ordinance by publishing his sheet each alternate fortnight under a different title, and it was to put an end to this evasion of the law that an amended ordinance was passed. That step was obviously necessary, and, in view of some of the facts that have been put before me, I am inclined to think that the policy embodied in these and similar ordinances, though on the face of it an interference with the liberty of the press, is not without justification in the conditions prevailing in some of these small islands in the West Indies. The editor of the Montserrat Herald has lately been convicted of a libel on the Chief Justice of the Leeward Islands and sentenced to a term of imprisonment, but as I understand that he is appealing against this conviction I do not think it desirable to make any comment upon the case at present.

I wonder why so many map sellers labour under the impression that no home can be happy without a sample of their wares hanging on its walls? The Geographia Designing and Publishing Company, Limited, of 11, Adam Street, Strand, are so obsessed with the idea that they even supply maps gratis. This does not appear to be intentional benevolence on their part, but an unforeseen contingency arising out of their methods of doing business. The company first delivers a map at your house or office, and some days later sends an invoice for 3s. 10d., with a politely worded intimation that they hope "the obvious advantages" of the map will influence you to purchase it. The advantages of getting a map for nothing are still more obvious, and it must occur to a good many people that they are under no obligation either to pay for or return articles left with them unrequested. If the Geographia Company were a philanthropic institution their action would be understandable.

It is not only literary men in search of a job who need to be on their guard against the wily Ashley Larkins. Particulars furnished me by a firm in Victoria Street show that tradesmen need to be equally wary about giving him credit. The firm in question supplied goods to Larkins at his flat at 11, Cathedral Mansions. The goods were not paid for, and the firm recovered judgment for the debt in the county court. Intimation of the fact sent to Larkins produced a communication from him dated from "The Temple," Tenison Avenue, Cambridge, informing his creditor that it was a waste of money to take proceedings against him, and would be a still further waste to issue execution, as he had sub-let his flat to a "Mr. Punch." He offered, however, to return the goods, and as a mirror included amongst them had been damaged, he suggested the firm should accept a "beautiful mezzotint picture" in its place.

The firm, making the best of a bad bargain, sent for the goods, but found they had already been distrained on by the landlord. Meanwhile Larkins had moved to 12, Army and Navy Mansions, and application was again made to this address. The result was a communication from "Mr. Punch" requesting that no further letters for Larkins should be addressed to his flat, but giving no explanation of how Mr. Punch, of 11, Cathedral Mansions, came to be installed at Army and Navy Mansions. This was followed by another letter from Larkins stating that he had been "down with fever," but that he had given instructions for the lift porter at 109, Victoria Street to hand to the firm's representative a valuable silver print in settlement of the debt. The firm sent for the picture, and ultimately found themselves in possession of a framed portrait of Larkins himself.

There is an originality about this method of paying one's debts which might lead one to think that Larkins is something of a wag, but if so his humour is of the unconscious variety, for when the creditor pointed out that the picture had no saleable value he became exceedingly wroth. Such an idea, he declared, "savours of madness," since he occupied "a position in fame as good as the original of any published picture." It is a very dubious sort of fame which Larkins has achieved so far, but even if he were as famous as he imagines he would find few tradesmen willing to accept portraits of himself in payment of their little accounts.

Just as I am going to press I have received a letter from the London manager of the Bank of New Zealand with reference to my comments last week upon the report of a New Zealand Parliamentary Committee in the case of Captain Hamilton and the Mangatoro Estates. The manager encloses an official statement respecting the bank's position in the matter which has recently appeared in the New Zealand Times, and which I hope to deal with next week.

THE MASTER OF THE SITUATION.

The Chronicle is certain that its side will win the game
And so's the News, the Leader, and the Star;
The Mail and Post and Standard no less certainly proclaim
That their party the prospective victors are.
But the wise man, far too cautious his prophetic skill to pledge,
Just wags his noddle shrewdly and sits tight upon the hedge.

At Asquith as a traitor-knave the rabid Tories fume,
And Redmond as Beelzebub they ban:
The Rads. they speak of Lansdowne as a tyrant, matched with whom Domitian was a liberal-minded man.
The wise man's withers are unwrung by either villain's crimes;
He's heard this sort of thing before, about election times.

"Protection" the Free Traders with contemptuous sneers describe
As ridiculously futile and unsound;
While at Free Trade t other party as an empty fetish gibe,
For which there's not a reason to be found.
But the wise man sits and chuckles; for that sage observer knows
That neither creed has all the cons, and neither all the pros.

And who's this sage, you ask me? Well, he's just the average man;
You can meet him by the hundred in the street;
A level-headed critic, and no hide-bound partisan,
He judges without prejudice or heat.
No Liberal, no Tory—you can't say he turns his coat,
But he often turns elections by his mute, impartial vote.

SCRUTATOR.

THE RIVAL REFORMERS.

THE noble army which is marshalled for the defence of the House of Lords has now completed its change of front. The Rosebery resolution has placed on paper a nebulous suggestion for amending the constitution of the Upper House, and the Lansdowne resolutions have presented a scheme—a little less vague than the other, but to the same extent more open to objection—for settling future disputes between the two Houses. A change of front when the opposing forces are already in line of battle is always a risky operation, but in the present instance the movement has been effected with adroitness, and may possibly have some little effect. The object in view is to detach from the other side the large body of moderate-minded electors who recognise, as everybody recognises, that the House of Lords in its present shape is an anachronism, and that its powers have been of late strained and abused, but who are at the same time opposed to violent reforms and apprehensive of possible abuses of power by the House of Commons. The moderate-minded man is bidden to observe that the House of Lords is as conscious as anybody else of its own shortcomings and of its anomalous position in relation to the representative chamber; that it is quite willing—indeed, desperately anxious—to undertake its own reformation and to submit to a limitation of its powers; and that the Government in rushing to the country for a mandate to carry out its own proposals is moved by unreasoning passion and desperate revolutionary designs.

The voting power of the "moderate" man, of whom so much is expected at present, is an unknown quantity. We know for certain that there is a large shifting weight in the electorate which tends to oscillate from side to side at successive general elections, but to what extent it is swayed by pure reason and to what by a primitive instinct to get rid of the Government for the time being is altogether uncertain. In the face of large proposals of constitutional change, however, the disposition of the majority of Englishmen and Scotchmen is cautious and conservative, and if a choice is offered between a half-measure and a whole the half will generally be preferred. For this reason the peers are wise in their generation to offer a half-measure, and certain Cabinet Ministers are unwise to stump the country using wild and inflammatory language that appeals only to class prejudice. Mr. Lloyd George in particular would do well to reflect that the sort of claptrap which had a certain relevancy when the issue was between the pockets of the peers and the pockets of the people is likely to do more harm than good when a constitutional dispute is to be decided the merits of which require to be carefully explained, and when the people who have to be convinced are largely people whose misgivings arise, not only from distrust of democracy, but from fear of handing themselves over to the rule of demagogues.

The Liberal case against the House of Lords needs no claptrap to commend it to the sympathies of the average man. It only requires to be lucidly explained. It could not be better stated than in the admirable speech of the Lord Chancellor last Thursday night. In January, 1906, a Liberal Government received at the polls the most overwhelming vote of popular confidence that has ever been given at a general election. The Liberals had been at that date out of power for virtually twenty years, and had a proportionately large programme of legislation to accomplish. For four years in succession the Government, with this unprecedented popular vote in its favour, was unable to carry into law its principal measures. Its proposals were negatived with increasing boldness by the House of Lords, at the sacrifice of months of wearisome labour in the House of Commons, until the climax was reached in the rejection of last year's Budget—an absolutely unconstitutional act, in the sense that there was no precedent for it. The avowed object of this proceeding was to force a dissolution of Parliament; in other words, the House of Lords, after resisting and thwarting the Commons and the Government for four years, considered that the time was ripe to administer the coup de grâce to both of them, and did not scruple to strain its own constitutional rights in order to attain that end. The calculation failed. The Government survived the election, and it at once announced that its first and only business would be to limit the legislative powers of the House of Lords as a preliminary to reforming its constitution. The confidential negotiations between the leaders of the two sides which were brought about by the death of his late Majesty having revealed that there is no possibility of agreement between the two Houses and the two parties on the reforms that the Government demands, the Government now appeals to the country on its own account for the requisite authority to deal with the question in its own way. Such is the history of the present crisis.

With these facts in mind no one ought to be in any doubt about the nature of the issue that is now to be decided, whatever the view that may be taken of the merits of the controversy. Nor can there be any reasonable doubt as to the necessity for submitting this issue to the country without further delay. The rejection of a Budget by the Upper House, if it is allowed to become a constitutional precedent, makes it impossible that the Executive can exist unless it commands a majority in the Upper House. The system of party government becomes a meaningless fiction if a party placed in office by an enormous majority can only legislate with the sanction of the party it has defeated at the polls. We have not arrived suddenly at this situation. It has been maturing slowly for fifty years, viz. the gradual conversion of the House of Lords into a chamber representing one party only; and a great many Liberals, quorum pars ego, long since came to the conclusion that the time was ripe for an appeal to the country for an amendment of the Constitution. But delay has had this good effect, that it has emboldened the Upper House to more and more violent use of its powers, until the time has arrived when everybody can see for himself that the continuation of the present state of things is impossible, and even the Lords themselves, stimulated and alarmed by what they know of public opinion, by suddenly proposing to reform themselves, publicly acknowledge that their position is indefensible.

How, then, should the proposals which they put forward in such circumstances be regarded? The question which the country has to consider is whether the Rosebery-Lansdowne resolutions promise any amendment of a situation which all men admit is intolerable. So stated, the question admits of only one answer. In order that our system of party government may be once more a reality, instead of a sham, the first essential is that each party when placed in power at a general election shall have equal opportunity of carrying out its own policy in Parliament. To secure that state of things both parties must have equal opportunity of obtaining representation in the Upper House. There is no other remedy. The Rosebery resolution by its very vagueness promises absolutely nothing as regards the adequate representation of both parties in the Upper House; and by its retention of a very large hereditary element it offers every probability that the House will contain a permanent Conservative majority —the source of all the present trouble. The Lansdowne resolution, which proposes a joint session of the two Houses for the settlement of differences of opinion, can have no bearing at all upon the fundamental reform which is required until the future constitution of the Upper House and the mode in which the joint session is to be formed have been determined. A joint session of the two Houses as they are at present would obviously not prevent the majority of the peers from overriding the majority of the Commons; and the same thing may easily be true of an Upper House reformed on the Rosebery plan. The Referendum, to which Lord Lansdowne has hastily committed himself and the peers, is in itself a novel and questionable experiment, of doubtful applicability to the political circumstances of this country; but, apart from that, the power to dictate a Referendum which Lord Lansdowne would vest in the Upper House is only one degree less open to objection than the power to dictate a dissolution which he assumed last year. Such a power gives the Upper House a very practical control over the Executive and over the Lower, and until both parties stand on an equal footing in the Upper House it would be entirely inconsistent with the first essential principle of reform—namely, that both parties should have equal opportunity in Parliament of carrying out their own measures and their own policy. Lord Loreburn spoke well within the mark when he said that there is absolutely nothing in the House of Lords' resolutions which promises amendment of the mischief which is at the bottom of the present trouble; on the contrary, since a reformed House of Lords, no matter how reformed, would possess more authority in the country and more confidence in itself than the present House, there is every probability that reforms on the proposed lines would aggravate the present difficulty between the two parties and the two Houses instead of removing it.

It is this last consideration which ought to weigh most of all with those who desire to form a fair and impartial decision on the issue now raised. The proposals of the House of Lords offer no settlement whatever of the existing dispute. From the nature of the case there can be no settlement until the essential condition of equality of opportunity for both parties in Parliament is conceded. There is no question whatever of establishing single chamber government. When Mr. Balfour puts this bogey into his election address he knows that the late Conference between the two Front Benches could never have lasted for three months if the Government had any such design. On the contrary, what the Government and the Liberal party are fighting against is a system of single-chamber government already existing in a most deadly and insidious shape. For four years past the Upper House has exercised uncontrolled dominion in the Legislature, finally claiming the right to overrule an Executive with a 200 majority of the elected House behind it. On the other hand, there is no case within living memory of the Upper House having exercised the slightest check upon the Lower with a Conservative majority in power. The Lord Chancellor last Thursday invited any peer to mention a case within a hundred years past in which the Lords had rejected a Bill of a Conservative Government, and the challenge was not answered. It follows incontestably that with a Conservative majority in power we have now for all practical purposes no second chamber, while with a Liberal majority in power the first chamber is reduced to impotence. The House of Lords exists, not to exercise the legitimate functions of a second chamber, but to retain one party in power when the country places the other party in office. It has now been conclusively shown, by the failure of the attempt to settle the issue by negotiation, and by the character of the proposals put forward in the House of Lords, that the Liberal party alone can correct the present intolerable situation and restore the lost balance of the Constitution. No wise man who can exercise his judgment independently of partisan considerations will hesitate to give them the power required for this purpose.

A BLUE-BOOK ON QUACKERY.

As a straw showing which way the legislative wind is likely to blow the Blue-book issued last week on "The Practice of Medicine and Surgery by Unqualified Persons" in the United Kingdom and Ireland is worth attention; not so much perhaps for the sake of its contents—though these are of considerable public interest—as on account of the course of events which have led up to the publication of the report. The Blue-book, in fact, owes its existence to a resolution of the General Medical Council requesting the Government to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into the evil effects produced by the unrestricted practice of medicine and surgery by unqualified persons. Upon receipt of this resolution the Lord President of the Council deemed it expedient in the first instance to have recourse to ordinary means of information, and requested the Local Government Board, the Scottish Office, and the Irish Government to issue circulars to the medical officers of health in each county, asking them whether unqualified practice is assuming larger proportions in their districts and the effect of such practice on the public health. The issue of the Blue-book, therefore, may be interpreted as a preliminary step towards a complete investigation of the subject by a competent tribunal armed with plenary powers, for the net result of the preliminary inquiry is to establish the fact that unqualified medical practice as it exists to-day urgently calls for remedial legislation.

As might have been expected, the medical officers of health for the main part merely dot the "i's" of the resolution of the General Medical Council which led to the inquiries being given to them. Many of them are apparently unable to distinguish the wood for the trees, though this may be due to the specific nature of the queries given them to answer. They take the strict medical view that the chemist who prescribes is a public danger, though not always with the cynicism of the M.O.H. for Barnsley, who states that their proceedings are "on the whole beneficial to the medical profession, and if the public suffer it is their own fault." They direct attention to the encroachments of bonesetters, unqualified dentists, Christian Scientists, faith-healers, and a variety of so-called specialists in consumption, cancer, and other diseases, upon the field of the medical profession. But it is when their opinions are summarised upon the question of "proprietary medicines" that the report, like one of the best-advertised secret remedies, "touches the spot." There is a consensus of opinion that such remedies are consumed in enormous quantities, and that the public is grossly deceived by fraudulent advertisements. As for the effects of such consumption, some of the medical officers of health state that it is difficult to prove actual harm, though others supply instances of such harm which have come under their notice. In the main, however, the injury is stated to be mainly indirect. Time is lost during which disease, not being beneficially affected by the medicine, develops. Complications are set up, and when the sufferer finally is compelled to seek skilled advice the disease is in so advanced a stage as to have become incurable. Particular attention is drawn to phthisis and cancer in this connection, while the use of proprietary aricles for treating children's ailments is also stated to have a direct influence on infant mortality. Still stronger evidence of the dangers of unqualified practice is shown in that section dealing with the sale of abortifacients. Here the evidence is direct and conclusive, and it is strengthened by the reproduction of a number of the advertisements of those who practise this loathsome trade, which is fraudulent where it is not criminal, and not infrequently is both.

Speaking generally, however, the Blue-book contains nothing which is new to TRUTH readers. It merely tabulates and summarises medical opinion all over the country in regard to a great and growing evil which has been continuously exposed in these columns. No suggestions for dealing with the evil are made except in a few instances, and these are but of minor value. As regards the quack nostrum, certainly the only practical suggestion made is that the composition of all advertised remedies should be stated and their prescription and analysis determined by Government analysis at the vendor's expense. Though useful so far as it goes, such a regulation would only touch the fringe of the mischief, for it would leave untouched the most dangerous of all the quack brigade, the hygienic institutes, the bogus medicos who pose as consumption and cancer specialists, and the aural and optical swindlers who pretend to give special treatment and advice to those whom they catch in their advertising nets. It is rascals of this type who are the greatest danger to the public. If they could be effectively brought under control the question of counter prescribing by chemists need hardly be made a matter for special legislation. It is more in the nature of a professional quarrel between the chemists and the doctors, for the medical practitioner who does his own dispensing can hardly complain if the chemist occasionally prescribes a pill or a draught to the man who comes to him and asks for a remedy for some simple ailment. It is true that he may on occasion fail to diagnose the incidence of some serious disorder, but here again the qualified medical man is not omniscient, and taken all round it is more than doubtful if there is any serious damage done to the public by the chemist's poaching on the doctor's preserves.

TRAINING COLLEGE HUMBUG.

The London County Council has at last capitulated to the demand of the Education Board and decided to appoint 255 additional teachers to relieve the overburdened classes in the Council schools. The decision, although welcome enough to the unemployed teachers who will thereby obtain engagements, will be cold comfort to the much larger number, trained partly at the public expense, who find themselves as far as ever from the prospect of employment. Unfortunately, there seems to be at present no sign of a desire on the part of any one to grapple with the real problem—the problem of how to make the supply of efficient teachers approximate to the demand. So far as can be seen, the London County Council will go on wasting the ratepayers' money on attempting to turn unfit material into schoolmasters and schoolmistresses, aided and abetted by the Board of Education, which grants certificates to young men and women whose passage through the training college has left them absolutely unfitted for the profession they have entered.

That this is no fancy picture may be gathered from some evidence which has been placed in my possession recently in the shape of some of the private reports by the Board of Education upon the work of the teachers in one of the training colleges. The college is not, it is true, one of the London training colleges. But that fact is not likely to make any difference. There is no reason why the Board of Education should give preferential treatment to provincial colleges as regards the certification of the students attending them. If incompetent teachers get certificated in the provinces they are just as likely to attain the same end in London. And what but incompetence makes the following strictures upon the examination papers of student-teachers explicable?

> The elementary facts were not known by most of the students, whilst their attempts to deal with the more advanced and general questions were rendered almost worthless through the want of real knowledge and the failure to realise adequately what is implied in the wording of several of the questions.
> The majority appear to have made insufficient effort to master the period; and there is none of that facility which comes from independent reading of a favourable subject.
> There is little evidence of careful and intelligent study.
> The questions were feebly treated, and in the manner of the average schoolboy.
> The papers, as a whole, did not reach a satisfactory standard. The answers . . . . showed a most inadequate knowledge of the subject.
> The essays, as a whole, were disappointing. Very few of them were good, and not less than one-third were thoroughly unsatisfactory in every respect. Amongst their many faults may be mentioned irrelevance, vulgarisms, lack of arrangement of ideas, incoherence, and faulty punctuation.
> The general level of attainment was low.

These criticisms were applied to the work of both men and women students over a range of subjects which included English Language and Literature, Mathematics, Hygiene, History and Geography, in the year 1910. Yet in the list of students examined from this college for 1910 not a single student failed to obtain certification. With their ignorance of elementary facts, their inadequate knowledge, their irrelevance, vulgarisms, and incoherence, they were graciously certified by the Board which passed these strictures upon them as fully qualified to instruct the rising generation. Maybe the Board of Education fears to hurt the feelings of the hopeless incompetents it thus certifies as teachers, or perhaps imagines that the ratepayer would be shocked if anything less than a hundred per cent. of those upon whom his money is spent reached the goal of their ambition. But in either case, the policy of certifying the unfit is as unkind as it is unjust. Sooner or later both teacher and ratepayer will awaken to the fact that they have been dwelling in a fool's paradise. The teacher will discover that his certificate is no guarantee that he will obtain employment, while the ratepayer, awakened to the hollowness of the teacher's pretensions, may well question the desirability of spending money on multiplying such failures.

THE WRONG THING IN THE RIGHT PLACE.

There is an old proverb which speaks of a place for everything and everything in its place. Life would be all very well if this were so, but most things are in the wrong place. The soul of good in things evil gets no chance to expand. One has a suspicion that in the sorting office of Fate many letters of discredit have been sent to the wrong address. Consider the uses of bad temper in the right place. As a rule a really bad temper comes to its finest development through long practice on an unoffending family. Take Uncle Podgkins in a tantrum, for instance, and turn him on, not to long-suffering Aunt Belinda, or to his meek, middle-aged daughters, who have never married because they dared not tell him they were engaged, but to a company promoter who is fattening on the miseries of widows and orphans. In fact, turn Uncle Podgkins' remarks on cold bacon at breakfast into a diatribe on swindling the defenceless, and you have a fine moral situation, and an active force for good; because there are more elderly gentlemen heckling their wives than there are swindlers; there are more cold breakfast dishes than fraudulent prospectuses; and the surplus tantrums would all go to strengthen the single diatribes to which the promoters would have to submit. Again, take the pretty woman's skill in making up, and give it to some haggard, elderly female who would be infinitely improved by the applied arts and crafts to which so much modern beauty is owing. Let expert thieves steal for the benefit of the poor. They must of course be punished, because theft would remain a sin, but in the meanwhile their ill-gotten gains would be feeding the hungry. Let the hangman be busy with tired and listless people who want a short cut out of this life. Many murderers are young and full of the joy of living, and in the new scheme of economy their little predilection for homicide would of course be exercised only on the wicked and those who "never would be missed."

There are many people in the world who do not seem able to tell the truth, but, as things are, this inability frequently causes a great deal of trouble and mischief. Yet a really well-placed lie has before now been known to avert a great deal of needless misery, though too often, when such a situation arises, there is nobody on the spot to tell the lie except someone who has scruples about doing evil that good may come. Curiosity in an income-tax official is a virtue; in a servant it is an inconvenience. Most domestic servants appear to be good detectives spoiled. Their finest capacities are completely wasted. The technical knowledge of a poacher would be invaluable to a keeper, just as even half the surplus strength of a lunatic would be priceless to his attendants.

Selfishness is one of the most frequently misplaced qualities. It is found chiefly in people who are surrounded by the unselfish, when in reality its natural use is to act as a check on other people's selfishness. The practice of unselfishness is quite as often a vice as a virtue, and it is occasionally simply ludicrous. I know two people living together who constantly do things they do not like, because when asked what they want to do each always says what seems the most probable wish of the other. Anyone who has ever watched two people standing bowing at each other by an open door, each waiting for the other to take the lead, will perceive what a lot of time would be saved by the proper distribution of rudeness and politeness. When politeness meets politeness progress goes to the wall. This is not an Oriental proverb; it is simply an observation of practical reality. Tidiness is another virtue which usually gets into the wrong house. Tidy people spend an absurd amount of time putting things straight after the untidy, and then the latter come in and find a nice orderly place—in which to make hay.

In fact there is not a human vice or failing which would not be of inestimable value in the right place. The net result is a flagrant extravagance in human qualities. We find pearls thrown before swine, and hungry swine grunting natural disgust at being fed with pearls. One can only wonder at the extraordinary state of things in which the commissariat officials of Fate have got muddled between hog-wash and oysters. Hamlet ought to have been a Government official, and Cecil Rhodes the Prince of Denmark. Mr. Bernard Shaw has all the autocratic qualities of a first-rate tyrant, spoiled by his notions about freedom. On the throne of Russia he would be quite magnificent, more unexpected than any bomb, and consequently completely paralysing to all bomb-throwers; whilst the Tsar was obviously meant to be an English country gentleman, where all his failings as Tsar would be virtues as squire. Strauss is an aural specialist expressing himself the wrong way; while it is probable that King Alfonso would have discovered the secret of perpetual motion long ago, and that the Fat Boy of Peckham would have made a popular and successful Spanish monarch, if only these two celebrities had been changed at birth.

THE WEEK AT WESTMINSTER.

WHEN I mentioned last week that most of our men had bolted to the constituencies I did not wholly foresee the fell consequences. I imagined that the Master of Elibank, our portly and genial Chief Whip, would always keep sufficient forces in hand to make a House, and that, at the worst, the Irishmen would stand by him. Somehow, this did not happen, and Thursday gave me a new Parliamentary thrill in the shape of a "count-out." The Old Hand tells me that this used to be a favourite device, sometimes even countenanced by the Government of the day itself on a private members' night, when some particularly inconvenient motion had won top place in the ballot and threatened to disturb official serenity. Certain members specialised in the art, with the late Mr. Joseph Biggar as their most skilled mentor. Mr. Biggar was the inventor of what came to be known as "obstruction," and unwittingly laid the foundations of our present rigid system of closure by compartments, which reduces us private members to nonentities and invests the Executive with almost tyrannical powers. But he was also an ingratiating adept at the game of suddenly calling Mr. Speaker's attention to the fact that there are not forty members present. To move a count successfully, it seems, you must be sure of your facts. It is not enough to survey the House with a mathematical eye and satisfy yourself that only a dozen or so members are lounging on the benches. Others may be hidden in scores in the dining-room, the smoking-room, the library—all over the shop, and these will come rushing in the moment the bell rings and the lusty attendants shout "count!" Even Palace Yard rings with the intimation, and a decent sprinter can make his way from the foot of Parliament Street to within the Bar before the sands have run out in the hour-glass on the clerks' table. So Mr. Biggar and his pupils would complete a painful Odyssey through all the rooms and lobbies, mentally noting this man here and that one there before attempting the coup, and only when they were convinced that in all human probability not more than thirty-nine members could possibly assemble within the allotted time would they make the attempt.

An effectual "count" is now the rarest of events. More stringent rules and the advent of the taxi-cab have tended to baulk this pleasant resource. Somehow, however, Sir J. D. Rees managed to work it on Thursday evening. I do not know whether it was the result of crafty calculation or a mere impish trick. Sir J. D.—I understand that he dislikes being called Sir John, so I am all anxious to humour him—has a native gift for tripping up people and things. The Old Hand tells me that in the last Parliament he was a constant thorn in the side of the group of Indian sympathisers, of whom Sir Henry Cotton, Mr. Mackarness, and Dr. Rutherford were the leading lights. Whenever they asked a question or made a speech about Indian affairs he would spring forward and try to blunt the point of their argument by a counter proposition. This may have enhanced his popularity with the officials of the India Office, but it made his seat below the gangway about as comfortable as a bed of nettles. With the disappearance of this militant little section at the last general election Sir J. D. found that his occupation was gone, and moped accordingly. Like King Gama, he found the world extremely flat, with nothing whatever to grumble at. Much brooding over denied opportunities has led him to a step which many of us have anticipated.

At the end of last week he wrote a long letter to his Liberal Association discarding his political allegiance, trouncing Mr. Lloyd George, and generally voicing that innate, sub-conscious Toryism which has long been suspected, and at the first opportunity he dramatically crossed the floor and seated himself on the front Opposition bench below the gangway next to Viscount Castlereagh. This in itself was not very much. There have been defections before now, and there will be again. But it was a decided score to have brought off that "count." Only the proverbial zeal of the convert could have inspired the thought. It did not occur to any of the few Tories present, and, perhaps, seeing that we were actually discussing the motion for adjournment from Thursday to Monday for the formal prorogation, they would have refrained, even had they seen their chance, from springing such a trick on the Government; but to Sir J. D. the opportunity of making himself disagreeable to the people who only a few months ago had rewarded him with the Knight Commandership of the Indian Empire was irresistible. Just as though it had been Sir Henry Cotton or Mr. Mackarness, he made one of his panther bounds and brought his prey to the ground. When the last grain of sand had fallen through the glass and the Speaker counted heads, with his cocked hat as indicator, there were only thirty-six present, and everything had to stand over till Friday in order that the adjournment might be solemnly voted. It was a great nuisance, this bringing us all down again for a comical three minutes' sitting, and I understand that it seriously inconvenienced certain august plans for the week-end—but there you are. The forms of the House exist and must be obeyed, and Sir J. D. Rees was within the strict letter of his rights. Some people seem to imagine that a sort of moral stigma attaches to a Government which allows itself to be counted out against its wishes, and that it ranks second only to the carrying of a vote of want of confidence. I don't share this view, especially in such exceptional circumstances as the present, and it can be hardly imagined that many seats will turn upon it in the coming election. Still, it is one of those things that one could have wished had not happened, and I believe that our whips were a good deal chagrined. Sir J. D. is now standing as a Tory for some other constituency, so perhaps we shall hear of him again in his new guise.

There was no risk of the House of Lords counting itself out during the reform debates, even could it conceivably bring itself to such a material act. Their Lordships seemed thoroughly to enjoy the consciousness of their own imperfections, and discussed their shortcomings with engaging candour. To look at him nobody would suspect Lord Curzon of being the sturdy democrat that he has made himself out to be, while Lord Lansdowne's Whiggism took a form that would have dismayed a secret conclave at Lansdowne House. These peers protested overmuch their passion for popular rule and their sensitive concern for the due representation of the Commons in a joint sitting. The attitude of the Liberal rank and file was a little disconcerting, for Lord Courtney shook his professorial head at the Parliament Bill, Lord Brassey boomed something that sounded very like apprehensions, while Lord Weardale, of all people in the world, came out as a rebel. I have always been taught to regard Lord Weardale as a stalwart ever since the days when he sat below the Commons gangway as Philip Stanhope. Somehow that vague disease known as Constitutionitis has affected him, and he was inclined to scold Lord Crewe almost in the vein of Lord Halsbury. This is, however, no case of that rapid recantation of principles that sometimes descends upon ennobled Liberals, such, for instance, as the famous case of the first Lord Brabourne, who made his first speech and delivered his first vote against Gladstone, who had just raised him to the peerage. On that occasion Lord Rosebery caustically condoled with the renegade on the fact that "his coronet must indeed be a crown of thorns." Lord Weardale will remain staunch, although he may not like the line of action to which the Government finds itself compelled. One young peer on the Ministerial benches—Lord Nunburnholme, a Wilson of Hull—spoke out bravely for his leaders, and so far has kept his Liberalism vigorous amid enervating surroundings. For the rest, the debates were mainly a competition among the Unionists as to who could bid highest for popular confidence, and some of us did not find it particularly edifying.

This Parliament is now over. Like the stricken infant, it might observe that if so soon it was to be done for, it wondered what it was begun for. The next two weeks will decide the complexion of the new one, and when it reassembles may I, like the narrator of John Gilpin's ride, "be there to see."

THE STANDARD OIL TRUST.

VI.—FOREIGN WARS AND INTRIGUES.

HITHERTO we have been dealing with the history of the Standard Oil Trust on its native heath, the United States of America. It is now time to pass in brief review, as promised at the outset, some of its operations in foreign countries. It appears in many lands, this Protean conspirator, and always in some new guise. Here it is the pioneer and prophet of native oil; there it is the importer of vast floods of foreign oil. Itself protected by a heavy tariff in the United States, it poses in other lands as the chief of the apostles of free trade. It demands alike freedom to enter foreign oilfields as a prospector and foreign oil markets as a retailer. In one country it is the advocate of high prices; in another it is the ruthless undercutter of its competitors. Always preferring secrecy to daylight, its underground agitations embrace the press, the politicians, and the public. It is not always easy at first to discover who is behind a Standard oil agitation, but I shall give a few clues which may assist the student of oleaginous origins.

The Trust in Mexico.

Turning first to Mexico, we find that the Standard's operations there have been conducted under the name of the Waters-Pierce Oil Company of Missouri (mentioned in my last article), which is now after many years of falsehood admitted to be a tentacle of the Trust. The history of the re-entry of the Waters-Pierce Company to the State of Texas is a good example of the Standard's typical methods. There sits in the United States Senate one Joseph Bailey, a Democrat of the deepest dye. A lawyer, an orator, one of those pure-souled patriots who denounce in public the trusts and monopolies, Senator Bailey was exactly the man the Standard wanted. The full facts are given by Miss Ida M. Tarbell, in an article in the "American Magazine" for January, 1908. The Texas Legislature passed a sweeping anti-Trust law; under it the Waters-Pierce company was prosecuted from court to court until finally in March, 1900, the United States Supreme Court sustained the decisions of the Texas Courts, and the company was ordered to close up its business and get out. At this point Senator (then Congressman) Bailey appeared, and for a fee of $3,300 (charged on the company's books to "profit and loss") succeeded in obtaining from the Democratic Attorney-General of Texas two months' grace. The Waters-Pierce Company finally transferred itself to a new company of the same name, which took over the entire business of the original company, and Mr. Henry Clay Pierce, the manager, applied for a charter for the new one. He swore that it was in no way connected with the Standard Oil Trust, and that he owned 3,996 out of 4,000 shares. Largely through the influence of Congressman Bailey the new charter was granted. Four weeks later Bailey, who was always regarded as a poor man, was able to buy the splendid Grape Vine Ranch at Dallas, Texas, of 6,000 acres—a singular coincidence, to say the least.

The new Waters-Pierce Oil Company went on trading until in the Missouri proceedings in 1906 Mr. Henry Clay Pierce, the managing director, was at last forced on to the witness-stand. He there admitted that he only owned 1,250 shares of the new Waters-Pierce Company, and that the Standard owned 2,750. He admitted quite frankly that in order to evade the anti-Trust law of the State of Texas the Standard's 2,750 shares stood on the books in his name from May, 1900, to September, 1904. During this period the dividends were sent to Mr. Bayne, of the Seaboard National Bank of New York—a gentleman whose name my readers may recall as appearing in my first article in connection with the Standard's carefully concealed ownership of the Security Oil Company of Texas. In June, 1904, Mr. H. C. Pierce was asked to transfer these 2,750 shares to Mr. Van Buren, who happens, oddly enough, to be the son-in-law of Mr. J. D. Archbold, whose name has appeared so often in previous articles.

During all this time that the Waters-Pierce Oil Company was posing as an "independent" business it was carrying on a very large and profitable trade in the adjoining Republic of Mexico. Although there are large natural deposits of petroleum in Mexico, the Waters-Pierce Company preferred to import crude oil from Texas and Oklahoma, refine it in Mexico, and sell it at a price which returned a profit of 600 per cent. on the invested capital. But the Mexican Government desired to develop the natural resources of the Republic, and as they were quite tired of the high prices of the Standard, which had a monopoly, they granted large oil concessions to the Pearson interests, which are headed by Lord Cowdray. The Pearson firm had executed large railway, waterworks, and harbour contracts for the Mexican Government, and they developed the petroleum resources of Mexico so rapidly that the Standard, which was hampered by a duty of $4\frac{1}{2}$ a barrel on all the crude oil they imported, soon began to feel the pinch.

Then ensued the rate-war which lasted so many months in Mexico, but which is reported to be now compromised. The Waters-Pierce Company built a refinery in Mexico, and spent large sums in buying Mexican oil lands. They cut prices so heavily that they sold oil under cost, but the natural advantages of the Pearson interests were so great as to render them impregnable, and the Eagle Oil Company was recently successfully launched on the London market by Lord Cowdray's firm to carry out extensive developments on the oil-bearing lands they own. During the bitter contest there was plenty of evidence of the existence of the Standard's press bureau, the head of which gets the liberal salary of $12,500 a year. Articles appeared in London financial newspapers predicting the imminent ruin of the Pearson interests, and obviously intended to stop the English investor from backing their flotations. According to a statement recently published in the United States, a more subtle campaign seems to have been carried out against President Diaz, who favours the Pearson interests. Many officials of the Government, including a son of President Diaz, have become shareholders of the Pearson local oil company, being naturally desirous of developing their national resources and of fighting this American monopoly. Now under the title of "Barbarous Mexico," an ostensibly humanitarian campaign was lately opened in newspapers and magazines of the United States of America against the alleged harsh treatment of the Yaqui Indians by the Mexican Government. In the Cosmopolitan Magazine of March last it was categorically asserted by Mr. Alfred H. Lewis, one of the foremost American magazine writers, that this campaign had been inspired by the Oil Trust. They were determined to be revenged on President Diaz, and, therefore, they induced a number of well-meaning Americans—who haven't time to put down the public lynching of negroes in the United States—to plead the cause of the unfortunate semi-enslaved Yaqui Indians. I cannot prove this charge, but Mr. Lewis says it is believed by Americans resident in Texas and Mexico. From the nature of the case this allegation is difficult to substantiate, but for the present purpose it is a sufficiently significant fact that a writer of Mr. Lewis's reputation should believe that such a Machiavellian scheme is possible. That the Standard will stick at nothing appears from the fact that when Lord Cowdray visited New York last June he was shadowed by their detectives. The Standard Oil Trust issued a formal denial of this charge, but Lord Cowdray repeated it and reaffirmed it.

The Railway Rebate in Canada.

Turning next to Canada, we find that the British flag has been no protection against the Standard's invasion. Here, too, railway discrimination was the principal weapon employed, and this was aided by the legislation which the Standard obtained at Ottawa permitting them to ship their oil along the international waterways and the Canadian canals in bulk steamers to Canadian ports, where it was easy to transfer it to tank cars. In 1898 the late Mr. Henry D. Lloyd, author of "Wealth Against Commonwealth," wrote as follows to the present writer with regard to these discriminations:—

> My information came direct from the attorney of one of the principal Canadian refiners. This refiner carried on his business with my book at his elbow, and he told his attorney that precisely the things that I had exposed in that book were there and then being done to him. The discrimination was managed by some manipulation of the rates with regard to shipments in barrels. The Oil Trust had barrelling works of its own at certain points, from which it received rates at discriminations that killed the profits of the home refiners who did not have these central stations. The refiner I speak of was prosperous, liked the business, and would have continued in it but for this railroad discrimination. He made every possible effort by appeals to the railroad people in Canada to remedy the wrong, but found them as determined to favour the American Trust as railroads in the United States.

Finally the Standard clinched the matter by purchasing a Canadian refinery, which it runs as the Imperial Oil Company, a nice patriotic sort of name which no doubt appeals to the Canadian public. With this refinery and the railroad discriminations they are as powerful in Canada as they are in the United States.

The Benzine Battle in the Far East.

When one turns to the Far East it is surprising to discover that the Standard has not had things all its own way. It does a huge business in China and Manchuria in case-oil, but it has there had to fight, first, Russian oil shipped in bulk, and, when that fell off, the competition of the Dutch East Indies. Several of these islands are very rich in petroleum, and, in my opinion, its failure to secure a footing there was the Standard's first great defeat. The story is told with commendable bluntness and candour by Mr. Robinson, British Consul at Amsterdam, in his annual report for the year 1897 (Foreign Office Consular reports, No. 2,054). He says:—

> At present a very important question has been raised by the attempt of the well-known American monopolist undertaking, the Standard Oil Company, to acquire a footing in the Dutch East Indies by the purchase of the shares of the Moeara Enim Company, an important concession in Sumatra. An extraordinary general meeting of the latter company was to have been held in the last days of February for the purpose of ratifying the agreement with the Standard Oil Company, but the Dutch Government has interfered by the categorical declaration that no concession will be granted to a company under the control of the American monster monopoly, and the meeting has naturally been postponed. It remains to be seen whether the financial power of the Standard Oil Company can be effectively resisted by such steps, but the Government seems quite determined to use all possible means to this end, and the course which it has adopted will certainly be a popular one, threatened as Netherland India is by an "imperium in imperio" of this description. The agitation against the Standard Oil Company's monopoly, in so far as this inflicts on this country all the dangers and disasters caused by an exclusive supply of low-flashing oil, is a constantly increasing one.

The result was that the Moeara Enim Company were unable to sell, and the Standard has never been able to get into the Dutch Indies. Worse still, the Moeara Enim and two other Dutch petroleum companies were absorbed by the Royal Dutch Petroleum Company, and this in its turn became in 1907 allied with the Shell Transport and Trading Company of London, of which Sir Marcus Samuel is the head.

Briefly, the present position is that two new companies have been created, in which the Royal Dutch and the Shell Company hold all the shares. The Bataafsche Petroleum Maatschappij is a Dutch company with a capital of 80,000,000 florins, which carries on all the pumping and refining operations of the combine in the Far East, while a new English company, the Anglo-Saxon Petroleum Company, with a capital of £4,000,000, owns all the petroleum fields in which they operate, and also the very large fleet of tank steamers formerly owned by the Shell Company, in which their products are carried. They send into London alone 80,000 tons of petroleum spirit annually through the Asiatic Petroleum Company, their marketing agents. This year the same combination sent 10,000,000 gallons of this motor spirit into the United States, supplying firms who were competitors of the Standard Oil Trust. Last year the Royal Dutch-Shell combine took over the business of many of their agents. For this purpose the Shell Company provided additional capital amounting to £440,000, the Royal Dutch put up £660,000, and the Asiatic Petroleum Company £200,000, making an additional outlay of £1,300,000 for one branch of their business. A large Roumanian oil company, the Astra, has been secured, and the Shanghai-Langkat Company, which operates refineries in Borneo, has also been bought out since the amalgamation of 1907. That amalgamation has apparently been profitable to those engaged in it, for the Shell Company's dividend, which had been only 5 per cent. per annum between 1903 and 1906, rose to 15 per cent. in 1907, 20 per cent. in 1908, and 22½ per cent. in 1909.

The Secret of the "Oil War."

Now the awkward part of this chain of events so far as the Standard is concerned is that the whole petroleum world has been turned upside down by the motor engine. In 1897 Mr. Paul Babcock, director of the Standard, told the Select Committee on Petroleum that they had in New York tanks full of naphtha which they could not sell. Mr. Bergheim, a well-known Galician oil producer, told a City meeting the other day that he could recall the day when his firm gave the naphtha to any one who would take it away. Then the Standard with its control of the tank installations and the selling agencies for reaching the consumer of illuminating oil (or kerosene) was the master of the world. Now the consumption of kerosene is threatened by electricity among the rich and slot-gas meters among the poor, and it is the despised naphtha (or benzine) which is in demand. Motor-cars, motor-cycles, motor-omnibuses, motor-lorries, aeroplanes, all these engines are demanding petrol, and it is the good fortune of the Shell combine that its crude oil provides a larger percentage of benzine than the Standard's American. While huge quantities of benzine, for which there is an increasing demand, are being sent to Europe by the Shell combine, the Standard is left with its monopoly of kerosene, for which the demand is decreasing. At the same time, the Sumatra and Borneo crude produces a very profitable percentage of petroleum wax, for which there is also an increasing demand, and there is a big market for the residue all over the Far East as fuel oil. This is the real secret of the recent "oil war," which has broken out because the Standard finds its supremacy challenged by wealthy and vigorous competitors, and is trying to use its vast accumulated profits in a "rate-cutting" war.

This is not the first time the Standard has attempted to injure the Shell. In September, 1904, the New York Herald published an interview with Mr. W. H. Libby, the foreign marketing agent of the Standard in New York. This was a long "puff" of the Standard, and contained the allegations that in the "rate-cutting" which had then been going on the Shell Company had been reduced to serious financial straits, and were selling oil falsely branded. As these allegations were entirely false, the Shell Company brought an action against the New York Herald in the English Courts for libel, which ended in 1905 in a complete victory for the victims of Standard Oil calumny. Mr. J. Eldon Bankes, K.C. (now Mr. Justice Bankes) stated on behalf of the defendants that they had made inquiries into the matter and found that the statements could not be substantiated, and, therefore, withdrew, apologised, and paid the plaintiff's costs as between solicitor and client. As we proceed we shall find other points at which the Standard and the Shell have collided, but the vital factor in the present oil situation is the Sumatran benzine, which the Rockefellers failed to secure in 1897.

The Standard and Burma.

Passing to India, the Standard had to fight for years with the Russian oil exported in bulk through the Suez Canal, and is now pressed hard by the Burma Oil Company, an undertaking mainly under Scotch control, which has until recently had a monopoly of the Burma oil output. As there is a tariff on American oil in India from which Burmese oil is exempt, it was obviously to the interest of the Standard—which thoroughly believes in tariffs at home—to get behind that obstacle. It, therefore, applied to the Indian Government for an oil-prospecting licence in Burma, and was much grieved when the Indian Government refused it. We come across that same Mr. Libby flitting about India. In November, 1902, the Calcutta correspondent of the Financial News reports that this gentleman was trying to induce the Bengal Chamber of Commerce to support his little scheme against the Indian Government. The correspondent gives us a pretty picture of Mr. Libby's virtuous protestations:—

> The representative of the Standard Oil Company seems to wish the Bengal Chamber of Commerce to believe that the motives of his company were not wholly mercenary—that, on the other hand, they were philanthropic, inasmuch as he says that "it was the intention of the Standard Oil Company to encourage as many Burmese natives as possible to enter the producing business, by aiding them in the employment of modern machinery and modern methods, by providing them with an immediate cash market for their crude oil, and by loans, if necessary, at very moderate rates of interest, to the end that production might be stimulated and an important industry created. The Standard hoped to derive its own profits by economies in refining, by materially improving the quality and value of the manufactured products, and by distributing the said products in India and other Oriental markets where aggressive effort might largely increase existing consumption."

We know, of course, that the Standard has always been willing to encourage other people to undertake the risks of oil-well sinking, but the idea of stimulating this speculative business for the benefit of the natives of a semi-barbarous country is novel as well as captivating. When Mr. Libby's campaign failed in India he came to London, and his claims were pressed on the India Office by the United States Ambassador in London, the Hon. Joseph Choate. As the Ambassador had often appeared for the Standard when at the American Bar, and as he had himself once stated that he was a shareholder in the Trust, we may be sure that his advocacy of the Standard's schemes in Burma did not lack either zeal or ability. But it failed, and the Trust cannot get into Burma. The imports of all classes of oils from Burma into Madras Presidency during 1909-10 amounted to £317,868, as compared with £212,982 in 1908-9. In the same period the imports of American oils decreased from £241,128 to £189,362.

Russia and the Suez Canal Agitation.

Passing next to Russia, there is no doubt that in the past this was a far more dangerous competitor of the Standard than it now is. The Baku output was at first so tremendous that it seriously disarranged the Standard's calculations, and when first Russian shipowners and afterwards Sir Marcus Samuel proposed in 1891 to ship Russian oil in bulk in tank steamers to the Far East, a perfect panic seized the Standard. Immediately one of those bogus agitations, in which it excels, broke out with great virulence. Not only was the shipping community thrilled by the supposed dangers of conveying oil in bulk through the Suez Canal, but the British nation was once more warned of the dark and malevolent designs of Russia against "our highway to India." Nothing could be more amusing than this waving of the Union Jack over the designs of the Standard Oil Trust, but we shall see the same "patriotic" imposture reappear in the flash-point agitation a few years later. The Standard was at this time supplying its Far Eastern markets with oil packed in tin cases, which was, of course, a more expensive method of transit than the large tanks of the bulk-oil steamers, and the agitation against the new scheme was carried to the Foreign Office. The story is told without unduly emphasising the Standard's share in it in Mr. J. D. Henry's standard work, "Thirty-five Years of Oil Transport" (Chaps. V. and VI.). Messrs. Russell and Arnholz, solicitors, wrote to the Foreign Office, urging the Government to use their influence through the British directors of the Suez Canal Company to prevent the transit of bulk oil. Lord Salisbury asked them for whom they were acting, and received this very significant reply:—

In view of the opposing commercial interests engaged, and the fact that the true promoters of bulk transit have not yet declared themselves, we respectfully submit that without pleading the privilege of our profession it would be imprudent on our part to permit our clients to disclose their names.

In the reply which the British directors of the Suez Canal Company forwarded to Lord Salisbury, this coyness on the part of the Standard was thus commented on:—

They decline to give your lordship any clue for the present as to the names of their clients, but an expression in their letter of November 10, which describes the passage of petroleum in bulk as a disturbance of the regular and safe case trade, leads to the inference that they are pleading the cause of parties engaged in sending petroleum through the canal packed in cases, and whose interests they appear to think may be damaged by facilities being given for the more economical conveyance of petroleum by these tank ships.

The Foreign Office then informed Messrs. Russell and Arnholz that His Majesty's Government could not take action in the direction they desired without full information as to what British interest they represented in the matter. As the Foreign Office thus declined to become a Rockefeller catspaw, somebody organised a memorial by merchants and tinplate manufacturers in Wales, where the Standard still buys most of the material for its cases, and another by shipowners who at that time were being chartered to carry case-oil to the East for the Standard. Finally, Sir Frederick Abel and Mr. (now Sir) Boverton Redwood prepared a report for those British shipowners who were hostile to the bulk carriage of oil through the Canal. Sir Frederick Abel was a chemist who constantly gave evidence on behalf of the Standard Oil Trust when it needed an expert, and Mr. Boverton Redwood had been from 1870 till just before this period (1889) the salaried chemist of the Petroleum Association, a trade body whose members vended the Rockefeller oils. Mr. Redwood was subsequently for a considerable period regularly employed to test oil cargoes on behalf of the Anglo-American Oil Company, and he gave evidence against raising the flashpoint of lamp oil before the Petroleum Committee of 1896. His presence on the scene is sufficient to satisfy anybody in the oil trade as to what was the real origin of this benevolent agitation against tank steamers. While this gentleman was still in Egypt Sir Marcus Samuel artfully published in the Times an extract from a paper Mr. Redwood read to the Institution of Civil Engineers, in which he said:—

The tank storage of kerosene oil has undoubtedly a great advantage over barrel or case storage in the event of fire.

Mr. Redwood was thus rather neatly cornered, for he had to admit in his report that this statement was still true. So he had to lay the chief stress on the danger of burning oil escaping on to the water—which the experience of nearly twenty years has proved to be a very trifling risk. The directors of the Suez Canal Company took a very accurate measure of this report when they replied:—

Without entering into the question whether the work of Sir F. Abel and Mr Boverton Redwood is not merely a criticism of our regulations bearing too exclusively the impression of the anxiety of parties interested in the present mode of transporting petroleum to the East, we, etc.

After this the agitation fizzled out, and the transport of oil in bulk still continues. The subject was referred to at the Institution of Civil Engineers in February, 1894, when Mr. (now Sir) Fortescue Flannery invited Mr. Boverton Redwood to state how his prophecies on the carriage of bulk oil through the Canal had been fulfilled. Mr. Redwood replied thus (Proceedings Inst.C.E., Vol. cxvi., p. 250):—

He could only say that if, as appeared to be the case, the transport of petroleum through the canal had been going on with entire absence of anything approaching to an accident, he was very glad to hear it. He did not know, however, that that was to be taken as absolute proof that no risk existed. Time alone, and a longer time than had as yet elapsed, would demonstrate that.

Nearly twenty years have now elapsed; the Standard Oil Trust itself has tank steamers which convey oil through the Canal, and Mr. Henry in his work shows that between 1892 and 1906 2,000,000 tons of oil were thus transported.

The Nobel Agreement.

With the collapse of its artfully engineered agitation on this subject the Standard next turned its energies to diplomacy. It devoted great arts to Ludwig and Manuel Nobel, the millionaires who had grown rich out of the "gushers" of Baku, and cherished dreams of becoming the Rockefellers of Russia. The Standard's emissaries played on their vanity and induced the Nobels to form the Russian Refiners' Union, which 80 per cent. of the trade had entered in 1894. The idea was that the Russian export output should be limited to an amount agreed with the Standard, and that Nobel Brothers were to be the sole agents in Europe. Each refiner was to send out a certain quantity of oil according to the capacity of his refinery. At the same time there were certain distributing firms in Europe which had been dealing chiefly in Russian oils, and as Nobel Brothers did not require them, the good, kind Standard agreed to buy them up. It is in this way that the Italian Petroleum Company, the Bremen-American Company, and Reith and Company, of Antwerp (all mentioned in my first article) came under the control of the Standard. At the same time they acquired the Kerosene Company, which had a great storage installation close to the Anglo-American plant at Purfleet. The Trust continued to run these businesses in their old names, and it was some time before the truth began to leak out. Production in Baku was at that time so tremendous that before the three years during which the union was to last had expired, the Russian refiners were quite tired of it. Then the pleasing result was realised that, with the exception of Nobels, none of them had any selling organisation in Europe, and that the Standard had so perfected its control of the trade that people who wanted Russian oil could only get American. The first firm to take action were the Paris Rothschilds, who are the owners of the Caspian and Black Sea Company at Baku, and next to the Nobels the largest refiners in Russia. They established in 1898 in this country at vast expense a new selling organisation called the Anglo-Caucasian Oil Company, afterwards merged in the Consolidated Petroleum Company, and a vigorous contest took place for their share of the English kerosene trade.

The Russian oil trade has always been a commercial switchback. At the time just mentioned the Rothschilds and Nobels were exporting largely to Europe, and the Mantascheffs were sending large quantities of Russian oil to the Far East. Then came the Baku riots of 1905, when murder and incendiarism stalked through the oil fields and the production fell off tremendously. It was a stroke of luck for the Standard, for it crippled their (at that time) strongest rival. Since that day the exports of petroleum from Baku have not been large, most of the reduced output being consumed in Russia, where oil fuel is used far more extensively than it is here. Then early this year came the Maikop boom, a vast number of French and English companies being floated to work oil on the borders of the Black Sea. The majority of them will never produce a barrel of oil, but the good properties will soon be pumping oil, and their product is bound to have its effect on the European market. Hence no doubt the Standard's second reason for embarking on the recent oil war—the desire to stifle these infant companies at their birth.

when they are still subject to the diseases of inexperience, experimental work, and bad management.

The Vacuum Company in Austria.

Passing next to Austria, we find the Standard operating in the Galician oilfield, the production of which has risen from 214,800 tons in 1895 to 1,734,235 tons in 1908. The story is told in the Foreign Office report on Austria-Hungary for 1908 (No. 4,355 Consular reports). There was an enormous production in 1908, but the State railways could not use the raw oil in its locomotives until the benzine was extracted. This is our Consul's narrative (p. 15):—

> The Producers' Association, however, had not the capital to build the necessary works for this process or the new reservoirs required, and at this stage the Standard Oil Company of America saw an opportunity to extend its influence in Austria. The American company entered into negotiations with the association and offered to erect the factory for extracting the benzine, and further to build the new reservoirs and lease them to the producers, who would, in return, have to supply raw oil to the Standard Oil Company's representatives in Austria at a special price. An arrangement on these lines, which would have given the American Combine a predominating influence in the Austrian oil industry, was on the point of being signed when the Austrian Government intervened in June, 1909, to prevent it by undertaking to carry out the necessary works itself on much easier terms for the producers. . . .
> By this arrangement the Standard Oil Company has been entirely excluded from the business of supplying the State railways with oil; but the Austrian Government has gone further in its desire to protect the Austrian oil industry from the competition of the American Trust, which is represented here by an affiliated company [i.e., the Vacuum Oil Company, of Austria a branch of the Vacuum Oil Company, of Rochester, N.Y.] and has introduced a Bill in the Reichsrat containing various provisions aimed directly at the Standard Oil Company. Thus a concession will in future be necessary for carrying on the business of storing, handling, and refining raw oil, and the provincial authorities are able to refuse this at their discretion. Further, the distribution of petroleum by means of tank carts is only to be allowed by permission of the Ministry of Commerce. The tank carts were recently introduced into Austria by the representatives of the American Trust, but met with great opposition on the part of the trade because they rendered the middleman superfluous, and there is little doubt that the Ministry will not give the permission required.

The Times Vienna correspondent on September 14 last reported further developments of this war against the Standard. It appears that there is also operating in Galicia a certain Limanova Petroleum Company, which, though registered as an Austrian company, has about £500,000 of French capital invested in it. It has been working "in some sort of unconfessed relationship with the Vacuum Oil Company," and the Times correspondent tells us how the Rockefellers have been forced to swallow their favourite medicine. He writes:—

> The object of the Standard Oil and its affiliated companies in Austria (as in other countries) is to obtain control of the Galician oilfields, which are worked chiefly by a large number of Austrian producers and refiners organised in a loose ring or trust. The tactics of selling oil at or below cost price currently employed by the Standard Oil Company to kill its competitors or to bring them to their knees appear to have been employed both by the Vacuum and the Limanova Companies.
> Some months ago the Austrian Government intervened to protect the Austrian producers and refiners, and applied to the Limanova Company in particular methods of administrative chicanery and railway discrimination strikingly similar to those which made the name of the Standard Oil Company a byword in the United States. The tactics of the Austrian authorities are as indefensible, or as defensible, as are those of the Standard Oil Company.

The Standard did not enjoy railroad discriminations applied to itself, and it not only made unavailing representations to the Austrian Government through the United States Minister at Vienna, but acting through the French shareholders in the Limanova Company they induced the French Minister to remonstrate with Austria.

> These representations having produced little effect, the French Government is now stated to be about to adopt measures of retaliation, and to impose a prohibitive tariff upon Austrian petroleum imported into France.

In order to help the Standard Oil Trust to crush out the Galician oil industry, the French consumer was to pay more for the petroleum products, ozokerit, etc., that he buys from Austria. But this scheme has failed, for on November 9, 1910, it was announced in the Neue Freie Press (quoted here by the Financial Times) that the Limanova Company had surrendered. It has agreed to give up all business transactions with the Vacuum Company, not to sell directly or indirectly to them either crude oil or the products of petroleum, and not to make use of the selling agency of the Vacuum Oil Company for the sale of its own products. It has further agreed not to undersell the other Galician refiners, and the Austrian Government has therefore cancelled the discriminations referred to which it employed against the Limanova Company. Deserted thus by its French ally, the Vacuum Company has to rely on itself, and it is announced that the United States Government has sent a special envoy to Vienna to discuss with the American Ambassador, among other things, the differences between the Austrian Government and the Vacuum Oil Company. It looks as though the Austrian Government is going to win in its struggle with this unscrupulous monopoly, and that the Vacuum Oil Company will have to climb down.

"Boodle" at Bucharest.

In the adjoining country of Roumania the Standard has waged a bitter war for the control of the oil industry. The output of oil in Roumania has been increasing very largely—it trebled in quantity between 1895 and 1900, and as it has a high flash-point the Standard wanted to get control of the field in order to supply its Italian and Mediterranean market. When its agents appeared first on the scene, Roumania had one large refining company—the Steana Romana—which dealt with about two-thirds of the native crude oil. The wells were all, or nearly all, in the hands of small proprietors who were unable to sink them deep enough, and whose ability to market their oil was hampered by the high railway rates and deficiency of tank cars. The Standard came forward with a proposal to build a pipe-line from the fields to its proposed refinery, but fortunately for Roumania, its statesmen had heard of the Standard's American record, and they refused to allow it to thus obtain entire control of the national output. It was allowed to build a refinery, and it bought certain oilwells from the owners, but the pipe-line project was decisively ruled out. Strange conversions went on at Bucharest when the Standard's lobbyists put in their fine work. Politicians and newspapers which had opposed the Standard were converted from the error of their ways in the manner with which Mr. Archbold has made us familiar, but the Standard was unable to secure any special privileges. By this time the Deutsche Bank, which controls the Steana Romana, had taken an active interest in the matter, and formed some sort of alliance through the European Petroleum Union with the Shell-Royal-Dutch combine, and the Rothschilds, the Mantascheffs, and Gukasoffs of Baku. The terms of this alliance are unknown, but very keen rivalry has been going on in the Roumanian oilfield, and only last year the Shell-Royal-Dutch party purchased a large Roumanian oil company, the Astra, which is now valued at £1,200,000. In the spring of 1907 the Standard came to a "selling arrangement" with the European Petroleum Union, and this was followed by a similar arrangement with the Asiatic Petroleum Company, whose capital is equally held by the Shell Company, the Royal Dutch, and the Paris Rothschilds. Just how far the European Petroleum Union is involved in the "rate-war" which has broken out between its twin the Asiatic and the Standard is unknown, but as the Deutsche Bank is largely interested in Galician oilfields where such a bitter fight has been going on with the Standard for some months, it is probable that the whole combination must ultimately be involved if the "oil war" lasts much longer.

German-American Companies.

In Germany the Standard was artful enough to strengthen its position by acquiring existing oil companies and retaining certain prominent German oil merchants as shareholders, thus breaking to some extent the force of the natural outcry against itself as an alien corporation. In the case of its English companies, very few shares are held by anybody resident in England, and even these are mostly Americans, but in Germany they are more cautious. There has been a great controversy as to the adoption of tank railway wagons and tank installations on the Prussian State railways. It is obvious that these methods will cheapen the transit of oil, but it is also obvious that they will play into the hands of the Standard, which with its vast capital is able to establish extensive installations of this kind, and to prevent its smaller competitors from reaching the market.

FRANCE, SWEDEN, AND NORWAY.

In France, where there is a heavy duty on refined petroleum, the Standard has established a refinery, which has given it a monopoly of the benzine trade. The latest news last September was that the French Government has been induced to reduce the import duty on Dutch East Indian benzine from £1 to 10s., and this has enabled the Royal Dutch combine to start a refinery in France for the purpose of competing with the Standard. As I have explained, the Sumatran and Borneo crude provides a higher percentage of benzine than the Standard's American crude, and there is no doubt this move will prove a very awkward one for the latter.

From Norway, in September, came the news that the last independent refinery had been acquired by the Standard, that much public indignation had been aroused among the hardy Norsemen, and that steps were being taken with the support of the Government to build at once an independent refinery. All round the world there is a revolt against the domination of the Rockefellers, and a revulsion against their commercial practices. The Morgenblad, of Stockholm (quoted in the English shipping organ Fairplay of July 22, 1909), gives an account of the characteristic methods of one of its branches, the Vacuum Oil Company, of Copenhagen, which is another of the Everest group. The Stockholm newspaper states that the Civil Commission appointed to inquire into the buying of naval stores has in its possession several letters from the Vacuum Oil Company, of Copenhagen, to engineers in the Swedish Navy. These letters contain advice to enable the engineers to prove to their superior officers, who possess less knowledge of the subject, that other lubricating oils are inferior to those vended by the Vacuum Company. One letter runs:—"It is very easy to do this by only tightening the nuts a little, and the bearings will soon become hot."

In my concluding article I shall narrate some of the Standard's business methods in Great Britain.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

FAITH-HEALING AND THE LAW.

I SUPPOSE the French law authorities could not help prosecuting Mr. Mann, the "telepathic" healer, different medical men having, as you say in England, laid informations against him as guilty of breach of a stringent article of the Code. All the same, there is some inconsistency in their action. If he had called himself a Christian Scientist, I dare say no action would have been taken against him. Had he followed M. de Lasalle in operating with Lourdes water, the Public Prosecutor would not certainly have moved in the matter, any more than against any of the numerous chaplains at Lourdes who proclaim to the whole world the faith cures worked in the grotto by their instrumentality.

The methods of Mr. Mann (I believe he is an American citizen) belong to what doctors call psychotherepathy, or healing by suggestion, of which faith healing is a variety. The late Professor Charcot scientifically showed and proved beyond a doubt that very many diseases can be cured by moral influence. At Lourdes as well as at his clinique at the Salpêtrière, I witnessed many of his demonstrations. But the diseases must be due to what physicians here term "trophic disorders," or to bad habits contracted by the organism, or particular organs, or both, during long periods of illness. It is now admitted that most diseases that are not surgical cases or that are not due to microbic infection are due to weakness of the nervous system. And even sores can be alleviated by moral influence or suggestion. How often have I not seen nursery maids in the Champs Elysées persuade children who had fallen or otherwise hurt themselves that the bobo, or bruise, was just nothing, and that to rub it with the leaf of a tree would entirely cure it. As the nurse pretended to rub the child ceased to think of his mishap, though an ecchymosis proved that he had had too good reason to cry or howl. Nurserymaids instinctively hit on "suggestion" as a curative method. Quacks do so, too, but acting from shrewd observation I am prepared to admit there is hardly a successful quack who cannot boast of a certain number of real cures. I also believe that unsympathetic, fashionable physicians depending for their vogue on fine establishments and smart motors have really very few cures to show. Some years ago I heard of a Methodist minister setting up to do better than doctors of this sort. And so he did by calling, whenever he knew of illness in his flock, a prayer meeting at his chapel. If the invalid could not come there, he held the meeting at that person's house, in his room, and nearly always with curative effect. He knew nothing of Charcot or suggestion, and ascribed his success to the power of prayer.

The most famous of the healers by persuasion, or suggestion, that I can speak of from having seen them operate were the ex-private of Zouaves, Jacob, and Philippe, who at different times had the honour of being summoned by the Tsar to Russia and once to Compiègne. Jacob seemed a human magneto-electric organism at high tension, and in the highest degree self-confident—as were also Philippe and Mme. Blavatsky. He underwent prosecution scores of times, often being heavily sentenced to fine and imprisonment. Believers in him paid the fines. The rest in gaol seemed to renovate him. At last the judges grew tired of sentencing him, and he enjoyed full licence to beard the Faculty of Medicine. Whenever he appeared before the Correctional Tribunal a crowd of witnesses gathered near him to declare the cures he has, as it seemed to them, miraculously performed. They were of all ranks. The greater number were upper class. The ladies, however, outnumbered persons of the other sex. Jacob asked no fees, but took any that was offered. I remember his having told a stockbroker troubled with dyspepsia not to give him anything until eighteen months after appetite had returned. The Bourse gentleman at the end of the time specified brought Jacob a banknote for 10,000 frs.

Mr. Mann, whose case was last week adjourned for a fortnight, has likewise a body of witnesses to speak for him. The defendant's theory, said a witness for the prosecution, Professor Thoinot, of the Faculty of Medicine, "is pure rubbish. I have no patience with those why cry up his therapeutic-telepathy outrage on common sense, let alone on medical science." Very likely. But listen to testimony on the other side. A Mme. Fontaine, whose husband is well known in the jewellery trade, says: "I owe a debt of lifelong gratitude to Mr. Mann. He has saved my life. I had, so to speak, no stomach, had no strength to move about.

no hearing, for I had grown deaf, and I suffered dreadfully from nervous collapse. He cured me as if by a miracle." Mme. Moreau, rentière, deposes: "I was all but in the grave from neurasthenitis and a most painful affection of the right eye. The doctors who met in consultation about it said it must be removed. In my distress I went to Mann; he has completely cured me."

There is a side to the faith-cure picture that ought not to be overlooked. It is that of the persons who have paid their money and not been cured. Endless are those who have faith and died uncured or dragged on life in a hopelessly incurable state. If Lourdes bears the official stamp of the Church, the cures there in the record years are not more than one in a thousand. They tend to diminish as pilgrims multiply. Seven hundred thousand came last year in the season in which the piscina is available; yet it was by no means a successful season, though there were cures. Certainly if I needed medical help I should not go to a faith-healer's. Were I a judge I should think twice before sending Mann to prison. The law ought to be the same for him as for miracle-workers at resorts of pilgrims.

I have often had occasion to record here triumphs of feminism, and that without a suffragist method being once employed. Perhaps had they been resorted to the cause might have been deserted by its masculine supporters, who are mostly, so far as I know, an élite. The Midinettes, or cloak-making girls, did resort to violence in their strike promenade, but the policemen very good naturedly did not retort, and rather slurred over what had happened in filling charge-sheets. Women have nothing to gain by resorting to fisticuffs, and a great deal to lose. A new honour for the feminist cause has been gained by Mlle. Trélat, who comes out "bracketed" with the two masculine competitors for a first diploma at the Special School for Architecture. There was some hesitation on the part of the examiners as to whether she was not worthy to figure above the fellow students now bracketed with her. She comes of a family of distinction in regard to talents and artistic and scientific acquirements. Their loyalty to the Republican form of government has never varied since the Revolution, when they stood high in the bourgeoisie of Paris. M. Emile Trélat and his son, grandfather and father of Mlle. Trélat, were eminent architects. The immediate ancestor of Emile, a doctor of considerable repute, acted as secretary to the Provisional Government in 1848. In politics he declared himself more the feminist than anything else. He assured Louis Blanc that most of the women who filled the mad wards of the Salpêtrière were there because they had large families and were driven out of their minds by over-anxiety. As director of that refuge for 8,000 women he ought to have spoken with knowledge. He exhorted his daughter-in-law and his lady patients to give their girls a strong—that is to say, a mind-bracing—education. The movemnet came from him and Senator Carnot, Minister of Public Instruction in 1848, which culminated forty years later in the Camille Sée law for the creation of girls' lycées.

Mlle. Trélat was preceded in the building profession by Mme. Bissoud, who specialised herself after she had served in an architect's office as a builder. Her husband had been one. He died, leaving her to attend to a number of half-finished houses. She donned a cyclist's suit for convenience in climbing scaffoldings, and going from one to another locality to direct her masons with her plans strapped knapsack-like on her back. Her character being firm, her temper even, and her head clear, she succeeded well. When she had no building business to attend to, she studied all the articles of the code relating to that business, and travelled to extend her professional knowledge. I heard some months ago that she died leaving a good fortune, made chiefly by herself, to her family.

The other day, on a platform of the Gare du Nord, I recognised two passengers. One, a man over sixty, with a red face, pale blue eyes, and an easy-going manner reminding one of King Edward's—was H.R.H. the Duke of Chartres, the uncle of the Queen of Portugal. His companion, a man of fifty-five, and looking quite that age, was the wealthy M. Arnaud de l'Ariége, the largest shareholder, next to the British Government, in the Suez Canal. They had met casually on the platform, and were returning to Chantilly, where they are neighbours. M. Arnaud, with his hat off, and with an attitude of deep respect unusual in this country, reminding one of the attitude of certain Englishmen before a lord or a lord's son, begged H.R.H. to step in first. The duke, moving back, motioned to his companion to take the lead. As the latter hesitated, the duke insisted: "Je vous en prie," upon which M. Arnaud stepped into the carriage.

The scene reminded me of the one between Louis the Fourteenth and Lord Stairs, the British Ambassador. The Duke of Chartres, I was interested to notice, treated the matter as one of really no importance. It was not an act of deference to age, his companion being his junior, but rather a piece of amiability which has always been usual in this country among people of rank or position. It is, indeed, rather a subtle way of asserting rank, this voluntary surrender of the pas to some one else, and is, I think, the one form of patronage that is not offensive.

If ever you see in Paris a person with a red ribbon in his buttonhole, accompanied by a friend, about to enter a house, a carriage, a shop, you may be sure that the monsieur décoré will insist on his companion passing first. He does not diminish himself thereby—it is not as if he gave away his ribbon—and he has the satisfaction of feeling that he is not proud.

A divorce at Ballincourt is talked of. I have read somewhere in the papers that M. Durrieux, the successor of King Leopold, but on a legal footing, has retired to his Castel de St. Jacques. It is the party suing for the divorce who, on the eve of proceedings, leaves the house. Should rumour not be at fault, we may expect to see the Baroness exalted to the rank of Duchesse, and, with the nobleman who places the strawberry-leaf coronet on her brow, at the court in partibus of Wood Norton. The Duc, who is daft about her beauty, is a widower, and his late wife's great fortune has gone to her children. He is an enthusiastic yachtsman, and has spent a pile in experimenting on new notions in yachts. His grandfather owed the ducal title to his delightful manners, and had the gift of being subtly insinuating. After winning the favour of a queen of Napoleonic creation he secured, and in an extraordinary measure, that of a legitimate King, who obtained for him the hand of an heiress to eight millions of francs, of high French birth, and of on one side hochgeboren parentage, the kinsfolk being of an illustrious sovereign house.

The second Duc of the line had manners that acted as a balm on soured characters and irritated spirits, and shone in political and diplomatic society as a man free from narrow or other prejudices. I thought him wonderfully good company, not that he ever tried to amuse, entertain, or make a figure as a conversationalist. He greatly contributed to the splendid launch of the Union Général Bank, both in Paris and Vienna. He went in greatly for finance, and as a means to the continued success of that venture, managed to bring in Alfonso XII. and the Archduchess Christina, she being the daughter of the Archduchess Elizabeth, mother of the enormously rich Archduke Frederick, and the most influential woman at the Court of Vienna. Their first courtship meeting was at this Duc's villa at Arcachon.

Alfonso let himself be persuaded he had been run after by, and "encouraged," by the young Archduchess when a student in the Theresa Cadets School near Vienna. But he did not bite, and married as soon as he could his cousin the Princess Mercédès de Montpensier. At Arcachon he let himself be persuaded. He gave to the matchmaker a curious reason why he did so. It was that when once Elena Sanz saw the object of his official choice, she must feel satisfied that she still reigned in his heart. And so that glorious contralto singer continued to feel to the last moment of his life. He made as much in the Union Générale as the French Catholics lost. Courts and high society now are everywhere manipulated by financiers.

This reminds me that Queen Christina when she went to Arcachon had not been dispensed from the vows she made at her investiture as Abbess of some Order of Noble Ladies. In subsequent correspondence with Señora Sanz, Alfonso XII. always spoke of Christina as "the Mother Abbess."

I have known Spanish Ministers to complain that the Queen Mother, as the fiancée of Arcachon now is, never sloughed her Abbatial skin, though they had declared in public that she never, since her son came of age, meddled with public affairs. To say this was a way of telling her to mind her own business.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE peers, dear Lady Betty, are prepared to lay down their heads for their seats; this estimate of the relative value of either it would be unbecoming to dispute. "A Peer" writes:—

"Sir,—Intelligence has its merits; it is a middle-class asset serviceable for the attainment of suburban superiority. Intelligence and improvement are equally objectionable to those who thrive as I do on the unearned increment of hereditary superiority and its attendant superior opportunities. Had I to depend upon my head for my livelihood the prospect might be depressing, but my seat in the House of Lords enables me to render services to those who employ me which are substantially remunerated. 'Off with their heads,' cries Lloyd George; 'Off with their seats,' answers Lord Lansdowne; of the two courses I, and some three hundred other 'incompetent' peers, greatly prefer the first. Deprived of our seats we might possibly starve; the removal of our heads might leave us unconscious that any material change had occurred."

When "The tenth transmitter of a foolish face" is represented as being the most effectual "check to folly" we should have reached almost the summit of absurdity. The flashes into the feudal system which the crisis is affording are singularly enlightening.

It is a triumph in the annals of journalism to be enabled to make public the following announcement at this juncture, and some weeks before it was intended to communicate the particulars officially.

The comparatively few peers who habitually frequent the House of Lords have decided to reorganise this institution, which will shortly re-open as The Lansdowne Club. Lord Lansdowne is to be President and Lord Rosebery Vice-President, who, together with the committee appointed by the two, will undertake to control the concerns of this reconstituted House of Lords, and consequently the destinies of the country. The peers who are combining to effect this important reconstruction have decided to remove the names of over three hundred of the present members of the House of Lords from the books of that now defunct institution, and all candidates for election for the proposed Lansdowne Club who do not enjoy the approval of the President, Vice-President, and Committee will be inevitably rejected. As, of course, any leader of the Tory party in the Commons will have to be a nominee of the Committee, and any Liberal measure will be incontinently negatived it is hoped that the Lansdowne Club will amount to a Dictatorship of a selection of hereditary peers over the British Empire under the nominal supremacy of the Crown.

Lords Lansdowne and Rosebery and the peers associated with them in the proposal to reorganise the House of Lords unconsciously reproduce the situation described in "The Three Sailors of Bristol":—

"There was gorging Jack and guzzling Jimmy,
"And the younger he was little Billee.

"To gorging Jack says guzzling Jimmy,
"'We've nothing left, us must eat we.'"

Having no satisfactory alternative policy, the peers now propose to devour each other. When adrift cannibalism is the last resource of the desperate.

"The Germans are coming," cry the peers. "Possibly," answer the people, "but before that you are going." The populace ignores the refinements of polished retort.

There has never yet been such a pilgrimage of peers to the United States as that which is preparing to sail. It is hoped that the heiresses of America will welcome them on their arrival with the words:—

"Come, rest in this bosom, my own stricken deer,
Though the 'herd' have all fled thee, thy home is still here.
I know not, I ask not, if gold's in that heart,
I but know that I love thee for the Peer that thou art!"

* * * * * *

A celebrated Colonial statesman on a visit to England once complained that he was "never less at home than when home." A Tory duchess of the day is said to have asked him, "Do you have politics in your country?" More recently, a contingent from the Antipodes reported on their return that when in the Mother-country they were "idolised by the crowd and ignored by the courtiers." A more rational attitude is at last being assumed in England towards our fellow-countrymen and countrywomen from beyond the seas, and it is the Court which is mainly effecting the requisite change. Many clubs have lately been founded in London for the especial convenience of visitors from the Colonies, and their number will shortly be increased by the addition of "The Overseas Club." The institution will have the support of the most distinguished personages, and a particularly strong committee will preside over its destinies. At "The Overseas Club" every possible requirement of visitors from the Colonies is to be provided for, and its objects have been carefully designed so as not to clash in the slightest with those of other institutions of the kind. It is not competition but co-operation in a patriotic endeavour which is the purpose of the founders.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

ROUND THE MARKETS.

CASE-HARDENED MARKETS—ELECTION BETTING—THE MEXICAN AND BRAZILIAN REVOLTS—PROMISING CENTRAL ARGENTINES.

THE Stock Markets last week showed a degree of cheerfulness in face of clouded conditions that evoked some surprise. The resiliency of prices was a tribute to the healthy state of the open account. During the last three weeks there has been a good deal of liquidating by bulls who were not prepared to chance the uncertainties of a general election, and at the same time the bears have been inclined here and there to operate. Hence the House has become much more ready to respond to good than to bad news. The political situation, while it remains a riddle, is regarded more favourably from the Unionist point of view than when the dissolution was announced. There has been active betting on the Stock Exchange in majorities, and the estimated majority for the Government, which started at 120, has since fallen to 90. Those who know the overwhelming Conservatism of the Stock Exchange will appreciate the influence wrought by this modification. Monetary happenings, too, have helped the market for investment securities. The Bank of England is steadily recovering in strength, and it is possible that we may not have to wait until the new year for a reduction in the Bank rate, now 5 per cent.

In the Foreign market Mexican securities have fluctuated widely on the insurrectionary disturbances reported from that country. In various parts of the Republic attempts have been made to inflame the populace against the present Administration, and while the disturbances were on the American journalists did not fail to draw the long bow when supplying details. In influential City circles the troubles were never regarded seriously, it being known that the veteran President Diaz had the situation well in hand. Events have turned out as expected, the incipient rebellion being crushed within two or three days. The trouble has been too promptly quelled to have any lasting effect upon Mexican credit. A similar remark applies to the mutiny on several Brazilian warships. Here the disturbance had a local rather than a political meaning, the sailors rebelling because of dissatisfaction over questions of pay and punishment.

English Rails have shown an unwonted degree of strength, and there is every indication that the market is broadening. Yankees have been neglected and featureless, but an investment demand was noticed for Argentine Rails. The outlook for the new crops remains excellent. In the Central Argentine's territory conditions are understood to be especially good. As this company already since July 1 has an increase in gross receipts of £412,000, the record for the complete financial year bids fair to be an imposing one, and it is hardly surprising if holders are beginning to be expectant of an increase in the dividend next October. Even on the present 6 per cent. basis "Rosies," as Central Argentines are still called, are well worth their present price of 106.

RAILWAYS.

HOME RAILS—A CONTINUED STREAM OF INVESTMENT PURCHASES — CHEAPER COAL CONTRACTS — THE GREAT CENTRAL OUTLOOK.

In the Home Railway market dividend hopes have been a powerful antidote to political uncertainties. Dealers tell me the stream of small investment purchases is running steadily, and that at each of the last two or three Settlements there has been quite a respectable take up of stock. A continuance of this process involving a gradual appreciation in values is much more to be desired than a boom, in which quotations are rushed up by a few speculators before the investing public has a chance of getting in. Generally speaking, conditions remain in favour of the Home Railway market. The trade of the country is active, and in the absence of such inflation of prices as brought to a sudden stop the boom in 1907 there is no reason for believing that the crest of the wave has been reached. The moderate level at which prices stand is, of course, a matter of the first importance to railway companies, which are amongst the biggest consumers in the country. Coal, which is the chief raw material of the railway industry, is especially favouring the buyer. I referred last week to the fact that coal contracts were being arranged by the leading lines at from 9d. to 1s. per ton less than a year ago. This is a matter that has a very important bearing upon profits, though I ought to mention that the new contracts, according to information that reached me the other day, have been fixed for three months only, the colliery owners refusing to commit themselves on such terms for the usual period of a year.

Within the past fortnight I have dealt briefly with the outlook for the Great Northern, Brighton, Great Western, South-Western, Midland, North-Western, and Metropolitan District. I propose to continue my survey with a few words about the Great Central. This company has still to derive the full benefit accruing from its extension to London completed in 1898. That extension, it may be recalled, proved a much more costly business for the company than its promoters imagined, and since the year named over £10,000,000 of preferred and deferred stock has been without a dividend, while several millions of preference stocks have also either been wholly or partly without interest. But the Great Central, in spite of the increased capital burdens placed upon it, has in the last few years been steadily improving its financial position. Its absorption a few years ago of the Lancashire, Derbyshire, and East Coast Railway was a good stroke of business, the full fruits of which have yet to be enjoyed. The construction of the Immingham Docks is another enterprise which will in time mean a considerable accession of traffic to the Great Central, and there is, of course, the considerable room for development that still exists along the route taken by the London extension.

Up to a year or two ago a bugbear from the shareholders' point of view was the exceptionally high ratio of the company's working expenses, due to the keenness of competition for business existing between the company and its rivals—especially the Great Northern. The attempts made to effect a virtual amalgamation on a basis of pooling receipts, first of the two companies named and later of the two plus the Great Eastern, were not successful, the Bill being withdrawn by the companies themselves, owing to the onerous clauses sought to be exacted by Parliament. But most of the good results aimed at by the Bill have been achieved by a mutual understanding between the three companies. Undue duplication of trains has been avoided, goods being sent by the shortest route, unnecessary receiving offices have been closed, and in other ways desirable economies have been effected. The changed policy was reflected in the Great Central's results for 1909. Gross receipts for the year amounted to £4,338,040, an increase of £13,153 over 1908, while working expenses showed a reduction of £65,615, and net revenue was accordingly up £78,768, to a total of £1,505,897. The expense ratio came down from 67.04 to 65.29 per cent. of the gross takings.

In the first half of the current year the reduction in the expense ratio was only slight, the percentage being 65.32 per cent. against 65.46 for the corresponding period of 1909. Gross receipts showed an expansion of £101,892, of which increased working expenses absorbed £63,748. The improvement in net revenue enabled the company to pay the half-year's dividend on the 5 per cent. 1881 preference (against nil), and to carry forward an additional balance of £12,000. In other words, the current half-year commenced £46,500 to the good. To date, since July 1 (twenty weeks) the company's gross receipts show an increase of £59,000, equal to £76,700 for the six months. Allowing for under publication, the actual advance will probably be greater than this. Assuming two-thirds of the advance be absorbed by working expenditure, and that there is a small increase in the net profits of the joint lines, there would be an improvement of £30,000 in total net revenue. On such a basis the company could pay the full 4 per cent. for the year upon the 1889 preference stock as compared with 2 per cent. for the previous year, and 2 per cent. (actual) upon the 1891 preference (against nil).

It may be, as suggested, that a larger payment will be possible upon the 1891 preference, but in framing an estimate I prefer to err, if at all, on the side of caution. In any case a 2 per cent. dividend on the 1891 preference would be the best performance achieved by the company since 1898—the year of the opening of the extension to London. The solid progress the company is making leaves room for a levelling up of all the junior issues. Those that specially seem worth the attention of the investor are the 5 per cent. 1881 preference at 104, the 4 per cent. 1889 preference at 82, the 4 per cent. 1891 preference at 66, and the 1894 preference at 50. It will probably be some years before the ordinary capital returns to the dividend stage, but the improvement in the company's position will doubtless be attended by a rise in both the preferred and deferred. The former stands at 23 and the latter at 12.

Two Unique Investments—Bromboro Port Estate Debentures—Interest 72 Times Covered—Kansas City Terminal Bonds—Interest 134 Times Covered.

A week or two ago, in a conversation upon investments, a City friend remarked to me that one of the safest things he knew was the 4½ per cent. debenture stock of the Bromboro Port Estate Company, Limited, a concern owning a large block of land on the Mersey near Liverpool. He pointed out that the outstanding amount of this debenture stock was only £168,200, requiring an annual service of no more than £7,569, and that as the balance of profit and loss shown last year by Lever Brothers (who guarantee the debenture stock in question) was £545,000, the interest on these Bromboro Port Estate debentures was covered seventy-two times. This stock is quoted in the Official List at 102-3, has interest payable January and July, and is redeemable at the company's option in whole or part on or after July, 1911, on three months' notice at 5 premium, or can be purchased in the market. I admitted to my friend that he had hit across a stock made for the widow and orphan, but told him that I knew of a security where the gilt was laid on still more thickly. When I told him my rarity hailed from Kansas he was at first inclined to smile, remembering the tall stories that come from that part of the New World, but I left him convinced. The security in question is the 4 per cent. bonds of the Kansas City Terminal Railway, and since the conversation referred to this concern has made a further issue. The total authorised is $50,000,000, of which the amount now outstanding is $20,094,000. The company was formed in 1906 under a charter for 999 years to acquire and operate a Union passenger station and freight and passenger terminals in and about Kansas City. This terminal undertaking is the result of united action on the part of the railroad companies running into the city to obtain a comprehensive system of terminals sufficient not merely to cover present needs, but also designed to provide future expansion for many years. There are twelve railroads interested in the Kansas City Terminals, amongst those best known here being the Atchison Topeka, and Santa Fé; Chicago, Milwaukee, and St. Paul; Union Pacific; Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy; Missouri, Kansas, and Texas; Chicago Great Western; and Wabash. Each of the twelve covenants unconditionally to pay an amount equal to one-twelfth of the principal and interest of the Kansas City Terminal bonds. If any company defaults on these obligations the remaining companies must make good the deficiency, and any defaulting company will be excluded from the use of the terminal facilities. Now in the year ended June 30 last the combined surplus income of the twelve guaranteeing roads, after payment of all their fixed charges, exceeded $108,000,000, and as the annual interest on the present amount of bonds calls for $803,760, the service is covered 134 times! The bonds are to bearer of $1,000, and they may be registered. They are redeemable by the company (but only as a whole) at 105 per cent. and accrued interest on January 1, 1930, or any January 1 or July 1 thereafter. The issue made the other day was at an issue price of 97 per cent., which, at exchange $4.85 plus 1 per cent. English revenue stamp, was equivalent to £202 per $1,000. At the time of writing the scrip is quoted at ½ premium.

RUBBER.

Vallambrosa — Strathmore — Some Depreciated Shares.

While on the whole quiet confidence continues to be the principal asset of the rubber market, some dealers profess disappointment at the Vallambrosa announcement that the sales to date of the current year's crop have realised no more than 6s 0¼d. per lb. net London price. In reality, however, few insiders expected a better result, and four weeks ago I warned my readers that Vallambrosa had no particular attraction at 39s. 9d. As is the case with other companies whose financial year ends on March 31 the high prices realised in the spring for plantation rubber went to swell Vallambrosa's profits for last year. On the other hand, those companies whose books close at the end of the calendar year have yet to account to their shareholders for the result of the abnormal trading prices which obtained in the early part of the year. The gross selling price obtained by Vallambrosa for the year ended March 31 last averaged 8s. 3⅜d., giving, after deduction of freight and selling charges, the very satisfactory net selling price of 7s. 11d. per lb. Little attention, I believe, need be paid to the suggestion that the company held up its rubber early in the year in the hope of obtaining higher prices. The company's output appears to have come forward at a natural rate, and to have realised current prices. Some commendation is due to the Vallambrosa directors for the early announcement they have made as to the prices realised, and it would be much to the advantage of the market if other companies would adopt the practice of including in their periodical output announcements a statement of the prices obtained at the sales. It may, perhaps, be of some practical interest to my readers to note that among other companies whose year closes on March 31, and who have therefore already disbursed the results of boom prosperity, are Bukit Rajah, Cicely, Federated Selangor, and Perak. Kuala Lumpur, too, whose financial year ends on June 30, is in much the same position.

The average price realised by Singapore Para is stated by the report for the year to June 30, just issued, to be 8s. 3d. per lb., and the cost of production works out at less than 1s. 6d.—a satisfactory result of the company's first year's working. After writing off the preliminary expenses a net profit remains of £17,290, out of which it is proposed to pay a dividend of 12½ per cent. and to carry forward a balance of £4,786. During the year 1,350 acres of additional land have been acquired at a cost to the company of £474, and the acreage under cultivation has been increased to 1,664 acres, which, at the present market price of the shares, carries a valuation of about £166 per acre. Options over 6,167 of the company's shares have now been exercised, leaving 13,833 still outstanding; the proposal to split the shares into floriners seems likely, if carried into effect, to add to the market popularity of the shares.

Strathmore has again marked a small rise in price, and the new issue which it is proposed to make in January at the rate of three new shares at par for every ten now held should provide a further profit to readers who have recently bought these shares on my recommendation. The statement made by the chairman at last Wednesday's meeting that the company has now overcome all its difficulties confirms a private report which has reached me from an Eastern correspondent as to the condition of the property, and Mr. Hunter, one of the directors, who has recently returned from the East gives the estate an excellent character, while the position, of course, is materially strengthened by the company's holdings in the Ulu Buloh and Riverside Companies. I do not know of another Malayan company floated so long ago as 1907 whose shares can be picked up at the modest premium which Strathmore now commands, and a point in its favour is that it has no dead-weight to carry in the shape of options.

The extent to which some companies are handicapped by vendors' and promoters' options is, perhaps, hardly realised by the average investor. When such options constitute the sole remuneration of a promoter little objection can be raised against their issue. Most promoters, however, show a strongly marked desire for cash profits, and the options which they receive over large blocks of shares are frequently thrown in by way of bonus. In one group alone (and I do not in this case make any suggestion of unfairness) the options granted to the promoters and underwriters of three well-known and successful companies represent at to-day's market prices a profit of over £350,000—a sum which, were it necessary to raise the capital, could to-day, by the issue of the shares at a premium, be converted into a reserve fund for the benefit of the shareholders. Another case, perhaps not quite so well known, is that of a popular company formed in 1904 (long before the investing public took an interest in rubber), whose directors, in lieu of fees for four years, took an option over 3,000 shares. At the end of the four years the board's future remuneration was fixed at £250 per annum, but the option shares are worth to-day £50,000.

The Kamna directors have now issued a circular to which is annexed a copy of a statutory declaration by Mr. G. O. Fischer denying "that the property changed hands, as has been said, at £7,500, or any sum in the neighbourhood of such a low figure, in February, 1910, or at any time previous thereto, since the cultivation of the plantation." The declaration certainly meets the original charge, and the directors state that they have no means of ascertaining what price was paid for Kamna by the German syndicate. Presumably, therefore, Mr. Fischer declines to make any further disclosure. The directors state that the latest reports on Kamna indicate that the estate is in first-class condition, and that the labour force is being gradually augmented.

A glance at the daily list of quotations of Java and Sumatra issues reveals an appallingly long list of depreciated shares. Most of them, of course, represent flotations made at fancy prices during the boom, but in some few instances at least quotations are low enough to suggest that the limit of depreciation has been reached. Asahan, for example, was a flotation which I did not welcome, and the price paid for the property appeared far too high. At the present price of 11s. 3d. for the fully-paid £1 share the position, however, is interesting. Of the £215,000 issued capital the sum of £97,000 was provided for working capital, and if this sum is intact or has been wisely expended the working capital alone must be very nearly equivalent to 9s. per share. In the following table I have included Asahan and a few other instances of unduly depreciated shares, and I have shown the present market valuation of the estates after deducting the working capital.

| | s. d. | £ | £ | £ |
| Anglo-Java..... | 12 0 | 413,244 | 300,000 | 140,000 |
| Asahan ..... | 11 3 | 112,950 | 118,000 | 23,935 |
| Djaboong ..... | 10 0 | 35,000 | 41,000 | 11,000 |
| London Sumatra ... | 10 0 | 52,940 | 32,250 | 7,250 |
| Simpang Sumatra... | 10 0 | 31,032 | 30,000 | 5,000 |

If Anglo-Java was worth anything like Mr. Bingley's valuation of £413,244 it can hardly now be considered dear at £140,000; and Simpang Sumatra, which was valued at £31,032 last year, looks ridiculously cheap at £5,000. The properties included in the list are not, of course, first class, but at their present low price the larger of them may be worth picking up with a view to profit-taking later on.

By a slip of the pen last week I described Mr. Grant Watson as secretary of the Brazilian Legation at Rio de Janeiro. I should have written "the British Legation."

Nutmegs as Rubber.

Truth readers will not have been unprepared for the admissions which have at last been made by the directors of Petoong Java as to the misrepresentations contained in the prospectus when this company was floated in March last. I warned my readers as to the unpromising nature of the venture, and in advising my correspondents to dispose of their holdings I have on more than one occasion pointed out in these columns that 6,591 nutmeg trees were misdescribed in the prospectus as rubber. A very moderate knowledge of the business which they had undertaken to manage would have spared the directors from so serious a blunder. It now appears from the report of Professor Wallace that of the 796,405 coffee trees which were mentioned in the prospectus at least 595,725 are useless, and that 14,229 trees described as Hevea rubber were in reality Ceara trees planted in 1908, about half of which died and were replanted within the current year. Here again a comparison with the prospectus reveals a serious discrepancy, for it was stated that the youngest trees on the estate were of over five years' growth. Misrepresentations of so serious a character call for strong measures, and shareholders should not be satisfied with the action which the directors are taking against the persons who were responsible for the mis-statements. Rubber directors who can allow a prospectus to be issued which describes nutmeg trees as rubber are guilty of culpable negligence, and shareholders should take action for the recovery of their money.

MINES.

Business Still Restricted—Activity Confined to Specialties—Gaikas and Jumbos—Westralians—More Bullfinch Field Promotions.

Dealers in the mining markets were not sorry to see the end of the nineteen-day account last week, but, so far, the current period has not witnessed any expansion of business, and until the political uncertainty is removed it is doubtful whether dealings will become much more brisk. Roberts Victor Diamonds have made some spectacular movements, and in one or two other specialities there has been a fair amount of activity, but prices have mostly moved by sixteenths or thirty-seconds, and no decided general tendency has been apparent. The carry-over on Friday disclosed the existence of a comparatively small open position in Mines, so that, technically, the condition of these markets would appear to be healthy, and prices will move all the more rapidly in response to any volume of buying that may come along when the outlook becomes clearer.

Great expectations were indulged in in certain sections of the market in regard to Lord Harris's speech at the Gold Fields' meeting, but up to the present his remarks have exercised little if any stimulating influence upon speculation in mining shares. He did not devote much time to Rhodesians, but what he did say in this connection was considered encouraging, and he also had some words of cheer for those interested in West African gold mining. As regards the Rand, he confined his remarks to a brief review of the principal crushing mines of the Gold Fields' group, which, on the whole, was not calculated to inspire any bullish enthusiasm. This, and the fact that he did not make any encouraging remarks on the general Rand outlook, tended to depress Kaffirs, but they have since revived, thanks to some Continental buying and local "bear" covering.

Last week I mentioned two cases in the Rhodesian market where official data failed to justify the market capitalisation. The annual report of the Gaika, whose shares have been as high as 49s. this year, and are now about 30s., provides fresh evidence in the same connection. Without allowing for development expenditure this concern earned a profit of only £11,715 during the twelve months ended June last, which sum is equivalent to barely 5 per cent. on the issued share capital. In addition to the share capital there are £14,450 six per cent. debentures outstanding. Ore reserves have fallen off instead of increasing, and represent little more than a year's supply. There have, it is true, been some encouraging developments, but it will be obvious to my readers that the market in valuing the shares at the present price is pretty liberally discounting possibilities. Whether the market capitalisation will ever be justified by results remains to be seen. In the case of another Rhodesian mine, the Jumbo, the market has been greatly disappointed. These shares were run up to 25s. at one time this year, and some people were confident that they would reach 30s., but they have tumbled to about 12s. The annual report issued twelve months ago was of an encouraging character, but the document to be considered at to-day's meeting shows a substantial decrease in the ore reserves, and the engineer in his report says that it is vital that development work should be pushed ahead with all speed. He recommends that the small No. 1 shaft should be continued down to the fifth level, which work will probably take over four months. Since the date of his report developments between the two shafts have continued to prove payable ore, but if work is to be pushed ahead so as to place the ore reserves well ahead of mill requirements, there will be the question of finance to consider. It will be interesting to see what the directors have to say on this point at the meeting to-day, particularly as the £24,000 debentures outstanding are repayable on or before the 31st proximo at 115 per cent.

Following the summary of the development position issued a few weeks ago, and published in TRUTH of November 9, the East Rand Proprietary management has cabled a further statement during the past week. This shows that workings between the Angelo and Angelo Deep mines have been connected, thereby improving ventilation and facilitating development. Stretches of good pay ore were passed through. The connecting up of these workings not only forms one of the most interesting features in the company's history, but also constitutes a record in deep level mining on the Rand, reef having now been exposed on the incline for a depth of 6,060 ft.—well over a mile—from the surface. A dividend of 4s. per share, the usual half-yearly rate, has just been declared on East Rands.

Interest in Westralians has expanded a little during the past week, but here there is nothing like the excitement that prevails in the Colony, where dealers are reported to be so busy that they cannot always find time to code their cables, notwithstanding the much greater expense involved by telegraphing in full. The lists were soon closed in respect of the "Bull Ant Proprietary of Western Australia" issue last week, but the bulk of the shares I understand were taken by Colonial and not by British speculators. That issue having gone off like hot cakes, another prospectus—that of the "Golden Bullfinch"—has made its appearance, and doubtless there are more to come. The feature of these promotions is the vendor consideration. On the "Bull Ant" property only a trifling amount of work has been done, but the purchase price is £125,000, out of a total capital of £200,000. Two out of the three directors are intermediate vendors, one of them makes £30,000 and the other £20,000 by re-selling the property. In the case of the "Golden Bullfinch," which is capitalised at £100,000, the purchase consideration is £40,000, although no development work at all has as yet been carried out. The intermediate vendors (who acquired the property for £5,000 less than a month ago) also get a call at par until the end of 1913 on any unissued shares, while for underwriting the present issue they are to have a commission of 5 per cent. and an overriding commission of 1 per cent., both payable by the company in cash. This sort of thing recalls the rubber boom at its height, and those who rush into such schemes are, I hope, aware that they are participating in an absolute gamble. Valuable ore deposits may be proved to exist at various points on what is termed the Bullfinch gold belt, but it seems to me that the public is being asked to pay for them before they are found, and that if this practice continues there will probably be not a few disappointments later on. There is usually a large percentage of "duffers" among propositions floated during periods of wild excitement, and there is no reason to think that the Bullfinch field will prove an exception to the rule in this respect, but as to which will prove disappointing we can only "wait and see." Dr. Maclaren, the eminent geologist, who was interviewed after making a brief visit to the field, is reported to have expressed the opinion that the formation of highly capitalised companies at the present juncture and on present prospects could not be too severely deprecated, though there were excellent opportunities for small prospecting syndicates with a working capital of, say £5,000. Among the older Westralians Great Boulders have had a spurt to about 22s. on the strength of a cable announcing that leases have been acquired for the company on the Bullfinch field, and there have been active dealings in Oroya Links, whose local manager is understood to have been or to be investigating a Yilgarn proposition.

RAND RESULTS REVIEWED—KNIGHT'S DEEP AND NOURSE MINES—FEATURES OF THE ANNUAL REPORTS.

The annual reports of two well-known Rand dividend paying companies, the Knight's Deep and Nourse Mines, have been issued during the past week, and in view of the number of letters I receive from correspondents relating to the shares of such undertakings I think it is worth while devoting a portion of my notes to a review of these documents. Having regard to the fact that the distributions of both these companies for the past financial year were on a reduced scale, shareholders must have been prepared for a falling off in earnings, and they have doubtless carefully perused the reports for an explanation of the less satisfactory results achieved. In the case of the Knight's Deep, whose total profit for the year ended July 31 last was about £4,000 less than that for the preceding twelve months, the falling off was in respect of sundry revenue, not in the yield from the treatment of ore from the mine. A brief summary of the last two years' figures is appended:—

|---|---|---|
| Ore Milled | 650,820 tons | 593,990 tons. |
| Working Profit | £285,304 | £281,306 |
| Sundry Revenue | £15,582 | £23,549 |
| Total Profit | £300,886 | £304,855 |
| Dividends | £193,057 | £257,410 |

Although a lower grade of ore was treated last year the effect of this was more than counterbalanced by the larger quantity dealt with, and by a reduction in working costs. The decrease in sundry revenue was due chiefly to the fact that the amount of surplus water sold was less and a lower price was obtained. The Knight's Deep, it may be remembered, is one of the wettest mines on the Rand, well over a million gallons of water being pumped per day. Out of profits provision was made for machinery renewals and other depreciation, amounting to £11,204, debenture interest and redemption absorbed £33,904, and profits tax £23,385, so that after meeting the dividends (30 per cent.) nearly £40,000 remained, and at July 1 last there was £88,300 to the credit of the appropriation account as against £48,900 a year previously. As regards the mine, only a limited amount of development remains to be done, and this work as it progresses will open up very large ore reserves. Since the close of the financial year 1909-10 the Knight's Deep has announced profits totalling £74,075, or at the rate of £296,000 per annum, and as was foreshadowed in my last notes, the next dividend, due to be declared in a few weeks' time, may be at a slightly increased rate

Labour difficulties prevented anticipations being fulfilled in respect of the Nourse Mines. It was impossible to employ the plant to its full capacity, and working costs increased. The retreatment of accumulated slimes yielded some £4,000 more than in the preceding year, but the sundry revenue was appreciably less, the 1908-9 total under that head having included a refund of £16,250 in respect of water supplied to the company. Below the results of the last two financial years are compared:—

|---|---|---|
| Ore milled | 464,577 tons | 441,701 tons |
| *Working profit | £205,382 | £244,670 |
| Sundry revenue | £3,443 | £22,533 |
| Total profit | £208,825 | £267,203 |
| Dividends | £151,875 | £168,750 |

* Including accumulated slimes.

Nourse Mines started its current financial year with a liability, allowing for reserve gold on hand, of £14,706, and further expenditure will have to be incurred on capital account. Arrangements have, however, been made with Rand Mines to finance any temporary shortness in funds such as will occur at the dates when the dividends are paid, and repayment of the indebtedness will be spread over a reasonable period. When the necessary electric power to run the company's plant is available a direct saving in operating costs is expected to be shown, and provided the present labour force can be maintained, or, as is hoped, increased, development will be pushed in order to strengthen the ore reserves position. In connection with the dividend outlook, it is satisfactory to note that the returns for the first three months of the current financial period are well above the average of 1909-10, being at the rate of £264,000 per annum; but it must not be overlooked that the number of shares ranking for dividend is now nearly 828,000, as compared with 650,000 when the last distribution was declared. However, if future results show no relapse, last year's dividend rate of 22½ per cent. may be maintained on the increased capital, and on that basis the yield on the present market price of 2½ would be 9 per cent. Eventually the company should do better than this, and the shares have lock-up possibilities.

INDUSTRIALS.

THE RISE IN CEMENTS—DORMAN LONG'S RECOVERY—BRITISH AUSTRALIAN OIL PROGRESS—WEMBLEY PARK ESTATE.

A feature in the Industrial Market during the last few days has been the strong demand for Associated Cements. The £10 ordinary shares, which touched 30s. this year, rose to 3⅝, and the 5½ per cent. £10 cumulative preference, which have been down to 6 7-16 this year, went up to very nearly 8. Various rumours have been current to account for the movement, including a story about a coming combination of American and Continental producers to raise the price of cement and statements about the demand for the commodity being at the present time in excess of the supply. It may be nothing more than a coincidence, but just before the previous general election a speculative demand for Cements sprang up, based on the hope (which, of course, was not realised) that a Government would be returned to power pledged to protecting the cement trade amongst others. To those readers who ask me whether they should buy Associated Cement ordinary I have little hesitation in replying in the negative. There is nothing very wrong with the cement trade, and higher prices, for all I know, may be in store for the producers. But there has always been something wrong with Cement ordinary; indeed, the admission was made some time ago in inside circles that the whole of this stock, amounting to £1,922,320, was "water." The company, although not strong in the matter of reserves, has always managed to pay the interest on its 5½ per cent. cumulative £10 preference shares, but at 8 these shares begin to look pretty fairly valued. The 4½ per cent. first mortgage debenture stock is a fair investment to yield nearly 5 per cent.

Dorman Long, the famous Middlesbrough engineering company, shows a recovery in profits for the year from £103,200 to £121,500. The dividend is raised from 4 to 5 per cent. There is still room for improvement, the profits two years ago being £171,800, but the current twelvemonth has opened with all departments well supplied with orders at profitable prices, and therefore a satisfactory report a year hence seems probable. The company's £1 shares stand at about 18s. Two years ago the dividend was 6 per cent., and previous to that the rate was 7½ per cent.

I have referred once or twice lately in favourable terms to the prospects for the British Australian Oil Company, and from a circular sent to the shareholders last week I was glad to find that already substantial progress has been made in the construction of the crude oil works and refinery and in pushing forward the various other matters incidental to the preliminary stage of the company's career. The prospectus issued in March last indicated that the whole works would be erected within eighteen months, and the oil and other products placed in the market within two years. The directors now state that they expect this period will be shortened very considerably. The branch railway connecting the property with the main line was completed some little time ago. The seam of clay referred to in the prospectus is proving of great value, and a brick plant has been purchased and erected, with the result that the company is now making its own bricks at a cost very considerably under the price which had to be paid for those required in the initial stages. After the company's requirements have been satisfied the surplus stock will be disposed of at satisfactory profits. The Commonwealth Government, it will be remembered, has passed a Bill giving a bonus of £10,000 for the first year and £20,000 for the subsequent two years for the production of kerosene and wax. The board of the British Australian Oil Company is very hopeful of being in a position to claim a substantial portion of this bonus next year. There is a call on the company's shares payable on 8th prox., which will make them 15s. paid. The current quotation is $\frac{3}{16}$ to $\frac{1}{16}$ discount, on which basis a purchase bids fair to repay the speculator who puts the shares away, say, for a couple of years.

In TRUTH of November 17, 1909, I gave a few particulars of the Wembley Park Estate Company, Limited, the successors to the ill-fated company that was formed to construct the Wembley Tower. The present affair, which is concerned with the development of the estate for building purposes, has just issued its report for the year ended June 30 last, and I notice that an option entered into with certain interests for the sale of an additional fourteen acres has been exercised, the purchase taking effect as from the end of the present month. I am informed that the price to be paid is £750 per acre, which would mean a sum of £10,500 available for reducing the company's present mortgage of £35,000. The company will then possess about 200 acres, and, assuming a value of £750 per acre, this would be worth £150,000. Deducting from this the balance of the loan on mortgage and two other small liabilities, there would be a sum remaining of £123,500 available for the shareholders. There is in existence £70,000 of £1 ordinary shares; these are entitled to a cumulative dividend of 5 per cent. per annum, and the arrears to date amount to another 12s. per share; in other words, assuming the company were to be wound up to-day, the total claim of the ordinary shareholders would be £1 12s. per share, rising by 1s. per share so long as no distribution is made. On the basis of an estimated balance of £123,500, the amount available would be £1 15s. per share. Of course the final liquidation of the estate is bound to be a matter of some years, but the land is what builders would call ripe for development. It is adjacent to the railway on each side, the Great Central on the west and the Metropolitan on the east, while there is a tramway within half a mile that leads direct to London. In all the circumstances the company's £1 ordinary shares, quoted in the official list at ⅜ to ½, look a very fair purchase for the speculator who cares to lock up his money for a few years.

THE STERLING SHARE-PUSHERS.

It was suggested to me the other day that I should make an inquiry of the British Guiana Government regarding certain statements which are put forward by the Sterling Debenture Corporation of New York in their puffs of the shares of the Bartica Company. The Governor of British Guiana has, I believe, shown a disposition as commendable as it is rare to protect the interests of investors and the reputation of the colony in matters of this kind, and possibly he may think it desirable to say something about the Bartica Company, but meanwhile it is hardly necessary for me to wait for any official communication before I advise my readers to turn a deaf ear to the blandishments of the New York share-pushers.

In 1908 the Bartica Agricultural Estates, Limited, was formed in British Guiana to establish a sisal plantation, and in 1909 about fifty rubber seedlings were planted as an experiment. Early in the present year, when the colonial company had spent about $50,000 upon development work, the undertaking passed into the hands of the Sterling Debenture Corporation, and the Bartica Company was "organised under the laws of the State of Maine" with a capitalisation of no less than $2,000,000. The corporation then began an extensive advertising campaign in England as well as in America, representing the Bartica Company as a rubber-planting proposition from which big profits would be derived from 1916 onwards. Unfortunately for its promoters, the opening of that campaign synchronised with the subsidence of the rubber boom, and in this country, at any rate, people were no longer snapping up shares in the expectation of dividends five or six years hence. Most opportunely, however, the Sterling Corporation were very soon able to get out revised editions of their literature, in which an entirely new light was thrown on the prospects of the Bartica Company. The thing reads like a fairy story. The planting plans, it seems, were well under way when explorations resulted in the "remarkable discovery" that there were on the estates approximately 280,000 wild rubber trees only needing to be tapped to yield 1,400,000 lbs. of rubber in the first year. The old estimates of profits only beginning in 1916 disappeared. There would now be no long wait for dividends, but "an enormous income" almost immediately. Such are the grounds on which purchases of the shares have latterly been recommended. But although the Sterling Debenture Corporation spend money lavishly on the production of seductively-worded circulars in the guise of type-written letters and expensively got-up descriptive pamphlets, with coloured maps and pictures galore, they never give the information which an intelligent investor would require. He is not, for example, let into the secret of the purchase price that was paid for the property, or of the toll that the corporation takes on the shares that it peddles out to the public by this very costly advertising process.

That, however, is only one reason why I think the shares should be left alone. Another is the fact that British purchasers would find it extremely difficult to dispose of American shares, which are not dealt in on the London Stock Exchange, if they wished to sell. On that account I have time after time warned my readers against the alluring offers of shares in more or less obscure American industrial companies which those Sterling circularisers have made during the past year or two, and now that they are further seeking to get in touch with investors here by means of advertisements in the Times and other newspapers, it is desirable that this warning should be repeated. The Britisher can very well afford to leave such investments to his American cousins. I see, though, that American investors are also cautioned against them in a very interesting article on the operations of the Sterling Debenture Corporation in the current number of that excellent periodical, Munsey's Magazine.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

Charles Harrison: Stockbroker.

A pertinent question suggests itself in connection with the prospectus of the French Palace Development Syndicate, Limited, offering for subscription £80,000 mortgage debentures. Of the merits of the syndicate's scheme for the development of what is known as the "island site" between the Strand and Aldwych I say nothing, and as to the debentures, I need only remark that they are apparently to be secured upon nothing more substantial than a building agreement to be entered into with the London County Council when an option is exercised, and upon the promotion profits that may in that event be made. It seems a nebulous sort of security for debentures. My question, however, relates to one of the directors of the syndicate, who appears on the front page of the prospectus as "Charles Harrison, Hollyside, Victoria Road, Kensington, gentleman." I was curious enough to send a representative to the solicitor's office to inspect the contracts mentioned in the prospectus, one of them being a contract with the said Charles Harrison. In this document Mr. Harrison is described as of 49, London Wall, in the City of London, stockbroker. So far as I can discover no broker of that name is a member of the London Stock Exchange, nor is there apparently any office at 49, London Wall, bearing the name of Mr. Charles Harrison. But there is at that address a notorious bucket-shop carried on under the nom de guerre of Duncan Forbes and Co., whose methods of business have been the subject of a good many criticisms in Truth during the past year; and what I should like to know is whether Mr. Charles Harrison, the director of the French Palace Development Syndicate, has any sort of association with that bucket shop? In view of the character of the business, the matter is one of considerable public interest.

Another Bank Failure.

The failure of the insignificant concern known as the London Trading Bank, now in the hands of the Official Receiver, should serve as another warning to the public. I have not, however, the least expectation that the warning will be taken to heart. There are a surprisingly large number of people who cannot be persuaded to discriminate between banks until they have to bewail the loss of their money. For the sake of some advantage in the terms offered—which is really of no consequence at all in comparison with the all-important question of the safety of their capital—they are ready to patronise any small, obscure, possibly mushroom, institution rather than one of the first-class banks. Putting aside concerns whose business has no real affinity with that of legitimate banks, I am continually receiving inquiries about various minor institutions which may be sound, but which I do not take the responsibility of recommending. There are, I find from my correspondence, muddle-headed people who cannot understand that when I decline to recommend a bank I do not necessarily mean that I consider it positively unsafe. Very often, of course, the reply simply indicates that I do not regard it with the complete confidence which I deem essential for the purpose of such a recommendation. After all, there are many well-established joint stock banks whose stability is as thoroughly assured as anything can be in the world of finance, and it seems to me foolish in the extreme to open deposit or current accounts with second or third-rate concerns.

Ashton's Philanthropy.

H. A. Ashton, otherwise "The Industrial Development Corporation," is still disposing of Wassau Banket shares by means of the trick which I lately exposed. He offers 50 shares free as a first prize, and 450 in parcels of 50 at prices ranging from 2s. 6d. to 6s. 6d. for the nearest guesses at the closing quotation of Canadian Pacifics on a certain date. He represents that these shares are "priced at 7s.," so that those who get an award of 50 at 2s. 6d. are led to believe that they are buying shares of the value of £17 10s. for £6 5s. A Sunderland competitor who received such an "award" the other day happened to learn that three of his local acquaintances had been similarly favoured, and, as he points out, the fact that 200 out of the 450 shares supposed to be available were being "awarded" in one town is in itself a pretty good indication of the humbug of the whole business. The truth is, of course, that Wassau Bankets—which are not the same shares as Wassaus—are rubbish, practically unmarketable even at threepence each, and in saying that they are "priced at 7s." Ashton is grossly misleading ignorant people. To those who resist the temptation to acquire the 50 shares at 2s. 6d. he subsequently make a still more dazzling proposal:—

If you take up these shares we will make you a present of our £30 offer for £6—that is, send you contract notes for £30, besides fifty shares fully paid up. In other words, £47 10s. actual value for £6 5s., in order to secure you as a client.

The real value of "the contract notes for £30"—a combination of worthless options and cover deals—can be gauged from the fact that Ashton is ready to throw them in, free gratis and for nothing, with the 50 Wassau Baskets, and the preposterous statement that he is giving "£47 10s. actual value for £6 5s." in order to secure a client would not deceive anybody with an atom of common sense. But there are plenty of fools about the country, and as a further device for relieving them of their cash Ashton announces that he will shortly advertise a new competition for a £500 motor car and a year's holiday free of cost.

The North British Bank.

What sort of a concern is the North British Bank, which has its head office at 223, St. Vincent Street, Glasgow, and branches at 142, Nile Street, in that city, and 16, George Street, Edinburgh? I ask in view of an inquiry just to hand from a correspondent abroad. A few weeks ago he applied for particulars of some Ten per Cent. Redeemable Debentures which were advertised (with a "Box No." address) in the Daily Telegraph. In reply, he received a letter stating that the debentures are issued by the North British Bank, that they form "a first charge upon all the assets and property," and that they are "a first-class security, the capital being amply secured by trust deed." With the letter, signed "North British Bank," was enclosed a printed card setting forth the rates of interest allowed on deposits for fixed periods. Neither the letter nor the card gave any name, nor was there a scrap of information regarding the constitution and management of the bank—the omission of the word "limited" from its title shows that it is not an incorporated company—the amount of its capital, the nature and value of the "assets and property," and so on. Apparently, the writer of the letter thought that it would be a work of supererogation to supply such details to anybody simple-minded enough to invest at all in this "first-class security." Perhaps he was right. Perhaps, too, my question about this mysterious institution is unnecessary. After all, the mere fact that it borrows on debentures at ten per cent. is a pretty clear indication of its status as a bank.

NEW ISSUES.

The Anglo-Hungarian Petroleum Company, Limited, has been formed to continue the exploitation, working, and development of an oil territory situated in the Upper Iza Valley in the Carpathian Mountains, comprising an area of about thirty square miles. The field lies between the oilfields of Galicia and Roumania. The preliminary investigation of the field is dealt with in a favourable report by Professor Zuber, the eminent petroleum geologist, whose remarks are confirmed by Mr. J. Macdonald Cameron, the technical adviser of the new company. Two wells are at present in process of being bored, and from both oil has been obtained. The authorised capital is £100,000, in shares of £1 each. Of these 40,000 will be issued as fully-paid in respect of purchase consideration, 40,000 are now being offered for subscription at par, and the balance will be held in reserve. The shares at this stage are obviously speculative, but to those prepared to take a risk they offer good possibilities.

The Anglo-Servian Trading Company, Limited, invites subscriptions for 37,000 7 per cent. participating preference shares of £1 each and 3,700 deferred shares of one shilling each. The capital is £60,000 divided into 57,000 participating preference and 60,000 deferred shares, and 10,000 of the former and 56,300 of the latter will be issued in satisfaction of the purchase consideration, the vendor taking no cash. The company is formed to acquire a concession granted by the Government of Servia for the establishment of slaughter-houses, factories, etc., for the export of meat and also preserved and canned fruit, etc.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of Truth.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

A. S. W. (Lincoln).—No. 1 is quite safe. No 2 is not the equal of 1, but it is a very fair investment, and looks moderately priced.

Chien Vert.—The company may turn out a success in time, but its financing is very complicated, and the shares are not the things I should care to hold. It is impossible to forecast dividends.

Investor (Hereford).—1. Position after expiry of guarantee looks doubtful. Exchange into, say, Central Argentine Ordinary. 2. The A shares were converted into stock as from the 1st inst. Each old £10 share is now represented by £15 of stock, worth, I believe, 19-20.

Moonraker.—a. It has good prospects if held for a few years. b This stock is well secured under the guarantee given by the Buenos Ayres and Pacific.

Mines.

Ardra.—1. I should prefer East Rand Proprietary. 2. See note in another column. 3. Some recovery will probably occur later on.

Boyman.—Holding must be regarded as very much of a gamble.

Calcutta.—The company has mineral rights over about 530 square miles in Madras, and it is stated that five properties have been selected. As to the condition of the company's finances, I have no information, and I have not heard of any dealing in the shares on the London Stock Exchange. Cantab.—A market will probably be made in the fractional certificates, but I cannot say now what they will fetch. Your shareholding entitles you to apply for £15 of debentures, in respect of which you will have to pay £14 14s. If you want a good 5 per cent. security to hold you should buy additional fractional certificates to make up a £50 bond. The debentures will probably go to a premium sooner or later. Christmas.—In the circumstances you had better realise No. 1.

Lawhill.—1. Not "sate," but have speculative possibilities. 2. They have recently had a good rise. 3. A hopeful speculative lock-up.

Pare.—1. A higher price is expected by some market men, but the shares are, of course, a speculative holding. 2 and 3. Keep these for a better market. Pater.—I see no reason at present to expect much improvement, and think your money could be more hopefully employed.

Rex.—It is impossible to estimate the life of the mine, and the shares are certainly not "quite safe."

Searcher after Truth.—The shares are rubbish; see note in another column.

Tyne.—Both hopeful speculations from a lock-up point of view.

Wooloomooloo.—They may possibly drop under 5½ before they have any material recovery. In the event of a moderate rally you might sell the remainder of your holding. On present prospects the shares are not really cheap at £6.

Yam.—Thanks for the contribution to the Truth Toy Fund. I referred to the fall in the shares you name in my notes of November 2. It is impossible to estimate the life of such a mine.

Mixed Securities.

Back.—An excellent investment. You could hardly do better. Billy.—1. I do not care for them, and would sell. 2. A sound stock, though an exchange to Central Argentine Ordinary seems worth making. 3. Yes, keep them.

CAVAN.—India 3½ per cent. stock would suit. CIVIS.—Rio de Janeiro Federal District 5 per cent bonds, Chilian 5 per cent. bonds, 1896, Greek 1907 Fives, Uruguay 5 per cent., 1905, and City of Buenos Ayres 5 per cent. bonds. CALICO.—1. No. 2. Good, but looks fairly valued now. 3. Yes, a very fair investment.

E. I.—1. I do not look for a recovery just now, but by holding you stand a good chance of selling to better advantage in the course of a year or so. 2. Prospects uncertain. ELEPHANT.—Sell 1; hold the other two.

F. W.—A full six months' interest is paid July 1. Allowance for this makes the difference between the yield you have calculated and the £4 2s. stated in my article. 2. New York Telephone 4½ per cent. bonds and Metropolitan Electric Trams 5 per cent. second debentures.

HOPEFUL.—1. An exchange into Zinc Corporation Ordinary would be likely to turn out well in time. 2. Possibly you may be able to get a somewhat better price later on. No. 3 are a poor holding, though it scarcely seems worth while selling now. HOUKUN.—Japanese 4½ per cent. bonds would suit as well as anything I could name.

IGNORANT.—1. The company is likely to make progress as building proceeds along its route. But the rate may be slow, and at best the Ordinary shares are a very doubtful holding. 2. I cannot undertake to explain why certain shares are recommended by other writers.

MORNINGSIDE.—1. They do not appear really cheap, even at the present reduced price. 2. They are a sound investment, possessing scope for a moderate rise. MARINERO.—A very fair list. I see no particular reason why you should part with any.

PAT.—1. Not advised at present. 2. They seem a fair speculative holding for dividends.

RATS.—a. I do not care for the shares, and would sell. b. A sound industrial, but I cannot predict a higher dividend or any material rise in the shares. c. I cannot say whether they will have an early rise, but sooner or later both will probably improve. REFUGE.—1. They are a fair industrial holding, but will be liable to ups and downs in sympathy with the fluctuations in the shipping trade. 2. These seem a hopeful lock-up speculation. ROLLE.—The envelope you enclose shows that your previous letter was not stamped. Unstamped letters are not accepted at TRUTH office. 1. Unless you wish to secure your profit I see no reason why the shares should be realised. 2. Much depends upon traffics in the new year, when the crop is moved. For the present the stock looks fully valued. 3. It is too early to forecast yet, for everything turns upon the net results in the final quarter. Up to the end of the September quarter the company did not show 1 per cent. upon the stock.

STAMFORD.—1. See Rule 2. 2. Very speculative. 3. Sell. SCROGGS.—If the amount be small better buy Consols through the Post Office Savings Bank.

TAPETA.—1. A poor holding. Better sell. 2. Worth keeping.

WOLF.—I see no attraction in 1 or 2. As regards 3, I should prefer English Rails. See recommendations of the last few weeks.

RUBBER.

A. J. CROWNTHORPE.—1. A hopeless concern. So far the company has made a loss every year, and no dividend has been paid. 2. The shares are unsaleable. ALOES.—The last report was disappointing. Although a gradual recovery to your figure is not improbable, it would involve a long wait, and you would probably do better by exchanging for Tremelbye and Strathmore. ATHENÆUM.—1. See Rule 2. 2. See reply to "Aloes." AJAX.—The figures are approximately correct. Sungei Bahru is the better purchase. ART.—All worth holding. No. 2 is, of course, speculative, but I understand that the company has some profitable business in hand. Tapping has commenced on No. 3, and the shares have been split into floriners A. B. C.—If you sold the shares the buyer would be responsible for future calls. Your assumption is correct. The estate is being developed, and I look for a substantial improvement early next year. ARTRO.—1. Pay the call certainly, and hold the shares. 2. Sell. 3. Exchange for Tremelbye. 4. Hold for recovery. 5 and 6. Take a profit AALESUND.—1. A first-class company, but the acreage valuation is high. I prefer cheaper shares, such as Tremelbye. 2. Worth holding as a speculation, but I do not recommend a further purchase. APE.—1. Glen Bervie and United Serdang. 2. Tremelbye and Johore Rubber Lands. ABACUS.—1. I have a poor opinion of its prospects. 2. Grossly over-capitalised. 3. Yes.

BRYN.—The company is respectably managed, and is said to have some good business in hand. Worth holding. BILLY.—1. Unpromising. 2. Exchange for Taiping. 3 and 4. Worth holding. The first three have been criticised in these columns. BLINKER.—1. No. 2. There may be a small shortage on the Anglo-Malay revised estimate, but the other official estimates should be realised. 3. Your limits are reasonable. BOYMAN.—The purchase price was high, but the estate can be opened very cheaply, and the planting of the 5,000 acres is, I understand, in hand. Hold for recovery. BRECHIN.—Strathmore.

CHAIRBACK.—The company is in good hands, but is developing slowly. Eventually satisfactory dividends should be forthcoming, but an exchange for Taiping would probably give quicker results. CÆSAR.—1. See preceding reply. 2. A fair purchase. Nothing would be gained at present by exercising the option. The option certificates are a good delivery. 3. Kepong. CLISSOLD.—A good list. Take a profit when obtainable on Nos. 1, 3, and 4. Hold the others. CHAIR OF KILDARE.—The property is developing satisfactorily, and the rubber is fetching good prices. They are speculative, of course, but worth averaging at present price. CLIFFS.—On any substantial recovery sell Nos. 1 and 4. Re-invest in cheaper shares. Hold Nos. 2 and 6. Exchange No. 3 for Tremelbye. As to No. 5, see reply to "Aloes." COCKSCOMB.—Hold Nos. 1, 2, and 5. As to No. 3, see reply to "Aloes." Nos. 4 and 6 are speculative shares worth holding for a profit.

DOUBTFUL.—Both fair propositions, but neither has any special attraction at present price. Tremelbye and Strathmore would probably suit you better. DOON.—1. Hold for the present. See reply to "Elstree." 2. Hold Kamna. 3. Hold for substantial improvement. DEOR.—See reply to "Aloes." DENTIL.—Tremelbye is a dividend-payer likely to improve in value. Strathmore is not far from the producing stage. The price is low, and there is room for considerable appreciation.

ELSTREE.—An early rise in the raw article would, of course, more immediately help present producers, and as these are paying substantial dividends there is no reason why you should sell in an unfavourable market. The cheaper shares provide more scope for capital appreciation. Make the exchange at a reasonable opportunity. EDMOND.—1. Yes, as a speculation. 2. Worth holding. 3. Sell. EVAN.—1. No dividend expected before 1912. A gradual recovery to your figure is not improbable, but you would probably do better by exchanging for Tremelbye and Strathmore. 2. Hold for the present. See reply to "Elstree." 3. Very good, although the acreage valuation is rather high. 4 and 5. Yes.

F. A. F.—Strathmore, Jeram, Lankat. F. R. D. T.—1. Serdang Central is a good purchase. 2. Quite good.

GORDON.—I see no prospect of Vallambrosa doubling in value, but it should pay handsome dividends for many years to come. A cheaper share such as Strathmore should give a better chance of capital appreciation.

HARESTOCK.—I have a good opinion of the company. See reply to "Bryn." HOPE.—Hold Nos. 1 and 4. Exchange others for Strathmore and Taiping. HOLYWOOD.—1. Good little company. 2. Sound, but the acreage valuation is high. Exchange for Taiping. 3. Speculative, but likely to reach your figures again in any return of market activity. H. C.—Anglo-Sumatra, Castlefield, and Tremelbye.

INTER NOS.—1. See reply to "Elstree." 2. See reply to "Aloes." 3. Not first-class. Take a profit.

J. B.—A good speculative purchase at ⅜ premium. Floated last April. JACK.—In good hands. Worth holding.

KEYSTONE.—Take your fine profit. Re-invest in Strathmore.

LINDUM.—All sound dividend-payers, but open to the objection referred to in reply to "Elstree." I prefer Tremelbye. LESLIE.—I should select Sungei Bahru, Sedenak, and Chembong. Avoid H. and U. LACTON.—Hold for a profit.

N. C. F.—1. The whole position is most unsatisfactory, but I do not know of any ground for action. The venture is unpromising, and probably the best way out of the difficulty is to sell the shares, and cut the loss. 2. Taiping. NESTOR.—I will endeavour to deal with some of them at an early date. NEASTEN.—I have expressed an unfavourable opinion of them all. Nos. 1 and 2 are less speculative than No. 3. NEKO.—Both excellently managed, and good for capital appreciation with the probability of substantial future dividends. Your suggested List A is a very good one. NORTH.—Your suggestion that the brevity of my reply "amounts to actual discourtesy" is ridiculous, and in view of the impertinent tone of your present letter I shall not give you any further answer.

PUGGY.—A fair purchase at present discount. P. F. (Belgravia).—A promising gamble if you are prepared to take risks. Relatively to its small capital (£20,000) the company has an exceptionally large number of Ceara rubber trees (1,500,000) on its freehold estate of 10,000 acres, but it is far more speculative than the other shares you mention. PADDY.—1. Your limit is a reasonable one. 2. Yes. 3. The machines are giving satisfaction. Wait for the demonstration to shareholders. PERAK.—See Rubber Notes. PAIGNTON.—1. Not a first-class property. Fairly valued at present discount. 2 and 3. Quite good, but the companies are small, and I cannot trace any recent dealings in the shares.

RETLAW.—Sell No. 1. Hold the others.

SNAVE.—1. A good property excellently managed. The purchase price was considered high. Worth present quotation. 2. Both good Ceylon companies. Beverley purchase price was low, and is rather the cheaper of the two. SNAPSHOT.—Future prospects are good, and the shares are well worth holding. STUCK.—See reply to "Chairback." SYMBOL.—Disregard the criticism. Merlimau is a good purchase at present price. Hold Taiping for a substantial profit. SYSTON.—Hold Nos. 1 and 3 for improvement. As to No. 2, see reply to "Aloes"; and reply to "Elstree" as to Nos. 4 and 5. No. 6 is a good speculative holding. SCOT.—Hold Nos. 1 to 6. As to No. 7, see reply to "Elstree." Buy Strathmore and Taiping.

TAXI.—Exchange for Taiping. TEARFUL.—As to Anglo-Malay and Linggi, see reply to "Elstree." Taken as a whole, the others should gradually recover to your figures. THISTLE.—Average No 1. No. 2 is worth holding for improvement. Sell No. 3.

VICTOR.—Hold Strathmore and Taiping for a substantial profit.

WANDERER.—A very good Sumatra share. Average as you suggest.

YAM.—You could buy other shares to better advantage.

MISCELLANEOUS.

A. R. W. C.—I believe it to be a thoroughly sound society. ABYSS.—The company looks to be over-capitalised. But unless there is ground for legal action on the score of wilful misrepresentation in the prospectus—which I think unlikely—I do not see what action the shareholders can take, at any rate, until the issue of the first annual report. I have never cared for the shares, and were I a holder would be inclined to get out. AALESUND.—They are a distinctly speculative lot; in fact, are all gambles. Nos. 2, 3, and 5 are as promising as any. AN ENQUIRER X.—Your question shows that you really do not need any enlightenment as to the character of the business of the United Stock and Share Corporation. It is a bucket-shop against which I have often warned my readers. A READER OF TRUTH.—If you want a reply you must send coupon and your name and address.

BONO.—Three sound stocks, but I see no reason to advise you to part with the bank shares. BON ACCORD.—Both are good holdings of their respective classes, and should be worth keeping. BANKRUPT.—1. I believe there is no proper market for them. 2. Presumably interest has been met to date. 3. A new venture of the kind is most risky, and I advise you not to touch the shares. BOB.—See reply under "Insurance."

CENTURION.—An excellent investment, but they look reasonably valued. CHESHIRE.—In view of the statement in the Financial Times the other day as to an impending promotion in which both companies are interested, I should not sell either at the present moment.

D. F. WHISTLER.—You could sue, but if he chose to do so he could bar your claim to the profit by the Gaming Act defence. I should accept the £10. DALE.—You would, perhaps, be best advised to go to one of the larger and older established concerns.

EASY CHAIR.—It is an investment of a speculative character, and I know of no special reason for recommending a purchase. E. S. D.—1. I do not by any means say they are all of the same class—far from it—but for reasons I have often explained I never advise dealings with any outside brokers. 2. The person whose alias is given in the Cautionary List is not the same individual. 3. Yes, there have been references to "E. Donnithorne" in TRUTH. The principal in the business formerly carried on the Milne, Son, and Hamilton bucket-shop. 4. Whether the Gaming Act can be successfully pleaded depends upon the terms of the contracts and the circumstances of the case. 5. I never heard of this being done. Do you know of an instance? 6. Yes.

GALWAY.—It is a bucket-shop business, which you should shun.

HYACINTH.—You will find your questions anticipated by a note in last week's article, which you doubtless have already read. H. H. D.—I regret that I have no information; no doubt the report will shortly be issued. H. M. C.—It is an outside broking concern, whose advice cannot be regarded as disinterested, inasmuch as it frequently recommends the purchase of securities which it is itself selling at an undisclosed profit. HORNER.—The school is an excelent institution, but I should not recommend an investment of your savings in the shares.

INLAID.—I have heard no particular reason beyond the fact that the capital was recently increased. Keep them for the report.

J. M. P.—Whether the letter you received amounted to a contract which you can legally enforce is a question upon which I cannot possibly express an opinion without knowing its precise terms. In any event, it would surely not be worth while to bring an action in such a trumpery case. J. C. S. T.—Morton Harris and Company have been more than once dealt with in TRUTH. Have nothing to do with any such bucket-shop.

LANCASTER.—Merchants Trust 4 per cent. debenture stock would be a suitable investment for you. The yield is practically 4 per cent. LADDY.—What is the use of asking my opinion after you have committed yourself by buying? I can only tell you the shares are a distinctly risky holding, and I am not aware that there is any market for them.

MARGATE.—A first-rate institution. The legislation to which you refer should in no way affect its stability. MECHANICAL.—1. I prefer an institution which devotes itself exclusively to banking. You have some excellent institutions up North without sending your money to the Sassenachs. 2. A very fair investment. MISSFIRE.—1. You have been misinformed; the shares were never recommended in TRUTH. There is evidently something seriously wrong with the concern, but at present no details have been vouchsafed. 2. A sound industrial, and the shares should be all right for mixing purposes. 3. I recommended them when they stood 10 points lower. They are still a fair speculative purchase.

OILY COUNTRYMAN.—1. They are £1 shares. As the price implies, the company is thought very well of, but it has not yet commenced paying dividends. 2. They are well regarded on the Stock Exchange, and as a speculation should be worth holding. 3. The company is understood to have a good property, and you might keep the shares, say, for the next report. OXON.—I do not know a safe oil share. The company you name has lately been engaged in a desperate war with the Standard Oil interests, and its present position is uncertain. However, the management is good, and, in the long run, the shares may repay a holder.

ROSSENDALE.—Not an investment I should recommend, especially considering the liability on the partly-paid shares. You ought to be able to sell.

SUSSEX.—The company has had a good record, and the shares look a reasonably satisfactory business risk. SOUTHEND.—Sell. 2. No. SCOT.—There is, so far as I am aware, no market for the shares, and I cannot recommend them. SPONOS.—1. The National Share Exchange is a common bucket-shop which I have often exposed. 2. I know nothing as to the value of the land. 3. Not a concern that I recommend.

T. R.—1. No, I should be breaking the law if I recommended any lottery. 2. I do not quite understand the question. Was he selling as a broker or agent, or on his own account as a principal?

X. M. P.—No. 1 looks a fair industrial risk. I would not buy either of the others.

VIGILANT.

INSURANCE.

A STRIKING EXTENSION OF LIFE ASSURANCE PRINCIPLES—AN INVESTMENT THAT CANNOT DEPRECIATE IN VALUE—ANNUAL INCOME AT £4 8s. PER CENT.—THE CAR AND GENERAL IS NOT THE LAW CAR.

AN innovation so striking, so beneficial, and so just as that which has been made by the Mutual Life Insurance Company of New York deserves to be fully considered and widely known. The company has arranged that whenever a policy becomes a claim the money can, if desired, be left with the company; can be drawn whenever it is required; yields interest at a guaranteed minimum of 3 per cent. per annum, and at such higher rate as may be earned upon the funds of the company from year to year.

I have often spoken of the holders of policies of life assurance as "co-operative investors"; the phrase receives a new, a fuller, and a more permanent meaning in consequence of this new departure. If the beneficiary under a Mutual policy, whether the assured himself at the end of an endowment period, or the heir of the assured after his death, is entitled to receive, say, £1,000, under a Mutual policy he can of course draw the amount in cash immediately; but the new plan confers upon him the right to leave the capital with the company just so long as it suits his convenience to do so, and to draw interest upon it at whatever rate the company may earn, which for the present is £4 8s. per cent. per annum. In a word, the beneficiary remains a participating member of this mutual society, instead of the mutuality—the partnership—coming to an end the moment the policy becomes a claim. The company has previously allowed the money due under policies to remain in its hands at 3 per cent. interest; this rate of 3 per cent. is positively guaranteed by the company, and the novelty of the new plan is that the owner of the money is to receive for the future the increased rate of interest which the company is able to earn.

The first significant fact to be noticed is that it constitutes an investment that cannot by the remotest possibility decrease in capital value at any time whatever. It can be realised at any moment the owner desires, and the full amount, undiminished by a single penny, is practically payable on demand. It constitutes a gilt-edged security of the very highest class, in which loss of capital value cannot occur. Investors need only call to mind the great fall in the prices of what are called gilt-edged securities to realise the striking advantage that accrues from this guarantee for the integrity of their capital in all circumstances and for any period however prolonged. When unimpeachable, undepreciable security can be found to yield interest at some such rate as £4 8s. per cent. it is difficult to imagine any investment more satisfactory in its character, or one that it is more prudent to make.

It is relevant to repeat the reasons which I have given more than once before that make co-operative investment of the kind which life assurance affords so superior to the investment possible for any individual acting alone. A progressive life office steadily increases the amount of its funds from year to year. Every premium paid for life assurance is employed to pay for expenses of management, for insurance protection, and for saving or investment. A life office has to hold a reserve for each policy in existence, and the amount of the reserve increases with the duration of the policy. For each policy, therefore, the funds in hand must grow larger year by year, and with a steadily increasing business the funds as a whole must increase in magnitude. The first result of these considerations is that such a life office never has occasion to realise its securities when market prices are unfavourable. The second result is that a company, always having money to invest, is able to buy good securities at low prices when these low prices prevail; it can buy in the best market, and it can sell in the best market. If on particular investments there is a permanent decrease of capital value there is a good chance of this being compensated for by a permanent increase in the capital value of securities bought on favourable terms. The third result of always having money to invest, and that on a large scale, is that the best opportunities and the most expert advice are available. There is a momentous fourth result, which is that the dividends received can be, and are as a matter of course, invested immediately, so that the great cumulative effect of compound interest is obtained. No single one of these results is open to the ordinary investor acting for himself, but all four of them are amply at his service if he joins in that co-operative investment with others which life assurance provides.

It is well known that one of the principal sources of bonuses on life policies is the excess in the rate of interest actually earned over the rate assumed in valuing the liabilities. The Mutual values at 3 per cent. per annum; the rate of interest it earned last year was £4 8s., and one source of the bonuses declared upon its policies was this difference of £1 8s. per cent. for the year upon the amount of the reserve held for each policy. Hitherto this participation in surplus interest was limited to the period during which the life assurance continued. At death, or at the end of an endowment period, this participation used to cease. For the future the benefit of it may still be had by every policy-holder who chooses, for as long or as short a time as he likes. Both during the existence of the assurance, and after the policy has become a claim, everything is fully guaranteed upon a 3 per cent. basis, a rate which it is manifestly certain that the rate of interest actually earned will greatly exceed. No specific rate beyond 3 per cent. is guaranteed. The bonuses upon policies are partly derived from this excess interest, and the bonuses increase or decrease according to the fluctuations in the rate of interest yielded by the funds. Precisely similar conditions apply to the money left with the company. The owner of £1,000 is certain of an income of £30 a year, but he receives in addition an annual cash bonus or increase of income depending upon the rate of interest earned. At present this bonus increase would be £14 a year, and his income from his £1,000 of capital would be £44. Next year the bonus may be £13 or £15, and his income £43 or £45. All that skill and integrity can do, and the peculiar advantages which the life assurance business presents, are available for him to the utmost. That mutuality in investment matters, which used to be limited to the duration of a life, or the length of an endowment period, is now extended with all its advantages to years, or generations.

The plan is so safe, it is so manifestly an extension of sound assurance principles, it is so clearly beneficial to investors, that its wide adoption can scarcely fail to follow. It is only possible in the fullest attractiveness in offices which are in a position to earn a good rate of interest. Such a rate as £3 15s. per cent. would hardly yield sufficient income, though even that would be intrinsically good when the impossibility of depreciation in capital value is taken into account. When, however, the return exceeds 4¼ per cent., the plan becomes irresistible. It is only feasible to invest in this way money that has been derived from a life assurance policy, and the opportunity of obtaining such an investment should be sufficient by itself to cause people to effect insurances. There are, in addition, the normal advantages of life policies and of the especially favourable conditions in regard to surrender values and other features characteristic of the policies of the Mutual, which has now taken such a long step forward in the extension of life assurance principles.

The general manager of the Car and General Insurance Corporation tells me that my recent article on the Law Car and General may be regarded as referring to the former company. I wish I had anticipated the possibility of confusion between the two, since then I would have stated explicitly, as I do now, that the two companies are entirely separate and distinct. The Car and General protested against the registration of the Law Car and General, and I think it is a pity that the name of an established company was allowed to be so closely copied.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

[Inquiries on the subject of insurance are answered in this column every week. Every letter containing an inquiry must be accompanied by a coupon cut from the third page of the coloured cover of TRUTH.]

J.S. (Cardiff).—Few companies like such risks, but I know of none who refuse them altogether. Foyle.—The society is one of the safest and best in existence. File.—Drop your policy and assure elsewhere. Linenopolis.—(a) What kind of policy do you want? (b) Both offices are sound and good. It depends upon the policy you want as to which is the better. Ranger.—The society is acting within its rights. Tell them I advised you to ask for a paid-up policy and let me know their reply. Sarsfield.—The Scottish Life is perfectly sound and excellent for your purpose. Brae.—No. 1 is sound. I should scarcely advise dealings with (2) or (3). Alpha.—The office is quite sound. I do not think the policy would sell for much, if any more than the surrender value. Midlothian.—You can probably obtain copies of the Valuation Returns from the institution free of charge. Bourne's Assurance Manual (1s.), 85, Fleet Street, or Life Assurance Returns (official), published annually. F. G. H.—United Kingdom Temperance or National Provident. Hodge.—I may very likely deal with this corporation soon. Advise every one to avoid it. Bob.—I am writing to the company, and will write to you on receiving their reply.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

THE S.A. PROSPECTING AND CONCESSIONS SYNDICATE, LIMITED.

An extraordinary general meeting of the S.A. Prospecting and Concessions Syndicate, Limited, was held at Salisbury House, London Wall, E.C., on the 24th inst., for the purpose of submitting the following resolutions:—(1) "That each of the 30,000 ordinary shares of the company of £1 each be divided into two shares of 10s. each, and that the shares resulting from such division be renumbered accordingly." (2) "That the capital of the company be increased to £50,000 by the creation of 40,000 additional ordinary shares of 10s. each." Sir John W. Ottley, K.C.I.E., M.Inst.C.E. (chairman of the company), presided.

The Chairman, in the course of his remarks, said that when he had the privilege of addressing the shareholders eleven months ago the company was a "private syndicate," consisting of about thirty gentlemen, of whom many were his personal friends. It was then decided that it should be converted into a public company, and that the capital be increased. This was carried into effect. In conformity with their usual practice of giving information concerning the syndicate's operations, the Board had issued a circular setting forth the position, in addition to publishing cable news. He thought he might be allowed to repeat the main points in that circular. News reached the syndicate by cable on August 23 last reporting an important discovery of ore in Southern Rhodesia on one of the syndicate's areas known as the "Eureka." The message stated that the panning values showed 13½ dwts. of gold per ton, and width of reef 3 ft. 6 ins. This was followed by a cablegram, dated September 6, reporting that the full gold contents disclosed by assay were 1 oz. 6 dwts., instead of 13½ dwts., and that the "Eureka" area taken up consisted of thirty claims in three blocks, measuring 4,500 ft. in length by 600 ft. in width. On September 12 the syndicate's agent cabled that another discovery had been made two miles to the south-east of the "Eureka," and that this new ground was covered by numerous ancient workings, on which all the surface pannings showed gold varying from 1 dwt. to 1 oz. 5 dwts. per ton. On September 26 cable advice was received stating that this new area (which had been christened the "Empress") looked very well, and consisted of four blocks (forty claims), on which a body of banded ironstone ore, about 40 ft. thick, had been discovered. Having regard to the remarkable nature of the news received, the Board determined to retain the services of a skilled mining engineer who had been employed by Dr. Merensky when this well-known authority accompanied the managing director to Rhodesia last year. The London office wired instructions that the mining engineer referred to should be retained as the syndicate's manager, and should proceed forthwith to the "Eureka" and "Empress" properties in Rhodesia and investigate and report on the discoveries made thereon. On the 10th of last month (October) a cablegram was received reporting that the assay values of the float reef on the "Empress" property were 5½ ozs. of gold per ton; that the west block on the one side showed 8 dwts., and that for the whole width of the enormous reef body of banded ironstone, schist and quartzite, values sampled from the outcrop showed 7¼ dwts. per ton. This message was sent after the arrival of the manager. In the letter of report, dated October 10, 1910, the manager states: "I have seen a great number of properties in Rhodesia, and the Empress is certainly the finest prospect I have seen anywhere up till now. I shall be greatly surprised if she does not turn out a real prize. My opinion is that on the eastern (hanging wall side) of the banded ironstone body, where Mirls thinks the lode stops, we shall find a quartz lying parallel with it, and that the kopje will turn out to be practically one large mass of ore bodies lying stratified or parallel bodies between the banded ironstone—thus, banded ironstone, schists, quartz, schist, quartz, schist and banded ironstone, and so on throughout, all carrying values, more or less." In another letter, dated October 23, the manager writes:—"That the quantities of overburden alluded to exist there can be but the smallest doubt in the mind of anyone visiting the property. As to the maintenance of values as per assays from Mr. Mirls' samples, this can only be determined by a series of pot-holes over sections of the ground put down as rapidly as available labour will allow, to enable something like a systematic sampling and assaying. If results were favourable there is no reason why the property should not be readily floated into a company with hundreds of thousands of tons, possibly millions, of pay ore on the surface. That the foregoing may appear a very glowing picture is perhaps true, but whilst endeavouring at all times not to build up hopes unlikely to be realised, it still would clearly not be right if I refrained from placing the position before you from time to time in its true aspect." Continuing, the Chairman said it read much like a fairy story, but observed that mining developments of a most astonishing character had already taken place elsewhere in Rhodesia during the past year. He added that any success that they might achieve would be due—he thought he might almost say wholly due—to his friend Mr. Marks, the managing dicector. In conclusion, he formally moved the resolutions.

Mr. A. E. B. Foulerton seconded the resolutions.

Mr. A. J. Marks, after dealing with his South African tour, said the information received concerning the properties left no room for doubt as to their prospects. Having regard to the facts before them, he was convinced that he had done well for the syndicate in turning to Rhodesia, and he did not consider that he had been over-enthusiastic with regard to that country's future and its potentialities. (Applause.)

The Chairman said it was their intention to issue 6,000 10s. shares with a 10s. premium, and to offer these shares to the existing shareholders or their nominees. It was also their intention to apply for a Stock Exchange settlement immediately after the capital had been increased.

The resolutions were unanimously agreed to, and the policy of the Board approved.

QUEER STORY.

STODGE AND THE SPLIT.

WHY he was called Stodge, I don't know. It bore no affinity whatever to his real name. But Stodge he had always been ever since I can first remember him. No one thought of calling him anything else.

Stodge was a sort of general bottle-washer at the "Red Deer," the principal hostelry in our little country town of Patcham. His duties were diverse. He had to run errands; to sweep out the four-ale bar; and to dig, when required, in the landlord's back garden. But the greater part of his time was spent in the street outside, minding the horses and bicycles of customers.

He was not exactly a prepossessing person, with his shambling gait, his bleared eyes, and his distinctly alcoholic nose. But his speech and manners were better than his appearance. He hadn't so much as the hint of a provincial accent, and his language, in a general way, was a colourable imitation of the King's English.

His address was polite and courteous—leaning a little, perhaps, to the obsequious side, but not objectionably so. To use a common expression, Stodge knew his place—and kept it. Of his past record I am ignorant. But, hazarding a conjecture, I should say that he had been, at one time, a well-trained gentleman's servant, who had come to grief through a too insatiable thirst.

He had a wonderful head. After ten o'clock in the morning, I should doubt if he were often, strictly speaking, sober. Yet no man, to my knowledge, ever saw him tipsy. At his worst, he was always steady on his feet and master of his wits. His face might be slightly flushed; his speech just a shade thick. But that was all—saving, perhaps, that his eloquence was rather more than ordinarily florid, and the courtly sweep with which he took off his cap to you a little extra pronounced.

Stodge was the despair of curates and district visitors. They could do nothing with him. Not that he was ever defiant or contumacious. Indeed, he always listened to their exhortations with exemplary politeness. But it was the politeness of a tolerant latitudinarian towards well-meaning bigots; as much as to say that he didn't wish to deprive them of any satisfaction they might derive from their little prejudices, but he was really rather sorry for them that their moral code should be so narrow. Stodge's moral code was not narrow. On the contrary, it was in the highest degree elastic and might be warranted to stretch to any extent.

Here is a case in point. Stodge was an inveterate smoker. I remember commiserating him, last year, on the half-penny an ounce rise in the price of tobacco. He beamed on me with his usual bland smile.

"Bless you," he said, "it makes no difference to me. The Budget hasn't put any duty on biking, that I know of."

"Biking? What has that to do with it?" I inquired, in natural bewilderment.

With an affable smile, Stodge produced from his trouser pocket a two-ounce tobacco tin, labelled "Higson's Navy Cut."

"See that?" he said. "It's empty at the moment. But when I get my weekly half-day off to-morrow, I shall fill it with damp sawdust, pressed tight together, and fold it round with paper, as Higson's tobacco always is."

"What on earth will you do that for?" I asked.

"To make the tin feel as though it was full of baccy, of course," answered Stodge. "Then I bike into Bristol—taking care to keep to some part where I'm not known—and make for the first tobacconist's shop I come across. 'Two ounces of Higson's,' I says, laying down tenpence on the counter. The young man gives it me. I take it, and put it in my pocket. Then I suddenly change my mind. 'Think I'll have two ounces of Hawthorn Mixture, after all,' I says. And I hand him the dummy Higson's, and he hands me the Hawthorn in exchange. So I get four ounces of baccy for the price of two, and I come home and pass on the Hawthorn to a mate of mine, for the same price as I paid for it. And there you are, sir!" beamed Stodge, with placid satisfaction.

"But that is swindling," I remonstrated in indignant tones.

Stodge merely bestowed on me a smile of indulgent pity for my narrow-mindedness, as he strolled off to attend to his duties in the four-ale bar. That was Stodge all over.

But the occasion on which Stodge really excelled himself was when the police made their big effort to put salt on the tail of Jim Fosdyck, our local bookie. They had reason to believe that he was making the "Red Deer" his principal centre of operations; but hitherto they had failed to catch him out. Exasperated by frequent failures, they now determined to have him at any cost.

One morning, as Stodge was standing outside, minding a customer's pony and trap, he was accosted by a genial stranger of sporting appearance, attired in Harris-tweed breeches and pig-skin gaiters.

"Cold job, that—eh?" remarked the stranger, with a friendly nod.

"You're right, sir," answered Stodge, touching his cap civilly.

"Been here long?" inquired the genial stranger.

"More than ten years, sir," replied Stodge, "and I don't mind telling you that what with the long hours, and the poor pay, and the standing out in all weathers, and the shameful language they use to me in the four-ale bar, I'm getting fair fed up with it."

"But you rake in a good few tips for this sort of thing, I suppose?" inquired the stranger, nodding towards the pony and trap.

"Precious little, sir," said Stodge, with an injured shrug of his shoulders. "They're a measly lot, the customers here, I do assure you. Sometimes it's no more than a pipe of baccy I get. Sometimes it's only thank you. And sometimes it's not even that."

At this moment, the owner of the pony and trap came out of the saloon-bar, wiping his mouth.

"A smoke for you, Stodge," said he, as he took the reins.

And he produced his case and dropped into Stodge's expectant palm—a couple of cigarettes.

Stodge eyed them with an air of the deepest disgust.

"Here's the style of thing," he said, holding out the cigarettes to the genial stranger, as the trap drove away. "Two measley fags, and home-made ones at that. It's enough to make a horse sick, isn't it?"

"Perhaps they'll smoke better than they look," said the other, consolingly.

"Perhaps they will, sir," was Stodge's scornful rejoinder. "But I'm not going to sample 'em. Not me. Fags are only good for kids, in my opinion. I shall just take 'em home to my youngest nipper."

And he dropped the cigarettes contemptuously into his side-pocket.

"If I depended on the pay I get from the house and the little I pick up for holding horses, I should have cut it long ago," he added. "But, lucky for me—— Coming, sir, coming!"

And he shambled away in answer to the landlord's summons.

The genial stranger eyed his departing figure with a thoughtful smile. Then he strolled into the saloon-bar and ordered something to drink. He seated himself near the window, where he could command a good view of the street, and, while he sipped his beverage, he kept his eyes mostly in that direction. Presently he saw Stodge come out again and take his stand on the pavement. He watched him attentively. After a little a young fellow emerged from the public entrance. He whispered something to Stodge; then, glancing cautiously up and down the street, slipped a little bit of paper into that worthy's hand. A brief interval, and another man came out of the "Red Deer," who repeated the performance. The genial stranger smiled to himself triumphantly. He had seen enough.

A minute later he was out on the street confronting Stodge.

"Ha! my friend! Caught you at last, have I? So you're Fosdyck's tame runner," he remarked.

"Sir!" exclaimed Stodge, all bewildered innocence, "I don't know what you mean."

"You may tell that tale to the magistrates. Meanwhile, you will accompany me to the station," was the curt rejoinder. "I'm a police-officer, let me inform you, and I'm going to charge you with taking betting slips."

Stodge threw up his hands in dismayed astonishment.

"You a split!" he ejaculated. "And you looked quite the gentleman. Oh, you are an artful one!"

"Too artful for you, anyhow," said the other, with a well-satisfied smile. "Come along."

It was a very dejected Stodge who shambled along beside the detective-officer to the police station a few hundred yards distant. There arrived he was ushered into the office. The detective preferred his charge. The sergeant duly entered it on the sheet. Then Stodge, reproachfully protesting, had to submit to the indignity of being searched. They found on him a pipe, a few cigarettes, a box of matches, a tobacco tin, a knife, and two slips of paper. On these last the detective pounced triumphantly. He smoothed them out and read them. And what he read was this:—

On slip number one: "Old Stodge, 100 to 1 on."

On slip number two: "The Split, 100 to 1 against."

Both slips bore the same signature—the evidently facetious signature of "H. Walker."

"You—you—impudent scoundrel!" burst out the detective, fairly spluttering with baffled rage.

Stodge stood beaming, in his blandest manner, on the discomfited officer.

"Only my fun. No harm in having a bit of fun, is there, Split?" he remarked, affably. . . .

It was some months later before Stodge came across the detective again. Next time was in Park Street, Bristol.

"Hilloa, Split! How's business?" he asked, genially.

The detective scowled. Stodge, however, was not in the least put off. It took more than a scowl to put off Stodge.

"Remember when you ran me in?" he pursued, as bland as you please, "I've hardly done laughing over it yet. The funniest part of it was I had the betting-slips on me all the while, and you never twigged 'em. I've chucked the 'Red Deer' at Patcham, and Fosdyck has retired into private life. So I don't mind telling you how I worked it. You see, I'd known for some time that I was being watched. So I had to protect myself by stratagem. I got the fellows just to write their commissions on fag-paper and roll it round a bit of baccy. Simple thing, after all, when you've once had the office—isn't it, Split?"

And Stodge took his leave of the enraged officer with a characteristically exaggerated elevation of his greasy cap.

BOOKS.

ANYTHING about Napoleon is always fascinating, how much more Napoleon about himself! Hence the extraordinary interest of Mr. Clement Shorter's "Napoleon in His Own Defence" (1), a reprint of certain letters written by the Emperor from St. Helena to Lady Clavering. Mr. Shorter has reprinted also Theodore Hook's pamphlet in reply, precious only for its rarity. Indeed, you feel inclined to say of its rarity what Dr. Johnson said to the lady who explained of a piece her little girl was thumping maddeningly on the harpsichord, "I assure you, Dr. Johnson, it is a most difficult piece." "Would to God, madam, it was impossible!" Theodore Hook thumps with a vengeance! The loud pedal of capitals is continually down, and you have good reason to recall Talleyrand's "Les superlatifs sont les cachets des sots." However, Hook's scurrilous pamphlet has at any rate the effect of throwing into relief the moderation and effectiveness of Napoleon's defence. It is "Hyperion to a satyr!" and indeed the satyr is as much in evidence in this pamphlet as it was in Hook's character and in a good deal of his other work. By the way, another quotation from "Hamlet" best suggests the mistake we made in treating the captive of St. Helena with the spitefulness of a woman and the sordidness of a grocer. "My lord," says Polonius, "I will use the players according to their desert." "God's bodykins, man, much better: Use every man after his desert, and who should 'scape whipping? Use them after your own honour and dignity—the less they deserve the more merit is in your bounty." Sir Hudson Lowe, with all the petty ingenuity of a spiteful woman, took care to make Napoleon realise every moment, at every turn, all the mortifications of his imprisonment.

"Persons who might obtain a pass to visit Napoleon were prohibited from making use of such a pass to communicate with any others of his court, unless such permission was specifically expressed in the pass; so that Napoleon, if he received a stranger who could not speak French, was not authorised to call upon Las Cases or any other of his attendants to interpret! Sentinels were placed round the gardens at sunset in such a manner as to preclude Napoleon's taking exercise in it in the only time that can be done with pleasure in a tropical climate. During the day another sentinel was posted in a situation from whence he could observe whatever was going on in the garden; while in a letter to Bertrand every communication, even verbal, with the inhabitants was prohibited."

Indeed Napoleon and his suite were even prohibited from speaking to anyone met in the public roadway! Even more unworthy, perhaps, of a great nation was the cutting down by the shabbiest cheese-paring of Napoleon's domestic expenditure. However, the most interesting incomparably of all these defensive letters are those in extenuation of the shooting of the Duc d'Enghien, a crime which, if wholly unjustifiable, was not wholly unprovoked. Dr. Rose, who is even virulently anti-Napoleonic, admits not only that the Count d'Artois, afterwards Charles X., was at the bottom of the Georges conspiracy for the assassination of Napoleon, but also that our own Government both countenanced and forwarded the nefarious scheme! "I have examined," says Dr. Rose in his painstaking "Life of Napoleon," "the Foreign and Home Office archives, and have in them proofs of the complicity of our Government. Our Government was aware of the Bourbon plot, and these documents prove its active complicity." In fact, the permanent Under-Secretary at the Foreign Office, Mr. Hammond, knew all about the hatching of the assassination plot in the Comte d'Artois's house in Baker Street, while the Admiralty gave what practical help they could to the assassins. As soon as the assassins had done their work the Duc d'Enghien, who was himself in the plot, was to hurry to Paris as the representative of the Bourbons, to take what advantage he could of the disappearance of Napoleon from the stage. Admitting, what has now been put beyond doubt, that these Bourbons, with the connivance and assistance of our Government, despatched assassins from England for the despatch of Napoleon, the judicial murder of the Duc d'Enghien was but a reprisal in kind. By the way, the death of the Duc lies chiefly at Talleyrand's door. Writing to Napoleon from Strasburg, the Duc offered, if he were pardoned, to disclose all the plots against the life of the First Consul, whom he would henceforth faithfully serve. This letter Talleyrand delayed to present to Napoleon till after the execution of the Duc, since at this time that wily diplomatist held that "the destruction of all the Bourbons was necessary to the tranquillity of France." In his own account of the affair Napoleon wrote: "Perhaps if this letter had been presented in time by Talleyrand the political advantages which would have accrued from the Duc's declarations and his services would have decided the First Consul to pardon him." By a slight slip Mr. Shorter, in a note on p. 139, admits what on p. 30 of his striking essay on "Napoleon as a Man of Letters" he denies—that it was solely his disgust at the execution of the Duc d'Enghien which alienated Châteaubriand from Napoleon. Mr. Shorter, who always saturates himself with the literature of any subject before he undertakes to write upon it, shows both in his essay and in his notes a consummate mastery of the mountainous mass of material which has accumulated upon Napoleon.

In reading Sir Clements Markham's "The Incas of Peru" (2) you recall Bacon's dreary description of the earth as "a mere ant-hill whereon some ants carry corn, others their young, others go empty, but all to and fro over a little heap of dust." Here is a great civilisation kicked over and trampled down like an ant-hill, leaving no trace behind but a few fragments of its home. A civilisation, older and grander than the Egyptian, older even than the Andes themselves, is engulfed like a little child's castle of sand at full of tide. To it succeeded at a barbaric interval the empire of the Incas, established by a surviving and reviving remnant of the old race, a fine civilisation which in its turn was extirpated by the thoroughly Christian, and even Spanish Christian, ferocity of Pizarro, Francisco de Toledo, and the rest. Sir Clements in these admirable historical essays traces, with the help of all that the most modern research has disclosed, the rise and growth and fall of the Empire of the Incas; but what lingers most in the memory of the reader is that earlier and earliest of empires of whose civilisation no more trace remains than remains of the mastodon—only the gigantic bones. You recall Shelley's sonnet on the vast and trunkless legs of stone in the desert lying by the side of the shattered visage with the inscription:—

> "My name is Ozymandias, king of kings:
> Look on my works, ye mighty, and despair!"
> Nothing beside remains. Round the decay
> Of that colossal wreck, boundless and bare,
> The lone and level sands stretch far away.

Cecil Rhodes, I find from his secretary, Mr. Jourdain's, biography of him (3) had a characteristic horror of cities, and a passion for wide, wild, waste spaces. He was in many ways Napoleonic in the spaciousness of his mind and views, if also at times Napoleonic in the unscrupulousness of his ways and means. The Archbishop of Cape Town, in a funeral éloge upon Rhodes, quoted his invariable advice:—"Have before you one great idea, and go for it till you have achieved it, reckless of disappointments," and quoted also Rhodes's own one great idea as communicated to the Archbishop long before the formation of the Chartered Company: "All rich men have their hobbies. Some collect butterflies or china, others pictures, others purchase landed estates or stately mansions and live like princes there. To me it has always seemed a nobler aim to open out Southern Central Africa to British energy and British colonisation." It was characteristic of the spaciousness of Rhodes's thoughts and aims that when he wanted to think he climbed Table Mountain, and spent there hours, finding in its vastness, ruggedness, and solitude an adequate inspiration. These and a hundred other characteristics of Cecil Rhodes—those especially of an intimate, interesting, domestic, and naïve nature—are related with Boswellian enthusiasm and minuteness by Mr. Philip Jourdain, in his biography of his hero.

Miss Macnaughtan's "The Andersons" (4) is essentially, eminently, and even pre-eminently, a novel of character. Indeed, it is some time since I read such admirable studies from life as those of these two Highland families, while there is as much humour as nature in the dogged chase and final running down of the dense doctor by the determined Flora.

I have been reading Mrs. Dora Sigerson Shorter's "The Troubadour" (5) to find in it, as always in her poems, the genius which differs from talent as a fixed star, shining with its own light, differs from the borrowed light of a planet. The principal poem is founded upon that story in Boccaccio where Gulielmo Rossiglione gave his faithless wife her lover's heart to eat, but the plot is doubly softened, since Margarida makes no such gruesome feast, and since, as in "Romeo and Juliet," the outcome of the tragedy is reconciliation. It is not too high a compliment to the poem to say that as one reads, one recalls Keats' version of Boccaccio's "Isabella and the Pot of Basil." No less exquisitely conceived and expressed are the minor poems in this appropriately dainty volume.

The foolishness of those "Gammonobacon Cranks" who are satirised in "The Crankiad" fulfils at least one useful purpose by stimulating interest in the authentic works of the man who wrote the "Novum Organum" and "De Augmentis," but not Shakespeare's plays. For this reason Dr. G. Walter Steeves's book "Francis Bacon" (Methuen, 6s. net) makes an opportune appearance. It is not, thank goodness, a fresh contribution to the tiresome Bacon-Shakespeare controversy. Dr. Steeves gives a careful sketch of the philosopher's life, together with a classification and short description of his chief works, which will be invaluable to the Baconian student. The volume is copiously illustrated with reproductions of the title pages, etc., of the earliest editions of Bacon's works.

It is not at all surprising to hear that Mr. Seymour Hicks's autobiography, published by Messrs. Alston Rivers, has proved so successful that a second impression is already in preparation. This half-crown volume, "Seymour Hicks: Twenty-four Years of an Actor's Life: By Himself," is vastly more entertaining than the great majority of the costly books of reminiscences which are poured from the press. In the introduction to his autobiography the popular actor modestly disclaims any pretension to literary merits (though, by the way, he confesses to the authorship of over thirty plays), but he has a bright and racy style, and in these pages, while now and then sounding a more serious note, he is for the most part as lively and amusing as he is on the stage. The book teems with good stories of players and playwrights and theatrical life.

Mr. F. W. Hackwood's book "The Good Old Times: The Romance of Humble Life in England" (Unwin, 10s. 6d. net) is packed with information of value to the sociological student, but set forth in a form that will attract and interest the general reader. It is, indeed, avowedly for the general reader that the author has written this account of the condition and treatment, the harsh oppression and pitiful misery and suffering of the common people in what are foolishly and ignorantly regarded as the "good old times." Beginning with the age of Saxon thralls and Norman villeins, Mr. Hackwood traces "the dolorous story of the poor" down to the present day, illuminating his narrative with a wealth of historic and picturesque details, and giving some particularly interesting chapters on vagrancy and the begging cult in olden times. The volume is illustrated with many reproductions of old drawings.

Captain Owen Wheeler's "A Primer of Photography" (Methuen, 2s. 6d. net) is an excellent little manual for beginners, the outcome of many years' study and experience. It imparts just such practical instruction as the novice requires, and at the same time provides an introduction to the more advanced branches of photographic study.

In theological circles in Germany a storm of controversy has been raging over a book from the pen of Dr. Arthur Drews, Professor of Philosophy at Karlsruhe, of which Mr. Unwin has now published (price 7s. 6d. net) an English version under the title of "The Christ Myth." The translator is Mr. C. Delisle Burns, an ex-priest, who left the Roman Church owing to his Modernist views. The book is an attempt to prove that the origin of Christianity can be accounted for without the assumption of an historical Jesus.

Messrs. Macmillan have just added to their Shilling Library a number of new volumes of greatly diversified interest. "Leaves from the Notebooks of Lady Dorothy Nevill" is one volume, and among the others are "Tales of Old Japan," by Lord Redesdale; "H.M.I.: Some Passages in the Life of one of H.M. Inspectors of Schools," by Mr. E. M. Sneyd-Kynnersley; "Cawnpore," by Sir G. O. Trevelyan; "Barracks, Bivouacs, and Battles," by Archibald Forbes; and "North Italian Folk," by Mrs. Comyns Carr, with illustrations by Randolph Caldecott.

Mr. James Cassidy's new novel, "Black Humphrey," which the Walter Scott Publishing Company are issuing, is a story of adventure, love, and mystery in the old coaching and kidnapping days, the scene being laid in Cornwall.

Professor E. B. Poulton's book, "John Viriamu Jones, and other Oxford Memories," which Messrs. Longmans are publishing, contains a rather full account of the Union in the seventies, when Mr. Asquith, Lord Milner, Lord Curzon, and other men now eminent were speakers at the debates there.

"Standard Musical Biographies," which Messrs. Hutchinson are publishing, is a book by George P. Upton dealing with the lives, works, and characteristics of representative composers. It is profusely illustrated with portraits.

Swinburne, Wilde, George Gissing, and Alfred Noyes are among the modern writers who, besides many old masters, have been laid under tribute in "The Seasons," a charming anthology in prose and verse compiled by Helen and Lewis Melville. The book is published (price 3s. 6d. net) by Messrs. Williams and Norgate.

Both from the artistic and the literary point of view The Sphere Christmas Number makes an attractive departure from the conventional style of such productions. It succeeds admirably in its design "to reflect the Christmas spirit in no hackneyed manner." The number is richly embellished with coloured pictures by well-known artists, and the letter-press includes "The Cigar with the Green Glow," a strikingly imaginative story from the French of Vanlentine Mandelstamm, with illustrations by René Lelong, and "The Red Butterfly," by Gerald d'Houville, with illustrations by Edmund Dulac.

BOOKPLATES. Artistic, original, specially designed. Inclusive cost of design, block, and 100 plates, 17s. 6d. Marvellous value. Specimens free.—HENRY O. WARD, 49, Great Portland St., London, W.

ART.

THE NEW ENGLISH ART CLUB.

IT did not take Post-Impressionism to depose the New English Art Club from its proud position of best-abused art institution in the country. For some time now the club has been acquiring standards and traditions of almost alarming sobriety and, with the exception perhaps of a few stray members, has been sloughing the conscious eccentricity that often does deputy for originality. Quite a number of New English Artists exhibit with impunity at Burlington House; some, indeed, form part of the body corporate that has no narrow-minded predilection for the straight and uncomfortable way; yet far from showing symptoms of Medization, the New English Art Club retains its individuality in that, unlike a number of art institutions, it retains the individuality of every one of its units.

The superb impertinence of the Post-Impressionists is naturally foreign to the Englishman. He may attempt it, may even achieve a praiseworthy imitation thereof. But his self-conscious swagger gives him away and shows what the lion's hide is doing its best to conceal. And while there has doubtless been misinterpretation of the New English Art Club, it was to a great extent provoked by the swagger from which the present exhibition in Suffolk Street is so noticeably free. On the contrary, it is not difficult to detect in the almost universal desire of New English Art to paint rocks and castles a return to the well-regulated dramatic instincts of early Victorian respectability. It is true that it is a return with a difference, but it is also proof that New English Art feels itself strong enough no longer to fear the odour of respectability. Here are no Devils' Bridges, no Drachenfels of Covent Garden fame, but plain rocks such as might be seen on a cheap trip to Margate or a sojourn in the lake country or Wales. Professor Holmes in particular has originated a stern, imposing convention which, by its very reticence, conveys the suggestion of grimness and isolation. A cross between a scientific painter and an imaginative geologist, Professor Holmes produces something between a picture, a map, and a cross-section, in which, however, his mountains are enmeshed by a simple lure, where they have resisted a hundred more elaborate expedients. Mr. Albert Goodwin expresses mountains through their surrounding atmosphere; Professor Holmes paints hard rock itself with none of its softer yet more diffuse attributes. In "Nature's Ramparts" Mr. W. Rothenstein conveys an immense impression of height and freedom, and in "Rocky Portals" Mr. W. Russell would have added to the conception of his picture had he given rather more suggestion of the sea beyond the portal. Mr. Sydney Lee's "Barbican Gate," as is the case with all his many exhibits, is full of poetry and imagination, while Mr. Talmage's "Blue and Silver" comes back with its shining cliffs to a very pleasant light-o'-day reality. Mr. Philip Connard's "Castleacre Castle" owes a good deal both to Mr. Orpen and Mr. Steer, and, in spite of its excellent work and the beautiful woman's figure, is not entirely successful, while Mr. Wilson Steer's "Deserted Quarry," with its fine glow and feeling, stops just in time to avoid merging into sheer rhapsody of colour rather than of quarry.

With one or two exceptions landscape generally has found its most satisfactory exponents among the water-colourists, including Mr. Rich's beautiful "Corfe Castle," Mr. Wm. Coles's "The Severn at Coalport," and Mr. Russell's "A Storm," Mr. Shackleton's "Storm Rising" and work by Mr. David Muirhead and Mr. F. Carter. Mr. Fisher's large oil "Waterway" would have been better on a smaller scale, being somewhat over-green and luscious with the mat green of a faded daffodil. Mr. W. Bayes has a glorious "Harbour Scene," and Mr. David Muirhead is showing several excellent landscapes. Noticeable water-colours are Mr. Sargent's brilliant "Green Parasol," Mr. F. James's flowers, and Mr. Orpen's "Artist and His Model," of which the beautiful drawing and exquisite feeling alone would absolve Mr. Orpen from any other justification.

The main tendency of the New English Art Club has always been landscape rather than portraiture, which very often has compromised with a portrait-interior or with figures in a landscape. Well-founded as the instinct may be it is not prohibitive of fine work on the part of a few New English artists—I refer particularly to Mr. Orpen and Mr. Nicholson. Perhaps the greatest tribute that can be paid to Mr. Orpen's opalescent "Afternoon on the Cliff" and the warm bright "Midday on the Beach" is that there is very little to say about either of them, except that they convey a sensation of intense pleasure, and that their fine workmanship seems so easy that the visitor wonders why he did not attempt it himself. Mr. Nicholson's Velasquez-like "Gennie" is perhaps the most delightful piece of work he has ever done, all his sometime preciousness being swept along by a tremendous burst of spontaneity. Very notable, too, is his "Ruth," the hands being particularly well treated. Mr. Henry Lamb is showing a clever portrait, while Mr. Giusti's "Columbine," though not particularly original, is very charming. A number of portrait-interiors, finely though conventionally painted, fall this time a little flat in comparison with the spirited work of the portraitists.

One characteristic of the exhibition is the number of women exhibitors who have contented themselves with attempting very modest subjects and in treating them with notable taste and delicacy. Among these I should like to mention Miss Essil Elmslie, Miss Catharine Wood, and Miss Josephine Mason, while Miss Sargant Florence strikes a strong and entirely new note in the simple naïvete and strength of her tempera painting, "A Game of Chess," which has something of the spirit of the early Italian masters.

One more picture demands special mention, and that is Mr. Hallam's "House-hunters," a fine example of the house personality which is such a feature of present-day art. On the whole the New English Art Club contains this year such a high average of work as to render impossible full justice to all its exhibitors.

MUSIC.

AN important event next year will be the International Musical Congress which is to be held in London under the auspices of the International Musical Society. Last year, it may be recalled, a similar meeting was held in Vienna, and was attended by many well-known British musicians. Now it is to be London's turn, and the hope is naturally being expressed by those responsible that every one will co-operate and make the congress a success and a credit to ourselves. We have often been called an unmusical nation, and British music is still spoken of by Continental cynics as a contradiction in terms. Now we shall have an opportunity of proving the falsity of both assertions and of heaping coals of fire on our sceptical Continental critics by giving them the time of their lives.

So far as the International Musical Society is concerned, its members have never shown any lack of respect for British musicianship, as is proved by the fact that a British composer, Sir A. C. Mackenzie, is the president of the society; but this makes it only the more desirable that we should utilise the coming opportunity to justify and retain their good opinions. To this end some representative concerts of British music will form an important part of the programme of the congress, which for the rest will include the usual reading of papers, interspersed with jaunts and junketings customary in the case of such gatherings. When the congress was held in Vienna the British members were treated exceedingly well, and it is naturally desired to extend equal hospitality to our visitors next year. It is satisfactory to hear that a handsome guarantee fund has already been subscribed for the purpose.

At Covent Garden of late the only addition to the repertory has been Mr. Clutsam's one-act opera "A Summer Night," which was quite worth reviving, for, if the action drags at time, the music is full of cleverness and charm. The cast was precisely the same as that heard in the work when it was given at His Majesty's in the summer. In "Elektra," on Saturday, a new Klytemnestra, Fräulein Marie Goetze, was heard, but she hardly possessed sufficient vocal power for such an exacting part, neither was her acting particularly impressive. Fräulein Plaichinger repeated her impersonation of Elektra, in the case of which her acting is better than her singing; otherwise the cast was as before. This was a matinée performance, and the exceptionally large audience attracted was worth noting. Earlier in the week Fräulein Plaichinger was heard in "Tannhäuser," doubling the two parts of Venus and Elizabeth (in consequence of Mme. Gleeson White's indisposition), and Herr Kraus gave an eminently German impersonation of the title-part.

An opera which many London music lovers will look forward to hearing is Humperdinck's "Die Königskinder," though it has been spoken of so long that some may begin to wonder whether it is ever actually destined to see the footlights. It appears, however, that it is positively to be produced at New York during the present season, and that those who have seen the score speak most favourably of it. This is not surprising. Those who remember the incidental music to the play of the same name which Humperdinck wrote, and out of which he has developed his opera, will recollect it as altogether charming, if slight. And as in its operatic form it is said to have been vastly strengthened and developed, high expectations seem justified. It is curious and regrettable that Humperdinck has done so little since "Hänsel and Gretel" to redeem the promise of that enchanting opera. He has produced other works since, but none that has made any enduring impression. It is to be hoped, however, that with "Die Königskinder" he may break the spell.

Another important new opera about to be produced in New York is Puccini's long-talked-of "Girl of the Golden West," of which very favourable preliminary reports are also to hand. One cannot quite see Puccini handling a "wild and woolly" theme of the Bret Harte order, but according to Signor Toscanini, who is to conduct the work in New York, it is one of the strongest things which he has yet done. "There are new things in the music," he is reported as saying; "above all, exquisite new tones, timbres, and colours in the instrumentation. It has more vigour, variety, and masculinity than the scoring of the composer's earlier operas. It is more complex and more modern." One thing at least is certain. In the manner of its presentation the work will have every advantage, since Destinn and Caruso are taking the principal parts. It is understood that the work will be given at Covent Garden next season.

Not many concerts of much importance have been given lately. Mischa Elman reappeared on Friday and played as brilliantly as ever, though now that he is no longer a prodigy he scarcely excites the same furore as formerly; he plays better, of course, but he is no longer in knickerbockers. Miss Julia Culp, who gave a recital on Saturday, is always forth hearing, and it is only a pity that she is not to appear in London again before next May. That clever young pianist, Mr. Cecil Baumer, had quite a triumph at his orchestral concert on Thursday, when he clearly demonstrated that he is one of our younger pianists who must be reckoned with. With his fine technique and manifest intelligence he should go far. Mr. Ernest Schelling, who was heard earlier in the week, is another brilliant pianist who is rapidly acquiring a following of his own. At Covent Garden on Sunday evening some excerpts from Dukas' "Ariane et Barbe-Bleue" made a fairly favourable impression, as did Mme. Perelli, who sang in them, and the "Dance of the Seven Veils" from "Salome" was another interesting item in an exceptionally attractive programme.

Of books about Wagner there is seemingly no end, and "Wagner at Home," by Judith Gautier, which has recently been published by Messrs. Mills and Boon (10s. 6d. net) in an English version, is neither better nor worse than a good many others of its kind. Daughter of Theophile Gautier, the authoress of these gossipy reminiscences seems to have been one of many well-known French folk who early fell under the master's spell, and her book tells how, in company with some others, she went to visit him in his retreat near Lucerne. The expedition must have been great fun, and many amusing incidents are narrated. Villiers de l'Isle-Adam was one of the party, and seems to have contributed considerably to its humours—as often as not unconsciously—as, for instance, when he was scratched by Wagner's Newfoundland "Russ," and disgusted the master by his abject terror of subsequent hydrophobia. The book was evidently written a good many years ago, and a good deal of it has a somewhat antiquated ring to-day, but the writer wields a lively pen, and if some of her gossip is rather small beer she carries it off by the lightness of her touch. There are some rather amusing vignettes of well-known folk, as, for instance:—

> Richter, in Wagner's presence, preserved the ecstatic expression of a priest before a holy apparition. Standing at a little distance he listened to the master thoughtfully, his steady eyes shining behing his glasses in the midst of the abundant gold of his beard and his hair. He seemed to have lost the power of speech.

THE THEATRES.

A Week of One-act Plays.

THE past week has been notable only for the number of one-act plays that have been staged. No less than four were given in one afternoon at the Haymarket at the matinée in aid of the Shakespeare Memorial Theatre. On the same afternoon "Inconstant George," at the Prince of Wales's, was preceded by a pretty little dance play, while on Saturday night two further novelties in the way of short pieces were put on in front of "Vice Versâ" at the Comedy and "Just to Get Married" at the Little Theatre respectively. Finally, on Sunday evening, in the fine programme arranged by the Playgoers' Club for their Children's Pantomime Fund, three or four more notable trifles figured. This performance took place at His Majesty's Theatre, which had been kindly lent by Sir Herbert Tree, and certainly those who patronised it have no cause to complain of the fare put before them. Mr. Bourchier and Miss Vanbrugh appeared in that amusing little piece "A Marriage Has Been Arranged," Mr. Aubrey Smith and Miss Rosina Filippi gave "Colonel and Mrs. Henderson," Mr. Laurence Irving and Miss Mabel Hackney were seen in "The Dog Between," and Miss Hilda Trevelyan and Mr. Nye Chart repeated their old successes in "'Op o' me Thumb." Seeing this clever and pathetic little play again makes one realise in how short a time that brilliant little actress Miss Trevelyan has made a great and solid reputation. It does not seem many years since I remember her playing in "A Chinese Honeymoon" at the old Strand Theatre. Then she delighted every one with her beautiful and pathetic performance as the little romantic slavey in "'Op o' me Thumb," and after that Mr. Barrie, recognising her great ability, gave her one or two excellent parts to play. At the present moment it is not too much to say that her charmingly sympathetic playing of the typist in "A Single Man" has contributed largely to the great success of Mr. Davies's comedy. All that is wanted now is for some clever dramatist to write a play round her curiously interesting personality. We have not many star actresses, and there is plenty of room for another. Miss Trevelyan also played in the Haymarket matinée, namely in Mr. Barrie's fascinating skit "A Slice of Life." This is no novelty, but as brilliantly acted by Mr. Gerald du Maurier, Miss Lena Ashwell, and Miss Trevelyan; it is a thing of sheer delight. George Paston's "Stuffing," in the same programme, was again no novelty, but it is an amusing low-life comedy in which a duck that a cabman buys his wife for a birthday present (because he likes duck) plays a leading part. The same authoress's "The Kiss" is an adaptation from the German, and shows how a fascinating scoundrel while pretending to be merely robbing a lady of a kiss robs her of her necklace!

The pièce de résistance, though, of the whole afternoon was Mr. Bernard Shaw's "The Dark Lady of the Sonnets." This fantasy was not presumably written to shed any new light on the identity of the Dark Lady. Rather, it would seem that it was written to belittle studiously the dramatist to establish a theatre in whose honour the matinée was given! This is a truly Shavian jest. He contributes a work to support the National Memorial Theatre movement, and in that work makes out our Shakespeare a poor creature, who, it is true, can flatter and cajole Queen Elizabeth, but yet walks about the terrace of Whitehall Palace at night noting down from the conversation of other people good lines for his plays. The Dark Lady herself, namely, Mary Fytton, merely appears as a "light" lady very prone to making midnight assignations. However, this may be no libel. The sonnets do not give her the best of reputations. Mr. Granville Barker played the bard and delivered, quite admirably, the serious appeal put into the mouth of Shakespeare for a theatre which shall be of more benefit to authors and actors than our present purely commercial houses—so the play served its purpose, and it was certainly amusing. One felt, however, that the poor belittled bard really ought to have been prophetically advocating a National Bernard Shaw Theatre. Frankly the whole thing is unworthy of Mr. Shaw, and the serious nature of the final appeal does not blend at all well with the cheap flippancy of the earlier parts in which Shakespeare is held up to ridicule.

"The Portrait," by Dora Bright, which now appears in front of "Inconstant George" at the Prince of Wales' Theatre is a very pretty little musical fantasy, in which an artist falls in love with a wonderful picture he has painted. When failing light causes him to leave off work he falls asleep, and the lady in the canvas comes to life and woos him in a characteristic dance. She, it would appear, is as much in love with her creator as he with his creation. Ultimately she is disturbed and returns to her frame, but, like Cinderella, she leaves a shoe behind her, which the painter has to explain to his friends as best he may. Miss Mona Harrison dances very charmingly, but the best feature of the entertainment is Mr. Gordon Cleather's singing of two songs.

Mrs. Herbert Cohen's "Mount Pleasant," which has been put on in front of "Vice Versâ" at the Comedy, points the moral that it is not always wise to educate your children into being dissatisfied with their surroundings. Mrs. Harris lives at Mount Pleasant, which has a pleasing sound if you do not happen to know the precise slum which it designates. Gladys Harris has been away for a long while at a charity boarding school. When she comes home she is horrified with her entourage, because her mother, with extreme foolishness, has led her to believe that they live in a charming country spot. The drama comes out of the girl's gradual acceptance of the new conditions and realisation of how much she owes to the poor old mother who is so proud of her. Miss Clare Greet gives a beautiful picture of the foolish uneducated little mother, and Miss Marjorie is good as the girl.

The last in this catalogue of curtain-raisers is "Denton (Lab.)," which Miss Gertrude Kingston has staged in front of "Just to Get Married" at the Little Theatre. "Denton (Lab.)" is in a way prophetic. It shows you what may happen at any moment in the near future. Sir George Egerton is a blue-blooded old aristocrat with a perfect valet—one Denton, on whom he is greatly dependent. Imagine his feelings, therefore, when one fine day Denton tells him that he is going to contest the Homefield division in the Labour interest. As Sir George's son is the Unionist candidate there is much discussion, and trouble seems imminent, but eventually the admirable Denton decides to sink his political aims for the moment, because he learns that his old master has only six months to live, and needs a faithful retainer to the last. This, of course, rather shirks the real question. When one's valets go into Parliament and one's housemaids have to go out to vote, the servant question, I fancy, will become unanswerable.

SPORT.

RACING NOTES.

I STATED last week that information had reached me that King George's first visit to Newmarket next year will probably take place during the Second July meeting. If all is well the King and Queen will be present at Epsom races on the Derby and Oaks days, and the arrangements for the visit of the Court to Ascot will be the same as during the last reign. It is very likely that the King will attend Goodwood races on three days of the meeting, and in the autumn his Majesty may be seen at Newmarket during either the Second October or the Houghton meeting. I have seen an announcement that the King hopes to attend the Summer meeting at Newbury, but this is clearly a mistake. This meeting is fixed for Monday and Tuesday in the Coronation week, days on which the King will be overwhelmed with both public and private engagements in London. The proper days for Newbury are Tuesday and Wednesday in the week after Ascot, but the meeting was brought forward when the list of fixtures was settled last summer, because it was then expected that the Coronation would take place on Wednesday, June 21. As matters stand Wednesday and Thursday (Coronation Day) in that week are both blank, except for the Newcastle fixture.

A morning paper printed last week some flummeracious nonsense about the "grave disadvantage" under which the late King's racehorses have laboured during the past season because they were unable to run for the races in which they had been engaged as yearlings. The animals in question are exceedingly moderate, and it is in the greatest degree improbable that they would have won any of the races for which they had been entered in King Edward's name, so there is no affinity with reason in these puzzle-pated regrets. If King George were well advised he would sell most of the horses which have been leased to Lord Derby during the last six months, for they are not at all likely to do much good next season. There is no greater mistake possible for an owner than to keep in training a number of bad horses. They are quite as costly as the good ones, which win valuable races, whereas the bad ones bring in nothing but training bills and forfeit accounts. An owner who races for sport should keep only horses which are up to a fairly high standard of form. This was the sound principle on which the studs of the late Duke of Westminster and the late Lord Falmouth were always managed, and the result was satisfactory, if the matter were regarded only from the profit and loss point of view.

The entries for the races at Ascot which have lately closed are very satisfactory. In the Biennial 132 yearlings have been engaged, Mr. Whitney being the largest subscriber with five entries. The list is headed by his Majesty, who has three entries. There are 121 entries for next year's New Stakes, Mr. Whitney again being the largest subscriber with six. There are sixty-one entries for the Prince of Wales' Stakes for 1912, and fifty-two for the Ascot Derby. There are seventy-five entries for the New Biennial, and the list of now two-year-olds engaged in this race is worth notice. It includes Black Potts, Mushroom, Lowlander, St. Nat, Grey Spinner, Oliver Goldsmith, Mary Carmichael (this filly has been one of the conspicuous failures of the past season), Prince San, Cyrilla, and Tullibardine. There are 102 entries for the Hardwicke Stakes for 1912, and valuable hints may be gathered by intelligent people from a study of the list of the older horses, which includes Lemberg, Swynford, Thalia, Ulster King, Declare, The Story, Greenback, and Cardinal Beaufort. The most notable of the now two-year-olds are Seaforth, Pietri, Manwolf, King William, Stedfast, Mushroom, St. Nat, Cellini, Knockfeerna, and Prince Palatine.

The Champagne Stakes at Doncaster has done remarkably well, there being 107 entries, as against eighty-nine for the present year. It is to be regretted that the Stewards of the Jockey Club have not ordered an alteration in the conditions of this race. Doncaster is a very rich meeting, and the Champagne Stakes is the only really important two-year-old race in the programme. It is therefore preposterous that the minor forfeit (£5) should continue to be grabbed for the fund, and especially as it is not declared until the first Tuesday in July. These forfeits should be divided between second and third horses, leaving the sweepstakes and the added money for the winner. It is a mistake, moreover, not to have penalties for winners in a race which is run so late in the season. A winner of a race of £500 should carry 7 lbs. extra, or 10 lbs. for one of £1,000.

Lord Derby will be unlucky if he does not win several important three-year-old races next season. Stedfast and King William have shown excellent form during the past autumn, and both colts were very far from being at their best, for they are obviously capable of great improvement. They bid fair to train on into very fine three-year-olds. So many engagements were made for Stedfast when he was a yearling that he still has thirty-one of them to fulfil, and he has also been entered for several races which have lately closed. Stedfast's first engagement as a three-year-old is the Two Thousand, and a week later he is entered for the Chester Vase of £2,000, and in that race he has a breeding allowance of 7 lbs. Lemberg, Bronzino, and Pietri are engaged in this race. King William is also entered for the Two Thousand, but he has a previous engagement at Newmarket in the Craven Stakes. This colt is in the Newmarket Stakes, and both Stedfast and King William are in the Derby. Oliver Goldsmith ought to turn out a very useful three-year-old if all goes well with him, but he is not likely to be up to the form of the two other colts. Oliver Goldsmith is entered for the Newmarket Biennial.

Lord Derby has a highly promising filly in The Tabard, half-sister, by Zinfandel, to Swynford. The same judicious policy has been followed with The Tabard as was adopted last year for the St. Leger winner. She is remarkably good-looking and racing-like. The Tabard's engagements during the early part of next season are the One Thousand, the Newmarket Stakes, the Oaks, and the Coronation Stakes at Ascot. On paper, Hair Trigger II. could be made out to be one of the best two-year-olds of the season, but she unluckily went amiss early in the autumn, and therefore could not start for certain races at Newmarket, which she appeared very likely to win. Hair Trigger II. may be permanently affected by the cough from which she suffered. It did not appear, however, as if this filly were likely to turn out a stayer, and I expect The Tabard will prove Lord Derby's best filly for the classic races. Persephone has been one of the great disappointments of the season, as she was repeatedly much fancied for important races, but always failed. She may win some T.Y.C. races next year, but she need not be thought of for the One Thousand or Oaks.

One of the papers laments the sale of Lord Cadogan's horses in training, but hopes that at least he will "continue his work as a member of the Jockey Club." Lord Cadogan is not at all likely to leave the Jockey Club, but I would vastly like to know what is the "work" to which reference is made. The members of the Jockey Club held three meetings at Newmarket during the autumn, but the "work" done was simply 0 0 0, although there are several practical matters which have for some time required the attention of the Stewards, with a view to legislation.

Minoru has gone to the stud. He will join the Tully Stud, Kildare, and his fee is to be £98. One of the other sires at this stud is White Eagle, whose subscription for next season is full at £48.

There was a fairly large field for the Manchester November Handicap, but the class of the competitors was exceedingly poor, and the result was not satisfactory. It is never pleasing to see an important handicap won by a "thrown-in" old horse. The Valet who won, is six years old, and he carried only 6 st. 9 lbs., which included a penalty of 5 lbs. Anchora, who finished second, is five years old, and carried 6 st. 12 lbs. I had expected Accurate to win after her running at Derby, but she could only get third. The Valet ran porminently for a long way in the Derby Cup, and some people were of the opinion that he would have done better in that race if he had not been ridden so hard from the start. Merry Task was greatly fancied at Newmarket, but the American colt was over-weighted. Here was a three-year-old giving 15 lbs. to a six-year-old that was known to be in fair form, and with heavy ground.

ASHFORD MANOR GOLF HANDICAPS—FOOTBALL—RUNNING.

The Ashford Manor Golf Club, or, rather, the committee thereof, is suffering from a disease that periodically affects golfers. This golf influenza takes the form of making the sufferer believe that his course is not difficult enough. The disease arises either when professionals are going to play in a big match or when some member of the club shows transcendental superiority. In the former case the illness takes the form of a mania for building bunkers. It never strikes the builders that the bunker placed for the average scratchman may as well be non-existent for the professional who is at the top of the tree and at the top of his game. Or the illness may be diagnosed by the impossible position in which the holes are cut on the putting greens. The course must not be too easy. Members will despise the club, players will not join if it is advertised to the world that in a News of the World competition the Southern cracks have done too well. This was the manifestation of the mania at Stoke Poges this year. The consequence was that a howl of execration was raised. No one had time to say anything good of the course. Its possibilities were eclipsed by the iniquities of the position of the holes. Verily the self-conscious vanity of these clubs is wonderful, passing the vanity of women. Neither of these manifestations of the disease is running through Ashford Manor The trouble there is the brilliancy of one player. The handicap committee dare not put him at more than plus six for fear, I suppose, of making their course seem too easy. It must be a rotten course, they argue, if a player is at plus seven. And with ostrich-like stupidity they raise every other player a stroke. They tremble at what the world would say if anybody in their club were at plus seven.

The cause of this trouble is a person once described by Andrew Kirkcaldy as a wee devil, otherwise Hilton. He cannot help winning at plus six, and hence the change in the handicaps. Players at Ashford have already gone up one, and they now go up another stroke because of Hilton. If Hilton gets even better than he is now the rest will go up yet another stroke. And the club committee will say, "Now, indeed, will the world say what a hard course Ashford Manor is! Here is Hilton, who was plus nine when in his zenith at Hoylake. He is playing as well as ever. He is only plus six at Ashford Manor in the Thames Valley, where the L. and S.W.R. trains run." And nobody will be deceived except the stranger handicapped to the par value of his own course who shall meet the Ashford player, who will be two strokes to the good. And again, the committee of Ashford Manor will smite each other's shoulders in their joy and say, "Indeed, we are men of wisdom. Behold, our player beats the strangers within our gates, and, armed with the handicap we have given him, goes forth and beats the golfers of the world." Wherefore, O unsuspecting stranger, if you by chance meet an Ashford Manor player, make him deduct two strokes from his handicap before you put a half-crown on the game. This handicapping to a player is, of course, an egregiously stupid and unfair thing to do. Mid-Surrey, where all things are possible, played the same game some years ago, when S. H. Fry was at the top of his form. Every course has its par value. Handicap to this standard, and the result is wonderfully fair wherever players congregate. There need be no fear of a man being handicapped to this course standard. If he is a Hilton the result will be fair wherever he plays. But the consequence of the Ashford Manor system is that Hilton on a strange course is in a better position than on his own course. Not that the handicap would make any difference to Hilton. He is not a pot-hunter; he never was. He does not bet on the game. He would probably arrange any friendly game on the basis of the Ashford scheme of giving his opponent more strokes. But all plus men are not Hiltons. There are pot-hunters amongst them. There are more pot-hunters on the minus side, and if some clubs handicap to a crack player these minus men set forth not merely to win pots but to make money. The club Hilton, whoever he may be, is a commercial asset to them. Wherefore one admires not the ways of the wise men of Ashford Manor, but sees in them injustice both to their friends and their foes.

The leading golf-ball manufacturers have taken up the position I suggested last week. The immediate effect of the fall in rubber cannot be felt while existing contracts are running. The price of the fine rubber thread is 10s. 9d. a pound. With regard to the threatened boycott, the manufacturers say it is absurd. Of course it is. Even, however, at the present prices of material they can offer to supply balls to clubs direct for cash at such a price that the clubs could sell to their members at 2s. and still make a profit. It seems that this procedure means cutting off the sixpenny tax that there is virtually on every ball owing to its being sold by the professional. My dreams are shattered. The club, through the professional, puts on a tax which, by every principle of economy, the foreigner—that is, the manufacturer—should pay, and no one adopts my suggestion of putting a tax on rubber to make it cheaper.

With neither side at full strength Oxford University only just managed to beat Blackheath. The losers' forwards were distinctly good. Guy's Hospital found their best form against the Harlequins, and won by a goal and a try to a try. The most interesting game was that between Cambridge University and the Old Merchant Taylors. The old boys have come on a lot since the season began. Their forwards are always on the ball. They have in Ryan a half-back who is at Oxford. He is pretty well up to International form, and he should partner the other old boy, Cheeseman, in the Oxford team. Amongst the forwards, Botham and Strang were very good. O'Callaghan's swerving quite upset the Cambridge defence, and Raphael scored a try from half-way. His team won by five goals, one being a penalty, to a goal and a try. The Cambridge three-quarters lacked all cohesion, and at times the defence of the whole team was pathetically puerile. Scholfield was, of course, missed at three-quarters. But it looks a hopeless game for Cambridge against Oxford on December 13 at Queen's Club. Raphael was really in top form both in attack and defence. He is leaving to go abroad for a trip, and this will be his last match this season. He stayed a week later than he intended, in order to play in this game. That is the sort of keenness that has made the O.M.T.'s possible as a club. That day-school poked away in the City in a corner of Charterhouse Square turns out a good first-class Rugby old boys' team year after year. Four or five teams play for the club each week. Youthful practice on the asphalte makes a frost-bound ground seem like a feather bed. They play the game in the spirit of the game, and a fairer and faster game one could not have wished to see.

Last week old Jack White died. For many years he had looked after the men at the L.A.C. and at Cambridge in the October and Lent terms. He was not in any sense a professional trainer as the office is understood or practised in the United States. He looked after your clothes, and he rubbed you down before and after racing. He would just tell you whether or not a certain spin would do you any good. But whatever you did he was certain it would do no harm. As a rubber-down he excelled. He just knew how much pressure to bring to bear. A good rub by Old Jack was always worth something before a race and afterwards it was something to be remembered. A rattling quarter and a rub down, and the fresh, lightsome feeling afterwards, every nerve of the body just tingling with life and health, was a joy of healthy youth that can never be forgotten. He was a little square-built man, the Gateshead clipper, the last survivor of those men who made names for themselves in the days when long-distance professional racing was popular. Those professionals would run fifty miles for a fiver. They might be out to win, but they took good care to win by as little as possible. If they gave their true form away they could not get matches. Old Jack showed his true form in 1863 against Deerfoot and others. At seven miles, done in the splendid time of 34mins. 43secs., he had everybody beaten. He went on comfortably and covered the distance in 52mins. 14secs. He might have done under fifty. He had shown his form and he could not get another match. He was before his time. Nowadays he would be taken to the States and run against relays of men. Some day, perhaps, professional running will revive in this country.

Mr. C. T. R. Scovell, a well-known yachtsman, was washed overboard from his steam yacht Charlotte in the North Sea some ten days ago. He was commodore of the Royal Bombay Yacht Club. The Field relates that in 1902 he sailed the 45-ton Godwit to India without a tow. He arrived at Bombay as the club regatta was proceeding. He rowed ashore, stepped straight into a club boat, sailed a race and won it. His grandfather was one of the founders of the Royal St. George's Yacht Club, Kingstown.

ELEGY WRITTEN IN A (BROWN) STUDY.

"How well I know what I mean to do when the long dark (winter) evenings come."—Browning, etc.

Relic of vanished beauty,
Pipe, you are sadly sooty,
  Yet as the smoke flits by me
    After an evening nap,
Weary and worn and jaded,
What though your form has faded?
  Though you are old and grimy,
    Still you're a handy chap.

Puff! and I see the fairies,
Thick as the study air is,
  Rise to the homely rafter,
    Playing the Muse's Mime;
Puff! and I feel them stealing
Down from the blackening ceiling,
  Lighting my soul with laughter,
    Filling my bumps with rhyme.

Quicker I puff and quicker,
Thicker they come and thicker,
  Shading the glowing embers
    There in the ruddy grate;
Casting me fairy glances,
Sending a fog of fancies—
  Not like a dull November's:
    Those are the fogs I hate.

Ah! I could puff for ever.
Do you forsake me? Never!
  Friend of the winter poet,
    You are a friend indeed.
You are a pipe and brother;
Yes, I shall take another
  Whiff for an hour—oh, blow it!
    I've used up all my weed!

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

THE long anticipated amalgamation of the Motor Union and the Automobile Association is apparently an accomplished fact at last, and the leaders of both organisations are to be congratulated on having put their heads together to such good purpose. It was so patently absurd that two different bodies, in addition to the Royal Automobile Club, should claim to represent the interests of motorists that the only matter for wonder is that such prolonged negotiations should have been necessary to find the obvious solution of the problem. Happily, common sense seems to have prevailed, and the two organisations are now one, though it remains to be ascertained upon precisely what terms the fusion has been effected. From what I can hear, I fancy that the smile will eventually be on the face of the A. A. But this, after all, is not the proper way of looking at the matter. It is better to think of it as a case of two hearts united in the bonds of holy matrimony—with the proviso, however, that no offspring are desired in the case of this particular union. The pious hope may also be expressed that the parties which have thus been brought together will not be put asunder at any future time.

Seriously, it has been very deplorable that such divided counsels should have prevailed hitherto in the motoring world. All automobilists are suffering at the present time from this childish state of things, and will continue to do so for some time yet, since it is obviously idle to look for any amendment of the existing utterly unfair system of taxation before January next, when the licence fees fall due again. Working together as one body, and in conjunction with the R.A.C., the M.U., and the A.A. should certainly be able to make such representations to the powers that be as will better matters before the following January comes round. In other ways, too, their consolidation ought to make for the good of the cause as a whole—especially if they make it their aim to come to a thorough understanding with the authorities in Pall Mall.

More grumbles about the late show—this time in regard to the catering arrangements. The facilities under this head were certainly defective, though it is not suggested for a moment that the firm who were responsible were in any way to blame. The trouble arose from the fact that the accommodation available is altogether insufficient. Consequently it was a case of waiting an inordinate time to get a place at a table. Nor is it easy to suggest a remedy, unless additional refreshment rooms could be built, which does not seem to be practicable. A little help, however, might possibly be afforded if pass-out checks were issued enabling visitors so disposed to go and get something outside and return again without the necessity of repaying. But probably not many would care to take the trouble to do this. Moreover, I do not know that the refreshment facilities in the neighbourhood of Olympia are very great. Still, the plan might be just worth thinking of.

Another matter which might receive a little more attention next year is the numbering of the stands. It was frequently quite a difficult job to find out the number of a given stand, and this was very exasperating when one happened to be looking for a particular exhibit. Every stand should be numbered in the plainest and most conspicuous manner. The show as a whole is quite a sufficient trial for the nerves without its worries being added to gratuitously.

Visitors also should not hold long conversations with the stand attendants on things in general when there are other people waiting to get information; and stand attendants in their turn might well be cautioned on the same point. It was no uncommon thing to see such conversations taking place while half-a-dozen people were waiting patiently, not caring to interrupt, but perhaps wishing to ascertain merely one single point, such as the price of a given car, before hurrying on elsewhere. This sort of thing is not only inconsiderate, but bad business as well, since the average man under these circumstances, after waiting a minute or so, is more likely to go off in a huff and not return to the stand again.

Another improvement would be the provision of a few officials wearing badges or a distinctive uniform for the purpose of answering questions and giving general information. It would be a great convenience. You are interested in two-stroke engines, perhaps, and want to see all that there are in the show. Unless you know the names of the particular firms exhibiting, the catalogue throws no light on the point. An official guide, properly primed beforehand as to the contents of the exhibition, would give you the information in a moment. Or perhaps your special interest is friction drive, front-wheel brakes, self-starters, or some other subject illustrated on half-a-dozen different cars. Again you would apply to your official cicerone and learn what you want.

As to diminishing the overcrowding which has been the subject of such general complaint this year, could not a little space be gained by curtailing the size of some of the exhibits? No object is really served by exhibiting such a number of cars as are shown by some firms. The show should not be turned into a show-room.

What a wonderful thing is competition! I apologise for the truism, but the remark is suggested by the great improvement which has been effected in a certain well-known accessory by the appearance on the market of a rival article claiming certain advantages. Straightway the makers of the original device set their wits to work and produced in their turn an improved article, which, it is safe to say, would never have been thought of but for the incentive supplied by the competitive stimulus—for in its original shape their invention was quite a good one, and motorists put up with its little drawback in default of anything better. Let another Richmond enter the field, however, and the makers soon devise a means of bettering matters. And so it is all round. In large things and small competition free and unrestricted is the first condition of healthy progress and development. And this is one incidental reason for resisting all restrictive proposals and tariffite nostrums.

Talking of inventions, competition, and so forth, it is worth noticing that it proves sometimes a positive disadvantage to an inventor or a maker to have been first in the field, for something newer comes along, perhaps directly based on the original, though not a legal infringement, and the public gets it into its head that being newer it is therefore better. One sees the same principle at work even in the case of cars themselves. In a vague sort of way the public gets it into its head that a car which dates back to the early days of the industry must be rather old-fashioned now. The proper assumption is all the other way, and the longer ancestry a car can boast the more it is likely to be deserving of confidence. Still the feeling undoubtedly obtains, and some of the oldest and best makers in the trade have to reckon with it.

Those delusive dots again—meaning the dots which sometimes make such a marvellous difference between the written word as it appears in the first instance and as it is reproduced in the advertisement columns. It was a quotation from the Times which was thus artistically treated in this particular case, and the contrast between the original and the reproduction with the said "judicious asterisks" (as a humorist once described them) was certainly rather amusing; but this practice is not so bad as the wholesale manufacture of bogus press opinions which has been practised before now. What passes understanding is how firms of standing can favour such petty devices.

Another recent example of advertising "slimness" that caught my eye was in one of the motoring papers last week, in an announcement to the effect that 150 cars of a certain make (this in very large type) "were not" (this in microscopic type) sold at Olympia (big type again). But this was doubtless intended as a form of humour, though a specimen of a somewhat doubtful order.

WOMAN.

LETTERS TO MY MOTHER-IN-LAW.

DEAR Mrs. P.,—It was most kind of you to send me £5 to spend on myself at the Sale of Women's Arts, Crafts, and Industries at the Portman Rooms, and Elizabeth's leather work made we wonder at this instance of heredity in the boot trade as well as in another place. At the same time, I am sure you will think that I acted wisely in saving the money for something I really wanted. I did stacks of unnecessary needlework myself before I was married—my mother thought it a much better asset for an unmarried girl than games; I never wear jewellery unless it is real and not cheap or artistic; I don't care for leather work—for myself, I mean—but I bought Elizabeth's cigar-case for James—he has so many that one more or less won't make very much difference—and I know you would have been sorry for me to waste my money on enamels when I still have a number of quite useless wedding presents to give away for Christmas.

You know we have a good deal in the way of arts and crafts in Chelsea. Quite a number of young women eke out a pittance in a bed-sitting room or drug discontent with home life by the manufacture of jewellery that nobody but a very kind-hearted person could possibly wear, or in binding books for unwilling friends who like to have a reputation for good nature. Of course, leather work is rather different, as Elizabeth can get the materials free from the Blottingham Boots, and if it makes her content to give up Newnham and settle down at home, there is no knowing where it may lead, particularly if she sticks to cigarette-cases.

At the same time, and considering his advanced views, I don't think my father-in-law should allow himself to be prejudiced all at once against the higher education of women, merely because a Nonconformist Cabinet Minister got injured in the last Suffrage scrimmage, instead of an Established Churchman. A good deal of nonsense, by the way, has been talked about Mr. Birrell's knee. What really happened was that he had his hat bashed in by a band of militants out to destroy, and in endeavouring to push his way through them, twisted his knee to which a similar accident had happened five years previously. So both the pious horror of the Antis, and the self-glorification of the Militants are based on the inventive powers of the halfpenny press. In point of fact, it is unfortunate that "perfect rest and freedom from worry" should have been prescribed for one of the gentlest and kindliest members of the Government, instead of for the two thousand clamant lords and candidates who, for the next week or so, are going to make the night resound with exposures of each other's unparalleled wickedness and incapacity. James says he can't think how it is that the British nation makes such a point of allowing, without distinction of politics or party, venal, cheese-paring, frigid, calculating, dialectical, idle, rich, foreign, gilded scoundrels to be their legislators and representatives.

The innocuous subject of "Beethoven" induced a number of conscientious mothers to test the instructive powers of "mademoiselles" by personally conducting their flappers to the Little Theatre last Thursday to hear an impassioned harangue by M. René Fauchois. And, as I like to be as much like other people as possible, I made James put on a soft pleated shirt and an emphatic black tie, and we pretended we were not married—at least, not to each other. The flappers were stage-struck with James' beautifully oiled hair, his ultra-long boots, and his waist, which M. Fauchois in his less strenuous moments might have described as "sa taille fine et souple." M. Fauchois, you know, has decided views about Racine, got into trouble about them with the students in Paris, and is very earnest about a lot of things. Mrs. Brown Potter's recitation of "The Happy Prince" was a decided relief to some of her audience. The flappers enjoyed the story, the fancy young men enjoyed Mrs. Potter's sumptuous attire, while the dowagers felt all the pleasure of something they could really understand. It is wonderful what correctives to the simplicity and straightforwardness of "The Happy Prince" are really expensive furs, a wealth of gesture, soft music, and a costly audience.

I have given up the idea of breeding Pekingese after all. There were no fewer than 164 entries at the Ladies' Kennel Association Exhibition at the Horticultural Hall, and James says that if he is expected to take an intelligent interest in the things that really matter he couldn't undertake to exercise and look after them as well. At the shows they arrive in specially constructed kennel baskets, lined with soft cushions and decorated with Imperial dragons. Several of them have hot flasks as well—a thing I want so much myself that I am going to give James one for Christmas. If the padded baskets are placed close to each other the same shrill, irate yappings emanate from them as from any of the more ordinary kinds.

The judging somewhat resembles the customs house after severe weather. The harassed owners, combing and brushing to the last moment, and attached to a pet rampant regardant, surmounted by a ribbon "or" "vert" or "gules," press upon the judge to deal with him before another pet, also rampant regardant, demolishes or is demolished by him. The same sort of thing goes on in every available corner of the hall, only in terms of Skyes, Aberdeens, Samoyedes. Apart from owners, judges, and pets, there was very little room for anything else at the Horticultural Hall, and the stationary position of such visitors as made a point of seeing the dogs was largely due to a fancy arrangement of the catalogue, which, in the impossibility of finding any particular number, was no doubt designed to give every dog an equal chance.

VERITY.

An unprecedented motor car journey in Southern Algeria has been accomplished recently on a six-cylinder NOISELESS NAPIER. The owner, Mr. Richard Hennessey, praises his six-cylinder Napier very highly. Napiers are British-built throughout.

WOMEN AND ELECTIONS.

The "political woman" has been discovered with horror during the last few years. People have been as scared as if a herd of ichthyosauria had been found roaming, alive, well, and several sizes larger than nature, over unfrequented parts of England. Dantean pictures have been painted of the future of the sex—pictures in which, with the head of a man, the heart of a rock, the appearance of a griffin, and the voice of a stentor. Woman, that awful modern monster, was to live in a purgatory called "the arena," fighting tooth and nail with men—who, by the way, were to become wild beasts, without morality, chivalry, or the merest good manners, as soon as their wives stirred more than six inches from the cradle or the kitchen range. This dreadful political bogey-woman has been dangled before our eyes, like a golliwog before a baby to make it stop crying for its dinner, till we have rather lost sight of the fact that the modern woman is a good deal less political than her ancestresses. The present cry for equality, whether right or wrong, is essentially civic and national, and only incidentally political. Women have not been really political since the decline of the salons in France, and even earlier in England. That is not to say that women do not take a very keen interest in politics at election time; but they do not sustain that eager, notable fervour at other times which turned out forces like the Duchess of Gordon and Georgiana, Duchess of Devonshire. The enormous amount of work done by women at election times and the solid value of political entertaining as managed by some of our best hostesses no one will deny; but on the whole they lend themselves to the plans of others rather than make their own.

Women are at this moment in a curious position as regards elections. The earnest-minded woman of to-day scorns to use her personal attractions as weapons, and yet when she tries to fight on an intellectual basis she has to face the opposition of the lower-class men, who regard women with a mixture of contempt and fear, and the equally strenuous disapproval of working-class women, who lead full lives and have never had time to dissent from the proposition that woman is a hard-working domestic animal.

I once suggested a Mission for Dressing Earnest Women Properly. It is badly needed among political women, and especially among those who are breaking laws to show they are capable of making them. A properly dressed woman with well-done hair, a woman obviously of self-respect, will make far more impression by her public appeal for legal rights than a feminine rag-bag, dressed in dingy tones and shapeless garments. The lovely Duchess of Devonshire floated Fox into Parliament by kissing all the greatest blackguards in the Drury Lane district. They were drastic measures, but they succeeded, and, without copying them, it would be well if the women canvassing now would remember them. Men canvassers are not ashamed to be clean and tidy and put a flower in their button-hole. It is a mystery why women suppose that the more unattractive they are the better they prove their earnestness. They should remember that if they despise beauty the world does not.

On the whole, it is curious to find how comparatively few women are actively interested in this present election. This undoubtedly is due to the fact that it falls in that season when woman is required in her own domain. She is wanted in the kitchen; she has festivities to plan, the children's holidays to prepare for, presents to buy, and extra beds to put up in every corner, if she is to be a hostess, or the clothes of the whole family to overhaul if they are to stay with relatives for Christmas. The domestic side of woman is always very prominent for six weeks before Christmas, and politics have not yet made the dreaded alterations in the sex.

Wagner said: "In history there are no more cruel phenomena than political women." Looking upon the sex as a whole, one can to-day single out but few who could be described as "cruel phenomena." There are some who are foolish, a few who are utterly repellent or ridiculous, according to one's point of view; but the really political woman, as she has been known in the past, is very rare, and is almost always content to work for her men-folk rather than to take an individual stand.

THE WHOLE DUTY OF WOMAN.

[To look pretty at all times, and to move gracefully . . . are just as much conducive to wedded bliss as is the knowledge of how to choose the best cut of beef.—Weekly paper.]

'Tis not enough, O maiden fair,
If marriage be your aim,
To choose the Sunday joint with care
And cook and carve the same;
A pretty taste in ribs of beef
Of wifely arts is not the chief.

'Tis not enough, O blushing maid
For whom the joy bells peal,
To know each quality and grade
Of mutton and of veal;
The housewife's duty scarcely stops
At braising cutlets, grilling chops.

'Tis not enough, O wife to be,
To know the ways of pork,
Nor how to judge with certainty
Potatoes with a fork.
Your happiness will soon be dashed
If built on sausages and mashed.

Ah, yes! The helpmate who succeeds
In her exacting sphere
More than mere kitchen knowledge needs,
As plainly doth appear;
Both prettiness and grace appeal
To man more than a well-served meal.

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Wednesday.—Parties social, not necessarily political, are popular occurrences. The majority of my friends seem bent on being "At Home" from 4 till 6 and inscribing the fact on pasteboard. What to wear in the character of guest exercises the mind of Joan, who still lingers by the way of London and talks mysteriously of reasons which prevent her immediate departure for the South. She owes something to her country she tells me, but she does nothing whatever towards paying it, stretching herself on the sofa most mornings, and spending her afternoons either at functions with music intervening, or in clubs with bridge as the staple food for want of conversation.

She objects to going into a hot room with a long fur coat upon her; she objects to braving the elements without a long fur coat, and she finds it difficult to leave her coat in her motor because she does not possess a motor. She desires, therefore, that I shall somehow enable her to enter a room in a graceful satin dress with a fur stole and muff, and not to freeze when she emerges under like conditions into the cold, cold streets.

"Not to be done, my dear," I decided. "You must have the fur coat and you must leave it in the hall, nothing could be simpler; and you must appear upstairs in all the glory of the satin dress of your desire, trailing its three or four inches on the ground. The satin dress may also be a velvet dress, not worn simultaneously, but alternatively, and you must have a broad fur scarf and a wide fur muff, else you cannot hope to enrol yourself upon the list of the elegant. Also you must conceal your coiffure and most of your features beneath a velvet hat trimmed with chrysanthemums or metal devices or ostrich feathers or a double row of fur wound round its soft high crown."

The fur scarf and the large muff and the long frock are essential ingredients to the confection which shall be worthy of making its appearance in the world where one dresses one's self. The slight drawback of impecuniosity which might prevent the general multitude from obtaining the huge muff and stole and fur coat is not to be considered, for should Russian sable, or ermine, or chinchilla not be available, then there is skunk as prime favourite, and we have an acceptable imitation skunk born of a dyed opossum, while musquash looks as well as seal, and coney seal, if chosen with infinite care and treated with the utmost deference, may pass muster in a half-lighted room on a wholly dark afternoon. The shape of the long fur coat mainly matters. Coney seal lined with rose pink satin may, under sympathetic circumstances, be quite a success crowned with a mulberry velvet hat lined with pale pink with shaded roses round the low crown. Worn with a mulberry velveteen dress with some many coloured embroideries about the corsage, its due reward of praise for a well-spent thirty pounds will be ungrudgingly bestowed by a discriminating company.

Joan left to think it over and to wonder whether her non-attendance at afternoon parties and her withdrawal from the political arena could be relied upon to alter the fate, or to eclipse the gaiety of nations.

After she had departed I was visited by Marjorie on her way to see Mrs. J. E. Panton, a course offering considerable charm not to be resisted. I decided not to allow her to pursue it alone. Mrs. Panton always looks like some dainty French marquise, with her white pompadour hair and her little jewelled hands and her gracious manners, while she has a store of humorous anecdotes of her contemporary great which make her a delightful companion. Added to these virtues her crumpets are served hotter than most folks, and she never fails to be supplied with the currant bread of my special fancy. She is writing another book, which she entirely refused to discuss, turning my impertinent queries into talk of life in the country and the habits and customs of birds in whose daily needs she is specially interested at the moment, supplying them with baths and food, and combining her philanthropy with a knowledge which impressed me tremendously. She is quite a dear, and with her soft black garb she bears becomingly an air of keen interest in the words of others, a virtue much out of date.

Friday.—I sat at home all the morning looking at the fire and achieving some embroidery which shall decorate a jibbeh for my dearest friend's dearest baby, and in the evening went to supper with the G.'s, who have just moved into a new flat. It was a celebration party, and we all admired the white blotting-paper walls and the rose-pink hangings of taffeta edged with fringe, and the needlework pictures and the genuine old prints, few and far between, and, above all, the rose-coloured satin frock of our pretty hostess, who dimpled with joy at our appreciation of her attractive surroundings.

The most successful frock in the room showed an odd combination of apple-green satin foundation with hyacinth-blue chiffon tunic glistening with shaded bugles.

We had an excellent supper, grape fruit with just enough maraschino, lobster with irreproachable mayonnaise, pheasants of the right age and with the right accompaniments, frozen cream served with a very hot chocolate sauce, a savoury of smoked tongue, and cheese whose charms will dwell long in my grateful memory, together with the fact that no one present played any musical instrument.

After eating we sat at a large round table, and I was once again lured into the clutches of the jig-saw puzzle, and now my Christmas shopping will be inconveniently belated, my enthusiasm for canvassing will wane, while I struggle to find the punishment to fit the crime, and idle away the hours in a foolish endeavour to make a picture whose interest must fade into oblivion at its achievement. Copies of the works of the Post-Impressionists might well be adapted to this pastime; will the authorities of the Grafton Galleries please note.

Saturday.—Virginia arrived in all the glory of her best grey velvet and sable on her homeward way from Lady Mary Pepys' wedding at the Brompton Oratory. She said the bride had looked charming in soft ivory satin, with much old lace draped about the bodice and skirt, a trail of orange-blossom doing its decorative duty at one side, vest and sleeves of tulle dotted with tiny crystals, and the train of chiffon and lace bearing satin lilies and diamond stamens, while a veil of old lace and a wreath of orange blossom most admirably became Lady Mary's pretty auburn hair. The elder bridesmaids were also in white with large sashes of blue chiffon and satin hats lined with blue and trimmed with white lancer plumes and tied with pale blue under the chins. The little girls followed faithfully Romney pictures, and had close lace bonnets adorned with pink roses and shamrock.

Virginia seemed to have thoroughly enjoyed herself, reported the general company as patrons of uniform costumes of velvet and fur, and then voiced her private grievance of being obliged to hurry home and assist in putting Nita to bed to commence a rest cure ordered by her best medico.

Virginia is a persistent optimist who objects to face any definite troubles; she doubts all illness other than her own, and summarily dismisses every case of nerves as "not proven" or "merely bad temper." She was convinced there is nothing the matter with Nita, and then proceeded to tell me her various symptoms of restlessness and irritability, and perpetual fatigue. In one breath she grumbled at the establishment of nursing homes and the fashion set by the Royal Family in patronising them, and she deplored the energy needed to ensure complete quiet in a private house. And then reflectively she wondered why nurses recommended by doctors are invariably prettier than those who come from registered associations?

A month's bed unracked by pain and well outside the radius of Christmas bills sounds like a programme of considerable inducement, the addition of luxurious feeding, a decorative nurse, mountains of flowers, and an occasional letter of love and comfort from the one person, fill a vista full of advantages. Nita may be envied, always supposing she possess enough nightgowns of superior quality to gratify her personal taste.

And as she is debarred from reading, she may escape the statistics of the political situation, and even contentedly enjoy home rule. She cannot hope, however, to be the heroine of such an illuminating bulletin as that so lately appearing in the press—"Temperature 104; fever indicated."

Mrs. A.'s Letter-Box.

I have been persuaded to counsel through these columns all wise women who send me their dress difficulties to solve. But their inquiries must be clearly addressed to Mrs. A., "Truth" Office, Carteret Street, S.W.

Glixl.—I like the black and gold best. A lining that I have used and found most comfortable is velvet—old gold coloured velvet would be nice for you. The width of the tie must really depend upon how high your neck is; I like them as deep as they can be worn comfortably. You might put a little domette between the brocade and the lining, and I don't really think the metal lace would be necessary, because the brocade is so very decorative. I saw a necktie the other day about 6 ins. longer each side than the neck, measuring about 30 ins. altogether. The flower which held the ends was a gold tinsel rose, and the effect was further enhanced by a hat with a black and gold brocaded crown, with a border of fur, with a gold rose at one side.

Maysil.—I prefer the silk-embroidered Japanese kimono to any other bed-room wrapper, and they are quite warm; £5 5s. would secure a superior specimen.

Jean.—I remember you quite well; satin petticoats for 15s. 9d. are to be found in every colour at Debenham and Freebody's, Wigmore Street. I'll answer the other query next week when I have investigated further.

Mrs. D (Chelsea).—I hope you will recognise that this reply is meant for you. The Parisian Hat Company, 67, Knightsbridge, will make you for 30s. a plain satin hat lined with velvet and the crown banded with tapestry galore; but for the moment I would rather suggest a band of fur fastened at one side with a fanciful metal device.

AMONG THE NOVELISTS.

Mr. James Prior again strikes the Borrovian note in his "Fortuna Chance" (Constable, 6s.). Miss Chance, in the uncertainty of being mistress, is converted by the wits into mischance. Written at the time of the Young Pretender, there is very little pretender in "Fortuna Chance," but rather an intimate knowledge of English rural life, its laws, magistrates, and the customs of the period. Young Roland has been brought up by his mother in the forest of Sherwood a good Catholic, a Jacobite, and a very pleasant young man. He mingles with keepers, Methodists, gipsies, villagers, while Fortuna sits at home attended by her waiting woman, the redoubtable Press. How Roland was very nearly hanged for murder and high treason, how Fortuna Chance became Mistress Bond, and how Alfa came into her own, are elements of one of the most delightful stories I have read.

When a letter is delivered at the wrong destination, thereby inducing a poor brother and sister to represent their rich cousin as M.F.H. and Whip, respectively, you may make up your mind from the outset to swallow a good many impossible situations. Allowing for this, however, "Two Impostors and Tinker" (Hutchinson, 6s.) is a merry little story to which Miss Dorothea Conyers lends racy humour and considerable ingenuity. Derrick becomes deeply interested in Grania, who has a wicked old father; Hume has the life worried out of him by Josephine in her capacity of Jo. Finally, after numerous misfortunes, the cousin turns up, £60,000 drops from the skies in a fashion only possible in novels, and the story ends happily for every one, including the reader.

A staid young schoolmaster upon whom is unexpectedly foisted an ingenuous young maid is in a somewhat ambiguous position. Add to this a chief villain in the person of Miss Foster, the housekeeper, and you

Sykes-Josephine's "Haute Nouveauté" Corsets are ideal; being built on anatomical principles an elegant and graceful contour is created. will see that after various misnuderstandings there will be a marriage somewhere near the end of "Master and Maid" (Murray, 6s.), by Mrs. Allen Harker. Lallie is Irish, boyish, and high-spirited. She turns the heads of all the big boys, has bouts with Miss Foster, goes to stay away at a country house until Tony wonders how he can stand her absence much longer, and finally gives him a helping hand towards the proposal he doesn't venture to make. The story is pretty but rather slight, and not quite up to the usual level of Mrs. Harker's work.

"A King's Masquerade" (Greening, 6s.) has, I am glad to say, nothing to do with Cavaliers, Pretenders, or Queen Elizabeth, but breaks new ground in the person of King James V. of Scotland. King James is bent on suppressing free-booting, but in the intervals of business, masquerades the country as a pedlar. He goes to Braetoun Castle, the abode of Roger Armstrong, where he finds a fair maid in distress at the imprisonment of her lover by her father, who wishes her to marry some one else. Miss May Wynne tells her story with brightness and with wit. The incidents are well arranged, and have none of the heaviness of the average historical novel.

The skilful telling of "A Knight of Poland" (Smith, Elder, 6s.), by Miss M. E. Carr, is somewhat marred by the diffuseness of the plot. Valentine Luttrell, or Count Trawinski, has been brought up by his grandmother under his mother's name to ignore everything connected with his foreign father. When he is at Oxford Father Clement inspires him to take up the cause of his country against Russia, and from this point the story becomes vague and incoherent. His marriage with Anastasie, the discovery that her husband is still alive, Valentine's banishment, his escape, and discovery of his wife's death, his departure with his son for America carry the reader along too quickly for his interest to concentrate upon any one of the characters.

UPSTAIRS AND DOWNSTAIRS.

Voltaire said: "S'occuper, c'est savoir jouïr." If this is the case with normal people, it hardly needs a thought to see how infinitely more so it is with blind people, who are shut in with their own darkness unless they are given resources. The West London Workshops for the Blind turn numbers of helpless creatures into self-respecting, self-dependent, interested, useful workers. Their work is shown at 60, High Street, Notting Hill Gate, and rangers from the butler's pantry to the attic. It includes chopped firewood, and well-woven mats, cages, and all other sorts of basket-work, brushes of every household sort, canework, turnery, and knitting. The articles are strong, well-finished, ingenious, and not at all expensive. Repairs are undertaken. Last year the present King and Queen paid a surprise visit to the shop and workrooms, and bought very largely. A Christmas sale is now being held, and orders for work will much help the institution, which is on the telephone.

The servant problem has been solved very largely for big households by the invention of patent labour-saving devices, by the employment of a large staff, so that hours are easier, and by a definite organisation in the kitchen kingdom. These are just the ways in which the small householder cannot afford to alleviate his wife's task. In these days of professional women the difficulties of running a house are heavily felt. Some difficulties are removed by the scheme laid down by the Brent Garden Village at Finchley. The householders unite to support a central staff of servants, who look after all the houses. The children are cared for at a model nursery. Here is an end to household drudgery and bad service. Such a plan could be copied in every district with very great advantage to hundreds of worn women.

The N.S.P.C.C. issues an earnest pamphlet by Mr. Robert J. Parr, called "Flame and Flannelette," a director of the Society. Any lady interested in the welfare of children would be doing well by distributing this threepenny warning among poor mothers in her district. It points out the frequency with which children are killed, or maimed for life, by the carelessness of working-class mothers, who leave them alone with an open fire, or matches within their reach, and, above all, it shows the dangers of clothing children in flannelette. The mothers naturally ask what they are to do when flannel is so much dearer. Mr. Parr would have done well to show how little extra warmth there is in flannelette compared with more closely woven material. Perhaps, when the great north lands of Australia are opened up, wool will be cheaper. In the meantime much can be done to avert a particularly dreadful form of infant mortality.

In these days when so many people eschew a flesh diet, a really tasty vegetarian dish is an undoubted desideratum, and the following recipes can be strongly recommended:—

Pain d'Epinard à la Crême.—Thoroughly wash and boil about 2 lbs. of spinach, run it through cold water, and squeeze it quite dry in a cloth, rub the spinach through a wire sieve, and then work the purée in a stewpan with 2 ozs. of butter, two tablespoonfuls of very good white sauce, salt and pepper to taste, cover the stewpan and allow the spinach to mellow on the side of the stove for ten minutes, after which, mix in two whole eggs and two yolks. Steam it for three-quarters of an hour in a charlotte mould previously buttered and decorated with round pieces of hard-boiled white of egg. Serve with a creamy sauce poured round and garnish with small round fried croûtes of bread.

Spaghetti and Tomato Pie.—Twist the ends of 4 ozs. of spaghetti in a saucepan of boiling water. They will quickly soften. Then boil it for twenty minutes and strain. Mix a gill of reduced tomato purée with 2 ozs. of breadcrumbs, a gill of good butter sauce, the yolks of two eggs, and salt and pepper to season. Butter a fireproof dish, put a layer of the spaghetti at the bottom, which sprinkle rather thickly with grated parmesan cheese; then a layer of the tomato; repeat the layers of tomato and spaghetti and cheese. Finally, mix an ounce of grated cheese with a little cream, pour it on the top, and bake it about ten minutes a nice golden colour. Or it may be covered with puff pastry and baked.

THE DANGER OF NEGLECTED ILL-HEALTH.

MR. SANDOW'S IMPORTANT OFFER.

MUCH that has proved of the greatest value to the public from the health point of view has been published in connection with Mr. Eugen Sandow and the work of his Institute for the cure of illness without medicine, and the health message which is conveyed on this page to-day deals with one of the most important health questions in relation to individual sufferers—i.e., the peril of procrastination.

A WEEK'S HEALTH CHART of the average man or woman who does not enjoy perfect health on any day during the week. The health line of a person perfectly well should run in a straight line in the top section, a condition which can be secured by taking the Sandow Treatment.

The most dangerous thing any man or woman can do is to neglect even the slightest symptom of ill-health, treating it as a matter which if left will cure itself and pass away. It is by this negligence that chronic illness is deliberately invited and the seeds of incurable disease are sown. No symptom of indisposition is too trifling to merit immediate attention.

Statistics prove it beyond doubt. Our vital statistics show that the yearly mortality from curable complaints—the so-called minor illnesses—is far greater than the mortality from incurable diseases.

There are always 20,000,000 ailing people in the United Kingdom alone. They suffer needlessly, because their complaints are curable; and the ranks of the incurables are daily augmented because the sufferers neglected to seek a cure when it was easy to effect, when the condition was no worse than may be described as "not up to the mark."

Whilst the Sandow treatment is in no sense a cure-all, there is no doubt that in particular it will be found a great boon to all those who suffer from complaints which are nowadays so difficult to avoid and yet so hard to cure when once contracted.

Weak hearts, weak backs, curved spines, obesity, uric acid complications, indigestion, constipation, nervous disorders, weak chests, and other physical deficiencies, indeed too many illnesses to name here, can be remedied by scientific exercises.

Although you are ill and ailing now you can be made as strong and vigorous as the healthiest man or woman alive. What has been done for others in the restoration of health can be done for you. Upon this point you have this to carry conviction. The Sandow System of Scientific Exercise cures 94 in every 100 cases treated and gives substantial relief in 99 out of every 100 cases.

Surely the treatment which records so high a percentage of successful results is worthy of investigation by every man or woman in ill-health, particularly as there is no charge for making inquiry and because the cost of the treatment is so moderate as to be within the means of all.

A full explanation of the application of scientific exercise to the various forms of illnesses in which it has proved so highly beneficial is given in the health books referred to below, and it is made clear how and why the treatment can with the greatest benefit be taken by sufferers of all ages and either sex at small cost.

All whose health leaves room for improvement are invited to call and talk their case over, or write, mentioning Truth, to Mr. Sandow, at his institute, 32, St. James' Street, Piccadilly, London, S.W., asking for a gratis copy of the book in his illustrated Health Library, the titles of which are:

1. Indigestion and Dyspepsia.
2. Constipation and its Cure.

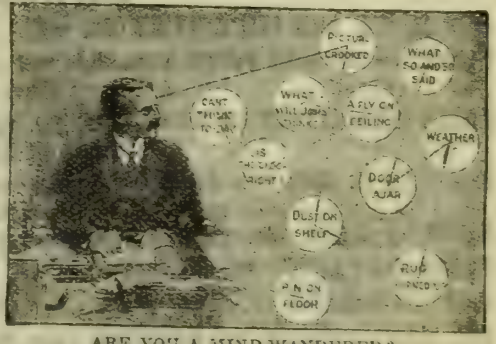
THE ROAD TO NERVOUS COLLAPSE. The different effects of neglected nervous disorders in either man or woman depicted stage by stage until the final result is reached. Any of the volumes mentioned on this page which deal with nervous disorders will show how they may be prevented and cured by Sandow's Scientific Exercise.

Those who also send particulars of age, occupation, illness from which relief is required, etc., will receive a personal opinion upon the suitability of their cases for treatment by this method.

There will be no charge whatever made to readers of Truth for either the booklet or opinion nor any obligation to adopt the advice given.



ARE YOU A MIND-WANDERER? This chart depicts the unfortunate condition of the man or woman who suffers from brain fag, and is unable to concentrate thought upon the matter of immediate importance. It is a condition arising from several causes, as is explained in the books referred to above, from which sufferers are invited to choose the book which deals with their particular illness.

"The true University of these days is a collection of books."—CARLYLE.

28 years since the last entirely new edition.

Hitherto, new editions of the Encyclopaedia Britannica have appeared at intervals, on an average, of 14 years. The first seven editions (1768-1830) were separated from one another by periods of 11 or 12 years; but, as the labour and cost of preparation increased, with the vast multiplication of special studies, the intervals grew longer. Twenty-one years separated the 7th edition (1830-42) from the 8th (1853-60), 25 years the 8th from the 9th (1875-89). If 1882 be taken as the mean date of the 9th edition, it will be seen that 28 years separate it from the new edition which has just been completed.

The 9th and 10th editions.

The lapse, on this occasion, of so long a period is due to the extension of life afforded to the 9th edition by the Times, which, in 1902, issued a supplement sufficiently important to entitle the enlarged work to the description of the 10th edition. A large number of copies had been sold of the 9th edition, which contained articles of great distinction. Such an extension of life, therefore, seemed doubly desirable. Important as were the additions thus made, the issue of supplementary volumes was recognised to be but a temporary measure. When the first volume of the 9th edition appeared (1875), a German Empire under the hegemony of Prussia, a united Italy with its capital in Rome, a Japanese Empire centralised under the sovereignty of the Mikado, were institutions only four years old. The first 12 volumes had appeared by 1881. The British occupation of Egypt had not begun; the subject of bacteriology had not sufficiently advanced to be referred to in the book; gold had not yet been discovered in the Transvaal; no public electric supply station had yet been built in London. The series of 24 volumes was completed by 1889. The Trans-Siberian Railway had not been begun; of the first-class battleships and cruisers constructed at the time when the article "Ship" was written, none are now in commission, save for instructional purposes. Some years were still to pass before the discovery of X Rays, before the appearance of motor-cars, electric traction, steam turbines.

It was evident that, while additional volumes might make good many omissions created by the lapse of time, the edition 1875-89, thus supplemented after an interval of twenty years, could not claim the normal duration of a new edition. No such process of "bringing up to date," nor any subsequent merging of the supplementary articles with those in the 9th edition, could thoroughly renew a book of which the contents were already beginning to reflect the point of view of a past generation. An entirely new edition—one founded, that is to say, upon a fresh survey of the world—was evidently needed, and the year 1910 was mentioned as a probable date for its appearance.

The "Times" reprint of the 9th edition.

The Encyclopaedia Britannica, in point of publication, has passed through several stages. The first period ended in 1812, when the executors of Andrew Bell, who had played a leading part in the publication of the first four editions, brought the property into the market. Constable purchased the copyright, and under his princely direction the work gained enormously in reputation, from the distinction of the great writers whom he enlisted in its service. When Constable's house stopped payment in 1826, the property passed to Adam Black, under whose charge the issue of the 7th, 8th, and 9th editions consolidated the supreme position of the book. Meanwhile, with the rapid advance of knowledge and the multiplication of special studies, the cost of preparation had risen to a disquieting figure. Indeed, when plans for the making of a 9th edition were put forward, Adam Black, hesitating to countenance the necessary expenditure, dissociated himself from the enterprise of his firm. The 9th edition cost £100,000 to produce, and he would have been a bold publisher who had ventured upon the even greater expense of preparing a new edition on a corresponding scale, had not the Times, in offering a reprint for sale at a greatly reduced price, and upon easy terms, revealed the great popularity which awaited the book in all parts of the English-speaking world.

The new and improved edition.

Now, the Encyclopaedia Britannica enters upon another period of its history with the issue of a new edition which is worthy to supersede the 9th. The most devoted admirer of that edition will have no cause to regret that the lapse of years has rendered its contents inadequate and misleading. If in the distinction of individual contributors the 9th edition set a standard not to be surpassed, the new edition, in keeping pace with the increase of special studies during the past thirty years, may claim to have brought to a fuller development the principle of resorting for articles to original authorities. In its more exhaustive treatment, in the better distribution of its information, and in its interior organisation generally, the new edition marks a great advance, due to the simultaneous production of the entire work from beginning to end. If the cost of producing the 9th edition has been more than doubled in the present case, so also has the utility of the book and the amount of information afforded in its pages. An improvement, of which the importance could hardly be overestimated, has taken place also in the material production of the work. The bulk and weight of its volumes have hitherto afforded real ground of complaint against the Encyclopaedia Britannica. The new edition consists of 28 volumes and an index volume, each measuring only an inch thick and weighing but 3 lb.; yet together they contain (in type of the same size) over 2 million words more than did the 35 volumes of the 10th edition, each of which was 2½ inches thick and weighed nearly 7 lb.

The Cambridge University Press.

The sale of the reprinted 9th edition by the Times constitutes, then, a notable chapter in the history of the Encyclopaedia Britannica, for at one stroke it revealed the popularity of the work and assured its continuance upon the same high level of scholarship. Circumstances, meanwhile, were combining to bring about still another change of control. Only a great newspaper could have accomplished what stands to the credit of the Times; but a newspaper office is no abiding place for such a publication, and a permanent establishment, in keeping with its character as a public institution, and as far removed as possible from the vicissitudes of a purely commercial enterprise, was felt to be the desideratum in connection with the Encyclopaedia Britannica. It is, indeed, to a university that such a book recommends itself as a proper charge, whether regard be had to the learning which goes to its preparation, or to the purpose which it serves as an instrument of instruction. As the product of the scientific spirit at work in every department of knowledge, the Encyclopaedia Britannica comes with a certain propriety into the keeping of the University of Cambridge.

Bentley, in 1693, said of the Cambridge University Press that "the advancement of learning" must ever be its object. In the results of original research which go to the making of the new Encyclopaedia Britannica, learning is indeed advanced, though over a larger field than Bentley contemplated when he used the word "learning." But the universities themselves, old and new, no longer limit their scholarship to the humanities and the pursuit of pure science, and hesitation might well be felt in excluding from the scope of the word "learning" to-day even the most practical among the activities which the new edition includes in its survey. And the new Encyclopaedia Britannica is calculated also to advance learning in another sense of the word "advance." Research, and the training of generations to prosecute research, are not the only duties of a university, which is the centre, also, for the diffusion of the learning it fosters. Nothing is more remarkable in the recent history of the ancient universities than the evidence afforded—for instance, in the establishment of the University Extension Lectures—of their desire to enlarge the sphere within which this diffusion may take place.

The Encyclopaedia Britannica offers itself as a powerful instrument to this end, and now, in its new form, goes forth from Cambridge to meet a popularity, not only deserved and expected, but proven and assured.

A newspaper announcement is no place in which to attempt any comprehensive description of so important a publication as a new edition of the Encyclopaedia Britannica. It must suffice to touch upon certain points as to which the interested reader may require information, and for the rest to refer him to the prospectus and specimen pages.

It should be noted that the prices and terms shown on the form of application sent with the prospectus refer only to subscribers who apply for copies, now, in advance of publication. Such advance applicants will be able (without any payment until the volumes are delivered) to secure the new work at the rate of 15/10 a volume instead of 30/-, which was the original published price of the 9th edition, and is intended to be the ultimate price of the present edition. Payment, after delivery of the volumes, will be accepted in monthly instalments of 21/-, or the cash price, at an increase of only a few shillings, may be paid over a period of 4, 8 or 12 months. Prospectus and particulars should be asked for at once. Please write name and address below, tear off this corner, and post to

History of Ireland
From the Earliest Times to the Present Day.

¶ This is THE book for those who desire to read up the Irish Question.

Irish history has for the most part been written under the influence of furious partisanship. The Rev. Dr. D'Alton, the author of the above new History, has approached his task in a different spirit. He has stated that in writing this History he has "no thesis to prove, no party to defend or attack."

The work is equipped with fifty-four plates, of which six are in colour: the rest are duotones (plates having the character of photogravures). There are, in addition, a number of coloured maps and a series of battle-plans.

Printed from clearly-cut type, on good paper, the work is bound in an artistic green cloth cover with gilt top.

CHARITY ORGANISATION SOCIETY,
DENISON HOUSE, VAUXHALL BRIDGE ROAD, S.W.
The Main Object of the Charity Organisation Society is the Improvement in the Condition of the Poor.
This it endeavours to attain:—
1. By bringing about co-operation between the Charities and the Poor Law, and between charitable persons and agencies of all religious denominations amongst themselves.
2. By spreading sound views on charitable work, and creating a class of almoners to carry them out.
3. By securing due investigation and fitting action in all cases.
4. By repressing mendicity.

A Prospectus has been filed with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, which states amongst other things as follows:—The whole of the purchase consideration for the properties and rights excluding machinery is payable in Shares. The SUBSCRIPTION LIST will OPEN on WEDNESDAY, the 30th day of November, 1910, and CLOSE on or before FRIDAY, the 2nd day of December, 1910. By the production of payable oil a new home industry will be created in Hungary, with its population of about 20,000,000, by the systematic production of crude oil. The imports of mineral oil for the four years 1906-1909 amounted to a total value of £2,817,197 (vide Diplomatic and Consular Reports Annual Series). This Company should be in a position to offer substantial advantages to the Hungarian home market.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed to continue the exploitation development and working of an extensive Oil Territory situated in the Upper Iza Valley in the Carpathian Mountains Hungary comprising an area of about 30 square miles and for the other objects set out in the Memorandum of Association.

SITUATION.

The Upper Iza Valley Oilfield lies on the southern slope of the Carpathians to the south-east of Maramaros Sziget Railway Station. The anticlinal runs approximately in a north-westerly and south-easterly direction through this field which is situate between the Oilfields of Galicia to the north-west and Roumania to the south-east.

HUNGARIAN COMPANY.

In compliance with the requirements of the Hungarian laws a Company has been incorporated in that Kingdom under the name of Magyar Kárpáti Petroleum Reszvenytarsaság of which Baron Sigmund Perényi Lord-Lieutenant of the County of Maramaros Hungary is President and two of the members of the Board of this Company are Directors. For the purpose of acquiring the legal title to the leases and rights of the Upper Iza Valley Oilfield these leases and rights have been transferred to that Company. All the shares in that Company will be held by this Company.

PROPERTY.

This Company will therefore control all the rights and privileges existing in respect of—

(a) The Mining Lease granted by the Hungarian Government rent free of the Karoly Maria Mining Field covering 215,528 square yards.

(b) One hundred and eighty-five mining rights (Freischurfe) granted by the Mining Department of the Government. These are held in perpetuity subject to the payment of Royalties to the former owners and the Government Taxes and compliance with the Laws of Hungary. (The mining lease (a) and the rights (b) cover the whole of the Upper Iza Valley Oilfield.)

(c) The complete drilling outfit of two wells now being bored including derricks engines boilers and also repair and blacksmith shops store houses with the casing and other machinery and effects on the property.

ROYALTIES.

There are no royalties payable to the Government. In respect of the lease (a) and 100 of the rights (b) there is a 12 per cent. royalty payable to former owners which can be commuted by the Company issuing about 2,400 fully paid shares. In respect of the said 100 of the rights (b) and 38 of the 85 remaining rights (b) there is also a 5 per cent. royalty payable to former owners reducible to 3 per cent. after a certain amount has been paid in respect of such 5 per cent. In respect of 85 of the rights (b) royalties amounting to 12 per cent. are at present payable to former owners and as to 47 of these the Company has the option extending over a period of several years of reducing the royalty of 12 per cent to 6 per cent. on terms which are considered favourable to this Company. No other royalties are payable in respect of any portion of the property. The charges payable to the Record Office of the Mining Department amount to a total sum of £74 per annum.

REPORTS.

The Territory has been inspected and reported upon by Professor Zuber the eminent Petroleum Geologist of the University of Lemberg Galicia and Mr. J. Macdonald Cameron Fellnst.Chem. F.G.S. F.C.S. a Director of the Tarakan Petroleum Company of Amsterdam and the Technical Adviser of this Company.

IZASZACSAL.

Professor Zuber in his report dated April 14th 1910 states :—

"This is undoubtedly the best opened and the most promising petroleum district of the Hungarian Carpathian Mountains according to the news received hitherto.

"On the point of the geological formation of this district I am convinced of the complete accuracy of Bockh's statement. The oil-containing formation which is here strongly developed consists of alternate layers of grey sandstone partly soft and partly hard and of grey clayey and marly slate stone.

"These layers form approximately an anticlinal passing almost through the centre of the village" (of Szacsal) "in an almost east-westerly direction and which dips at a very flat angle and slowly westward and seems to rise a little eastwards and was found to be oil-containing throughout its extent on the northern as well as on the southern side. . . .

"The bore hole No. 1 (No 1 Well) in Szacsal on the left bank of the Iza was very well situated probably quite close to the Saddle Ridge and reached a depth of 481 metres giving a strong outburst of oil and gas. . . .

"Bore hole 2 (No. 2 Well) on the right bank of the Iza is also in a favourable position but already more on the north side of the Saddle Ridge and had therefore to reach the same oil horizons somewhat deeper than No. 1 Well. It is said to have reached a depth of 670 metres where it was spiled at five inches in diameter. It produces in spite of the partial obstruction rather constantly a good deal of paraffin containing raw oil and a great deal of oil gases. . . .

"The bore hole 'A' (No. 3 Well) eastward of Szacsal which is also worked on the north side of the same saddle exhibits already very good indications of oil and should give good results if made a little deeper. . . ."

Professor Zuber subsequently made a further inspection accompanied by Mr. Thos. J. Ive and Colonel Massy (two of the Directors of this Company) and under date of 28th September 1910 he wrote :—

"I can only confirm my former report dated 14th April 1910 . . . . . "

In referring to the Izaszacsal part of the property he states:—

". . . . . It gives a total area about 6,000 metres in length and 1,000 metres in width or of 6,000,000 square metres or 600 hectares (nearly 1,500 acres 1 acre being equal to 4046.7 square metres) which can be covered with productive wells when the first drillings are successful."

". . . . . It can be considered now as proved that there exists a broad and flat anticlinal running in an almost east-westerly direction along the Iza Valley, and that the top of this anticlinal is situated almost exactly in the point where the ancient" (i.e. odd) "well No. 1 was placed. Therefore this part of the territory is the best for placing a new drilling and really we determined there on the spot the point where the next well should be drilled with the best chances to strike oil in relatively small depth (about 400-500 metres) . . . . ."

Mr. J. Macdonald Cameron (the pioneer of the highly successful Tarakan Oilfield of Dutch North Borneo) a copy of whose report dated August 17th 1910 is enclosed with the prospectus states :—

". . . . . I may mention here that it gives me great pleasure to be able to confirm Professor Zuber's report. . . . .

"I may remark that the future prospects in the Iza Valley are very much more encouraging than they were on the Island of Tarakan when I undertook the exploitation of that Field from which there is now being shipped from 18,000 to 20,000 tons of crude Petroleum per month. . . . . On the whole all the oil indications on the territory are exceedingly favourable and the prospects highly encouraging."

QUALITY OF OIL.

Samples of the oil taken from the field by Mr. Macdonald Cameron were submitted for analysis to Sir Boverton Redwood whose report dated August 13th 1910 affords conclusive evidence of their satisfactory quality. The sample from Well No. 3 (Well "A") was found to yield 3.6 per cent. of benzine 33.3 per cent. of kerosene and 57.7 per cent. of intermediate and lubricating oils with solid hydrocarbons (paraffin) whilst the sample from the deeper Well No. 2 gave no less than 15.7 per cent. of benzine with a boiling point ranging from 75 deg. to 150 deg. C. in addition to the other usual commercial products. It is obvious that from such a source a large yield of excellent oil fuel could be obtained.

DEVELOPMENT.

When the favourable situation of Hungary in the centre of Europe is considered there can be no hesitation in arriving at the conclusion that the development of this large Oilfield should make it one of the most profitable in the world.

This Company has the advantage of taking over the Oilfield in course of active development the work being carried on under the direct supervision of Professor Zuber and Mr. J. Macdonald Cameron drilling operations being energetically prosecuted under modern methods.

No. 1 Well (being that referred to by Professor Zuber in his report as having given a strong outburst of oil and gas) is almost on the back of the saddle of the anticlinal and is therefore exceptionally well situated. A new well is now being bored close to this old one in accordance with Professor Zuber's advice as he anticipates that oil should be struck at the relatively small depth of about 400-500 metres (vide Report).

No. 2 Well is already bored to a depth of 670 metres and oil has been reached which Professor Zuber pronounced to be excellent and of light paraffin quality with strong gases similar to that of Tustanovitz Galicia. The boring of this well is also being continued.

No. 3 Well has reached a depth of 88 metres and oil has begun to come in. This well according to the Expert's reports is favourably situated and drilling is being continued.

On the Karoly Maria Mining Field there is a well (94 metres deep) which is hand pumped still yielding oil used locally for fuel and lubricating purposes. Deep drilling in the vicinity is in contemplation.

At Dragomerfalva a 6-foot square shaft is down to a depth of about 12 metres. It shows oil. There are other shallow hand-dug wells on the Dragomerfalva section showing good oil indications.

WORKING CAPITAL.

The whole of the proceeds of the present issue will be available for Working Capital and the general purposes of the Company subject only to the payment of the preliminary expenses and the sum of £2,500 for the machinery and plant already on the property which is of considerably higher value. Further working capital will be available as and when further shares are issued. As this valuable machinery and plant is being purchased and portions of the work which the experts consider necessary are well advanced and this is a Parent Company the working capital is considered ample.

Application for shares should be made on the form accompanying the Prospectus and sent to the Company's Bankers with a remittance for the amount of the deposit. Wher no allotment is made the deposit will be returned in full and where the number of shares allotted is less than the amount applied for the balance of the deposit will be applied towards the amount due on allotment and any balance remaining will be returned. Failure to pay any instalment on the shares allotted when due will render previous payments liable to forfeiture.

Prospectuses and Forms of Application for shares can be obtained from the Company's Bankers and Brokers and at the Offices of the Company.

ABRIDGED PROSPECTUS.

This Company has been formed for the objects mentioned in its Memorandum of Association, and particularly for the purpose of acquiring an important Concession granted for 25 years from 20th June, 1907 (old style), subject to certain conditions therein set forth by Special Acts of the Parliament (Skupshtina) of the Kingdom of Servia, duly ratified and confirmed by the King of Servia and his Ministers of State, on the 20th of June, 1907, and the 25th February, 1910 (old style).

By the terms of this Concession the Company is expressly authorised to establish in the Kingdom of Servia:—

(a) A modern slaughter-house and an ice manufactory with all accessory buildings for slaughtering, smoke-drying, and preserving meat for export; in this slaughter-house will be slaughtered swine, oxen, sheep, and poultry.

(b) A manufactory to produce preserves of meat, fish, fruit, vegetables, and fruit juice in boxes, pots, and glasses for export.

(c) Manufactories for melting fat and for producing soap, candles of stearine and paraffin, glycerine, heavy oils and margarine for export; and for the above manufactures the bye-products won in the slaughter-house will be used.

(d) A corn mill exclusively for the use of this undertaking.

The Concession further confers (inter alia) the following benefits and privileges:—

Exemption from payment of Customs Duty on all imported materials necessary for the establishment and working of the manufactory and its appurtenances.

Exemption from all State, Parochial, or Communal Taxes, and from Export Duties.

A reduction of 50 per cent. on the cost of salt (a Government monopoly).

A reduction of 25 per cent. on the rates of the Servian State Railways for the transport of all materials used, or goods exported, with a proviso that the freight charges shall not thereby be reduced below the working expenses of the railway.

The right to take, free of charge, for construction purposes, stone, sand and gravel from land belonging to the State, and wood from the State forests.

Under the provisions of the Concession a deposit of 50,000 dinars (£2,000) has been made and is included in the purchase consideration, and will in due course be returned to the Company.

In the Concession power is given to the Company, in order to effectually control and further develop the work of each of its establishments, to divide the enterprise into separate independent departments each with its own working capital. It is intended that the various branches embraced in the Concession shall eventually be undertaken by separate subsidiary companies in which this Company will hold a large interest.

For contracts see full prospectus.

The minimum subscription on which the Directors may proceed to allotment is fixed at 5,000 Preference Shares, but 25,000 Preference Shares have been underwritten.

The Company will pay a brokerage of 6d. per Share on all Shares allotted (otherwise than in respect of underwriting) on applications bearing a broker's or other authorised agent's stamp.

An official settlement in these Shares on the London Stock Exchange will be applied for in due course.

Applications for Shares must be made upon the terms of the Full Prospectus, which with Forms of Application can be obtained at the Offices of the Company, or from the Bankers or Brokers.

"TRUTH" PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best Epigram, Conundrum, Lipogram, Bouts-Rimés, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this Journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the Truth Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a quarter to the same competitor.

7. All New Contributors are Required to Forward with their First Answers their Real Names and Addresses for Registration; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed twelve, and must under no circumstances consist of more than fourteen, letters.

9. Competitors must on no account change the noms-de-plume they have once assumed.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed:—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," Carteret Street, Queen Anne's Gate, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1659.

The subject of the moment, of course, is the forthcoming General Election. Indeed, people can talk just now of little else. And it seems to me that I cannot, under these circumstances, do better than set my competitors a puzzle in connection with that all engrossing topic.

So I am offering, this week, the usual prize of two guineas to that competitor who shall succeed in submitting

The Most Accurate Forecast of the Result of the Impending General Election.

In order to make the character of the competition perfectly clear, I would explain that all that is asked for is the gross strength of the supporters of the Government and the supporters of the Opposition, respectively. No details as to the various sections which compose either party should be attempted, and only one forecast will be allowed to each competitor.

For purposes of this competition, the Labour Members, Socialists, and Redmonites are to be included in the grand total of the Government's supporters; while the Unionist Free Traders and O'Brienites are to be included in the grand total of the supporters of The Opposition.

Once again, only the grand total of either party, The Government and The Opposition, is required.

Under ordinary circumstances this competition would not close until Monday, December 12; but as, by that date, many of the pollings will have been already declared, I think it better to curtail the usual period for sending in solutions.

All forecasts, therefore, must reach Truth office not later than by the first post on Wednesday, December 7.

Will competitors kindly make a note of this date?

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1650.

LETTERS CONTAINING AN IMPLIED OFFER OF MARRIAGE.

The prize of two guineas in this competition is awarded to Sea-Gull, whose letter was printed in Truth of October 19.

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1651.

TOPICAL SONGS OF A HUMOUROUS CHARACTER.

The prize of two guineas in this competition is awarded to Ballantrae, whose song was printed in Truth of October 26.

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1652.

THE THREE WORST SOVEREIGNS IN ORDER OF DEMERIT, WHO HAVE SAT ON THE ENGLISH THRONE, FROM WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR TO GEORGE IV.

The "ideal" list of three worst sovereigns, in order of demerit, as arrived at by collating all competitors' lists, works out as follows:—

1. John.
2. Richard III.
3. Mary Tudor.

John comes easily first; Richard III. only beats Mary for second place by a short head.

James II. and Charles II., neck and neck, are runners up.

Plébiscites are not always satisfactory. But in the present case, I cannot help thinking that the result arrived at in this way is a pretty accurate reflection of history.

Now as to the Prize award. I find that seven competitors (viz., Scar, Nemo, The Mac, Eliot, Remainder, W. J. S., and Maddie) have given the three Sovereigns aforesaid in the right order. The prize of two guineas is, therefore, equally divided between them.

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1653.

AMBIGUOUS PHRASES CAPABLE OF THE GREATEST POSSIBLE VARIETY OF INTERPRETATIONS.

This has been a difficult competition to judge, owing to the fact that many of the interpretations put by competitors on their ambiguous phrases, though not exactly impossible, are, to say the least of it, rather forced. On the whole I have decided to divide the £2 2s. equally between Bombay, Marguerite and Cadi.

The ambiguous phrases of these three competitors were printed in Truth of November 9.

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1654.

PARODIES OF KEATS' SONNET, "ON FIRST LOOKING INTO CHAPMAN'S HOMER."

The prize of two guineas in this competition is equally divided between Georgina, Dobbin, Amuinn, and Cercueil, whose parodies were printed in Truth of November 16.

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1655.

THE THREE BEST SOVEREIGNS, IN ORDER OF MERIT, WHO HAVE OCCUPIED THE ENGLISH THRONE FROM WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR TO EDWARD VII., INCLUSIVE.

The "ideal" list, arrived at by collating all competitors' lists, works out as follows:—

1. Edward VII.
2. Victoria.
3. Elizabeth.

No less than 34 competitors, viz., Aspidistra, Krüge, Cercueil, Navalis, Taormina, Rawthey, Bramble, Rubber, Regina, Theta, Six Knobs, Seaside, Blackrock, Yes Tor, Elizabeth, Sapper, Renwick, Alicrym, Snaggard, Muz-Muz, Nimpo, Shamrock, Veracity, Glenrosa, Mecca, Consilium, Clio, Blencathra, Blot, Flapper, Regent, Petros, Lucky One, and The Old Jap, have succeeded in naming the aforesaid three Sovereigns in correct order.

As it would not be worth while to divide the prize money between so many competitors, I am setting them a special play-off competition, full particulars of which will be found immediately below.

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1655.

SPECIAL PLAY-OFF COMPETITION.

The prize of two guineas will be awarded to that one of the 34 above-mentioned competitors who shall submit

The Best Summaries, not to Exceed 50 Words each, of the Characters of Edward I., Charles II., and George III. respectively.

Kindly note that only the 34 competitors who are announced above as having tied for the original competition are eligible to take part in this special play-off.

All summaries must reach Truth office not later than by the first post on Monday, December 12.

Answers to Correspondents.

The real name, with the address, of Miranda, winner of one-seventh of Truth Prize No. 1647, is Mr. H. Ronald Pettit, Weston House, Pembridge, R.S.O., Herefordshire.

Amuinn and Snapshot.—I much regret the printers' errors in the parodies submitted by these two competitors, and I have duly noted the same.

Miss C. (Bath).—You will find the announcement about which you inquire among the prize awards in this current issue.

Koeuke.—A good suggestion, for which I am much obliged. I hope to avail myself of it in due course.

QUEER STORIES

3rd Edition] FROM "TRUTH." [3rd Edition.

The Justice of this Criticism is fully borne out by the following Extracts from Reviews of this Latest Volume :

SCOTSMAN.—"Have long enjoyed well-deserved favour."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"A selection from this well known and deservedly popular feature in our popular contemporary. All its stories are wide awake."

REFEREE.—"It contains thirty stories, all of which are interesting, and some of which are very good indeed."

THE JEWISH WORLD.—"A splendid exchange for a shilling."

WESTERN DAILY PRESS.—"Very engrossing. They are 'queer' stories in that practically every one ends in an unexpected way, and contains a good surprise."

BAZAAR.—"This latest series should have as large a circulation as those which have preceded it."

SPORTSMAN.—"We need not commend them; they are well known to be entertaining."

ULSTER GUARDIAN.—"There are no short stories to compare with those which appear weekly in TRUTH, and we cannot think of a better shillingsworth of holiday fiction than one of the volumes. . . . which contain thirty of the brightest and best of these famous stories."

SUSSEX DAILY NEWS.—"A brilliant shillingsworth. Practically every one of the thirty stories it contains is of much more than ordinary interest. They are of that happy magnetism which compels the reading of the whole story once the first page has been scanned."

WORCESTER HERALD.—"Brighter reading for the railway carriage or the odd half-hour anywhere cannot be found."

THE NORTHERN WHIG.—"244 pages of true enjoyment."

CORK EXAMINER.—"Extraordinary value for the modest sum charged for the book."

NOTTINGHAM GUARDIAN.—"Comes opportunely to serve for holiday and seaside reading."

SPORTING LIFE.—"Better holiday fare it would be difficult to find. The stories are, needless to say, varied and bright, and form an exceptionally good shillingsworth."

FINANCIAL TIMES.—"May be recommended to those who are taking their holidays."

HOSPITAL.—"We strongly recommend this excellent shillingsworth."

FINANCIER.—"Well up to the level of excellence established by the first volume of this always entertaining series."

THE CALL OF THE CHILDREN.

ELECTION clamours fill the air,
And few have now a thought to spare
For aught beside.
'Tis this that all men's minds controls.
Where'er you turn, around you rolls
The busy fever of the polls
In full flood-tide.

And 'mid the bustle, turmoil, stress
That all distractingly obsess
Each mother's son,
There are some claims of Christmastide
(Whose urgent plea is undenied)
In danger to be thrust aside;
I'll tell you one.

This claim's on you, on me, on all;
It is the little children's call.
Oh, list to such!
To thrice ten thousand girls and boys
Whose lives are none too full of joys,
To whom their Christmas dolls and toys
Mean, ah! so much.

So much: To each small eager soul
These timely offerings mean the whole
Wide world, no less—
The difference 'twixt a Christmas Day
Enraptured, sunny, blithe and gay,
And one so drab, so dull, so grey
With hopelessness.

Hark to their mutely piteous pleas!
The flotsam and the jetsam these
Of life's rough sea.
What messages each bairnie sends;
What small appealing hand extends
To us, perhaps his only friends—
To you, to me!

'Tis well we throw our hearts and souls
Into the conflict of the polls,
Yield to their spell,
Fight for the cause that each holds true,
Resolve to see the battle through,
As honest citizens should do;
Yea, this is well.

But 'tis not well, on such things set,
That love and mercy we forget,
And kindly deeds;
It is not well no thought to spare
For those poor mites who claim our care,
Nor, heedless, once in mind to bear
The children's needs.

And what a little claim it is!
A little sum you'd never miss,
Its lack ne'er rue;
A little thing of little cost;
A little coin that else were tossed
Away, in idle pleasure lost;
That's all—to you!

But, oh, to them!—a little thing?
When such high rapture it can bring—
Of bliss such store!
To these, who scarce know money's shine,
A penny is a fortune fine,
And sixpence an unfathomed mine
Of boundless ore.

Should you (who would not?) wish to earn
A hundred-thousandfold return
For what you spend,
Without a hint of risk or fear—
Behold a method simple, clear!
The chance is with you, now and here,
To gain that end.

Come! Liberals, Tories—both, I say!
Think of the bairns, whichever way
The polls' tide runs.
Their Christmas you can make or mar.
You'd make? 'Tis well. Then here you are!
A little kindness goes so far
With little ones.

ENTRE NOUS.

BY way of postscript to the verses which appear on the previous page I should like to mention two facts. In the first place, the returns and estimates which I have now received show that there will be upwards of 23,000 children in the London Poor-Law Institutions, and close upon 8,000 in the hospitals, to be provided for out of the Truth Toy Fund at the coming Christmas. As regards the hospitals, the number is, of course, only a provisional estimate. As it stands, it is rather below the average, and in the event of anything like an epidemic among children during the next two or three weeks it is liable to be considerably increased. At any rate there will be, roughly speaking, 31,000 children looking to the Truth Toy Fund for their Christmas treat.

In the second place, the Toy Fund itself stands at the present moment fully £50 below the figure that it reached this time last year. As I attribute this to the distractions of the general election, there is reason to fear that the deficiency will increase rather than diminish during the next fortnight unless my readers will make a combined effort to prevent that result. After all, I do not suppose that the majority of readers of Truth have personal claims upon their pockets in connection with the election; and I may add that I am appealing to a considerably larger circle of readers than twelve months ago. I still venture to hope, therefore, that the appeal will yet meet with a wider response than has been the case at present.

The amounts received during the past week are as follows:—

I have received the following gifts in kind:—Two dressed dolls, Mrs. W. A. Gray; a character Indian doll, J. E. Needham; a box of knitted woollen balls, Miss Gregson; one dressed doll, Miss D. O. Carter; one box of dressed dolls, Miss Barnes and Miss G. Thomas; six dressed dolls, Mrs. Kemp and Mrs. Fowler; two scrapbooks, C. E. S. E.; one dressed doll, "Gunner"; one dressed doll, Miss J. Snell; ten dressed dolls, Miss B. Hardy.

I have also received from Messrs. Frank L. H. Collins and Son, of 4b, Frederick's Place, E.C., what is virtually a contribution of £2 2s. to the Toy Fund, they having once more kindly effected the necessary insurance in connection with the show free of charge.

---

The next matter to which I have to call attention is that an important change is to be made in connection with the next week's Toy Show, the success of which will depend very much upon my readers themselves. For many years the Show was open to the public free of charge on both days. A few years ago the experiment was tried of making a charge for admission, and carrying the proceeds to the Toy Fund. In response to numerous requests, I have now decided to return to the original arrangement and make admission free on presentation of a visiting card. But this is done in the hope that those who attend will show their sympathy with the objects of the Show by depositing their offerings in the boxes which will be provided for that purpose in the hall. If my readers will only come in sufficient numbers and act on the suggestion just offered, I hope that the Toy Fund will not suffer by the loss of gate-money.

There will again be a continuous series of musical entertainments in the Albert Hall for the benefit of those who want further attractions besides the unparalleled display of dolls and toys. For this I am indebted to the kindness of a number of ladies and gentlemen who are kindly giving their services. On each morning of the Show Mr. H. C. Tonking will give a recital on the grand organ from 11 to 1. On the afternoon of Wednesday Miss E. Gwynne Kimpton's orchestra will play under her direction, and on the same evening Messrs. Ascherberg, Hopwood, and Crew will provide a vocal and instrumental concert at 7.30

---

On Thursday afternoon an orchestra, consisting of members of the Strings Club, will perform under the direction of Miss Gwynne Kimpton, and on the same evening Mr. Jenkins's Mandoline Band, which has proved such a welcome attraction at many previous Toy Shows, will give a concert at 7.0 p.m. During each afternoon musical selections will also be given at intervals on the Radiophone. Visitors, therefore, will find plenty to hear as well as to see at the Toy Show at any time when they can find it convenient to drop in. The Show will be open, as usual, from 10.30 a.m. to 9.0 p.m. on each day—Wednesday and Thursday, December 14 and 15.

Whatever may be the result of the general election, the new Parliament is to be opened by the King in full state, and his Majesty will be accompanied from Buckingham Palace to Westminster by the Queen. A new procedure for the ceremonial of the State opening of Parliament by the Sovereign was drawn up at the beginning of King Edward's reign, and this will be closely followed by King George.

The drive of the King and Queen through London after the Coronation (which is to be a State "progress") will take place on the afternoon of Saturday, June 24. Neither the route to be followed nor the arrangements of the Royal procession has yet been decided.

All kinds of nonsense are being printed in the press concerning Court affairs. I read last week that during the last reign "the Windsor season did not begin until the middle of October," but there is to be a change now in this respect. As a matter of fact there was no "Windsor season" during the last reign. The Court was in residence at the Castle only for ten days about the middle of November, for ten days in the latter part of January, and for a week in June during Ascot races. In future the residences of the King and Queen will extend over at least four months in the year.

It is also quite untrue that the King has sanctioned "important rearrangements" of the contents of the State and private apartments. There are to be no changes whatever. Everything at Windsor is now in the most perfect order. We are also told that inventories are being prepared "of the furniture and artistic treasures" which are to be laid before their Majesties. These inventories will not be "laid before" either the King or the Queen. They are compiled at all the palaces by the officials of the Lord Chamberlain's department after a demise of the Crown. The object of this work is to discover whether the new inventory of Crown property agrees with the one which had been taken at the commencement of the previous reign.

A contemporary informs its readers that the collection of Sèvres china at Windsor Castle "was begun by George III. and continued by George IV., both great patrons of art." The china in the private apartments at Windsor was collected by George IV. exclusively. George III. never collected anything except books, and he neither knew nor cared anything more about "art" than a Newfoundland dog.

The King's visit to Lord Iveagh at Elveden Hall was settled some time ago, the understanding being that it is to be most strictly private in all ways, and there is no party to meet His Majesty. The King has several times been a guest at Elveden, and King Edward paid three or four visits there. Elveden, which is situated in a flat and very ugly country, was formerly owned by the Keppels, from whom it passed to the Newtons. The estate was sold in 1862 to the Maharajah Duleep Singh, who converted the whole property into a game preserve, rebuilt the house, and improved and extended the garden and grounds. Since Lord Iveagh purchased the estate he has considerably enlarged it, and he has added to and beautified the house, which was gorgeously decorated by its late owner in an Oriental style so as to resemble an Indian palace inside. A guest at Elveden some years ago, on the occasion of a Royal visit, described the house as "appallingly luxurious, with the kindest of hosts."

---

According to present arrangements, the King and Queen are to be the guests of Lord and Lady Mount Stephen at Brocket Hall, from Friday, the 16th, until Monday, the 19th, when they will return to town for a day or two before going to Sandringham for Christmas.

---

The Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife have been staying with their daughters at their house in Portman Square since they came up from Scotland, and they all leave England shortly on their way to Upper Egypt, intending to be away until about the end of April. Last week the Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife and their daughters were on a visit to Queen Alexandra at Sandringham Hall.

Prince Arthur of Connaught was last week on a visit to Colonel and Mrs. Houldsworth at Carden Hall. Carden, which is close to Chester, is a beautiful timbered house, formerly the old seat of the Leche family, who obtained the estate by marriage with the heiress of the Cawardens, who had owned the place since the reign of Henry III. The grounds lie under the Broxton Hills, and the woods and rocks in the higher part of the domain are very picturesque. The place was let for some time to Mr. Assheton Smith.

I mentioned some weeks ago that the King had sanctioned the creation of a new office in the Lord Chamberlain's department—that of Assistant Comptroller—and that it would be filled by Captain George Crichton, of the Coldstream Guards. The salary of this office is to be £800 a year, which is a liberal arrangement, inasmuch as the Comptroller receives only £1,000 a year. The business of the department has not been nearly so well conducted during the last nine years as it was for over thirty years previously, when Sir Spencer Ponsonby Fane and Mr. G. J. Hertslet were at the head of the office.

---

Princess Henry of Battenberg has been staying for a few days in Worcestershire on a visit to Lord and Lady Plymouth at Hewell Grange. The old house at Hewell, which was built during the reign of Queen Anne, and was noted for its immense extent and the length of its fronts, was dismantled about twenty years ago, when the present house was built. The manor of Hewell was given by the Empress Maud to Bordesley Abbey, and Henry VIII. granted it to Lord Windsor, in whose family the estate has ever since remained.

Prince Alexander of Teck, Sir Hedworth Lambton, and Captain Richard Molyneux were staying last week at York Cottage, Sandringham, on a visit to their Majesties. There was some shooting, but the King was a good deal occupied with estate business, as there is much to settle owing to so many new arrangements of various kinds being carried out.

---

The Grand Duke Michael Michailovitch and Countess Torby were last week on a visit to Lord and Lady Craven at Combe Abbey, where there was a large shooting party. The Abbey of Combe was granted by Edward VI. to John Earl of Warwick, and in 1616 the estate was purchased by an ancestor of the present possessor, who was Lord Mayor of London. The house was built during the reign of Queen Elizabeth out of the ruins of the ancient monastery, but it was reconstructed, enlarged, and greatly improved about half a century ago. It contains some interesting portraits and fine collections of armour and tapestry.

Queen Maria Pia (the Queen-Dowager of Portugal) has taken up her residence for the winter and spring months at the Royal château of Capo di Monte, in Naples, which is usually occupied by the Duke and Duchess of Aosta, who more than once entertained King Edward and Queen Alexandra there. Queen Amélie and King Manuel will proceed to Naples when they leave England on a visit to Queen Maria Pia, and late in the spring they will go to France to join the Comtesse de Paris at the Château of Randan, in the Puy de Dôme.

Prince and Princess Nicholas of Greece have been staying for a few days at Rufford Abbey on a visit to Lord and Lady Savile. There has been no partridge shooting at Rufford this season, owing to the scarcity of birds in Notts.

My Dublin correspondent writes:—

Even a modern Diogenes would find it hard to enjoy a secluded tub during a general election. No seclusion and no tub would keep out the hustle and turmoil. In the midst of strident politics the most cynical philosophy can hardly retain unruffled calm. Last week, so far as the fierce weather allowed it, was mainly devoted in Ireland to speechmaking on all sides, to meetings and canvassing, and then every one votes just exactly as he had intended to vote from the beginning. Lord Londonderry came over to rally Belfast, in the neighbourhood of which is his residence, Mount Stewart, in Down. The Abercorn family have been struggling in Derry against the invasion from a neighbouring county of Mr. Shane (anglicè, John) Leslie, who seeks regeneration in a name, a rebirth to Celticism. Shane, by the way, is not an Irish name, but merely the Irish way of pronouncing John, as Jean and Johann are respectively the French and German ways. "Going backwards is a deludhering way iv going on," as an Irishman said. In fact, the pitfalls on the way back are so many that old times are best left in possession of our ancestors. Sir Edward Carson and Mr. W. Long have been in Dublin. The St. Stephen's Green division of the town and the South County alone offer opportunity—an uncertain one mostly—to Unionists. "Old Trinity" has always remained Conservative and Unionist, and just now is even a little more so, with its stalwart representatives, Sir Edward Carson and Mr. J. Campbell.

Irish society could ill afford to do without Dublin Castle. Courts—viceregal as well as regal—have their uses; not only those which are ornamental and industrial, but others less obvious. They give people something to talk about, to criticise, and, above all, to grumble at. Not infrequently, too, they offer something in lighter vein, to relieve the seriousness of life. Lord Aberdeen's "reign" will be noted through its troubles with the Order of St. Patrick and the sensational disappearance of the State Jewels. These events were recalled last week by a writ issued against Sir Arthur Vicars, late "Ulster," regarding a badge of the Order of St. Patrick assumed to be in his possession. A curious official announcement regarding the prospects of the Castle season also engaged much attention. A novel form of vicarious fulfilment of entertainment duties was set forth. Their Excellencies kindly offered to promote a set of charity balls of which the guests would pay the costs. They also expressed a wish that others, in the interest of trade in Dublin, would give entertainments. Dublin has always protested against being obliged to observe a long period of Royal mourning. Ireland has so little to do with Royal rejoicing it seems hard to compel Dublin to do extra mourning and forego the "season," as important to it industrially as to a larger capital. The Castle season of last year was very short and inadequate, and this year it seems near to extinction. To suggest to the people to entertain themselves, whilst a viceregal court is kept up very generously by the Government, seems rather callous on the part of viceroyalty and an example of the virtue of thrift misapplied.

Lady Aberdeen has returned to the Viceregal Lodge. Their Excellencies will spend Christmas there and have a family party, including Mr. and Mrs. Douglas Gordon.

The sporting world, notwithstanding the scent of the battle from afar, last week were hunting and shooting, as usual, with true sporting philosophy. Lord Wicklow entertained a shooting party at Shelton Abbey, Wicklow, during the week, and Lord and Lady Farnham were entertaining in Cavan. Sir Horace Plunkett, with still more philosophy, set out on his usual visit at this season to America, where he is interested in extensive ranches and has a large circle of friends, including Mr. Roosevelt. Sir Horace Plunkett, like Lord MacDonell, shows a magnanimous example in working hard for a country which excludes him from its politics. However, some day, no doubt, through the law of reaction, the moderate man will again get a chance.

Lord and Lady Ardilaun have made a longer stay at St. Anne's than usual, owing to the General Election. Lord Ardilaun is a strong Conservative, and was the leading man in starting in Ireland the appeal for funds to promote a cause that no funds could promote. Lord Iveagh has not been in Ireland lately. Lord and Lady Plunket have been visiting him and Lady Iveagh at Elvedon. Lord Plunket is the son of Lord Iveagh's only sister, who died some years ago.

Mr. W. C. Gladstone, of Hawarden Castle, has accepted the appointment of unpaid attaché to the Embassy at Washington, and he will leave England for the United States directly after Christmas.

---

Lord and Lady Lansdowne have settled at Bowood Park for the winter. There will be a party at Bowood next month for the county ball at Chippenham.

---

The late Lord Churston never took any part in public life, and he was unknown out of his own district. He served for a number of years in the Scots Guards. He owned a large estate in South Devon, and had resided for a long time past at Lupton, his place near Brixham, which was let for many years. Lord Churston was the grandson of Sir John Yarde-Buller, who was one of the Tory members for South Devon from 1835 until 1858, when he was raised to the peerage by Lord Derby. Sir John exercised great influence in the House of Commons, and Lord Beaconsfield described him as "Sir Robert Peel's choice and pattern country gentleman."

---

Dr. Brushfield, of Budleigh Salterton, whose death took place a few days ago, was a very distinguished antiquary and a great authority on Sir Walter Raleigh and his times. He was an important and valuable contributor to the Oxford Dictionary of the English Language, having furnished many thousands of references. He was the author of many interesting papers read before the Devonshire Association (of which he was for many years an active member) and similar bodies, and he wrote numerous pamphlets on historical and literary subjects, and was a frequent contributor to Notes and Queries. He had such rich stores of peculiar historical and literary knowledge that his friends much regretted that he never undertook any elaborate work, and he was eminently qualified to produce a really valuable biography of Raleigh. He was a great reader in many departments of literature, and he had collected a large library, in which are many very rare books.

Dr. Brushfield was formerly well known as a distinguished expert in lunacy, and he had a great reputation as a specialist in that malady. He was for some years superintendent of the Brookwood Asylum, and his active professional career was closed at an early age through his being violently assaulted by a patient. He was very seriously injured, and soon afterwards found it necessary to resign his appointment. Owing to this mishap he was granted an unusually large retiring pension, and also because it was thought that he would not long survive the injuries which he had received. However, he ultimately recovered, and he continued to draw his pension for over thirty years.

The late Mr. J. E. Ellis was a typical representative of the Quaker Liberal—sincere, earnest, outspoken, and of most kindly disposition. He was universally respected in his own constituency, which he represented for a quarter of a century, and not less so in the House of Commons, where he served as a Vice-Chairman of Committee. For a short time he was an Under-Secretary of State, but the qualities which made him such a useful M.P. were not those best suited to a Minister, and he would have been even more out of place in a Cabinet than was John Bright. He was a man who always spoke his mind, and was quite incapable of subterfuge or mental reservation. Although he had finally retired from Parliament, his death is a real loss to Liberalism, and is regretted irrespectively of political opinion.

The truth about Hotel HERMITAGE, NICE (Cimiez): The Hermitage up to date in every respect. The most comfortable home on the Riviera.—Langham Hotel, Nice, same management.

The death of Professor Mayor deprives Cambridge of a figure that has been familiar in the University for over fifty-seven years. Professor Mayor was elected Ely Professor of Latin in 1872, and he had been a Fellow of St. John's since 1849. Educated at Shrewsbury under Dr. Kennedy, he gained high classical honours in 1848, and became an assistant master at Marlborough (under Dr. Cotton). It was there that he completed his admirable edition of the "Satires of Juvenal," which is a standard work of the greatest value. The accuracy, extent, and minuteness of Professor Mayor's knowledge were quite extraordinary, and his lectures were really too valuable to be popular. He filled the office of University Librarian for some years with great efficiency, and in a polished, old-fashioned style he was a very good preacher. For many years he was President of the Vegetarian Society, and he once preached an able sermon in favour of its principles.

The house at Lees Court, the seat of Lord Sondes, which was burnt the other day, is to be at once rebuilt. The last house was built about the middle of the seventeenth century by Sir George Sondes from designs by Inigo Jones, and it replaced an ancient timber manor-house which dated from the reign of Edward I. Sir George, who was a staunch Royalist, was created Earl of Feversham after the Restoration. His youngest son was hanged in 1657 for the murder of his eldest brother. This tragedy excited an immense sensation, and it produced a large crop of pamphlets and ballads, one of which was entitled "The Devil's Reign Upon Earth, being a full and true relation of several sad and bloody murders lately committed, especially that of Sir George Sondes his son upon his own brother."

A number of British residents at Nairobi, British East Africa, have sent me a joint letter calling attention to an official reply in the Legislative Council to certain statements by the Hon. Mr. A. M. Juvanjee, which appeared a short time ago in the London press. The statements in question (which were not published in Truth) related to the position and treatment of Indians as ratepayers and property owners at Nairobi, and judging from the official reply Mr. Juvanjee, if he was correctly reported, must have relied upon an Oriental imagination for his most striking facts. It was denied, by the way, that the Agricultural Department requested Mr. Juvanjee to act as a commercial representative of the Protectorate during his visit to Europe.

THE REFERENDUM.

(From various standpoints.)

I. From the Tory Stand-point.

Oh! Ministers are in a fright;
They know 'twill surely end 'em.
That's why they're all so filled with spite
Against the Referendum.

The People cannot fail to see
Full trust we now extend 'em.
They'll sweep us back to victory
Upon the Referendum.

In surveying "the state of the poll" the reader of Truth has this week an advantage over the editor. By the time he reads these lines he will have the result of three days' polling before him; while at the time of writing them only two days' returns are known. Only those who fancy themselves as professors of political meteorology venture on predictions at such a stage. The indications at present, however, point to the result which most people anticipated until the time arrived when all active politicians think it necessary to resort to "bluff." The strength of the Government seems likely to be slightly reduced, but there is no prospect as yet of any turnover of votes that would put the Opposition in power. In that event the election will decide nothing, and will not materially modify the situation out of which it sprang. It seems rather a ludicrous result from such a prodigious expenditure of money, breath, and ink.

An incidental feature of the returns which is decidedly interesting is the smallness of the polls. It is seen on both sides, in all parts of the country, and in large and small constituencies alike. To some extent this suggests that the electors are not so violently excited over the contest as the politicians and journalists; but, in the main, of course, it is simply due to the staleness of the register. From this point of view it is instructive to note that the reduction in the total vote cast is biggest in the biggest constituencies, irrespective of party. For example, it affects the Unionists in Birmingham to much the same extent as the Radicals in West Ham. At the same time it follows that as the Radicals are generally strongest in the great industrial constituencies they suffer on the whole more by the reduced poll than their opponents.

---

I think I am right in saying that this is the first year in which two general elections have been fought on the same register. It, therefore, affords a unique test of the extent to which polling is affected by the age of the register. It has always been believed—for very good reasons—that a stale register is specially disadvantageous to the Liberals, and this is now being proved by practical demonstration. It will probably be a long time before a Liberal Government dissolves again in December, unless our registration system is materially altered in the meantime—as it obviously ought to be.

---

THE REFERENDUM.

II. From the Liberal Stand-point.

Our Tory foes are in full flight;
Internal quarrels rend 'em.
That's why—to hide their desperate plight—
They've raised the Referendum.

The People through the trick must see;
To Jericho they'll send 'em.
Snowed under soon, poor things, they'll be Beneath their Referendum.

A ludicrous exposure of the insincerity and inconsistency of the Unionist press appeared in Monday's Daily Chronicle. About a year ago the London press evolved from its inner consciousness the idea that the Government contemplated submitting the Budget to a Referendum in place of a General Election, and there was more talk of the same kind with reference to the Veto question in February last. The Standard in October, 1909, was of opinion that the Referendum was "another revolution in itself," and pointed out that it must be made the subject of a special Bill, which it was certain that the Lords would not pass. The Daily Telegraph, as though anticipating what happened at the Albert Hall last week, asked whether it was not "ludicrous to talk as if the Referendum could be tacked on, as a paltry detail, to a measure of the most acutely controversial kind." The Daily Express regarded the project as "a clumsy and inept suggestion of Radical-Socialist despair," and damned the Referendum as "in itself a new revolution and one for which the country is by no means prepared." The Daily Mail found the idea "fantastic and preposterous." But the Globe rose to the occasion more impressively than any of them:—

> The Referendum is an institution which has worked with a certain amount of success in small communities like Switzerland, and the "plébiscite," of which it is another form, has been answerable for some of the greatest disasters which have overwhelmed modern France. . .
> Its introduction would work a revolution in our Constitution for which there is no parallel, and to spring it upon an electorate in the manner which is now suggested is a device for which it is hard to find any justification. We demand that the country shall have an opportunity of expressing its voice in the only manner which has ever been known in these islands—namely, at the polls.

As a matter of fact no such proposal had at that time been sprung upon the electorate. It was sprung, however, last week, and the Unionist press at once became convulsed with ecstatic admiration of the masterly stroke of statesmanship.

The Unionist journals certainly distance all competitors in feather-headed indifference to consistency and principle. But otherwise there is not much to choose between the two sides. It seems to be now the accepted rule of cheap journalism that for electioneering purposes capital letters are the only argument that counts, and that nobody wants to read anything but headlines. Every man must be assumed to know his own business best, but I cannot help thinking that the editor who first has the courage to confine electioneering intelligence at times like the present to two or three columns, instead of sprawling it over every page that is not reserved for advertisers, would reap a handsome reward. In a train the other day, one of my fellow passengers, after turning over the pages of his morning paper for a minute or two, suddenly cried "Damn! I am sick of all this rot!" then crumpled up the precious organ and kicked it under the seat. Though the rest of us were taking it lying down, I think we secretly sympathised with him.

A new feature in electioneering on the present occasion is the display of party advertisements in the press. If each party advertised in the organs of the other this method of spending money might have some affinity to reason. But why on earth should it be considered useful to pay for a page advertisement of electioneering catchwords and cant when every page of the paper is already stuffed gratis with similar bunkum? However, there may be reasons in the background which I have not been able to divine, and if any organisation, Unionist or Liberal, would like to try the experiment of hiring a page or two of Truth for electioneering ends, I am quite willing to co-operate.

THE REFERENDUM.

III. From a Neutral Critic's Standpoint.

I find myself bewildered quite;
  Hence this my rhymed addendum.
Both parties can't, of course, be right
  Anent the Referendum.

There's but one thing, methinks, to do:
  Take both sides' views and blend 'em,
And then divide the whole by two—
If we're to get the answer true
  About the Referendum.

The King has approved of the appointment of Mr. R. A. Sampson, F.R.S., to be Astronomer Royal for Scotland and Professor of Practical Astronomy in the University of Edinburgh, in the place of Mr. F. W. Dyson, F.R.S., who has gone to Greenwich. Professor Sampson took high mathematical honours at Cambridge in 1888, and two years later he was elected Fellow of St. John's College. Between 1889 and 1896 he worked at King's College, London, and at the Armstrong College, Newcastle-upon-Tyne. Since 1896 he has held a chair in Durham University. He is a profound mathematician, and a thorough master of observational work. For some years he has particularly studied the orbits and movements of Jupiter's satellites, and he has made some important discoveries.

Oxford Congregation spent several hours last week in dealing with the details of the proposed new statute which set up a Central Board of Faculties to unify and supervise the teaching work of the University. There were no fewer than sixty-four amendments, sixteen of which were dealt with, whilst the others were postponed until next term. Many were rejected, but the Master of Balliol's important clauses, which are intended to secure the position of a college tutor and lecturer, were passed. The amendment dealing with the constitution of the proposed Board of Faculties was rejected. A great deal of time was wasted owing to the absurdly long and complicated process of taking the vote in Congregation, but the Vice-Chancellor positively refused to allow any change to be made.

The Provost and Fellows of King's College, Cambridge, have presented the Rev. H. G. Cockerton, rector of Meesden, to the rectory of Monxton, near Andover, which is of the net value of about £250 a year, with house. The parish is a very small one.

The Deanery of Westminster is one of the prizes of the Church of England, and it is remarkable to hear of the Dean giving up such a position in order to accept the Deanery of Wells, the change, moreover, involving the sacrifice of £1,000 a year. The Deanery of Wells, however, is an ideal post for a learned divine, or for one who is unequal to heavy work. When Dean Johnson died Bishop Fraser was very nearly surrendering the See of Manchester in order to seek rest at Wells, and if he had done so it is probable that his life would have been prolonged for several years. The Deanery of Westminster was formerly held in commendam along with the See of Rochester. Of the Deans during the last century, Dr. Turton was promoted to the See of Ely, Dr. Samuel Wilberforce to the See of Oxford, and Dr. Trench to the Archbishopric of Dublin. When Dean Stanley died the post was refused by Hugh Pearson, canon of Windsor and rector of Sonning; by Dr. Vaughan, dean of Llandaff and Master of the Temple; and by Bishop Fraser. It was ultimately accepted by Dr. Bradley, Master of University College, Oxford, and canon of Worcester. The late Dean Farrar had hoped to succeed Stanley, and it was the greatest disappointment of his life when he was passed over.

The departure of Dr. Armitage Robinson from London will be greatly and widely regretted. He has done much good practical work at the Abbey, and he has exercised a considerable and excellent influence among Churchmen of all schools. His scholarly and thoughtful sermons and lectures have always drawn large and attentive congregations. The Dean has been a powerful force in Convocation, and it is a very good thing that he will not be lost to the Lower House. Everyone hopes that the change to Wells, and the comparative rest which the Dean will there enjoy, will prove beneficial to his health, and will enable him to continue his valuable contributions to New Testament criticism and other important literary work.

The Dean will retain the office of Lord High Almoner to the King, to which he was appointed in 1906 in succession to the late Lord Alwyne Compton, Bishop of Ely. This dignified office, which carries with it the coveted privilege of "the entrée," was held during Queen Victoria's reign by Archbishop Harcourt, Bishop Samuel Wilberforce, and Dean Wellesley, who was replaced by Lord Alwyne Compton, then dean of Worcester.

The Bishop of Ely has presented the Rev. J. R. Bowden, rector of Alwalton, to the rectory of Hardwicke, which is a small parish with a merely nominal stipend and house. The living of Alwalton, thus vacated, is also a benefice of very small value, and in the gift of Mr. Fitzwilliam, of Milton Park.

Lord Radnor has presented the Rev. L. G. Grey, rector of St. Mary-le-Crypt, Gloucester, to the important living of Christ Church, Folkestone, which is of the net value of about £600 a year, with house. Mr. Grey is an accomplished antiquary, and he has taken much interest in his beautiful old church at Gloucester, which is in some respects unique, and the ground plan is that of a Latin cross. Two ancient charnel houses are underneath it, and there are some fine monuments. Whitfield made his first appearance as a preacher in the pulpit of this church. The living of St. Mary-le-Crypt is of small value, and in the gift of the Lord Chancellor.

The diocese of Sarum has sustained a great loss by the death of Prebendary Whitefoord. He held the office of Principal of the Salisbury Theological College for twenty-four years with great ability and complete success, and during that period he took an active part in diocesan work, and he was a conspicuous figure in the public and social life of the city. He was a fine scholar, and much distinguished as a chess player. Among both clergy and laity he was a general favourite. He resigned his post at Salisbury about three years ago, when Bishop Wordsworth presented him to the rectory of Potterne, near Devizes, where he succeeded Archdeacon Buchanan.

Dr. Henson, Rector of St. Margaret's, has replaced Archdeacon Wilberforce as the canon-in-residence at Westminster Abbey.

Lord Rosebery has presented the Rev. W. R. Beard, Vicar of Bures, Suffolk, to the rectory of Postwick, Norfolk, which is of the net value of about £350 a year, with residence. When this living became vacant last summer Lord Rosebery offered it to the Rev. G. Streatfeild, rector of Fenny Compton, who accepted it, but afterwards withdrew his acceptance, as he was strongly urged to remain in his present parish, which is a college living.

The late Canon Faber had been for nearly thirty years one of the most prominent ecclesiastics in the diocese of York, and he acted as examining chaplain to three Archbishops. He took high honours at Oxford, and was at once elected to a Fellowship of New College, where he did excellent work both as Tutor and Bursar for about twelve years. He was a most successful coach, especially for logic. He was a great cricketer, and after he took orders he played in big matches as "Mr. Fabian," in order to avoid a shock to the sensibilities of Samuel of Oxford. He was the very successful headmaster of Malvern College from 1865 until 1880, when he accepted the living of Sprotborough, near Doncaster, which he held for twenty-seven years. He was a highly accomplished scholar, a forcible and witty speaker, an interesting original preacher, and an admirable raconteur. He was greatly beloved by his parishioners, who were his first object, although he was much concerned with the general administrative work and the haute politique of the diocese.

Knowing by experience that TRUTH is read by a great many kindhearted people, I venture to mention the following case in the hope that it may elicit sympathy of a practical kind. A lady who was at one time a rather well-known public singer, and after marrying an English gentleman was left on his death in very reduced circumstances, is at the present moment in a state of absolute destitution in a French town. She has a thorough conversational knowledge of German, French, and English, and possesses gifts of the highest order as a cook. She is therefore capable of making herself very useful, if someone could be found who would give her the opportunity of doing so. Her story is a very sad one, and her present position desperate. I should be very glad to hear from any lady or gentleman who would lend a helping hand in such a case.

With the approach of Christmas the Poor Clergy Relief Corporation issues an appeal which will, I hope, receive an attentive hearing in spite of the din and turmoil of the elections. The good work of this charity has often been described in TRUTH, and the need of a fund for the assistance of the poor clergy—there are many whose livings do not provide a decent living wage—is never more pressing than in the winter. Contributions should be addressed to Mr. Mandeville B. Phillips, the secretary of the corporation, 38, Tavistock Place, W.C.

A glance at the Army List shows how little attention is paid by the War Office to the regimental sentiment of the Garrison Artillery. In former years each company ranked for precedence according to the date of its formation. Some ten years ago this order of precedence was ruthlessly trampled under foot, and the companies, old and new alike, were re-numbered, not according to their length of life, but to their turn for foreign service. No. 1 Company, for instance, which was only raised in 1846, now takes precedence over No. 2 Company, which was formed in 1795, and has a long and distinguished record of service. The same anomalies run all through the list of eighty-seven companies and twelve heavy batteries which constitute the R.G.A. branch of the Royal Regiment.

I think the Adjutant-General might look into this matter. As the author of the History of the Cameron Highlanders, he knows as well as anyone what high value officers and men alike set on the past records of their corps. The present classification of Garrison Artillery units is not only meaningless—the foreign roster having been upset since its adoption—but an insult to company feeling. A few months ago a correspondent, solicitous on General Ewart's behalf, described him in Truth as a staff officer "who has never forgotten, and never wishes to forget, that he was once a regimental officer." Now is the Adjutant-General's opportunity for proving the truth of his friend's testimony.

A letter which I publish to-day in the correspondence column over the nom-de-plume of "Veritas" is from a young officer of the Indian Army. The letter speaks for itself, and the only comment which I wish to make is to ask the following question: If three-quarters of Indian Army officers are in debt, what must be the case with British subalterns who draw some £3 a month less pay than their brethren of the Indian Service?

As it seems so difficult to awaken the War Office to its duty in relation to its men and their families on board ship, I print below a detailed description of the treatment of a number of military passengers on a recent voyage from Tientsin to Hong Kong. It contains little or nothing that has not been previously related in Truth of other voyages in various parts of the world, but only by reiterating and incessantly advertising these perennial scandals is there any hope that some one in authority will take them up and put a stop to them once and for all:—

I beg to draw your attention to the following irregularities which occurred in the allotment of passages to military passengers travelling from Tientsin per s.s. Huichow to Hong Kong to embark on H.M.T. Rohilla for passage to Southampton.

First, I would point out that there are only two classes of accommodation on these boats—viz., Europeans and Chinese—consequently it was hitherto the custom for those entitled to second-class accommodation to travel first. In this case, however, there was only room for six second-class passengers in the European class, so the remaining four warrant and non-commissioned officers, two women and seven children were placed with the third-class passengers, irrespective of seniority. This could easily have been avoided, either by chartering a boat with more accommodation for Europeans or sending those passengers for whom there was no room on a separate boat via Shanghai.

Secondly, the accommodation fitted up for the unfortunate women and children in the third class was simply disgraceful, not even allowing for common decency or privacy. Women and children had to pass through the men's quarters to get to their own, the men dressing or undressing at all hours, and, owing to the flimsy partition (half canvas and half wood), every sound could be distinctly heard, to say nothing of bad language which will occur on certain occasions where men gather together. Even in their quarters the women were not private, as the portholes opening on to the troop deck had to be kept open owing to the heat; consequently, men could not resist looking in, until eventually an example was made of one of the men, which put a stop to it. The w.c. for the women and children was situated at the end of the quarters, and had no flush, and, being cleaned only once a day, the stench was for the most part of the day unbearable, and caused several to become sick.

There was practically no attendance, so that the women had to depend on their husbands to get them water to wash in, etc., etc.

The food arrangements were so badly arranged that on the second day out the captain of the ship ordered all the women and children, irrespective of class, to have their meals in the saloon, as the stewards were so hopelessly mixed as to who were entitled to second and third class respectively.

If the reason for these irregularities was economy, the people affected by them were willing to defray any extra cost necessary to, at least, provide for common decency.

It appears that the instructions laid down in War Office letter dated July, 1907, No. 120/Gen. No./6622 (Q.M.G. 2) has been overlooked; therefore, I consider there was gross neglect on the part of the Tientsin authorities with regard to this grievance.

If what my correspondent says in his last paragraph is correct—I have no reason to doubt it, but I have not the War Office letter before me—this is a case in which official instructions have been disregarded. Consequently some one can be made a useful example of, and this ought to be done. But more than this is required before soldiers and their families will get accommodated at sea with reasonable regard for comfort, health, and decency, and I repeat that Mr. Haldane could not do better than appoint a committee, duly leavened with non-official expert intelligence, to report on what should be done in this direction. It is not a question of money, for no M.P. would oppose any necessary expenditure for the purpose in view if the state of the case were properly explained.

Rear-Admiral C. J. Briggs goes to the Admiralty, as Controller of the Navy and Third Sea Lord, on the 20th inst. He was lately relieved from a division command in the Home Fleet by Admiral Sturdee. His selection for the responsible office he is about to assume is generally approved in the Navy, where his reputation for administrative ability stands high.

Vice-Admiral King-Hall has selected Captain Edward Francis Bowen to act as his flag-captain in the Powerful, where he is changing flags with Sir Richard Poore. I hear, by the way, that a more modern ship than this fifteen-year-old cruiser will shortly be placed at the disposal of the C.I.C. in Australian waters. Captain Bowen was last in command of the Highflyer, in the Home Fleet, at Devonport.

Captain John S. Luard, who has been in command of the Albemarle since February last, is recommissioning that ship on the 15th inst. Although she has been for some time past in the Portsmouth Sub-division of the Home Fleet, it is believed that the Albemarle will shortly join the four other battleships of her class in the Mediterranean. Probably she will be one of the two vessels selected to replace the Triumph and Swiftsure.

Captain Arthur Cavanagh Leveson has been selected for command of the new battleship-cruiser Indefatigable, which is at present undergoing her trials, and is expected to be ready to commission in February next. This officer is one of the survivors from the wreck of the Victoria, in which ship he was serving as a lieutenant when she was rammed by the Camperdown. The Indefatigable is confidently expected to touch thirty knots on her full-power trials.

The Greenwich Hospital pension of £80 a year, which became vacant on the death of Captain James Kiddle, has been awarded to Captain Edwin Wise, who retired from the Royal Navy in 1891. Captain Wise is one of the very few survivors of the old Sailing Master branch. In this capacity he served during the Crimea, acting as Beach Master at the embarkation of what remained of the Light Cavalry Brigade at Eupatoria in October, 1855.

Sir Robert Keith Arbuthnot has just taken over the command of the First Destroyer Flotilla, and with it the rank of Commodore. Since Commodore Charlton, who has now struck his flag, took over this command two years ago striking developments have occurred. At that date he had the Topaz as parent ship, and the Adventure as guide ship. These two vessels have been replaced by the Boadicea and Blanche, faster, more powerful, and more seaworthy vessels. Of the twenty-four destroyers which Commodore Charlton took over only three remain and these belong to the 33-knot Tribal group, which two years ago were just being passed into service. Then the average displacement of a First Flotilla destroyer was 578 tons; to-day it is 982 tons. Then there were three boats of 33 knots, three of 30 knots, and eighteen of the 25½-knot "Rivers." Now there is the 36-knot Swift, twelve 33-knot Tartars, and twelve 27-knot Basilisks. The total displacement of the flotilla and attendant cruisers is 31,200 tons, or almost double that of two years ago. It seems to me that if those alarmists who are so fixedly straining their eyes across the North Sea were sometimes to relax the optic tension by looking at the incessant process of naval development nearer home they might become wiser as well as more patriotic.

The First Lord of the Admiralty has addressed a letter to the Association of Headmasters on the subject of "cramming" boys for the Navy, which is a little difficult to understand. "We even deprecate," he says, "special 'Navy classes' in preparatory schools, and any parent who removes his boy from a preparatory school of the ordinary type, in order to send him to a school which lays itself out to 'prepare for the Navy' is ill-advised, and is not improving his boy's chances." This seems to imply that no particular educational qualification is demanded for entrance into the Navy. But is that the case?

According to the syllabus of the Osborne preliminary examination, candidates, who must not be less than twelve years and eight months, nor more than thirteen years, are only permitted one attempt to pass. The subjects include (1) English, composition, dictation, parsing, paraphrasing, etc.; (2) History and geography, with special reference to the British Empire; (3) Arithmetic, simple and compound rules, weights, linear and cubic measures, mensuration of surfaces, volumes, and capacity, metric system, relationship of money, vulgar and decimal fractions; (4) Algebra, substitution of values, easy identities, factors, fractions, equations, verifications, etc.; (5) Geometry, practical and theoretical, the principle of deduction from theorems, a comprehensive knowledge of Euclid up to the thirty-fourth problem, etc.; (6) French or German, with an oral examination. to which importance is attached; (7) Latin, translation of passages. It seems to me that for a boy under thirteen years to shine at an examination in all these subjects a certain amount of special preparation, in other words "cramming," is indispensable. If "cramming" is so strongly objected to at the Admiralty, the best remedy is to modify the syllabus.

I have received a letter from a naval correspondent with reference to my remarks of last week concerning the court-martial upon Sub-Lieutenant Foster. The chief point of this communication is that since every executive officer does three years at sea as a midshipman, during which time he is continually in charge of boats, my contention as to insufficiency of experience is not justified. Further information which has reached me regarding this particular case, however, seems entirely to support the view I expressed. It appears that Lieutenant-Commander Tennyson, in charge of the Gossamer, instructed Sub-Lieutenant Foster not to set sail in the whaler at all, as he considered the wind was too squally. The sub-lieutenant thought he knew better. He ordered the lug to be set, and in rounding Weymouth Pier a puff of wind rolled the boat over. The sub-lieutenant's fault was obviously lack of experience. Most of the boat training which midshipmen get is in steam launches. The judgment which is essential to the handling of open boats at sea can only come with the experience of years.

---

In relation to recent comments in Truth upon the subject of naval courts-martial, the White Paper giving the returns of these tribunals for last year which has just been issued is worth notice. It is gratifying to find the ratio of decrease in crime and punishments is steadily maintained. By far the biggest proportion of the offences enumerated continue to be striking, or attempting to strike, superior officers. The number of courts-martial held during 1909 is the lowest since 1894. But no fair comparison can be based upon this fact unless the great increase in the total of the personnel is borne in mind. The Royal Marines show the most satisfactory ratio of diminution in these returns. Between 1903 and 1909 the number of courts-martial held annually upon members of this corps had decreased by nearly seven hundred per cent. Surely the indications of general improvement in the morale of the Fleet afforded by these figures should encourage the naval authorities to modify the drastic code of punishments still permitted to courts-martial.

We have it on the authority of a ballad-monger that the British-speaking races "all love Jack," but in Canada they seem to have a peculiar partiality for Marines. So strong is this affection that the Imperial authorities have desired the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to preserve strict secrecy when conveying Marine reliefs across Canada. It appears that on the last occasion a party of Marines went through Canada by rail. Out of a strength of one hundred upwards of twenty deserted. At every station mysterious agents were posted to entice the men away. The result is that a detachment which has just travelled across the Dominion to join H.M.S. Shearwater at Vancouver had to be literally smuggled over the line.

Not until the other day did I know of the existence of the Indian Royal Chronicle, though its publishers, Messrs. Lewis and Company, of Calcutta, state that it was established in 1888. My ignorance seems to be inexcusable, for according to its publishers this journal is the medium through which the "good deeds, benevolent acts, charities, and munificent gifts" of the aristocracy and gentry are brought "prominently before the notice of the high officials of our benign Government both in India and Great Britain," with the gratifying result that they quickly secure "universal respect and admiration," and receive "higher and higher titles and honours." All this I now learn from a circular sent out broadcast to subscribers to the King Edward Memorial schemes in India. They are assured that they will earn a great name and reputation both in India and in Europe if they have their names inserted in a list in the Indian Royal Chronicle, for which privilege they must pay an annual advance subscription of Rs. 25. Moreover:—

> As the aristocracy of India will be represented therein, the omission of your illustrious name from it would, we are afraid, be too conspicuous to the Government and the public.

It is a silly business, but still it is too bad that money should be extracted from the pockets of poor and ignorant natives by such a device.

An inquest held last week at Eastbourne Workhouse on the body of an elderly inmate who died after taking poison revealed a most unsatisfactory state of affairs. The poison was a carbolic disinfectant which had been left about in a beer bottle. The old man, who helped himself to a drink, when taken ill was put to bed and attended by a nurse, but not until the next day was he visited by a doctor, and eventually he died of exhaustion. In explanation of the use of beer bottles for poisonous fluids the medical officer remarked that "we are all for economy here." I presume the reference was to the policy of the guardians, and if so I trust they will take this object-lesson of their cheeseparing policy to heart. But equally worthy their attention is the casual way in which the old man was treated when the result of his succumbing to the temptation of the beer bottle was discovered. As he was only an old pauper, nobody seems to have cared much what happened to him.

Some of the objections to legal aid societies were very clearly defined during the hearing of a workmen's compensation case at Hungerford County Court last week. In the course of the evidence it transpired that the plaintiff had originally taken his claim to the Workmen's Legal Friendly Society, which advertises free legal advice in return for an annual subscription of a penny, and undertook to provide legal assistance in accident cases for 10 per cent. commission on the amount recovered as compensation. In this instance the Workmen's Legal Friendly Society instructed a solicitor, who after communication with the insurance company's solicitors recommended the plaintiff to accept £20 in settlement of his claim. If he had done so, after paying the commission and doctor's fees, he would only have had £11 14s. for himself. Being discontented with the offer, he placed his claim in the hands of another solicitor, who secured an offer of £40 plus £5 5s. for medical charges and an indemnification against any charges which the Workmen's Friendly Legal Society's solicitors might claim.

In reviewing the facts before ordering the agreement to be filed, his Honour Judge Gwynne James remarked that he could not imagine a worse system than that adopted by the society. He characterised the concern as "a mere speculative society of a very bad description," and he expressed the hope that if any solicitor employed by the society presented a bill of costs the Registrar would tax it pretty severely. The strictures were well merited. The net result if the injured workman had left his affairs in the hands of the Workmen's Legal Friendly Society would have been that he would have been worse off by £33. At this rate the payment of a penny a year for legal advice is much more expensive than it looks.

An interim injunction was granted by Mr. Justice Neville in the Court of Chancery last Friday restraining two individuals named Lefrançois and Devet from issuing diplomas and other prize awards bearing the signature of Lord Denbigh and Lord Kinnoul. These diplomas, I presume, are those referred to in Truth on September 28 last of the "Concurrence Exhibition of Cigarettes" organised in connection with the "International Exhibition of Arts and Manufactures" at the Alexandra Palace. When I warned the public against paying Lefrançois anything for his bogus honours, he was offering his diplomas and medals to English firms, but it appears from an affidavit by Lord Denbigh, referred to in the application to the Court, that he is now selling them to traders abroad, and Lord Denbigh characterises this action as a gross fraud on the exhibitors and the public. It is.

The case heard before Mr. Justice Bray, in which an action for damages for assault was brought by an apprentice against a Swindon trainer of racehorses named Robinson, is the second instance within the past three months in which acts of gross brutality have been alleged in law courts against the proprietors of such establishments. No wonder there is a popular belief that a considerable amount of cruelty exists in training stables, and it might be well if the inspectors of the N.S.P.C.C. were to keep an eye upon them. I do not know why it should be so, but close association with that noble animal the racehorse does not always have an ennobling effect upon mankind.

The Clewer cook to whose swindling adventures attention has been directed two or three times recently in Truth found herself eventually at Bow Street, where on Friday last she was sentenced to six months' hard labour by Mr. Curtis Bennett. Her name was Bridget Lester, and she was proved to be an old hand at the game by Detective Inspector Duggan, who eventually brought her to book. In addition to the original case narrated in these columns two other charges of obtaining money for travelling expenses from ladies who had engaged her subject to her references proving satisfactory were proved against her. The modus operandi was in all cases the same. A country address was secured for the purpose of correspondence and representations made that she had come from that address, whereas she was in reality living in London. It is an old trick, and ladies who advertise for servants are not sufficiently on their guard against it.

In the days when a legal pillory was a standing feature of Truth the Lancaster justices frequently figured in it, and from a case brought under my notice they have not yet amended their ways. The case was that of a man charged with trespassing in pursuit of game. He was of good character, had been in one employment for sixteen years, and had never been charged with any offence. He went for a day's shooting on the foreshore at Glasson Dock, a village between Lancaster and Fleetwood. To get to the foreshore he crossed a field. In the field a farmer and two labourers were working. They said nothing to him. When within ten yards of the foreshore he encountered a gamekeeper, who asked his name and tore a bag from his back and trampled on it. A scuffle ensued. The man threatened to report the matter to the police, and on arriving by train at Lancaster he met a policeman on the platform, to whom he at once reported the affair. The gamekeeper had followed him, and he in return charged the man with trespassing in pursuit of game. The Lancaster Bench fined the man 40s. and costs, or in default a month's imprisonment.

The facts have been laid before the Home Secretary, who has expressed "his regret that he can find no sufficient ground to justify him, consistently with his public duty, in advising his Majesty to interfere." I share his regret. The Lancaster justices badly need a lesson in the administration of justice. The man was merely on his way to shoot at a place free to the public, and it is hardly likely that he would either have trespassed on preserved land in pursuit of game in full view of the farmer and two labourers, or have voluntarily reported his own offence to a policeman at the first opportunity which offered. I can understand a bench of game preservers convicting under such circumstances and imposing the heaviest penalty in their power, but I fail to see why the Home Secretary can find no grounds for interference. It is just the sort of case where his interference would have been valuable.

An absurdly lenient penalty was imposed last week on a pit-pony driver at the Rotherham West Riding Police Court for cruelty. In the course of the removal of tubs in the pit two ponies became entangled and restive, and one of them trod on the driver's toes. Thereupon he struck the unfortunate animal on the head with a pick-shaft, bursting the eyeball. The Bench fined him 5s. and costs. This seems hardly the way to put an end to the hideous cruelty to ponies which admittedly goes on in the mines.

One of the free-portrait tricksters who called himself Sydney Norton, but could more legitimately answer to the name of Israel Israeli, found himself before the Sheriff at Lanark last week. He had been pretending to canvass for a firm called the John Bull Fine Art Company, of Leeds and London, which turned out to have no existence apart from Israeli. As he had received money and was arrested before he had supplied any enlargements, the Sheriff fined him £3 3s., with thirty days' imprisonment as an alternative. There are a good many of this particular tribe of Israelites touring the country at present, and it is a pity more of them do not receive similar recognition.

If Tanquerey, the free-portrait swindler, is really dead, his lies have not perished with him, for his successors have recently been flooding India with the forged testimonial from Mr. Labouchere, of which he made such imprudent use while alive. Scores of these forgeries have been sent to me, and in one or two cases the senders have actually inquired if the testimonial is "genuine." And this after the public has been warned for years past that the "testimonial" is fraudulent, and that Tanquerey and the Société Artistique de Portraits are nothing more nor less than a gang of swindlers. Really, it makes one almost despair of ever enlightening the public. Perhaps the Indian papers can do something to put their readers on their guard against these Parisian rogues.

The proprietor of the Ideal Sight Restorer, one Richard Palmer, otherwise "Treasurer" of the Ideal Company, of 134, West-65th Street, New York, has sent me a long letter objecting to the remarks which have been made about his business in Truth and to its inclusion in Truth Cautionary List. He says he is quite sure that I do not want to do his firm any injustice, and by way of proving that injustice has been done them he sends me a book of testimonials. He is quite right about my not desiring to do him an injustice, and I am rather surprised that he does me the injustice to imagine that my opinion is likely to be altered by a book full of printed testimonials. Testimonials are so easily procurable nowadays that no really rational person pays any attention to them—at least in this country. It would require a great deal more than the written testimonial of some one on the other side of the Atlantic to convince me that Mr. Palmer's course of gymnastics for the eye is likely to abolish the use of spectacles, and that people who purchase his "sight restorer" are not wasting their money, even if they are not also incurring real danger of injuring what sight they have left.

There is another matter in which Mr. Palmer also does me an injustice. In the concluding paragraph of his letter he informs me that I am "standing in the way of my readers and others receiving the benefits which may be derived from the use of his instrument." Subtle as it is, the hint is not lost upon me; and I can assure Mr. Palmer that my opinion would not be in any way modified if he were to send me along an advertisement of his Restorer. Frankly, I am of opinion that the claims made on behalf of the Ideal Sight Restorer are preposterous humbug, and while I am of that opinion I shall certainly 'stand in the way" of my readers having it thrust upon them through an advertisement in Truth.

The Lancet for December 3 contains an interesting summary of a German Anti-quackery Bill which, after receiving the sanction of the Federal Council, is now before the Reichstag with every prospect of speedily taking its place on the statute-book. At present there are no restrictions in the German Empire regarding the practice of medicine, so long as one does not pretend to a qualification one does not possess. The new Bill does not propose to directly restrict medical practice to qualified men; it proposes to regulate the unqualified man's business. He will have to apply to local authorities for permission to practice, giving full particulars concerning his education, former occupation, and life. He will be required to keep books which will be open to inspection, and to give full information when required regarding his methods of treatment, and he will be forbidden to treat patients by correspondence, or to treat infectious diseases, including cancer. Further permission to continue the exercise of his trade may be withdrawn if there is reason to believe that the public is being swindled or its health endangered.

It is, however, in regard to the advertising of secret remedies that the new law is most drastic. The Federal Council will have the power to forbid the sale and importation of any preparation likely to prove detrimental to the public health and pocket. The making of untruthful statements regarding the value, effects, origin, or composition of any remedies or appliances advertised to the public will be made a punishable offence, while the distribution or advertising of any testimonials, expressions of thanks from clients, opinions of experts, and similar statements will be absolutely forbidden. The strict enforcement of this law is expected to topple the whole edifice of German quackery to the ground, one probable result of which will be a further immigration of alien quacks into this country. We are already suffering from an invasion of Yankee quacks driven out of their own land by stricter laws than obtain here, and it is sincerely to be hoped that the intention of the Government, foreshadowed by the recent publication of the Blue Book on unqualified medical practice, will soon take definite shape.

Yet another dental-aid society has come into existence the National Medical and Dental Aid Society, of 5, New Oxford Street, W.C. It supplies artificial teeth on the instalment system at prices varying from 1s. a week upwards. The name of Princess Marie Louise (Duchess of Seville) is printed on its circulars as "Patroness." It professes to give advice free and to extract teeth painlessly. It also professes to be managed by a committee which "have long recognised the necessity for a genuine institution to fill the gap between the assistance dispensed by hospitals and the high fees usually charged by dentists." I think I know that committee. It has been engaged in founding similar societies before under the patronage of ladies with titles, and its leading light is Mr. F. Sinclair Kennedy (No. 144 Truth Cautionary List). None of them are what I should call "genuine institutions" in any other sense than that of a genuine private business run for profit.

The recent Blue-book on unqualified medical practice contained a number of remarkable advertisements of unqualified practitioners, but nothing quite so remarkable as a leaflet issued by W. Lowry, of 445, York Road, Wandsworth. Lowry belongs to the ranks of the herbalists, and in regard to the advertising quack he is strongly of the opinion that Codlin's the man, not Short. "These advertising swindlers," he declares, "not only rob the simple people who patronise them, but generally injure their health also." Then, after some references to God's will, he states that he is the holder of the original recipe and only manufacturer of "the historical and precious Spikenard Ointment mentioned in St. Mark xiv. and other parts of the Scripture; the only known and reliable remedy for scrofula, cancer, ulcerated wounds, leprosy, and all skin diseases." This is really a novel idea in quack advertising, though scarcely an agreeable one. We shall be told next that some profane sight restorer is in a position to supply the original clay mentioned in St. John ix. 6.

Herbert William Whiteman, the City bloodsucker who trades as "Cox and Co.," received a useful little lesson in a case before the Common Serjeant last week. He sued a borrower for £10 10s., and the defendant counter-claimed for damages on the ground that the plaintiff had broken an agreement that he would suspend proceedings on payment of an instalment of £4, and also that he had contrary to his undertaking as to secrecy sent communications to the defendant at his place of business. The latter is Whiteman's usual method of putting pressure on his victims. The plaintiff's claim was cut down by the Judge to £6 12s., and damages were awarded against him to the amount of £10 0s. 0½d., so that instead of recovering anything he had to hand over to the defendant a balance of £3 8s. 0½d.

It is some time since I heard of the Collins Syndicate, 24 to 26, Bishop's Road, Fulham, S.W., but recent circulars show that they are still trading on the folly of the public with racing and roulette systems and "one horse daily" and "occasional guarantee" wires. To suit all pockets the syndicate offer a choice of systems ranging in price from the humble sixpence to the noble sum of 100 guineas. Their leading line, however, is "The Collins Theory and Method," price five guineas, which they affirm has a record of fourteen years' "consistently successful working," and—as an example of its triumphs—at a Newmarket meeting a few weeks ago produced a net profit of £890 12s. 6d. on a £10 stake. It is quite certain that if their fairy tale were true the owners of this magic system would not have been for years past imploring other people to buy the secret, but would have long since amassed a big fortune by working it on their own account. That, however, is a consideration which never enters the heads—though there is plenty of room there—of the greenhorns to whom such things appeal.

I was asked the other day whether I could give any information respecting a bookmaker named James Stuart, 526, Oxford Street, W., but I am afraid that I can supply none that is likely to be satisfactory to interested parties. All I know is that at the end of September Stuart's solicitor told a customer that the business was in liquidation, and that it was at that time "impossible to say what dividend, if any, it will be possible to pay to the creditors." The solicitor promised to write again. He has, however, omitted to reply to subsequent inquiries, and from this I conclude that the outlook for the creditors is not exactly rosy.

"I am a cousin of the late T. Chenery, who was professor of Arabic at Oxford," is the phrase with which T. Chenery McClean has commenced his begging letters for years past. McClean has changed his address to 110, Wiverton Road, Sydenham, since the last edition of Truth Cautionary List was published. He still begs, however, and from the story of his distresses he still omits to mention that they are chiefly due to his own folly and dishonesty. It is desirable, therefore, to mention again that he deserves neither sympathy nor charity.

Amongst the beggars of my acquaintance there is none who writes a more elaborate and circumstantial yarn than Allan Graham. When I last referred to him on March 30 he described himself as having come from Scotland to Manchester with his wife and three little ones, and only needing a loan of 20s. to provide himself with a camera, possession of which would enable him to secure a lucrative appointment. As security for the 20s. he offered a much-valued walking-stick, which had belonged to Sir Walter Scott. But though he got the loan from at least one gentleman, the lender has received neither the walking-stick nor repayment of the loan. The lucrative appointment also failed to materialise, for Graham is begging again. He has now also shifted the scene of his operations from Manchester to Halifax, where, however, the Poste Restante is the only address which he gives. The walking-stick formerly belonging to Sir Walter Scott must be a most useful staff if it has supported him during the interim.

In common with a good many other people, I have received an invitation from Mr. J. A. Martyn, of 338, Rue Saint-Honoré, Paris, to furnish him with biographical details for publication in "Martyn's Biographical Dictionary of Contemporaries." Mr. Martyn tells me that "no fee is asked for the insertion of the biographies," but owing to the great expenses involved in the production of the work "the editors expect each biography to be accompanied by a cheque for one guinea, for which a copy of the work will be sent post free on publication." My own feeling being that people who part with guineas on such terms are unmitigated asses, I should be sorry to figure among Martyn's Contemporaries, even if he were offering to pay me.

It is impossible to understand why London is the only place in the country where the fortune-telling charlatans are allowed to practise their trade with impunity. There is a certain "Professor" Zodiac, describing himself as a West Indian phrenologist and occult scientist, practising at 19, Edgware Road, who has lately been dropping handbills into letter boxes for silly servant girls to read. He promises to answer such questions as "Will you be prosperous in your next situation?" "Will you marry; if so, when?" "Would you like to know the description of your future matrimonial partner?" "West Indian phrenology" obviously is only another name for ordinary fortune-telling, and if a professor of this occult science were to attempt to practise his art in Manchester or any other provincial town he would speedily find himself receiving the attention of the police.

When I referred last week to Mr. E. Piercy Henderson's new pamphlet on life insurance I was not aware that he had already been compelled to withdraw it from circulation and to advertise at his own expense an unqualified apology to Messrs. Grindlay and Co., Calcutta, and Messrs. Grindlay, Groom, and Co., Bombay, for what he admits to have been "altogether unfounded charges against these firms." He ought to be grateful (as, indeed, he says he is) for their moderation and forbearance in letting him off with an apology. Mr. Henderson has a very unruly pen, and if he does not take care he will one of these days get himself into serious trouble.

As I briefly mentioned last week, the Bank of New Zealand has sent me a copy of a letter which its general manager addressed to the New Zealand Times in reference to the case of Captain Hamilton and the Mangatoro estate. My remarks on the subject a fortnight ago were based upon the report of a Committee of the New Zealand House of Representatives, and it was in answer to this report that the manager's letter was written. He points out that although the property was knocked down to the bank at the auction sale for £5,000, the true consideration was the £68,000 which the bank had advanced to Captain Hamilton, and which he had not repaid; but this must, I think, have been obvious to every reader of my paragraphs. As to the Act of Parliament which was subsequently passed, the manager says that its main object was to enable the bank to hold, as in one account, the whole of the property assets which had accumulated in its hands, and that Captain Hamilton's position was not affected by the retrospective operation of the measure. The committee took a different view. In regard to the result of the transaction, the manager says the price at which the property was finally sold "did little more than recoup what had been spent upon it, with reasonable interest, during the time it had been in the bank's hands."

Cannes.—Gallia Palace. Built in 1900. 40 apartments with private baths. Garage for 30 Motor-cars. Orchestra.

Reference is made by the manager to a judgment of the New Zealand Court of Appeal, which in an action instituted by Captain Hamilton "unanimously acquitted the bank of any fraudulent or improper dealing." For my own part I never for a moment supposed that an institution of the high standing of the Bank of New Zealand had been guilty of anything in the nature of fraudulent or improper dealing, nor did I read the finding of the committee in that sense. The finding was that Captain Hamilton suffered a serious wrong, and that his claim to redress deserved the favourable consideration of the Government. The seizure of the estate during a period of financial difficulty in the colony may have been a perfectly justifiable step from the point of view of the bank—a step which the management was indeed bound to take in the interests of its own shareholders. But it may nevertheless have been a great hardship to the owner, and the Parliamentary Committee's recommendation of State compensation is presumably founded upon the opinion (disputed by the manager) that the State made itself partly responsible by passing the retrospective Act.

In response to an inquiry put forward last week I have been furnished with copies of the circular and plan issued by the Strathcona Coal and Exploration Syndicate, Limited, 90, Mitchell Street, Glasgow, in reference to its offer of plots in Rosslyn Town site, near Fort William, Ontario. The circular describes these plots as a "splendid Canadian land investment," and over two of its three pages of letterpress are devoted to an account of the rapid growth of Fort William, now a prosperous city with upwards of 25,000 inhabitants. Rosslyn is described as a town site "in the suburbs of Fort William city, being only seven miles out, and bound to become a residential centre." In his letter to Truth Mr. H. S. Hancock, the City Engineer, says that Rosslyn lies thirteen miles west of Fort William; but perhaps the discrepancy in the distances given is due to the company's measurement being made from a different point. Mr. Hancock wrote to me in consequence of the arrival at Fort William of a Glasgow acquaintance who had bought land at Rosslyn and proposed to build on it. He seems to have been disillusioned regarding the splendour of his investment, and Mr. Hancock fears that other purchasers may have a similar disappointment.

The building ground at Rosslyn is being sold by the syndicate at £15 per plot of 33 ft. by 132 ft. This works out at £150 per acre. According to Mr. Hancock, the whole "town site" of 200 acres was sold less than two years ago for £300. It will be interesting if the syndicate will state whether this is correct, and, if so, what development there has been to justify the advance in the price from £1 10s. to £150 per acre. "As a Canadian land investment, which will increase in value within a very short time," says the circular, "we know of nothing better." As the sellers they are entitled to their opinion, but Mr. Hancock, who is on the spot, takes a pessimistic view of the prospects of Rosslyn for at any rate a good many years to come.

On the plan there is a space marked "municipal buildings." Do they exist? Mr. Hancock says that they do not, and, what is more, that the only buildings in Rosslyn are a roofless boiler house, a grocer's shop and dwelling combined, built of wood, and a small church in course of construction for the farmers of the vicinity. The syndicate only offer the plots as those of a "town site," not, of course, an existing town. It is quite possible, however, that purchasers in Scotland, of whom there are said to be a considerable number, do not fully understand the actual condition of affairs at Rosslyn; and Mr. Hancock suggests that, if further information is required, inquiries should be addressed to the City Assessor or the City Clerk of Fort William, or any city official or bank manager there.

Just now Canadian land investments are being strongly recommended in this country. No doubt there are many excellent openings for profitable investment in the Dominion. But it is obviously the height of folly for Britishers to buy land there without any local knowledge or any independent advice, or indeed any information whatever beyond that which they receive from the vendors or their agents.

SCRUTATOR.

DISHING THE RADS.

NOT so long ago the highest ideal of Tory statesmanship was expressed in the phrase "dishing the Whigs." The Whigs have disappeared from among us, but the Tory survives, changed in little but name; and on the eve of the general election the country has been treated to a Tory "dishing" operation surpassing anything conceived by party cookery in the Victorian era. The Conservative opportunist of those days was satisfied to jettison one of his political principles at a time when he desired to "dish" his rivals by posing as an ardent reformer. His successors are apparently ready to throw the whole British Constitution overboard in order to convince spectators that the democratic ideals and progressive instincts of Codlin are in advance of those of Short. The resolutions adopted by the House of Lords in the last fortnight of the Session, though ingeniously contrived to exclude in substance what they conceded in form, involved the largest amendment of the Constitution that has been attempted since 1832. But they are reduced to insignificance by Mr. Balfour's declaration that, if returned to office, he would not carry out the measure which for years past has been the principal, and almost the only measure in the programme of his party, and which has already been submitted to the country at two general elections, without first submitting the principle of it to the process of a referendum.

The Referendum, as everybody knows, is a method which has been adopted in one or two democratic countries for the purpose of eliciting popular opinion on legislative proposals—chiefly "organic laws," or amendments of the Constitution. For this or other limited purposes it may have a definite utility, and the principle underlying it is democratic in the extreme. But its utility must always depend upon the general political circumstances of the country which employs it; it is obviously inapplicable to complicated legislative proposals; it loses its raison d'être in the presence of an efficient representative second chamber; and it is most difficult to reconcile with the theory and practice of parliamentary government as developed in the United Kingdom. It has hitherto only been advocated by a few rather faddy Liberals; and until the last three weeks it has been more or less emphatically damned by every Conservative who has discussed it, including Mr. Balfour and Lord Curzon.

Nor is Conservative distrust of the Referendum unreasonable. Every one can see for himself that the adoption of this principle may put an end to our whole system of Parliamentary government, substituting for it government by plébiscite. It may easily destroy at a blow the whole theory of the responsibility of Ministers to Parliament; it is very likely, indeed, to weaken the individual member's sense of responsibility to his constituents, and even to himself. The Daily Telegraph light-heartedly informed its readers last week that a Ministry defeated on a Referendum would, of course, be under no necessity to resign. The situation thus conjured up is simply unthinkable. A Ministry doubtful of its majority in the Commons will be no longer under the necessity of facing a hostile vote on a division, necessitating resignation. It will only have to introduce a Bill—or, better still, as Mr. Balfour proposes, formulate anything it likes to call "principles"—and take a Referendum. If the vote is against the measure it will remain in office until the necessity arises of repeating the process with some other measure. It matters not whether the question be Tariff Reform, Home Rule, Disestablishment, or any other proposal, Liberal or Conservative. Any Bill involving possible unpleasantness can be "side-tracked" by this process, and the Ministry can go on its way rejoicing and drawing its salaries for an indefinite period. When it comes to a general election, any Minister or any individual M.P. can promise the electors anything he pleases, while at the same time he can invite those who do not like his programme to vote for him in the full security that no part of it will be carried out until the people have endorsed it by a Referendum vote. Does this last result read like the reduction of politics to the level of comic opera? All I can say is that, although the Referendum is as yet a vision of the future, Mr. Balfour has already used it in this very sense. Most considerately, he has shown the public exactly how the trick may be worked by the candidate for office. "Don't be afraid to put us in power," he cries to the Free Trade electorate; "I promise you that we won't introduce a tariff without taking a Referendum on it."

To any one capable of reflection it must be clear that whether the Referendum is to be an instrument fraught with the most revolutionary and far-reaching consequences, or an innocent and possibly useful adjunct to our political system, will depend entirely upon the mode in which the principle is applied. Before any opinion can be formed as to the advisability of adopting it, we must know definitely in what cases it is to be used, by whom it is to be used, by whom and how the questions submitted to a popular vote are to be stated, and what is to be the constitutional effect of the vote when given. All these are points requiring the most careful examination and thought, and on all of them the country has the clearest right to know every detail of what is proposed and to have the opportunity of voting upon them before the scheme becomes a part of the Constitution. Yet this momentous proposal, never before heard of in English politics as a practical scheme, has been sprung on the country at a moment's notice as a sort of side issue at a general election. It first made its appearance, less than three weeks ago, as an incident of the Lansdowne plan for removing a deadlock between the two Houses when all other means had been exhausted—a very proper and reasonable use for it in principle, whatever difficulties or objections might be raised in practice. But not till Parliament had been dissolved and the first polls were close at hand was the Referendum, with all its incalculable consequences, propounded as an ordinary part of our legislative machinery. And then how? Not as a thing of any intrinsic importance; not as a considered proposal for amending the Constitution; not as a measure to be placed in the fore-front of the legislative programme of the next Unionist Government; but just interjected casually into a statement of policy on another question, and obviously for no other purpose than to influence the minds of voters on one of the primary issues of the election—in short, a mere incident in the operation of dishing the Radicals. It is one of the cant phrases of the moment that the Unionists stand for reform and the Liberals for revolution. Neither the Veto Bill nor any Liberal reconstruction of the House of Lords that is likely to follow its passage into law threatens such a subversion of existing constitutional practice as the sweeping innovation that Mr. Balfour has sprung on the country; and not even in the wildest vagaries of revolutionary times is there any parallel to the airy nonchalance with which this innovation was—not proposed as a reform, but assumed as though it were a fact of no particular consequence already familiar to everybody.

Whatever may be the result of the present election, it is likely to be remembered in history as the occasion when the Unionist party shed the last rags of Conservative tradition and gave up, for the time at any rate, the defence of the Constitution as a bad job. It is possible that the Liberals may be successfully dished. The poorest tactics may have a measure of success against a five-year-old Ministry, which has not managed its own campaign in the best way possible. But there is ground to doubt whether even in the present circumstances the country will elect to be ruled by Conservatives in Liberal clothes, and that this masquerade can be permanently successful is impossible. The best that the Opposition can hope for is to find an opportunity of resuming their old clothes by getting into office for a time. The country, as a whole and in the long run, prefers that Conservatives should be Conservatives and Liberals Liberals. The behaviour of what was once the Constitutional Party towards our venerable Constitution reminds one of the daughters of Pelias when they put their aged parent piecemeal into Medea's cauldron in the expectation of making him young again. The experiment failed, if I remember rightly, because the damsels had not fully mastered the form of incantation which was to do the trick. This sort of business is not to be undertaken at a moment's notice and without previous study. It is by no means impossible that the British Constitution should be thrown into the cauldron and come out with its youth renewed, but the result will depend on the qualifications of the operator. It is devoutly to be hoped that the modern daughters of Pelias may be saved by the electors from the guilt of parricide.

THE COMPULSORY SERVICE BUBBLE.

Mr. John Murray is to be congratulated on publishing a remarkable book on military policy for a price (2s. 6d.) which puts it within reach of every soldier's reading room, and every village library: I am referring to "Compulsory Service," by Sir Ian Hamilton, with a preface by Mr. Haldane. Not long before the South African War broke out, believing he was doomed all his life to garrison service, Sir Ian very nearly "chucked" the Army in order to join the ranks of the literary profession. With all respect to this gallant officer, I think he is a better soldier than he would have made a journalist, for his writing is as lengthy, obscure, and discursive as Mr. Haldane's is short, clear, and pithy. But when the reader touches bottom, and gets at Sir Ian's views, they are nearly always sound and in striking agreement with those which have been put forward in Truth in regard to Imperial Defence generally and compulsory service in particular.

Take first of all the Imperial side of the question. The Empire has been built up not by pressed men, but by "francs tireurs" filled with the spirit of filibustering adventure, who have generally been traders first and only incidentally fighters. Germans, Russians, Italians, French, all have either completely failed, or have only very partially succeeded as colonisers because professional conscript soldiers are fish out of water when they find themselves on foreign soil. The raison d'être of conscription is defence of hearth and home, and while the conscript will serve his time for this purpose he simply won't do police duty abroad. This can only be done by volunteers, and a voluntary and conscript army cannot exist side by side together. The latter eats up the former. Continental experience proves this. Russia cannot get volunteers to go to Asia, nor can Germany get recruits for voluntary service in South-West Africa, while France is only able to maintain a small colonial force of 28,000 men by the grant of large bounties, high rates of pay, and the promise of certain civil employment at home when the men return to France. Peace soldiering is nowhere popular on the Continent, and after two years' hard service the conscript does not want to have anything more to do with military life.

With us the problem is further complicated owing to the large demands made by India and our other oversea dominions for voluntary troops from Great Britain. There are at this moment, including reservists, considerably over 300,000 men legally liable to be sent abroad if required. If the million strong army of the National Service League came into existence for home defence it would swallow up the source of supply from which these men are drawn. "I fear," writes Sir Ian Hamilton—and his words cannot be too strongly emphasised—"that compulsory home service must deprive the Regular Army of many thousands of eighteen to nineteen year old recruits. It is true that men might enlist into the Army after they had finished their recruit training; they might do so, but would they do so? Experience in the Adjutant-General's Department says, 'No.'" This being so, how can the Indian garrison be reinforced, our coaling stations defended, and the expeditionary force maintained up to its full strength? And what will then become of the Empire? The real fact is that the nation has not adopted compulsory military service because compulsion would weaken instead of strengthening our position with our neighbours. Military systems are dictated by political conditions, and as with the Roman so with the British Empire, its foreign service legions must be recruited by voluntary mercenaries and not by conscripts whose rôle is for other purposes.

I will ask my readers now to consider the matter from the side of defence. The Bill drafted by the National Service League proposes to establish a big home defence army of men raised and trained on the Swiss system, but only liable to serve at home. Compulsory training is to last for four years, from the age of eighteen to twenty-two, after which period the men will be liable to be called out in an emergency up to the age of thirty. The annual contingent for training purposes is fixed at 150,000, and allowing for wastage after the proposed Act has been in force for four years this gives some 400,000 men as always being under training. After the period of four years' compulsory training the annual wastage would, of course, rapidly increase, and when the scheme had been running for twelve years there would be perhaps a million of men available for a national emergency muster. These men would, however, only have had some six months' training distributed among the first four years of their period of liability, and no training at all in the last eight years. What are to be the functions of this big compulsory semi-trained militia force? Home defence; but this has been entrusted to the Navy. "The primary proposition," writes Mr. Haldane, "is that command of the sea is the essential foundation of our strategy not only for Imperial, but for home defence. The Navy undertakes to protect British shores from invasion on a great scale. I call this our basic principle, and looking to our geographical position it is vital that the Army and Navy should be organised with this conclusion in view." Yet the National Service League proposes to organise an army in direct violation of this "basic principle," which has been irrevocably accepted by both parties in the State. When will soldiers learn to comprehend the true principles of Imperial defence? When will they understand that the strategical rôle of the Navy is the mobile defence of our shores from invasion, that of the Army being oversea attack? The fourteen divisions of the Territorial Army are, as many think, more than sufficient to repel raids, and to increase the strength of this force by compulsory enlistment would be to set up a white elephant at the certain expense of our foreign garrisons and of the six expeditionary divisions which are kept at home. As to figures of comparative cost, the question is not one of finance but of policy, and this has been fixed beyond doubt and in such a way as to take all wind out of the sails of the National Service League. On this point both Mr. Haldane and Sir Ian Hamilton are in agreement. "The tendency of the scheme," writes the War Secretary, "is in the direction of the merely defensive, and away from the tradition which we have hitherto believed to be the inheritance of our people from Chatham and Nelson. It was not by waiting for the enemy to arrive on these shores that those great British strategists carried on the operations of war. They defended the empire not by sitting down and making preparations for the enemy's coming, but by throwing their efforts into seeking him out and into fashioning their instruments for offence." Napoleon could not have written truer words, which I venture to commend to the notice of the distinguished Field-Marshal and his followers who are giving the country a false lead in regard to a matter of fundamental Imperial policy.

PHOTOGRAPHY AND ART?

Time was when the photographer's art lay largely in trying to picture things as they really are. I recall this fact sometimes, and rub my eyes as I try to realise how far we have progressed beyond this primitive ideal! Photography is now an art, and "Art in Photography" is a cant phrase. Yet I wonder sometimes when I look through the pages of illustrated papers whether the change is wholly for the better. I wonder also when my friends send me their latest photographs whether it is really more satisfactory that the pictures should show the sitters, not as they are, but as they would like to be. Our grandfathers and grandmothers used to go to be photographed in much the same spirit as they would go to the dentist. Their prim fixed features showed that they were undergoing an ordeal, but all the same the old daguerreotypes and early photographs did resemble them, and I cherish fondly the little cases in which these portraits lie enshrined. Nowadays everything is changed. Miss Smith, if she be not prepossessing in appearance, goes to an artistic photographer, and what is the result? She presents her friends with a huge picture showing herself décolletée beyond all reason, clutching a wisp of tulle round her shoulders, and in all probability she has her face turned away so that she merely gives you a glimpse of profile as she glances over her shoulder. The photographer has told her that her shoulders and this fragment of profile are her most pleasing features, and accordingly I get a picture which no more suggests the Miss Smith I am accustomed to meet than a Gaiety beauty resembles a suffragette.

Presumably it is out of compliment to the stage that so many society women nowadays seem to desire that their counterfeit presentments should make them look like actresses. On the other hand, it is only fair to say that an appreciable number of actresses are photographed trying to look like ladies. The actress, of course, has a legitimate reason for advertising herself by means of photography as much as possible. It is important to her that her features should be known; but which clever professional was it who first thought of photographing stage favourites proudly parading their offspring? I may admire Miss Brown, Miss Jones, and Miss Robinson very much when they are on the stage, but when paper after paper that I open contains pictures of "Miss Brown and her daughter Topsy," "Miss Jones and her son Peter," "Miss Robinson and her twins Pot and Kettle" I get bored. To me these things are for the home circle and not for the public. Society women are just as great sinners in this respect. Moreover, when they are photographed with their children they have a pretty fancy for making the little darlings pose without any clothes. Consequently you get pictures of Lady Highgate Hill sitting somewhere out in the open, while darling, dimpled little Viscount Hampstead, sans clothes, hangs round her neck. I only hope that these poor children do not catch cold through being sacrificed to the craving for publicity of their mothers. When the infants are clothed they are often dressed up in some absurd way; but is it necessary that we should be inundated with portraits of fond mothers displaying their broods?

So much for this aspect of the question, and I quite admit that I may be singular in advocating more reticence. It is when I come to what is known as art in photography that I really get wrathful. I see no art in a fancy study of a lightly attired nymph, all bare legs and wisps of tulle, looking as though she were running from a satyr and wanting to be caught! There is no attraction to me in a picture of Lady Marjorie Clapham trying to look like a bacchante, and when I come across what is called "A charming study of the Hon. Mrs. Bruton as Lady Hamilton" I hurriedly turn over. Actresses and society women are equal sinners in this respect. Both have shown a tendency lately to burst out into bare feet and bare legs on the smallest provocation. Both love to be pictured as nymphs, bacchantes, sirens, mermaids, or, indeed, as anything that they are not, and the photographer always has a fancy back cloth against which they can pose in order to get the proper picturesque effect. Do these pictures gratify any one or any thing but the sitter's vanity—I wonder very much.

Another prevalent craze among these art studies is to have no name, but merely a fancy picture. This may be called "Spring Flowers," "The Milkmaid," "Fancy Free," or "Meditation," but in it you see some professional photographer's model trying, now to look spring-like and radiant, the while she sniffs a bouquet, or else she is blithely walking the meadows with milkpails, or standing endeavouring to look soulful and intense to typify maiden innocence. There is the hall-mark of the professional model, though, on all these pictures, which are not art, and serve no useful purpose in photography. Worse than any such freaks, however, are those grotesque concoctions in which you see leading lights of the variety theatres photographed in the midst of carefully faked surroundings. For instance, you get a picture of Miss Pansy Sinclair in very short skirts sitting on one horn of a crescent moon, while underneath is some such legend as "A Dainty Moonbeam." Most fiendish resource has been shown by photographers in compiling composite pictures of this nature. Skilfully arranged cotton wool combined with a study of Miss Topsy Barelegs gives you at once "The Spirit of the Clouds," while "A Water Nymph" can be easily arranged by enlarging a water lily leaf and then so photographing a tableau vivant model in the altogether that she appears to be asleep upon it. Photography is a wonderful art or science when used legitimately, but all these developments tend to become nauseating. Is not the time approaching when both sitters and photographers might well show a little restraint?

OUR DEBT TO THE INVALID.

The age is frequently accused of being squeamish and sentimental, and a number of whole and healthy persons are always to be found to declare that it is a sign of degeneracy to care so much for those who are technically known as "unfit." Such persons wish to abolish hospitals, asylums, homes for cripples, and all other institutions which have for object the preservation and amelioration of life to those who suffer mentally and physically. But people who are advocates of euthanasia are, on the whole, healthy and mentally vigorous, and to such people the thought of suffering is intolerable; they cannot believe in any enjoyment of life as possible under painful conditions. Perhaps some day the hopelessly insane and the hopelessly invalid will be quietly removed from our midst, but before that comes to pass we shall have to invent some means of defining the exact boundary between insanity and surplus mental activity on the one hand, and of measuring, on the other hand, the capacity for enjoyment, which varies so much in different people.

Another delicate matter to be settled before we get to that stage is the exact value set by different persons upon happiness in life. Many hopeless invalids are very happy in spite of their sufferings. They are spirit transcending the flesh. Another question to be considered is that of the value of any particular human being to the world. By the time we have some system of measuring all these things accurately surely we shall have discovered some way of preventing sickness and madness. The robust spirits which read such appeals, for instance, as those recently published by Princess Christian on behalf of the National Association for the Feeble-Minded, by Princess Louise Duchess of Argyll on behalf of the Chailey School of Arts and Crafts for Crippled Boys and Girls, and by Lady Juliet Duff in the interests of Charing Cross Hospital, and, having read them, declare that all such efforts are directly against Nature, who intends the fit to survive and the unfit to die more or less painfully—these people overlook the enormous debt which humanity owes to men whom a system of euthanasia would have removed from among us at a very early age.

If mere physical disability is to be the standard of unfitness we must remember that Homer and Milton were blind, and, to drop from the supreme to the solid plane, so was John Lothrop Motley. The disqualification of insanity would have deprived us not only of Ludwig II. and, through him, Wagner, but of a wild and impressive spirit such as Edgar Allan Poe, and Lamb, himself an invalid, would not have been himself without the influence of his sister, who would most certainly have been sacrificed to a rigid sense of physical unfitness. If, as many people say, the taking of drugs is an indication of complete unfitness, the world would have had to go without De Quincey and Coleridge, whose "Kubla Khan" alone is surely sufficient justification for letting him live to write it. In it, indeed, occurs one of the two standard instances of sheer, unadulterated magic in words. The whole thing exerts an unearthly fascination over the mind up to the final quatrain:—

> Weave a circle round him thrice,
> And close your eyes with holy dread,
> For he on honey dew hath fed,
> And drunk the milk of Paradise.

Another famous instance of magic in English literature is found in the work of a man who was all his life an invalid and died early of an incurable disease. If a kindly, strong-minded, robust humanitarian of the "survival of the fittest" school had been on the spot with a painless poison about 1810 we should never have heard of the nightingale,

> That ofttimes hath > Charmed magic casements opening on the foam
> Of perilous seas, in faery lands forlorn, and incidentally we should have missed the whole series of iridescent miracles contained in the poems of Keats. The list of those to whom the disqualification of bad health would have brought what advocates of the system call "merciful release" before they had done the work which so far as we can see they were put into the world to do is long and catholic. It includes besides those already mentioned Swift, Heine, Chopin, Sullivan, Robert Louis Stevenson, Byron, Carlyle, Ruskin, Shelley, St. Francis of Assisi, Cecil Rhodes, Lord Clive, Rousseau, Voltaire, Balzac, Tourgenieff, Björnson, Ibsen, Mrs. Browning, and Giorgioni.

It is frequently asserted that the influence of unhealthy men is unhealthy. There is not much of the morbid, however, about the work of Milton or Cecil Rhodes, and he who finds hypochondria in Stevenson's writings must himself be in a very bad way. It is curious to note how many of the world's famous invalids have taken to literature—probably because this is the line of least resistance to a spirit already heavily handicapped. It allows the body perfect repose and does not require movement or study outside the home.

There are those who consider old age as complete reason for gentle removal as any other form of physical disability. Dr. Osler, for instance, thinks that after forty a man is no use to the world, and any personal enjoyment he may get out of life he must be called upon to renounce in order that a younger man may step into his shoes. This immediately removes Ibsen, Tolstoy, Rhodes, Carlyle, Ruskin, and Voltaire in their full stride, and most artists when they are just coming to maturity in their methods. In fact, Nature has her laws, but the mind has its individuality. Suffering, which the healthy believe to be intolerable, is not only bearable, but sometimes incidental, in the mental vision of the sufferer. We may estimate the weakness of the body, but we can never estimate the strength of the spirit. Neither happiness nor suffering is the most important thing in life. It is quite a mistake to look upon our care of the feeble and suffering as mere sentiment and weak squeamishness. It is, on the other hand, strong-mindedness and a belief in the "unconquerable soul" of which that suffering cripple Henley sang.

THE STANDARD OIL TRUST.

VII.—OPERATIONS IN GREAT BRITAIN.

I HAVE reserved until the end of my survey the examination of the Standard Oil Trust's operations in Great Britain because, as they have not been investigated so closely here as they have been by various Legislative Committees in the United States, there is less official testimony to proceed upon. Many of the Trust's intrigues and agitations here can only be understood by remembering what has been proved by direct testimony to have taken place in similar circumstances in the United States. In this way our preceding examination of the secret rebate, the bribery, the underselling, and all the other machinery of the Trust in its native home will help us to understand a few things which are still obscure here. During the time when the Trust was growing up in America, the British consumer and the British oil-dealer were alike blissfully unconscious of what was in store for them.

For the first English news of the Trust we must turn to the evidence provided by Sir Boverton Redwood, the distinguished chemist, whose subsequent appearances at so many public inquiries as a Standard Oil witness have been fitly rewarded by his selection as Petroleum Adviser to the Home Office!

Mr. Redwood in America.

This takes us back to the years 1877-8, when Mr. Boverton Redwood was the Secretary of the Petroleum Association, and visited America at their request to induce the American refiners to adopt the Abel (closed) tester in standardising their oil, and also to complain of certain impurities which were appearing in their consignments. With regard to the first, Mr. Redwood's report to his association shows that he conducted experiments with the Petroleum Committee of the New York Produce Exchange which satisfied them with the Abel tester, and we read that Mr. Paul Babcock took great interest in these experiments. Mr. Babcock was then a director of the Devoe Manufacturing Company, about this time bought by the Trust, and twenty years later he and Mr. Boverton Redwood met in London, both giving evidence before the Commons' Petroleum Committee against raising the flash-point of kerosene. Mr. Redwood met at this time a number of other persons whose names will be familiar to readers of my narrative. He, for example, visited the refinery of Messrs. Charles Pratt and Company through the kindness of Mr. H. H. Rogers, and when he left New York he carried letters of introduction from Mr. Wm. Rockefeller, Vice-President of the Standard Oil Company, to Col. Payne, its Treasurer, in Cleveland, Ohio. Indeed, Mr. Redwood's tour seems to have been in the main a Standard Oil excursion, for in Philadelphia he visited Messrs. Warden and Frew (who were in the Trust), at Pittsburg he saw Mr. Charles Lockhart, of Lockhart and Frew (another Trust firm), and then at Cleveland he was taken over the Standard Oil works by Mr. Samuel Andrews (John D. Rockefeller's first partner). When he returned Mr. Redwood was the bearer of a letter from Mr. Wm. Rockefeller, dated December 19, 1877, couched in the best Standard Oil vein:—

> It is our desire to furnish at all times refined oil that will be acceptable to the trade of all countries. It is our wish and intention that our products shall always reach the highest excellence.

Whatever their wish might be, the prospect of making more money proved too strong for these philanthropists, and complaints continued from the English traders as to the bad quality of the oil sent here. In 1879 and again in 1884, Mr. F. W. Lockwood, a saponaceous Standard Oil expert, was sent here to gammon the Petroleum Association with some cock and bull story. The second visit is referred to by Mr. Boverton Redwood in a report to the Petroleum Association, published in the Grocer of May 3, 1884. In it he explained that Mr. Lockwood attributed the complaints about the oil to the use of damp-clogged or hard lamp-wicks. This great discovery was too much even for Mr. Redwood, who has never been a harsh critic of the Standard Oil Trust methods. He thus reported:—

> In conclusion, I desire to record as strongly as possible my individual opinion that in their own interest the American refiners should forthwith institute such arrangements as will ensure the future maintenance of a satisfactory standard of quality. Considerable injury to the petroleum trade results from the distribution of such oil as is the subject of this report, consumers in many cases relinquishing the use of petroleum oil in favour of some other sort of light. Moreover, the American refiners should bear in mind that even now they have not a monopoly of the supply of mineral burning oil in this country, and they will find it necessary to pay much greater attention than heretofore to the quality of the oil they manufacure.

As an impartial testimony to the then quality of the Standard's illuminating oils and the wonderful processes of manufacture which their Press Bureau tells us (in 1910) they invented, I should give that document a high place. But to do them justice, the American refiners were not above taking a hint from other manufacturers. A gentleman with long experience in the oil trade once told me how Mr. H. H. Rogers about this time came to England. Up in the North there was a manufacturer of lubricating oils who had by his own ingenuity and skill developed some excellent ideas. He used to blend American oils, and Mr. Rogers asked one of the importers who dealt in their goods to introduce him. They went over the works together, and the proud owner showed them all his special processes and his little inventions and blends. Rogers was a practical refiner, he kept his eyes open, and after he returned to America the Standard's first lubricating oil branch, the Thompson and Bedford Company, of New York, began to export here some of the specialties which the North countryman had made. As brain-pickers the Standard men have no equal.

The Standard's First English Company.

The first appearance of the Standard in this country was rather sudden. There came here an American gentleman named Frank E. Bliss, who had been connected with the business of Charles Pratt and Co. Nobody knew what his London business was, but one day there appeared in the Financial News the brief record of the registration at Somerset House on April 27, 1888, of the Anglo-American Oil Company, Limited. It had a capital of £500,000 in £20 shares. The first list of signatories contained several clerks and agents, but it also bore the name of Frank E. Bliss, and that told those who were in the trade what was coming. The first list of directors subsequently filed at Somerset House included such sound reliable Standard Oil names as H. H. Rogers, J. D. Archbold, W. H. Libby, J. G. Gregory, and Wesley H. Tilford, all of 26, Broadway, New York, and Frank E. Bliss, of London. The precise significance of the word "Anglo" in its title becomes clearer when it is stated that the articles of association provided that the directors' meetings should be held in London, but that if a majority of the directors so decided they might be held in New York or any other part of the United States of America. As there was only one director resident in England, it is not hard to guess where most of the directors' meetings took place. This also helps us to appreciate the amount of truth in Mr. J. D. Archbold's Missouri evidence (quoted in my first article) that he did not know why the Anglo-American Oil Company made loans amounting to £500,000 to its managing director, Mr. J. Macdonald. Mr. Archbold was a director of the "Anglo" from the outset until somewhere between July, 1907, and July, 1908. In 1893 its capital was increased to £520,000, and at this time Mr. John D. Rockefeller's name first appears on the share list as the owner of 6,867 shares out of a total of 26,000. In July, 1899, the share list of the Anglo-American Oil Company contained the following names. As will be seen, many of the names have appeared in the course of my articles, and the list contains a great deal of "American" and very little "Anglo." Where no address is given below, the return at Somerset House has "26, Broadway, New York," which is the central address of the Standard:—

There have been various changes in the share list, and on June 30, 1910, the following were the principal shareholders:—

| | Shares. |
|---|---|
| Standard Oil Company of New Jersey | 49,993 |
| Trustees Standard Oil Trust | 1 |
| Frederick D. Asche | 1 |
| J. H. Usmar, 22, Billiter Street, E.C., merchant | 1 |

| James Hamilton, 22, Billiter Street, merchant | 1 |
| | 50,000 |

The capital of the company was at that date £1,000,000 in £20 shares. It is worthy of notice that in 1907-8, at a period when Mr. Roosevelt and his party were out after the Trusts, Mr. Archbold, Mr. Rogers, and nearly all the American directors of the Anglo-American resigned. In June last the directors were Mr. J. H. Usmar, Mr. Thomas H. Hawkins, Mr. F. E. Powell, Mr. William P. McKendrick, of 22, Billiter Street, and Mr. F. D. Asche, of 26, Broadway, New York. Mr. Fred D. Asche is a clerk in the export department of the Standard in New York. Thus, while in 1889 there were five directors resident in New York and one in London, in 1910 there were four directors resident in London and one in New York—a somewhat significant reversal of the ratio. Mr. Jas. A. Macdonald, the gentleman already mentioned, ceased to be managing director in 1906, when his one share was transferred to the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey.

The "Anglo" at Work.

The advent of the Anglo-American Oil Company was the beginning of troubled times in the English petroleum trade. Mr. Rockefeller's motto, "Pay nobody a profit," was put into force, and the Trust began to buy out or to starve out the various groups of middlemen who had hitherto been vending their oils to the English consumer. Some evidence on that point was given to the Select Committee on Petroleum in 1897 by Mr. W. J. Leonard, of Carless, Capel, and Leonard, Pharos Oil Works, Hackney Wick. Mr. Leonard stated that London was then the only "free market" for other oil than Standard, since, although there were independent dealers in Liverpool, they had for several years a "selling agreement" with the Anglo-American Oil Company. Then came these answers:—

The Chairman: I want to know what there is to prevent you importing oil into Liverpool in competition with the Anglo-American Oil Company?—A. If we did this of course the Anglo-American Oil Company would at once put down their price, so that we should have to sell at a ruinous loss, and we cannot afford to compete with them; I mean, we are all afraid of them. If we sent oil to Liverpool the Anglo-American price, instead of being nearly ¾d. a gallon more than the price in London, would probably be something like ¾d. a gallon less than the price in London. That would be the immediate effect.

Q. Yes, but is there not a regular importation, and an increasing importation, of Russian oil?—A. No, it is not an increasing importation; it is not, certainly. Of course the Anglo-American Company are getting the whole business practically (Report and evidence, 1897, Q. 4,834).

This is how an "independent" oil merchant talked of the colossal power of the Standard Oil Trust at that date, and their influence extended even to the smallest transactions. When a great proportion of oil was still imported in barrels, at least one London firm did a very good business buying up the empty oil barrels from the hawkers and small dealers, who used to collect them at the consumer's premises. The barrels were well made, and the Standard gladly bought the empties to use again. But it found somebody else was making a living. This would never do. At once the Standard began to offer small inducements to the hawkers, and the barrels went to them direct, so that the small factor's business was killed.

Very interesting evidence was given by Mr. W. T. Rigby, Secretary of the Liverpool Oil Dealers' Association, who was called in support of the Standard's opposition to the raising of the flashpoint. He said the members of his Association objected to the Anglo-American Company supplying so small a quantity as five gallons to small shops which had formerly been supplied by the small wholesaler. He went on:—

In the first instance, when the Anglo American put their tanks on the ground they gave us their word that no less a quantity than twenty gallons would be delivered, but when they found that the retail dealers of Liverpool would not embrace the new system of tank-waggon delivery, but preferred to take it in the old style of barrels, they, in the words of their Liverpool manager, were forced to administer a stab in our backs—this is, go really behind us and secure that trade which legitimately belonged to the Liverpool chandler doing a small wholesale business, and that is why they [his association] are objecting to the delivery of anything less than ten gallons of oil (Report and evidence, 1897, Q. 6,052).

"Tied Houses."

But some of the wholesalers, especially where in the provinces they had built up a good business which it would be difficult for the Standard to capture, were allowed to remain as "tied houses" in the trade. Some evidence was with difficulty extracted by the Lord Advocate and Mr. McKillop, M.P., at the same committee from Mr. Geo. Base, a large "independent" oil dealer of Norwich, who had come up to give evidence in support of the Standard's views against raising the flash point.

Mr. M'Killop, M.P.: Have you any freedom to use any class of oil you like?—A. We prefer American oil. In fact, we have dealt in nothing else.

Have you a general freedom to use Russian oil, for example, if you choose?—We don't like Russian oil.

Are you bound to any particular dealer? Are you bound to use American oil?—Yes, that is so. That is largely because of choice.

You are under contract?—Yes.

You are not allowed to sell any other?—Yes, that is so.

Mr. Ure, M.P.: What do you mean by contract?—I mean I have an arrangement at present in distributing American oil.

Do you mean that you have a binding agreement with the Standard Oil Company to sell nothing but their oil for a specified period?—No, not for a specified period.

For an indefinite period?—There is no period specified whatever.

Do you mean that you have a signed agreement to this effect, "signed, sealed, and delivered"?—If it is a binding agreement, it does not matter whether it is signed or not.

Is that a common type of agreement with the American company and its customers?—I don't know.

Does it specify any price?—No.

Does it preclude you from dealing in the oil of any other company?—Well, yes, it does to a certain extent.

What happens supposing you have oil from any other com-

Scrubb & Co., Ltd., caution the public against the many injurious imitations of Scrubb's Ammonia that are being offered, and draw attention to their having affixed the signature of Scrubb & Co. to each bottle, without which none is genuine.

pany?—That I can hardly say, but I am perfectly at liberty to determine the agreement at any time I choose.

Do you mean that breach of the agreement would not entail a claim for damages?—No.

Then what "consideration" do you get for entering into such agreement?—The consideration is the larger volume of business.

But you can without an agreement deal in it?—Yes.

Why? You go into this agreement, and can give me no reasons for it. Is it in writing?—In print.

So that a great number of people enter into the same kind of agreement, apparently?—No, I think not. Of course, I have no personal knowledge (Report and evidence, 1897, Q. 3,475 et seq.).

We have only to read the evidence of Mr. Leonard and Mr. Rigby, and the American evidence given in my previous articles, to understand why these "tied houses" exist.

The Flashpoint Scandal.

It is now time to devote a little attention to one of the Standard's great triumphs in this country—the staving off until this present day of the legislative raising of the flash-point of petroleum. I desire to make this explanation short and simple. The flash-point is the temperature at which an oil will give off vapour, which, mixed with air, is explosive. In other words, it is the point at which a flame brought close to its surface will cause it to explode—the explosion being of course small in a 2-in. deep test cup, but serious when a lamp or a barrel is in question. The test depends on the presence of vapour. It is obvious therefore that any test cup which allows the vapour to escape before the flame can be applied is useless. The advocates of safe oil have always demanded a test cup which would retain the vapour, and the petroleum traders in Europe and America have always pushed some kind of cup which would allow as much as possible of the vapour to escape. The steps which the British Legislature and the bureaucracy have pursued in this matter may be thus summarised:—

First, by the Act of 1862 a correct flash-point of 100 deg. Fah. was fixed, but no tester was prescribed for ascertaining it.

Then, in 1867, the 100 deg. flash-point was legalised with an open tester of the Petroleum Association, which Sir Frederick Abel, who then sanctioned it, afterwards (in 1876) admitted was "unsatisfactory, unreliable, and susceptible to manipulation."

Sir Frederick Abel then devised the Abel (close) tester, which is an efficient one; but he showed that an oil flashed in that tester at a point 27 deg. lower than that at which it flashed in the Petroleum Association cup legalised in 1867.

The most colossal blunder of all was next perpetrated in 1879, when the new Act legalised Sir Frederick Abel's tester and then fixed the flash-point at what was called the "equivalent" of the old 100 degrees—in other words it reduced the flash-point by 27 deg., the amount of the inaccuracy of the old tester.

The effect, of course, was to perpetuate the blunder of the 1867 Act in another way. It is as though a man, finding that his watch lost 27 minutes in a day, bought a new and accurate timekeeper and then purposely put it back 27 minutes. The result has been that to this day all petroleum which flashes at 73 deg. Fahr. in the Abel tester is subject to no restrictions of any kind, and that lamp accidents and oil fires have carried off hundreds of lives since 1879. Lord Kelvin, surely a high authority, said to the Select Committee in 1906:—

It seems to me that the logical outcome of Sir Frederick Abel's work ought to have been to declare that the 100 deg. test in force in the 1871 Act must be fulfilled by a proper close test. I cannot think how Sir Frederick Abel dropped from 100 deg. to 73 deg.

Sir V. Majendie and Mr. Redwood.

This operation seems to have been carried out mainly by the assistance of the then Chief Inspector of Explosives, the late Colonel V. Majendie, a soldier and a gentleman, who was no match for the adroit and suave agents of the petroleum trade. It was perhaps not unfitting that the administration of the laws relating to Mr. Rockefeller's low-flash petroleum should have been placed under the Explosives Department of the Home Office, but it had this disadvantage, that Colonel Majendie, well acquainted with military explosives, knew nothing about petroleum. He once declared at the Imperial Institute in my hearing that he had learned all he knew about petroleum from Mr. (now Sir) Boverton Redwood, the gentleman whom we saw in 1877 in such close business relationship with the Rockefellers. How completely he was guided by his mentor in this matter appears from a memorandum of July 18, 1878, in which he gives his reasons for supporting the reduction of the flash-point from 100 deg. to 73 deg. In it he wrote:—

The figure is one to which the Petroleum Association, the body really interested, are prepared to assent, and although the Scottish Mineral Oil Association desire a higher flashing-point, it is really a matter in which they have very little concern, except in so far as the adoption of a higher flashing-point will tend to injure their trade rivals (the Petroleum Association). I think, therefore, that as the matter cannot be usefully carried further, the Abel test of 73 deg. Fahr. flashing-point should be accepted.

Mr. Redwood was at this period the paid secretary of the Petroleum Association, and had returned only six months before from his American trip. Sir Vivian Majendie seems never to have been able to consider the public; in his view it was all a trade squabble between the rival oil traders. I ought to explain here, by the way, that the Scottish oil refiners who deal with the shale-oil have always kept their oil up to a flash-point of 100 (Abel), their reason being that they desired to maintain a perfectly safe standard. They have always complained of the invasion of this 73 deg. American petroleum, not on ordinary commercial grounds, but because they held that its dangerous and explosive character was prejudicing the public mind against all classes of burning oils, and neutralising their own efforts to give the public confidence in them.

Naturally the juggle by which the low flash-point was thus stereotyped in the Act of 1879 had its effects, The number of petroleum accidents began to increase, and so Sir V. Majendie was sent to visit 242 places in England and the Continent and then to America. In both these series of visits he was accompanied by Mr. Boverton Redwood, Secretary of the Petroleum Association, "who was good enough to accompany me and render me great assistance," as Sir Vivian put it. I have no means of knowing whether Mr. Redwood was able to obtain the same letters of introduction from Mr. Wm. Rockefeller which he had secured in 1877, but I do know that there was one subject the pair did not inquire into. It appears in Colonel Majendie's examination before the Select Committee on Petroleum by Captain Hope (Report and Evidence, 1894, Q. 206-212):—

Q. Are you aware that in Scotland, where Scotch oil has been mostly in use, there have hitherto been very few fires or lamp accidents?—A. No, I have no statistics of lamp accidents. I have only a general knowledge derived from newspapers and from those who have given to the subject a larger study.

Q. When you were making your inquiries in America did you go into the question of the frequency of lamp accidents?—A. Not lamp accidents, I think, at all.

"New Lamps for Old."

While this surprising omission was being made lamp accidents continued to go up. In London they rose from 45 in 1873 to 271 in 1890. In that year the twin brethren, Sir F. Abel and Mr. Redwood, were directed by the Home Office to make an inquiry into the subject, and they discovered that it was all due to bad lamps. This ingenious theory set every one—press, coroners, County Council, Home Office—in full cry after a lovely red-herring, and diverted attention for several years from the Standard's explosive oil. When Mr. Lockwood came over in 1877 it was the bad wicks; now, in 1890, it was the bad lamps. The objections to attempting to secure immunity from petroleum lamp accidents by any lamp law are these:—

1. Nobody has yet guaranteed any absolutely safe lamp.
2. Nobody can guarantee that a safe lamp will remain safe in wear, or can compel its owners to buy a new one when it is in bad repair.
3. In both Scotland and America, where petroleum is produced and refined the remedy has been sought, not in a lamp law, but in raising the flash-point.

While the British officials were chasing the lamp-law will o' th' wisp Mr. Rockefeller was sending over here petroleum oil which could not be sold in most of the States of the Union, and the number of lamp accidents here was still rising. In London they rose from 271 in 1890 to 473 in 1895. By this time an inquiry could not be avoided, the Select Committee to which I have referred began to sit, and between 1894 and 1898 to take evidence and report.

The Standard at Westminster.

The evidence before that Committee in support of the Standard Oil Trust's contention was extensive and peculiar. There was Sir Frederick Abel, who admitted to the Committee that as chemist to the War Office he had recommended the adoption of 100 deg. or 105 deg. oil for use in barrack-rooms. Yet he was prepared to maintain that 73 deg. was sufficiently high for a lamp in a crowded tenement house, where obviously the chances of accident are far greater than in the strictly regulated and disciplined barrack-room. Then there was Mr. Boverton Redwood, and he, too, declared that the flash-point of 73 deg. was sufficiently high for public safety. The most remarkable thing about his evidence was the damaging admissions he was compelled to make, which gave away his whole case. Here are two:—

In my opinion a considerable proportion of the lamp accidents which occur would not happen if only oil of 120 deg. or even 100 deg. Abel test were used (Q. 1,824, 1896, Blue Book).

Undoubtedly in a sense the higher the flashing point the safer the oil, and from that point of view oil of 100 deg. flashing-point must be safer than oil of 73 deg. flashing-point (Q. 1,893).

Another very entertaining Standard Oil witness was Professor C. F. Chandler, of New York, who explained that he had been coming to Europe for a holiday, and was asked by the Standard Oil Trust to give evidence against raising the flash-point. He gave that evidence, and was confronted with this passage in a report he made to the New York State Board of Health in 1871:—

There is a strong inducement to turn the heavier portions of the naphtha into the kerosene tank so as to get for it the price of kerosene. It is therefore the cupidity of the refiner that leads him to run as much benzine as possible into the kerosene, regardless of the frightful consequences of the frequent explosions.

As this was exactly what the Standard was doing, this was rather awkward for the Professor, but he cynically explained that it was "a reckless statement" made when he was a "reformer." He admitted that he had never withdrawn it publicly until that very date in 1896, but he went on to swallow it whole.

The Orange Barrel.

But the prize witness on that side was Mr. Paul Babcock, whom we saw in 1877, and who as one of the American directors of the Trust came to tell the Select Committee that the 73 deg. oil—the brands known to the trade as "Tea Rose" and "Royal Daylight"—were as safe as the 105 deg. oil—the brand known as "White Rose." Thereupon the Lord Advocate (then Mr. Ure, M.P.) produced a little folding card just then issued by the Anglo-American Oil Co., Limited, a copy of which lies before me as I write. On the front page of this little Rockefeller tract—which, I grieve to say, is not now in circulation, so that mine has become a "rare edition"—there are two big orange-coloured barrels, and the words "White Rose American Lamp Oil." Inside there is an artless panegyric on "White Rose," of which we are told:—

Its fire test is so high as to make it the safest petroleum lamp oil in the world. Explosion is guarded against and families can burn White Rose oil with the same assurance of safety as they can gas . . . a really safe and reliable illuminant, etc.

Of course, all this clearly proved that the Anglo-American Oil Company, whatever it might say at Westminster, did not believe in Billiter Street that 73 deg. oil was as safe as White Rose. But Mr. Paul Babcock was a cool hand. He turned the card over carefully, and then remarked that it was "merely advertising bunkum," and that it was issued by the Anglo-American Oil Company, "who no doubt bought the oil of us." This was fairly cool in view of the fact that the Standard owns all the shares in the Anglo-American, but it is even cooler when we examine the orange-coloured barrel in the picture. This barrel bears at its head a label, "Kings County Oil Works, Sone and Fleming Mfg. Co., Limited, New York." Now Mr. Paul Babcock was himself general manager of that very Sone and Fleming Company, in addition to being a director of the Standard, which, since 1877, had controlled it. That incident is a fair specimen of the Standard's evidence at this inquiry.

On the other side evidence was given by Lord Kelvin (the greatest scientific man of his day), Sir Henry Roscoe, Professor Ramsay, Professor Attfield, Dr. Stevenson Macadam, Professor D. Mendeleef (who represented the Russian Government and the Russian petroleum industry), and Dr. Hermann Kast (of Karlsruhe), all denouncing the 73 deg. flash-point and advocating its being raised. Sir Henry Roscoe said:—

I think that Americans send over so much mixed oil of the character of this Tea Rose oil only because our flash-point is so low.

Lord Kelvin told the Select Committee:—

I am clearly of opinion that in order to avoid accidents the flash-point must be raised, and that no construction of lamp will meet the difficulty.

More Standard Agitations.

The Select Committee at last reported in favour of raising the flash-point, and an agitation started by the Star newspaper in support of this course received the adhesion of a large number of newspapers, coroners, and of the London County Council. At the same time the Standard Oil Trust started its own characteristic agitations. Petition forms were sent to every oil retailer with requests to obtain signatures in opposition to raising the flash-point. And according to the statement of Mr. Jasper Tully, M.P., in the House, some of these men in Ireland were threatened that they would get no more oil if this was not done. The result was that M.P.'s were bombarded with petitions from their constituencies, and Standard Oil agents filled the lobbies until even the Spectator protested in the terms I have already quoted. A well-known Standard Oil "expert" contributed anonymously a long article to the Times, in which it was represented that the safe-oil agitation was due to a desire to secure "protection" for the Scottish trade. It is amusing to recall that one of the strongest supporters of this theory was the Right Hon. Jesse Collings, who in four short years was to become an ardent convert to the theory of "Protection," not only for Scotch oil, but for everything else.

While the Standard was playing up to free-trade opinion in this way it was working the "patriotic" dodge in a very nicely got-up anonymous pamphlet sent to every M.P. In this it was shown that the effect of raising the flash-point would be to stop our cousins across the Atlantic from sending us oil, and to play into the hands of Russia, which had always been hostile to us. The old Russian bogey was still alive in the days before the Russo-Japanese war, and this waving of the Union Jack no doubt affected some soft-headed M.P.'s. The end of this combined attack was that when the Flash-point Bill came up for second reading in March, 1899, it was rejected, on the pledge of Mr. Collings, then representing the Home Office, that the Government would deal with the whole subject of the storage of petroleum and of lamp accidents.

Since that date nothing has been done, and although all the members of the Liberal Cabinet who were in the House of Commons in 1899 voted for the Flash-point Bill, they have never found time or courage to tackle the Standard Oil monopoly in explosive oil.

The Home Office.

No doubt they have been hampered by the obstruction of the Home Office bureaucracy. Before even the Select Committee had reported, the late Dr. Dupré, chemical adviser to the Home Office, said at Sutton (in November, 1897):—

If people thought they would get legislation on the subject to raise the flash-point they would be very much mistaken, for legislation would not so upset the trade. What was wanted was education and better lamps.

We have seen how Colonel Majendie was constantly sitting at the feet of Mr. Boverton Redwood on this question, and his influence was steadily against the flash-point being raised. His successor, the late Captain Thomson, followed the same tradition, and actually published with Mr. Redwood a "Handbook on Petroleum." This volume, which is ostensibly a guide to local petroleum inspectors in carrying out their duties, branches off into a defence of the 73 deg. flash-point, and contains all the old Standard Oil tags. One of its points is that more people are killed by falling downstairs than by lamp accidents—I only cite that absurdity to show the boldness which the Home Office staff have shown in their determination to obstruct the recommendation of the Petroleum Committee. The final climax has been the appointment of Sir Boverton Redwood as Home Office Adviser on Petroleum. Nobody questions for an instant the great scientific abilities of Sir Boverton Redwood, or his thorough acquaintance with the petroleum industry, but he has taken too long and too active a part in opposing the raising of the flash-point for his advice to be a safe guide on the question. It would be exactly like appointing Mr. Pretyman to advise the Inland Revenue on the drafting and circulating of Form 4. The Home Office has made another attempt to divert public attention from the flash-point of kerosene by appointing a departmental committee to consider the storage and transit of petroleum spirit, which body has just published its report and evidence. The fact is, of course, that this is a difficult and complicated subject, affecting large numbers of small oil and spirit dealers, on which it will be almost impossible to come to an agreement. The raising of the flash-point of kerosene is a simple, clear issue which can be done by a Bill of one clause, and the only people who will really be affected by it will be the Standard Oil Trust. At the same time the Oil Trust, with its vast capital, does not greatly object to restrictions on the storage and transit of either oil or spirit, because these mean large expenditure which it can easily defray, and they will at the same time hamper all its smaller competitors. Now in a time of congestion of Parliamentary business, when it is admittedly difficult to drive even a wheelbarrow through the House, the Home Office bureaucracy deliberately selects the long and complicated subject for its activity, and ignores the simple one. Why?

NOTES FROM PARIS.

A CORNER IN SUGAR.

IT is bad enough to find the cost of living increased by such unavoidable causes as labour legislation, new taxes, and scarcity. But it is far more galling to discover that some common article of food is running up "out of sight" just because a speculator or a ring of speculators have taken it into their heads to engineer a corner. This is just now the case with sugar. It is poor comfort to reflect that prices will eventually go down. Meanwhile, everybody in Europe and America must pay toll. For how long? Nobody knows. The monopoliser was named the other day in the Chamber of Deputies. He is a Chilian millionaire, M. de Santa-Maria. He has been busy for months accumulating enormous stocks in the bonded warehouses of Paris, London, and Hamburg, and he appears now to control the market. With the system of "margins" this is not an impossible feat. The price of sugar began to go up during the spring of last year, and by the end of July it had reached famine price.

I remember when, four or five years ago, it stood at 2 francs per 100 kilos. Its present price is just double—almost a record figure—although the production of 1908 was larger by nearly half a million tons than that of the year before.

Sugar is subject to periodical corners. The last one ended in a panic. This was six years ago. Everybody was buying "margins" in sugar. Some of the stars of first magnitude of the Paris Opéra owned several thousand tons. Brokers were scouring the provinces and finding customers everywhere. Prices were climbing to an unprecedented level. This means that the leaders of the market were unloading. But they did not unload fast enough. In a week sugar dropped from 45 to 25 francs. M. Jules Jaluzot, the proprietor of the Printemps Stores, was ruined. M. Crosnier, the director of the Egyptian refineries, committed suicide. Young M. Say, one of the wealthiest men in France, was then at Dieppe, playing polo. He received a telegram informing him that he and his brother were ruined—absolutely ruined. He stood the shock well, entered the sugar business at the bottom of the ladder, and, from all accounts, is in a fair way to rebuild the family fortune. The Princess Amédée de Broglie, née Say, saw her income reduced from £140,000 a year to £24,000. For years people were afraid to touch sugar again.

The new feature in the present situation is that the public are beginning to protest. The idle stocks of necessary commodities will be regarded as idle land—and taxes will be placed upon them. At any rate, the idea is in the air that the public must be protected.

M. Monzie, who called attention, quoting the report of Juge d'instruction Ponçet, to the Chilian capitalist's audacious accaparements, is the new deputy for a division of the Lot, Gambetta's native department. He is a first-rate speaker, and seems in all points completely equipped. One is favourably impressed in a time of hollow talk, and, to put it frankly—blague—by his elegant sobriety and the chasteness of the style, seeing that a Cahors accent hangs to his tongue, though not so notably as to Gambetta's. He has a delightfully warm voice—a great advantage when an orator is a close reasoner and inclined to be dialectical. One feels directly, thanks to this voice, that one is not going to be bored by his oration.

Notwithstanding the reverse of fortune that the Crosnier crash brought on Prince and Princess Amédée de Broglie, their château of Chaumont sur Loire continues to be the resort of Indian princes coming to France for instruction or amusement. They had there in the late autumn the Maharajah of Kapurthala and his future daughter-in-law, the Princess Benda. At different times in other seasons she followed the hounds at Chaumont, but turned away her head when the dogs came upon the stag. This very lovely dusky pearl has had the questionable advantage, for an Indian lady destined to live in India, of a French education, which included courses at the Sorbonne. One of her accomplishments is play acting, which she essayed at Chaumont and elsewhere at private theatricals. Her father-in-law that is to be approved of this display of her talents. She also wrote saynètes, vers de société, quatrains, and innocently romantic poems, and generally wore simply made frocks in la robe bébé style of white muslin or soft white cloth. Her very dark skin, lit up by jet black lustrous eyes, gave great value to the orient of her one-string necklace of phenomenally large pearls. The flowers she stuck in her hair and girdle were sure to be of some frank warm colour or white. Blues, mauves.

violets, canary yellow ill suited her. She left Marseilles under the care of the Maharajah of Kapurthala and his Spanish wife, who had in Spain danced herself into his affections and received from him a vow of eternal constancy. She has since her marriage lived with him on a European footing. The party went to India in the same P. and O. steamer that took out Lord and Lady Hardinge.

They had not long left when the Guwacar (spelling French) of Baroda came again among us. He passes to be rich beyond the dreams of avarice. In his impatience to pay a second visit to the motor exhibition he cut down his stay at Chaumont to a single day. Perhaps he had heard of the Crosnier crash, and understood that on £24,000 a year the Prince and Princess de Broglie could not entertain so magnificently as before. His pleasure at the motor show took an Oriental form. The motor was just the thing to run rapidly through the unclean streets of Indian towns and over monotonous plains. He got into open and closed vehicles, lay back as if to sleep on the luxurious cushions, examined the internal arrangements of a coupé, a limousine, an open 64-h.p., and a lady's motorette, and ordered four of the model. The late Shah could not have done better. It pleased him to express appreciation of the fine finish of the French motors. The motorettes will doubtless be used by ladies in the gardens of the zenana.

A Zinc and Paris-Gas King has sold his racing stud near Chantilly. People there thought he must have made a terribly bad plunge in mining stocks nearly everywhere. He only lost, it turns out, a mere trifle for a man of his fortune—12,500,000 francs. What went most against his grain was the unheard-of prices which his stud groom and trainer told him he must in future pay for fodder. His demi-Vaudois blood revolted against being victimised by the tariffs and cornering speculators.

The châteaux are again, as last year, unable to indulge in the sport of shooting. It is no use to cry out against the rain that rotted eggs in their preserves. But something may, it is hoped, be done in raising an outcry against poachers. All the Ministers are pleased and proud to figure at the shootings of the President and their several wealthy friends who have well-preserved sections of the State forests on lease. I do not see how poaching is to be put down except by employing hardened poachers as gamekeepers at high salaries. The individual who snares hares and warren-rabbits and nets feathered game is popular, and the game laws as stiffened by Henri IV. are still held in rankling horror by rustics. We all know he desired that every peasant should have a poule au pot on Sunday; but if the poule turned out to be a pheasant hen or a hen partridge the peasant was to be flogged until the drawing of blood and his ears cropped. For a second offence these penalties were repeated, with the addition of imprisonment for at least a year; and for the third the gallows or the galleys for life, as the judge might decide. This helped to swell the reckoning against Bourbons and feudal nobles at the Revolution.

Black and white reign in the sphere of fashion. The union cannot last long. A few weeks ought to play it out. Black by itself is not eye-hitting. Nor is white by itself. Is it not the emblem of tranquilly happy innocence? But unite them, and they form, and especially in the robing of any human living creature, the most staring of colour combinations. We may overlook a cock pheasant in a woodland avenue, or a redbreast on a garden walk. But should there be a magpie or a wagtail about we cannot help seeing it. It is the same with a human being. The black and white of a gentleman's evening dress makes every personal advantage in form, carriage, or style extremely conspicuous. The wagtail or magpie blackness of the coat and trousers, or of the waistcoat, with the equally magpie or wagtail whiteness of cuffs, collar, and glossy shirt front call attention to a silhouette, to a graceful action of the body, to an easy carriage, to distinction, or to a fine port in a manner that a combination of showy colours never could reach. The converse may happen when the air is shy, the form podgy, the silhouette expressive of the advance of years—a reason why elderly Frenchmen wear their waistcoats buttoned almost up to the throat, and a coat collar and sleeves that all but hide the shirt collar and cuffs. In short, they are as little as may be like either of the two birds that Nature has been at pains to robe so neatly and yet so conspicuously in black and white.

It is impossible to wear a black and white toilette more than once or twice in the same society. I mean a toilette in which the two colours give each other a pretty equal value, or in which white throws black into eye-hitting prominence, and black returns the compliment to white. A black gown with a mere finish of white is, however, more quiet than a white gown with black facings. Black and white Pekin silks, satins, and mousselines de soie for dinner wear are destined before the season is half out to figure among the perquisites of femmes de chambre. They can be turned to no earthly use if they be not dyed; and to dye them is impossible when the black stripes have a velvety nap. On the stage they can be worn often, and it is owing to the effect they produced there that they are now the fashion. They pass for reducing stoutness to the eye—a notion I am not prepared to accept. What they do effect is to give an actress who alone wears a black and white Pekin gown very great prominence. Not to be too staring in her stripes needs the nicest judgment on the part of dressmaker, femme de chambre, and wearer. It would take so little to make a toilette of this design caricatural.

It is too much forgotten that stage conditions are wholly different from those of a drawing-room or of a ballroom, a garden party, or a racecourse, though the latter approximates most to the theatre. There are no footlights at any private entertainment. There can be no play of limelight on particular beauties or ladies wishing to shine as such. The atmosphere should be more reposeful and competition as much as possible kept out of sight. We ought to meet for sociability in dining-rooms and drawing-rooms and not for rivalry. It is different at a racecourse, where both sexes are agog to lay hold of money that they never earned. The two most agreeable black and white toilettes in Pekin that I can speak of were made for Mlle. Berthe Behr to be worn in the part of Jenny, the workgirl, and for Mlle. Soubise, of Les Variétés. Both were simple. That of Mlle. B. B., a fourreau skirt with a rather short waist and a narrow and flat apron of Lille velvet that, well adjusted above the belt to the figure, covered the whole front of the corsage, while forming bretelles at the back. The skirt stripes fell vertically—those on the sleeves, of the chemise paysanne form, were placed horizontally. This opposition gave relief to them, and the skirt and the sleeves were finished off by a pleated border of black lace. A fairly wide hem of velvet at the edge of the skirt may be said to rhyme in tissue and colour to the pinafore. The girdle, approximating in shape but not in depth to a Swiss girl's belt, had for its fastening a clasp made of oval shells, making a fine show of mother-of-pearl and set in a light frame of filigree jewel work containing false pearls. A row of guimpe flatly applied served as a collar. The hat had a lining and low capote of black velvet and an encircling boa-like plume. It was all neat, pretty, telling, and one on the same model could be made at home for a few hundred francs.

The toilette of Mlle. Soubise, of a much wider pattern, had black velvet stripes on white peau de soie. The skirt had no bias seams, and descended well on the ground, thus taking from the up-right and down-straight stiffness of the stripes. The black stripes only appeared on it in the pleats at the waist, and the latter were continued all round. A fetter arrangement in black Spanish lace that narrowed to a band of about a quarter of a yard in depth at the knees in front, to rise high on the hips and higher still farther back, confined the skirt without seeming to imprison it. Nothing could be more easy than the fall of the folds below the lace. The corsage, with a short waist, had a mere trimming of diagonal drapery, loosely applied, of the same material as the skirt, and a flat, sloping collar of Spanish lace. The opposition in the direction of the stripes in skirt and drapery gave tone to the ensemble. One did not because of the drapery see more of the sleeves than their black edge. It was all perfect. With the model any femme de chambre who knows her business could make it. The hair, loosely dressed à l'antique, matched the gown in captivating simplicity.

The white satin collars and other similar parements strike me as crude and cold. Nobody who is over thirty ought to wear them off the stage. They have a disastrous effect on faces than are not in the freshest phase of full bloom.

THE EDUCATIVE POSTER.

I am a man who's blest, or curst,
With all the student's eager thirst
For learning;
And as about the world I hie,
And various novel things descry,
Each one to my instruction I Am turning.

Just now my studies are engrossed
With bills and pictures that they post,
All showing—
By aid of Art's pictorial spell—
Some startling facts, which, truth to tell,
Appear to me extremely well
Worth knowing.

From them I glean much novel lore;
Weird truths I never knew before
Now reach me.
Come, listen! I'll unfold to you,
In brief poetic strains, a few
Of the great lessons, strange and new,
They teach me.

I learn, as I these posters con,
That dukes like Barbary apes, upon
The whole, are.
They always dress in horsey style,
Yet sport their coronets the while Where lesser men would sport a tile
Or bowler.

I learn that Redmond always goes
About in peasant's woollen hose
And friezes,
And wears a hat of brigand type,
In which is stuck a short clay pipe,
That looks as strong as cheese, when ripe
That cheese is.

I learn that Asquith makes the leek
His staple fare—as mild and meek
As Moses;
While there below, upon the floor,
Where'er he goes, for evermore
A haunting white-chalk line before
His toes is.

I learn the Tory millionaire
Wears loud check suits that make you stare,
And swaggers—
His self-importance to enforce—
In way so blatant, bumptious, coarse,
It well might give a tough old horse
The staggers.

The theme no further I'll pursue;
Enough I've writ for your illu—
Mination;
So just conclude, when all is said,
Election posters, blue or red,
In strange, new truths are quite an ed—Ucation.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

EVERY generation, dear Lady Betty, has the limitations of its generation, which accounts for those who are ahead of the time being thought criminals or lunatics; those who are not abreast with it, imbeciles.

This attitude towards nonconformity of thought or conduct is notoriously more general here than it is in most countries; all Englishmen and Englishwomen deplore its prevalence amongst us—with reservations in favour of their individual prejudices.

An "Octogenarian" writes:—

"Sir,—The English resemble in this particular the horse to which they are so greatly attached; both suspect the new, and are soon reconciled to whatever is familiar. When I was young it was Lord Beaconsfield who was a charlatan and was to ruin the country, and, in quick succession, Gladstone, Bright, Joseph Chamberlain and Lord Randolph Churchill attracted similar abuse and caused equivalent alarm.

"In the past it was said of the coaches that 'Rust destroys quicker than running'; it is obvious that had we not moved Great Britain would long since have been ruined. For a country a future does not come; it has to be made.

"There is a development of the day, however, which I greatly deplore. Class hatreds are not long enduring, but racial hatreds are almost interminable—it is disastrous to cause it to be asked 'What have the Irish ever done to merit the hatred, or the Scots the contempt, of the English?' It is this question which the tactics employed at the moment are causing to be asked by many in Ireland and Scotland."

"My son," said an old squire on his death-bed to his heir, "The commercial value of ancestry has greatly depreciated; your ancestors can do little now for you." He paused, then whispering "Sell them," expired. The inconsolable heir did not lose an instant in complying with his father's injunction, and with the proceeds of the sale of the family pictures was soon enabled to achieve bankruptcy by maintaining a theatre for the benefit of a dancer.

They are stripping John Bull; it will soon be an Old England in new clothes.

Since the removal of the duty on old-world work imported into the United States a new industry has been created in that country. Where there is one art dealer in America to-day it is predicted that there will be ten in a twelvemonth, and a hundred ten years hence. There are said to be already three thousand "Runners" scouring Europe to purchase stock for shops of the sort recently opened, or about to be opened, in the United States.

The demand for old-world work of British origin is especially great, not only for America but for Africa and Australia, and now France is more eager than the rest to relieve us of our remaining store. British "art," which consists mainly of furniture in oak, walnut, mahogany, or satin-wood, and decorative objects of not too elaborate design or workmanship, breathes of home; it is essentially reposeful.

Castle, country-house, and cottage alike in England are being gutted of their treasures to provide for this general demand.

The stock of ancestral accumulations in England is not unlimited. Each year hundreds of thousands of objects of the kind which have been handed down to us from the past are burnt, broken or irretrievably disfigured, and hundreds of thousands more are removed to the Continent, the Colonies or the United States.

There is a desolate future in the making; John Bull in a jerry-built house, with jerry-constructed furniture and jerry-painted portraits lamenting the sale of his splendid inheritance for that which will then be obvious was a mess of pottage.

The revival of delicacy in England is a feature of the time which should not escape the attention it deserves. It was a bad day for taste in this country when French influence was removed from our art as a protest against the enmity of Napoleon I. The climax of the repudiation was the Middle-Victorian Period. "The Watteau Series" (Arthur L. Humphreys) as yet consists of only four volumes; the daintiest of little books, two of which are "The Inner Beauty," by Maeterlinck, and "Gardens and Friendships," by Bacon.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

CORRESPONDENCE.

OFFICERS' PAY IN INDIA.

Dear Truth,—I have been out in this country for about six years, and have been in various stations. I think all who have been in India will agree with me that the following table of monthly expenses is a very fair average and a moderate one for a young officer in an ordinary station:—

Monthly Expenses.

| | Rs. |
|---|---|
| Mess bill and regimental outings | 160 |
| Bungalow | 30 |
| Furniture | 60 |
| Servants | 60 |
| Club bill (gymkhana and club subscription added) | 40 |
| Bungalow expenses (firewood, oil, cleaning things, etc.) | 10 |
| Total Rs. | 310 |

In the Indian Army a subaltern's pay is Rs. 390 per mensem, so this leaves a balance (after deduction of monthly expenses) of Rs. 80 a month. Rs. 80 is just over £5, and out of this £5 must come our clothes, boots, uniform, travelling expenses, hire of carriages, shooting expenses—in fact, everything. I have taken the ordinary case of a young officer who lives moderately, but who is not a tectotaler or non-smoker. As one is obliged to keep up one's position as an officer one must travel first-class, take the best seats at concerts, theatres, and drive when asked out to dinner, etc. The conclusion is very apparent, namely, over three-quarters of the subalterns of the Indian Army are in debt, and some very heavily in debt.

I strongly advise any man to think seriously before he comes to this country without a private income. To keep up one's position and to live comfortably out here, but live moderately, one ought to get Rs. 500 a month, and that is the pay the Government ought to give to a young officer from the moment he lands in this country.

India is no longer a poor man's country, so let the young aspirant for Indian fame be careful and "look before he leaps." The recent increase in pay to the young officers and men of the Indian Army was a blessing and boon, but since then the railway fares have been increased 30 per cent.; the price of cigarettes and spirits has also been raised; in fact, it looks as if the Government was giving with the right hand and taking away with the left hand.—Yours truly,

THE JUDICIAL EQUIPMENT OF COUNTY COURTS.

Sir,—The extended jurisdiction of county courts, under the County Courts Act, 1903, with the probability in the near future of a still further extension of jurisdiction, renders it of the utmost importance that these Courts should be efficiently manned. The statutory provisions for attaining this end, however, are not, at present, all that could be wished.

No exception can be taken to the personnel of the judges of county courts themselves. Whatever may have been the case many years ago, they are now largely recruited from leaders of the Bar. Not a few of them, indeed, have enjoyed practices larger and more important than some of the judges of the High Court. It is not in this direction, therefore, that any danger of a lack of efficiency is likely to occur. But, under Section 18 of the County Courts Act, 1888, it is provided that, in case of the illness or unavoidable absence of any judge, it shall be lawful for such judge to appoint a barrister-at-law of at least seven years' standing to act as his deputy during such illness or unavoidable absence; and it is further provided that any deputy so appointed, during the time for which he shall be so appointed, shall have all the powers and privileges and perform all the duties of the judge for whom he shall have been so appointed.

This provision does not seem to be entirely satisfactory. The salary of a County Court judge has been fixed at £1,500 a year. Yet such is the uncertain nature of a barrister's professional position that there appears to be no difficulty in obtaining the services, as County Court judges, of well-known leaders at the Bar. On the other hand, the deputy judge receives a rateable proportion of the judge's salary and travelling allowances attached to the office. But, though in some circumstances it may be worth while for a leader at the Bar to accept a salary of £1,500 a year, it certainly is not worth while for even a leading junior to accept, it may be for a few days only, a fee of £5 a day. Moreover, the fact that a barrister has been seven years at the Bar is no test whatever of judicial fitness. He may have been seven years at the Bar without having held a brief. It could, however, be urged that there is nothing to complain about either in the judicial conduct or the decisions of deputy County Court judges. But that is hardly the question. My criticism has reference to the system and is not directed against any individual. And, as the law stands at present, there certainly does not appear to be a sufficient guarantee that a perfectly competent substitute will always be selected. Yet if the County Courts are to compete with the High Court, such a guarantee is obviously essential.

By Section 19 of the County Courts Act, 1888, it is provided that any judge shall be capable of acting for any other judge within or without the district presided over by such other judge; and I suggest that, in order to secure the proper transaction of the important business now flowing into County Courts, this section should be acted on rather than the other; or, in the alternative, that some means should be devised for securing a deputy not inferior in judicial qualifications to the judge himself. To this end the 18th section of the County Courts Act, 1888, should, I submit, be either amended or repealed.—I am, Sir, faithfully yours,

A. Kipling Common.

THE IRRESPONSIBILITY OF DIRECTORS.

A JUDGMENT of great importance to the investing public was delivered by Mr. Justice Neville last week in the case of the proceedings for alleged misfeasances and breaches of duty against the directors of the Brazilian Rubber Plantations and Estates, Limited. The company is not one of those brought out during the recent rubber boom. It was floated so long ago as 1906, by means of a prospectus which in respect of the grossness of its misrepresentations and misstatements can hardly have been excelled by any production of the boom period. Information which was placed at my disposal enabled me to publish an exposure of the scandal in the following year (my first article on the subject appearing on November 13, 1907), and soon afterwards an order was made for the compulsory winding up of the company.

The company was formed to acquire a property in Brazil which was purchased from the original owners for £15,000, and a month or two later resold through a promoting syndicate for no less than £150,000, payable as to £30,000 in cash and as to £120,000 in shares. In fairness to the original owners it should be said that they were not in any way to blame for the misrepresentations and mis-statements which admittedly occurred in the prospectus—in fact, as soon as that document reached them in Brazil they cabled and wrote protesting against its inaccuracies. It is not disputed that the prospectus was based mainly upon a report concocted in London by an interested individual who had certainly been in Brazil, but not within hundreds of miles of the property of which he penned such a glowing account. The area of the property was given in the prospectus as 12,500 acres. It turned out to be no more than 2,000 acres, and the explanation of this little discrepancy will, I should think, become historic among the curiosities of company-promoting. It seems that the original owners had written that there were "twenty mules" on the property, but by a most unfortunate blunder some one read the word "mules" as "miles," assumed that the miles were square miles, and then calculated that there must be 12,500 acres! The other errors included a statement that there were 400,000 trees ready for tapping, the real number being under 50,000. On this remarkable prospectus the public subscribed for about 26,000 £1 shares, and underwriters were called upon to take up the balance of the minimum subscription of 50,000 on which the directors went to allotment. It was a long time after the compulsory winding-up order before the property could be disposed of, and eventually it had to be sold for a little over £4,000. Acting on the advice of eminent counsel, the Official Receiver, as liquidator, then instituted the action to recover damages from the directors which has just been tried. They were not charged with dishonesty but with negligence in having—as was alleged—failed to take reasonable and proper steps to verify the statements in the prospectus which the promoters prepared for their adoption, and in having continued to make payments under the purchase contract after it was known that certain of those statements were untrue.

Mr. Justice Neville gave judgment in favour of the directors on grounds which deserve careful consideration. The directors, he said, were honest men, "who performed what they supposed to be their duty," but "unfortunately for themselves (his lordship did not mention the shareholders) they fell into the toils of dishonest men." It was clear that there were misstatements in the report upon which the prospectus was founded—in his lordship's phrase, "the authors allowed their imagination free play." Counsel for the liquidator had argued that the huge profit on the re-sale (disclosed in the prospectus) and the fact that the report was made by a person named as a vendor in one of the contracts should have "put the directors on inquiry." Mr. Justice Neville, however, considered that the particulars in the report (i.e., the 12,500 acres and the 400,000 trees) justified the price to be paid, and as to the absence of independent testimony:—

> Business men have very frequently to act on information derived from interested persons. In so doing the wise amongst them no doubt make an allowance for exaggeration, but exaggeration and fraud are not the same thing. If the report had been merely exaggerated there was no fear of the company making a bad bargain; there was ample margin to allow for exaggeration.

Very respectfully I must say that this judicial sketch of the ways of business men fills me with astonishment. Knowing that a property had just previously changed hands for £15,000, and being then asked to pay £150,000 for it, business men, we are given to understand, would not bother about an independent valuation, but, provided there was "ample margin to allow for exaggeration" in the report submitted by the vendors, would make the purchase! No doubt there was such "ample margin" in this instance. Under the heading, in big type, "Directors' Estimate of Profits," the prospectus bearing their name estimated the profits at no less than £135,000 a year, but added that as the basis of a dividend estimate they "preferred to take" one-half that amount, which would enable them to pay 25 per cent. In regard to the continued payments of instalments of purchase money to the vendors—some payments being actually made in advance of the contract date—Mr. Justice Neville dwelt upon the fact that "from first to last the manager never suggested the abandonment of the undertaking." His lordship added:—

> I doubt if any of the directors were fully aware of their rights as to rescission, and they were never advised by their solicitor that the contract was not binding upon them. Nor if they had known it is there, in my opinion, anything to show that they thought until, after the completion, that they had not got a valuable property which could be worked to the advantage of the company, however much it fell below the description in the prospectus.

It would appear from this that no matter what exaggeration there may have been in a vendor's description of a property bought by a company the directors are not under any obligation to repudiate the contract if they still think the property has some value. On the general question of the duties of directors Mr. Justice Neville made these interesting remarks:—

> It has been laid down that so long as they act honestly they cannot be made responsible in damages unless guilty of gross negligence. . . . A director's duty has been laid down as requiring him to act with such care as is reasonably to be expected from him, having regard to his knowledge and experience. He is, I think, not bound to bring any special knowledge to his office. He may undertake the management of a rubber company in complete ignorance of everything connected with rubber, without incurring responsibility for the mistakes which may result from such ignorance; while if he is acquainted with the rubber business he must give the company the advantage of his knowledge when transacting the company's business. He is not, I think, bound to take any definite part in the conduct of the company's business, but so far as he does undertake it he must use reasonable care in its despatch.

This exposition of the law must be very comforting to directors of the type of the worthy baronet who headed the board of this company. After the failure of the company he frankly admitted that he knew nothing about rubber estates, and that he never took any initiative of his own at board meetings, but "simply did as he was asked to do." Directors of this class are quite common, and the law is carefully framed to encourage the breed. They may undertake a business of which they are utterly ignorant with the serene consciousness that they incur no liability if through their ignorance they lose other people's money. Or if they prefer to be absolute ciphers on the board they are again shielded by the law, being under no obligation to do anything "definite." Rogues may employ them as tools, but so long as they are honest themselves in what they do or leave undone it does not matter in the least whether they are inexperienced, incompetent, foolish, and stupid. Such is the law as laid down in this very illuminating judgment. I commend it to the attention of simple-minded people who imagine that some sort of responsibility attaches to directors when statements in prospectuses are found to be false and misleading. It is evident from this case that there is practically none that can be enforced.

ROUND THE MARKETS.

A Rise and a Reaction—Electoral "Futures"—Bank Rate Down—Peruvian Corporation Results—Flat Yankees—Strong Argentine Rails.

In the stock markets the chief influences during the past week have been the rise and fall in Unionist hopes and the fall in the Bank Rate. The House in the last week or two has constructed a political barometer of its own by the establishment of a market in "Majorities." Extensive bets have been made upon the elections on the basis of the estimated Government Coalition majority. The figure at the Dissolution was 120, but it rapidly fell, and on Mr. Balfour's Referendum speech Majorities slumped to 45, promptly steadying to 60. Some of the enthusiasts in the Unionist camp said Mr. Balfour's adroit tactics had "dished the Radicals completely," and the Government would be sent out of office. Others declared that the Government majority would be pared down to such an extent that Mr. Asquith would be unable to put through his Veto proposals and would have very speedily to make another appeal to the country, when the Unionists would come in. Thus the Stock Exchange shook hands with itself, and showed its satisfaction by putting Consols and stocks generally higher. In the first two days of the present week the position has been reversed, disappointment at the paucity of Unionist gains sending majorities up to 90 and Consols down to 79.

The drop in the Bank Rate from 5 to 4½ per cent. was the more welcome because many people did not expect a change to be made quite so soon owing to the uncertainties surrounding further foreign gold demands. Yet on the position so far as it is known there is no reason to be surprised that the Bank Rate has come down. Since the Bank Rate on October 20 went to 5 per cent. the Bank has received some four millions of gold from abroad, the reserve being raised to the comfortable figure of nearly 25¾ millions, and from the action tak n by the Bank directors last Thursday it is evident that in the quarters best able to judge the demands that may be made upon us for gold by India and South America are not expected to be anything abnormal.

In the Foreign market some interest was provided by the preliminary statement of the Peruvian Corporation for the year ended June 30. The profit of the company has increased by £54,300 to £285,200, and after deducting debenture interest at the rate of 4 per cent., £53,200 as debenture amortisation charge, and £1,400 for income tax, the balance available, inclusive of £13,100 brought forward, is £243,800. The preference dividend is raised from 1 per cent. to 1¼, the debenture interest, as has been the case since 1903, is made up to 6 per cent., £5,100 is allocated to colonisation account, £10,000 to irrigation works, and £4,000 to lake steamers' insurance fund, leaving £23,500 to go forward. At 38 Peru preference receiving 1¼ per cent. looks fully valued for the present, though nobody can define the potentialities of this stock. The debentures I have recommended for years past, and those of my readers who bought below par should retain them. The present price is 103½, but as the drawings are at 105, there is nothing to be feared from redemption. The debentures are not secured by a trust deed, they are simply a floating charge upon the assets of the corporation, and there are no foreclosure rights, while the interest above 5 per cent. is contingent upon the prefereuce stock first getting ¼ per cent. Obviously, though, the investor wanting 6 per cent. must not expect his security to be irreproachable, and judged on recent doings on prospects and on marketability Peru debentures have much to recommend them.

Yankees have been the one really flat market in the past week. A number of bear points were brought forward to explain the weakness, including the pessimistic views upon the trade outlook attributed to Mr. J. J. Hill, a crop of bad monthly statements, the fears that a further cut will have to be made in prices of steel products owing to the need for stimulating the demand, and talk about friction between the Rockefellers and the Goulds which might lead to the dismemberment of the Gould system of railroads. The market has seen a collection of equally bad bear points frequently raised in the last few months, and has seemed to thrive upon them. Probably the underlying reason of last week's break in prices was the growing disappointment that the advance in values and all the predictions about coming trade prosperity have failed to attract the investing public either in the States or Europe. The discovery that the taking of profits involves the selling by one group of professionals to another group of professionals is not calculated to put any market in a good humour. Under such conditions I should prefer for the moment to sell Yankees upon rises than to buy upon falls.

Home Rails have continued to receive good support from investors and speculators. General conditions governing this market remain promising, and those who have bought any of the stocks whose cheapness I have lately pointed out have already no reason to regret their action. Some of the dividend estimates put forward by the newspapers appear to me to be too sanguine, and likely, if accepted by the public, to cause disappointment with the real results, however meritorious they may be. Buyers would do well in forming their estimates to make liberal allowance for additional expenditure and appropriations, for no harm will accrue to a bull market that errs on the side of caution. Besides, a good case can be made out for Home Rails without suggesting that gross increases are going to be converted practically en bloc into net increases, and the whole proceeds distributed. Argentine Rails have again been in favour, especially Central Argentines, Buenos Ayres, Great Southerns, and Buenos Ayres Westerns. The growing indications of bumper crops are doing much to dispel the feeling of hesitation that investors naturally had over the recent big increases in capital. So far as Central Argentines are concerned the only question likely to be raised next October is whether the dividend shall be maintained or increased.

RAILWAYS.

Grand Trunk Revenues—The Company's High Expense Ratio—Poor Outlook for the Third Preference.

The Grand Trunk market obtained cold comfort from the October net revenue statement. Expenses on the Trunk system continue to grow at a faster rate than receipts. Taking the main line and branches together there was an increase in gross takings for the month of £32,400, while the advance in operating costs amounted to £43,700, leaving net receipts £11,300 lower. The company is now feeling the effect of the higher wages scale granted at the time of the settlement of the strike in August, but it is noteworthy that no apparent relief has been felt from the greatly reduced amount required this half-year to be appropriated to the writing off of the engine and car renewals suspense account. In the four months from July 1 to October 31 the combined system had the nominal gain in gross receipts of £2,700, while working expenses went up £74,750. The net revenue is accordingly £72,050 lower. Partial consolation is to be found in the fact that of this total drop £46,150 occurred on the Grand Trunk Western branch, the finances of which do not directly bear upon the dividends of the parent company. Deducting the sum mentioned, the decline in earnings for the four months is £25,900. The Grand Trunk commenced the half-year £63,210 to the good by paying interest on its second preference stock out of the revenues of the June half-year instead of, as in 1909, leaving the increase of the July-December period to bear the full annual charge. The shrinkage in net revenue since June 30 reduces this sum of £63,210 to £37,310, so that all there is available for the third preference stockholders down to October 31 is an amount equal to ½ per cent. The final two months of the year may alter the position for the better, but in view of past disappointments it does not do to be too sanguine.

Mexican Railway Progress—The Attractions of the First Preference Stock—A 6 per Cent. Investment—Mexican Southern—A Progressive Stock.

Turning from Trunks to Mexican Rails we have a picture painted in brighter colours. The Mexican Railway is still cutting down its expense ratio in wonderful fashion. In the four months to October 31 an increase in gross receipts of $263,000 was attended by an advance of only $7,000 in working costs. The net gain for the period is consequently $256,000, or, say, £26,000. In the second half of 1909 the company paid at the rate of 2⅞ per cent. upon its second preference stock. To bring the rate up to the full 6 per cent. requires an increase in the current half-year of only £15,300, so that without allowing any improvement during November and December the company has its full dividend on seconds for the half-year in hand, and a sum available for the ordinary shareholders equal to nearly 1 per cent. Of course, the margin behind seconds is at present thin, and this stock, like the ordinary, must be left to the speculator. It seems to me, however, that the company's 8 per cent. first preference is worth picking up for the purpose of mixing with other semi-speculative securities that offer yields of 6 per cent. The full 8 per cent on Mexican first preference requires a sum of £102,164, and for the current year this has been earned with a margin of about £70,000 over, making no allowance for net increases in November and December. The present price of Mexican first preference is, say, 134. The highest prices in the past five years have been:—1906, 144¾; 1907, 148½; 1908, 144¼; 1909, 139⅞; 1910, 144½. The stock is this 14½ points below the highest figure reached in the quinquennium, in spite of the fact that the margin behind it is not only the largest in this period, but is greater than for, at any rate, the past twenty years, while the general outlook was never better. There are a number of investors inclined to fight shy of the stock on account of its heavy character. If instead of an 8 per cent. stock at 134, it was a 4 per cent. stock at 67, I have no doubt that the quotation would stand substantially higher. However, this objection is purely one of sentiment, and it is one, therefore, that the shrewd investor desiring a yield of 6 per cent., and, therefore, ready to incur a moderate degree of risk, will take advantage of.

Another attractive Mexican Railway stock is Mexican Southern ordinary. Its attractions differ from those of Mexican Railway firsts; the immediate return is small, but it will automatically increase as the years go on under a guarantee that renders the stock a really excellent security. I have more than once this year drawn attention to the attractions of Mexican Southerns but the present price suggests that the position of the stock is still not as well appreciated by investors as it ought to be. The annual report issued recently by the Interoceanic Railway (the guaranteeing company) offers an opportunity to again bring Mexican Southerns to my readers' notice. As from January last the Mexican Southern has been taken over by the Interoceanic on a rental basis which will give the following rates of interest upon the former company's ordinary:—1910, 3½ per cent.; 1911, 4 per cent.; 1912, 4½ per cent.; 1913 to 1915, 5 per cent.; 1916 and 1917, 5¼ per cent.; 1918 and thereafter, 5½ per cent. Further, commencing with 1918 a sinking fund is to be established, calculated to redeem the stock at par at the expiry of the main concession in 1990. The guarantee ranks after payment of interest on the Interoceanic Company's debenture stocks. In the year ended June 30 last the Interoceanic had a margin of revenue after meeting its fixed charges of about £127,000, sufficient to cover the interest requirements upon Mexican Southern ordinary for that period nearly four times. As a rough and ready way of getting at the yield upon Mexican Southerns I will assume 5½ per cent. dividends are being paid forthwith, and will add the yearly amount by which the dividend falls below 5½ per cent. between now and 1918 to the price. The total difference between the rates actually to be paid between now and 1918 and the maximum then to be reached is £4 10s. The present price of the stock is 102½, from which the half-yearly interest of £1 15s. will be deducted in January. Take the buying price as 101 and add the £4 10s. referred to makes the cost 105½, on which basis the return works out at about 5 3/16. By 1918, when the maximum rate of 5½ per cent. becomes operative the stock should (if Mexico continues to prosper at anything like the present rate) settle down on at least a 4½ per cent. yield basis which would mean a quotation of 122, as compared with the present price of 102½ cum div. or 100¾ ex div.

RUBBER.

Dull Markets—1911 Prospects—Tandjong—The Venture Group.

As in other departments of the Stock Exchange, the general election and the approach of Christmas have tended to restrict business in the rubber share market. Both evils have to be borne, and most members are of opinion that their coming so closely together is, from a market point of view, rather to be welcomed than otherwise in order that the way may be cleared for brighter conditions after the turn of the year. Last week's auction opened with the sale at 6s. 10d. per lb. of a parcel of Malacca smoked sheet, and the best qualities from Sekong, Kapar Para, and Tremelbye also commanded substantial premiums over the spot quotation for fine hard Para. The Malacca output of 40,000 lbs. for November induced the market to put the shares better, and now that some re-organisation has been made on the estate increases in the company's output should be reported monthly.

Last December the four big floriners—Cicely, Linggi, Pataling, and Selangor—were all obtainable at about 24s. per share, and if at the close of 1911 the current year's net advances of from 50 to 150 per cent. are maintained holders should, in view of the satisfactory dividends which the shares are earning, have no reason to complain. Any further great advance in this section during 1911 is improbable; but the second rank companies, whose outputs so far have been of only moderate dimensions, promise to make most of the running during the coming year, solely upon their intrinsic merits and apart from any hope of boom prosperity. Tremelbye and United Serdang may both be mentioned as shares of this class. The premiums already established on these issues have given holders a profit of 100 per cent. during the year, and the natural increase in their outputs which should take place during 1911, gives good ground for the expectation that increased dividend-earning power will bring its natural accompaniment of higher prices. Both estates are in capable hands, and the admirable care with which they have been opened leaves little room for developments of a disappointing character.

Following closely on United Serdang in development, and sharing with it many points in common, Tandjong has possibilities which the investor should not lose sight of. The estates are situated in the same district, managed by the same group, and should be brought to the producing stage at much the same capital cost. Tandjongs are now quoted at 2¼ premium—practically the same price at which United

The Most Complete List of Rubber and Oil Share Quotations will be found in every Saturday's issue of "The Financial Times," 1d. daily. On sale everywhere.

Serdangs were obtainable a year ago; and the only reason why United Serdang stands 100 per cent. higher than Tandjong is that the former is a year or so nearer the producing stage than the latter. For the investor to whom early dividends are of importance United Serdang should make an attractive purchase, but it appears to be beyond question that to the investor who desires capital appreciation within the next twelve months Tandjong affords the greater opportunity.

My list of September last included a number of shares which should make substantial progress during 1911, and of these Strathmore has already given a particularly good account of itself by rising 50 per cent. within the last month. Strathmore, of course, was much undervalued, and is still considerably cheaper than the majority of estates situated in the Selangor district. Jeram at a slightly higher premium also has excellent prospects, and upon the whole I consider that the investor gets better value for his money by investing in £1 shares of the Strathmore and Jeram type than can be obtained from the cheap but popular low-priced issues. Taiping, however, is a good share of the latter class, and the outputs from the estate, although small at present, are increasing satisfactorily. According to a recent circular issued by the Pelepah Valley Company, the increased capital of £60,000 should prove sufficient to bring the estate of 2,000 acres to the producing stage. As the company appears to have successfully passed through the initial stage, and the capitalisation works out at the moderate figure of £30 per planted acre, the 2s. shares are a promising purchase at around 4s. At about the same price Ceylon Timber and Rubber is a good lock-up.

Some inquiries have reached me with regard to the method used in ascertaining the market valuation of the estates owned by the Java and Sumatra companies which were included last week in my list of depreciated shares. Space limitations prevented my showing the calculations in detail, but as an example I give below the figures for Asahan. The company was floated in March last with an issued capital of £215,000, of which £97,000 was working capital and £118,000 represented the cost of the estate and the preliminary expenses. The £1 fully paid shares are now quoted at 11s. 3d., and on the assumption that the working capital is still intact the market valuation of the estate is arrived at as under:—

| Asahan. | |
|---|---|
| 215,000 shares at 11s. 3d. | £120,935 |
| Deduct working capital | £97,000 |
| Market valuation of the estate | £23,935 |

Mr. H. E. Darby valued the property at £112,950, and the estate comprised 11,000 acres of land, 860 of which had been planted and 5,000 cleared and drained ready for planting. The estate may have been dear at Mr. Darby's figure, but £24,000 is a bargain price.

The check to extension of land under tea caused by the larger profits afforded by rubber cultivation is already making itself felt, and at last week's sales the average price for Ceylon tea was over 9d. per lb.—the highest average price for any sale of Ceylon tea since 1899. Tea, of course, can never promise 200 per cent. dividends, but even on the lower scale of prices which has hitherto ruled some very comfortable dividends have been earned. For two years in succession, for instance, a 20 per cent. dividend has been paid by the Duckwari company, and as the company's rubber is now approaching the bearing stage the shares of the new company which took over the estates in June last may be worth attention.

A progress report issued by the London Venture Corporation states that two forest camps have been organised on the Madagascar Company's property with five sets of extracting machines, and that further camps are being prepared for other extracting machines, which are either on their way or will be shipped very shortly. Regular shipments of both cleaned and extracted rubber now arrive every fortnight, and it is satisfactory to learn that the actual working experience fully confirms the estimates which had been made as to the price at which rubber can be extracted and landed in Europe. Sites for the first forest camps on Nyassa have been decided upon, and three complete sets of extracting machines are now on their way, and more will follow shortly. Important shipments of both extracted and cleaned rubber may be expected to commence at the beginning of next year.

A draft prospectus is being circulated amongst investors inviting applications for underwriting the shares of a company known as the Repaking (Java) Rubber Estates, Limited. As the underwriting letters provide for the distribution of 200,000 copies of the prospectus it may be presumed that most of my readers will be favoured with a copy of the document. The cultivation of the Repaking estate has been of a very miscellaneous character, 1,500 acres being planted with Rambong rubber, coffee, cocoanuts, cocoa, and kapok. No valuation of the property accompanies the prospectus, but some interesting information as to the rate at which the value of the estate has been rising within the last few weeks may be gathered from an examination of the purchase contracts in which the prices recently paid for the property are set forth as follows:—

| November 19, 1910 | £16,000 |
| November 20, 1910 | £22,000 |
| November 21, 1910 | £32,000 |

The promoters of the company appear to be preparing a very profitable deal for themselves, but the figures should warn intending applicants that even the bait of a 10 per cent. underwriting commission is insufficient to render the issue attractive. So far Java Rambong propositions have proved very unsatisfactory investments, and there seems to be no reason for believing that Repaking will prove an exception to the rule.

I have received from Mr. Law Yew Swee a copy of a useful guide dealing with the rubber-producing companies formed locally and capitalised in the Straits currency.

MINES.

Kaffirs Receive a Little More Attention—Wernher Beit and Central Mining—Rand Outlook—A Dolcoath Surprise—Mexico El Oro Prospects.

In the mining markets business has continued on much the same scale as when I last wrote, although the reduction in the Bank rate gave rise to a somewhat more cheerful feeling in these sections. As inside support was accorded Rhodesian descriptions about the same time, this group once again started on the up grade, but it was not long before the demand slackened and the professionals commenced profit-snatching. West Africans have remained inactive, but in copper shares and Westralians a moderate amount of interest has been displayed, and Kaffirs have attracted rather more attention.

The professional buying of Kaffir shares during the past week has been attributed mainly to the circulation of a report, since confirmed, that Messrs. Wernher, Beit, and Co. have entered into an arrangement to sell their mining interests to the Central Mining and Investment Corporation. It is stated that the capital of the corporation will be increased to five millions sterling in order to effect the purchase. It will be remembered that Messrs. Wernher, Beit, and Co. have acted as managers and received a percentage of the profits of the Central Mining, while the latter has been entitled to participate in all new business of that firm in connection with South African gold mines. Sir Julius Wernher, who is the chairman of the Central Mining, will retain that position, and practically all the partners of his firm and of Messrs. H. Eckstein and Co. will join the board. The proposal has been favourably received in market circles, the impression being that it will mean the infusion of more life into Kaffirs than they have shown for some time past.

At the meeting on Thursday of Fraser and Chalmers, the mining machinery manufacturers, Sir Julius Wernher, who is chairman of the company, was asked to give his views on the South African outlook, and in the course of an interesting speech he said that he thought there was more apathy on the Stock Exchange than in the South African mining industry. He went on to remark:—

> You must not forget that things have settled down on an industrial basis, and, from the Stock Exchange point of view, those fluctuations which we have seen in the past can hardly be expected when things have settled down on a more or less industrial basis. Consequently, the speculative interest is certainly less than it used to be, but the industry is making good progress, and there have been in the last year or two large amalgamations which have not yet shown to the fullest extent the results which will ultimately come from the reorganisation of five or six of these large concerns into one, which is not an easy matter.

As regards labour, Sir Julius Wernher said he felt quite confident that the numbers would increase, as usual, in January or February, and on the question of taxation he asserted that there should be no anxiety so far as the gold mines are concerned. In this connection my readers may have noticed that in the Budget speech of the Union Minister of Finance at Cape Town at the beginning of last week no mention was made of any intention to increase the burden of taxation on the gold mines, but it was proposed that the profits of diamond companies operating in the Transvaal and Orange River Colony and those of base metal propositions should be subject to a tax.

At the meeting of the Eldorado Banket Gold Mining Company last Thursday Dr. Hans Sauer, the chairman, brought his speech to a close with the following sentence:—"Finally, I would express to you my opinion that the Eldorado mine is an absolutely safe and sound investment, and will continue to pay dividends for many years to come." The Eldorado is certainly one of the finest mines Rhodesia has produced up to the present, but I should not care to describe any mine in the world in such strong terms as those used by Dr. Sauer. He should be well aware of the uncertainties of mining, and should bear in mind that any remarks he may make in his capacity as a director of several companies may be widely read by the public, many of whom are apt to take things too literally. During the current year one or two of the world's best mines have disappointed people who considered their shares to be among the soundest holdings of that class of security, and Dr. Sauer will be fortunate if he never has occasion to regret having described the Eldorado Banket as an "absolutely safe investment."

To the surprise of most people a dividend of 9d. per share has just been declared by the Dolcoath Mine—several weeks before the end of the half-year, and more than two months in advance of the meeting. For the first six months of the current year the Dolcoath made no distribution on account of the expenditure in connection with the equipment of the new shaft, and the manager prepared the shareholders for a possible temporary falling-off in output during the current six months. Apparently the production has not fallen off, while the rise in the price of tin has assisted in increasing the company's earnings.

In an interesting report, dated 12th ultimo, on the position at the Mexico Mines of El Oro, the general manager states that development on the seventh and eighth levels shows improved conditions as compared with the beginning of August, but "a very grave difficulty, which will affect working during the next six months, is now presenting itself, and that is the very bad condition of the timbers in the south shaft." The necessary repairs will probably take six months to complete and cost $15,000, and in order to improve matters at other parts of the property he suggests an expenditure of $55,000, or $70,000 in all. It is just possible that a monthly profit of £15,000 may be maintained without prejudice to development or working the mine unfairly, but the manager adds that he would not like to promise this. Even if quarterly dividends of 17½ per cent. could be maintained—as to which there is some doubt—Mexico El Oro shares would not be cheap at 7½, their present price.

To Politicians and Election Agents.—Copies of the popular coloured cartoon "Tariff Reform" in the TRUTH Christmas Number can now be supplied, carriage paid, at the price of 3d. each, or 4s. the quire of 26. Orders accompanied by remittance should be addressed to the Manager, TRUTH Office, Carteret St., London, S.W.

Gold Mines Investment's Increased Distribution—Promise and Performance.

Five months ago I was able to give my readers some information as to the operations of the Gold Mines Investment Company and foreshadowed an increased distribution for the current year. The shares were then of the denomination of £2 and were quoted about 2⅝, and it may be remembered that I referred to them under the heading "A Promising Kaffir." Since my July article the shares of the Gold Mines Investment have been split, two of £1 being given for each one of £2. The present market price of 1⅝ is equivalent to 3¼ on the old basis, so that whereas the majority of Kaffirs have shrunk in value of late, the shares of the company in question have appreciated to a moderate extent. With the final dividend of 1s. per share in respect of 1910 the directors of the Gold Mines Investment have declared a bonus of 2s., making with the interim distribution a total return for the year of 4s. per share. This is the same amount per share as was paid for 1909, but the sum represented is £100,000 as against £50,000, the number of shares in issue being double that of a year ago. The larger of the two sums mentioned is precisely the amount of profit it was said the company had made out of its participation in the Shamva Mines deal. In addition to this operation the company became interested in other Rhodesians, and when the annual report reaches the shareholders they will find the year's profits to be considerably in excess of the £97,000 realised in 1909. The distributions for that year could have been increased to some extent, but the directors preferred to pursue a conservative policy; they increased the reserve to £25,000 and carried forward not far short of twice that amount. Doubtless on this occasion also they will add to the reserve, as it is very desirable that a mining finance company should set aside part of the profits of a good year towards a possible falling-off in earnings at some future date.

The East Rand Debenture Issue—Provision made for £20 Bonds.

The secretary of the East Rand Proprietary Mines has issued a notice that in order to meet the wishes which have been expressed for a debenture bond of a smaller denomination of £50, provision has been made for the issue of bonds of a denomination of £20 each, and also that holders of fractional debenture certificates, aggregating £6 or over, shall have equal rights with the holders of debenture bonds or provisional debenture certificates to convert the debenture holdings into fully-paid shares at 5½. In order to get a £50 bond one must be a holder of not less than eighty-two shares, a holding which at the present market price represents a sum of over £400. As there are doubtless a good many small shareholders in this company it is not surprising that a wish has been expressed for a bond of smaller denomination, but I think if I had had the arranging of the matter I should have decided upon a £10 and not a £20 bond as the minimum. As it is, one must be a holder of not less than thirty-three shares, or their equivalent in fractional certificates, to be entitled to one of the smallest bonds. With £10 bonds in issue the smaller shareholders would have a still better chance of securing a good investment. It is not everyone who can afford to buy additional fractional certificates to make up the necessary number to entitle him to a bond. However, the step the directors have taken is one in the right direction, and perhaps they may see their way to make another before the time arrives for voting on the debenture scheme. If they want to create a still better impression they should announce that the underwriting commission has been considerably reduced.

INDUSTRIALS.

London General Omnibus—Vanguard Liquidation—Sante Fe Land—Orient Steam Navigation—Slaters.

A week or two ago I referred to the remarkable recovery in the affairs of the London General Omnibus Company, which has just wiped off all interest arrears on its preference stocks. The report, published last week, for the year ended September 30 last disclosed, as expected, some remarkable figures. Whereas the combined undertakings, the London General, Road Car, and Vanguard, showed for the year ended June, 1908, aggregate losses of over £250,000, and the accounts of the combine for the fifteen months ended September 30, 1909, disclosed a deficiency of £33,400, the revenue account for the past financial year shows a credit balance of £125,132. Gross receipts were actually down from £2,388,607 to £1,707,176, but against this was set a reduction in traffic expenses from £1,032,126 to £696,784, and a cut in maintenance expenses from £1,193,313 to £836,000. The decline in outgoings is drastic, though the ratio of expenses to receipts is still the very high one of 92 per cent., against 97 per cent. a year ago. It is so far satisfactory that the loss incurred on the sale of horse and horse 'buses during the year was charged to revenue account, but a point of cardinal importance is that nothing is said in the report about depreciation allowance on omnibuses in running. This matter of depreciation will have to be faced before the finances of the company can be regarded as in a thoroughly healthy condition, and it must, of course, mean the continued deferment of dividends on the ordinary stock. Hence the reaction that has occurred in the ordinary since the report appeared.

From time to time correspondents have asked me when the liquidation of the Vanguard Motor-'Bus Company, the assets of which were taken over by the London General as far back as July 1, 1908, was going to be completed. They will accordingly be interested in the contents of a letter addressed to a shareholder by Messrs. W. B. Peat and Company. This firm states that the litigation on the construction of the agreement of sale between the Vanguard and the General has now been settled, and the inquiries which the judge directed to be made when disposing of the petition for compulsory winding up are nearing completion. The liquidator hopes to communicate with the shareholders in regard to the distribution of the ordinary shares of the London General Omnibus Company early in the new year.

The reports issued lately by some of the Argentine land companies justify the confidence placed by the public in these undertakings. The Sante Fé Land Company in the year ended June 30 earned net profits of £137,800, or £22,400 more than in the previous year. These profits are arrived at after allowing £20,500, as compared with £9,900, for maintenance and repairs, and £20,300, as against £12,000, for depreciation. From the available balance on revenue account £15,900, as compared with £20,000, is appropriated for the reserve fund, but the directors also propose to carry £75,500 standing at share premium account to reserve, thus bringing the total of that fund up to £250,000. The dividend on the shares is again 10 per cent., but the bonus is 2½ per cent., as compared with 1½ per cent. At the current price of 2 15/16 cum-dividend the £1 shares yield over 5⅝ per cent., and on prospects are not overvalued.

The Orient Steam Navigation Company, which now makes up its accounts to June 30, presents an excellent report for 1909-10. The net profit, after deducting general charges, interest, and depreciation, was £119,386, of which £30,000 has been applied towards payment of expenses and discount on the last debenture issue, and £50,000 was put to reserve. After payment of interest on the 6 per cent. preferred shares and 5 per cent. on the deferred, there was a balance of £25,257 to go forward. Since February the new mail contract with the Australian Government, under which the Commonwealth undertakes to pay a subsidy of £170,000 per annum for ten years, has been in force. The financial position of the company is sufficiently good to make its securities worth the attention of the investor. Last February there was issued £750,000 of 4½ per cent. first mortgage debentures, redeemable by purchase or drawings before 1924. These stand at 94, and on the basis of the company's earnings for 1909-10 interest is covered four and a-half times. The share capital is more speculative, and while in the past eight years 5 per cent. has been paid on the deferred, the company has several times had to draw upon the reserve fund accumulated for those shares, while on more than one occasion the preferred shareholders have had to rely in part upon the guarantee given by the managers. However, in the past four years revenue has sufficed to meet the distributions on both classes of shares. The 5 per cent. preferred, of the denomination of £10, can be bought at 8½, on which basis the yield, allowing for the payment of a half-year's interest in January, is 6 per cent.

Among catering companies Slaters, Limited, has shown a steady diminution in profits for some years. The report for the twelve months ended October 1 suggests that serious attempts have been made to arrest the decline, but it has not been stopped altogether. The available profit for the period was £22,877 against £25,192 for 1908-9, £37,047 for 1907-8, and £48,960 nine years ago. The dividend of 8 per cent. on the ordinary shares is the same as a year ago, but to pay it the carry forward has been drawn upon by £2,417, equal to about 1 per cent. Competition in the special class of business which the company carries on is admittedly very keen, but considering the seeming advantages the company enjoys in the matter of sites and general equipment results might be better. At the meeting on Monday Alderman Sir David Burnett, the recently appointed Chairman, took a hopeful view of the position, and suggested that with increased ability and energy in the management, combined with some necessary improvements and a forward policy, the company might not only anticipate regaining all its lost trade but expect a considerable amount in addition. It is sincerely to be hoped the corner has at last been turned; some of the shareholders acquired their shares at £4, and they are hardly likely to part with them now that the price is barely par (20s.).

THE PACIFIC-OREGON PROMOTION.

What is the present position of the Pacific-Oregon Railway and Navigation Company, "chartered in the State of Washington, U.S.A.," whose shares have been sold in this country by Messrs. Leopold Mayer and Co., Limited, 23, St. Swithin's Lane, E.C.? The question is one of serious importance to a number of people whose investments in this concern amount in the aggregate to a very large sum. A document styled a prospectus (though it was not a prospectus complying with the requirements of the English Companies Acts) was first advertised here in October, 1909. It stated that the capital of the company was 10,725,000 dols. (£2,145,000) in shares of 5 dols. (£1) each, of which 400,000 were offered for sale by Messrs. Leopold Mayer and Co. The company, the first prospectus continued, "is formed for the purpose of constructing and operating a steam railway from a point at or near Prospect, Jackson County, in the State of Oregon, to Crescent City, in the State of California"; and a contract for its construction and equipment had been entered into with the Pacific-Oregon Construction Company. There were most glowing reports as to the assured revenue of the line, and at the end of the prospectus the directors estimated that the earnings of "the first section, now under construction," would be sufficient to pay a dividend of 20 per cent. on the 400,000 shares then being issued. An abridged advertisement published by Messrs. Leopold Mayer and Co. contained this definite statement: "The first dividend will be paid on October 1, 1910." In the early part of the present year Messrs. Mayer circulated further prospectuses and illustrated pamphlets in which it was affirmed that the proceeds of the shares issued "are being utilised in the building and equipment of the first section," and that "the directors hope to have this first forty-three-mile section in operation shortly, so they will be able to pay the first dividend from the earnings, October 1, 1910." Such phrases as "the line is of a standard construction," "has so been made," etc., all conveyed the idea that the work was already well advanced; and this impression was moreover confirmed by one of the pictures showing a railway through "the great timber tract."

My inquiry regarding the present position of the company is based upon information from a gentleman who became a shareholder in March last. He has now been told by a representative of Messrs. Leopold Mayer and Co. that the promoters in America have abandoned the undertaking, that the construction of the line was never actually commenced, and that all the money subscribed has been utilised for preliminary expenses. Will Messrs. Mayer say whether this is an accurate statement and, if it is not, explain precisely how the undertaking stands at the present time? In the light of the quotations I have given from the prospectus a discovery that the building of the line was never even begun would be a serious matter; and in any case, if the enterprise is not being proceeded with, the shareholders are entitled to know exactly how their money has been disposed of. The Pacific-Oregon advertisements variously described Messrs. Mayer and Co. as "the issuing house," as the "bankers," and as the "registrars and transfer agents"; but their connection with the undertaking was really closer than this. "A. E. Law, Tacoma," and "L. S. Boutell, Tacoma," were two of the Pacific-Oregon directors; and two gentlemen with the same names, but London addresses, are or were directors of Leopold Mayer and Co., Limited. The other directors of the latter firm are Messrs. Henry Mather and A. F. Martin, who have both been associated with a premium bond business carried on under the name of Lloyd Etlinger and Co., 6, St. Swithin's Lane, E.C. Last year Lloyd Etlinger and Co. were pilloried in Truth in consequence of the distribution of a circular, signed by A. F. Martin, showing that they were unloading on the public a quantity of undesirable securities known as Servian Red Cross Bonds. The same address of Lloyd Etlinger and Co. is or was also the address of Hammerton and Co., Limited, who figured as "registrars and transfer agents" of the Washington Traction Company, shares in which were offered for sale by Leopold Mayer and Co. immediately after the flotation of the Pacific-Oregon Company.

Holders of Pacific-Oregon shares have been urged by Messrs. Leopold Mayer and Co. to accept in exchange shares in the Canadian Mills and Timber, Limited, and I understand that a number have done so. Canadian Mills and Timber is a British Columbian company whose shares were lately offered for sale here by the East Indies Syndicate, 13, Sherborne Lane, E.C., which latter concern appears to have an intimate connection with Leopold Mayer and Co. I should not recommend an investment in this Canadian timber concern, and in view of the peculiar circumstances of the business I think the shareholders in the Pacific-Oregon Railway would be well advised not to consent to the proposed exchange. They ought to consider whether some concerted action cannot be taken in the matter, and if any of them care to write to me I shall be glad to put them in communication with a shareholder who is already in possession of much interesting information.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

Consolidated Oilfields of California.

The following extracts from two communications received by a shareholder from the secretary of the Consolidated Oilfields of California, Limited, make an interesting contrast:—

| Circular, July 18, 1910. | Letter, November 28, 1910. |
| Arrangements are well advanced for obtaining a special settlement in the company's shares. | No application has yet been made to the Stock Exchange for a settlement in the shares. |

My readers will remember that the company has been severely criticised in Truth. It was one of the promotions of Mr. Carter West, and the bucket-shop firm of McKinley, Alexander, and Sons was employed to puff and push the shares.

The Sterling Corporation's Fairy Tale.

In an article last week on the share pushing operations of the Sterling Debenture Corporation of New York, I remarked that the circulars reporting the unexpected discovery of vast quantities of wild rubber on the estates of the Bartica Company in British Guiana read like a fairy tale. I now learn that the same view has been expressed rather more emphatically by Professor J. B. Harrison, Director of the Science and Agriculture Department of the British Guiana Government. To an inquirer who asked for his opinion on the circulars, the Professor wrote on October 31:—

> A very interesting fairy tale. . . The fairy tale, when reduced to its lowest terms, merely indicates that they have found some trees of sapium jenmanii. This is quite usual among second growth forest where clearances have formerly been made for cultivation. But even as a fairy tale it is a little stiff, and has too many frillings.

Still, investors are credulous beings, and I doubt not that many have unsuspectingly swallowed this remarkable story, despite its patent extravagances.

A Buyer of Rubbish.

A surprising proposal is made in a circular addressed to some of my readers by a Mr. R. M. Smythe, of New York. Mr. Smythe intimates that he will buy "old, repudiated, or defaulted bonds, also defunct or inactive railroad and other securities," including "bonds wiped out by reorganisation." He requires only American securities over ten years old, and he bars out mining and oil company stocks. It would be interesting to discover what Mr. Smythe does with these things. There is no accounting for tastes, but I hardly suppose that he collects worthless and unmarketable bond and share certificates as a sort of hobby just as other people collect old china. He is, doubtless, in the business to make money. Can it be that amongst his purchases of waste paper he picks up some pieces whose value is unknown to the sellers?

Company Nomenclature.

The explanation given in last week's Truth in the interests of the Car and General Insurance Corporation points very forcibly to the need of a more stringent interpretation of the law with regard to the registration of companies under similar names. The Car and General was registered in 1903. Three years later a new company, having no connection whatever with the old one, was registered as "The Law Car and General Insurance Corporation," and the close resemblance between the names has created much confusion in the minds of the public—a state of things particularly hard upon the Car and General owing to the unsatisfactory position of the Law Car and General. It has been officially stated that the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies can only refuse registration if the title so nearly resembles the other, "as to be calculated to deceive," and in this instance the word "Law" at the beginning of the title was considered sufficient to distinguish the later company from that already in existence. Experience has shown that the Registrar was mistaken, and it is clear that the Law Car and General ought never to have been permitted to assume a title which was an obvious plagiarism.

The Mystery of a Bank.

My reference last week to the North British Bank at Glasgow induced a local correspondent to go in quest of that institution. He found that it had removed from the "head office" at 223, St. Vincent Street, but in a large building at 142, West Nile Street, an address given as that of one of the branches, he came across a door inscribed: "John Gunn and Co., Solicitors. The North British Bank." Perhaps Messrs. John Gunn and Co. can enlighten me as to the constitution, management, assets, and liabilities of this mysterious bank, which was lately seeking to borrow money on what it described as the "first-class security" of its 10 per cent. debentures.

The Blind Pool Brigade.

Being favoured with one of the familiar circulars of the National Securities Corporation, 181, Queen Victoria Street, a correspondent who now uses the appropriate pseudonym of "V. Green" forwarded £10 for the next "Combined Stock Operation." He expected that in due course he would get his money back with those handsome profits, running into hundreds per cent., which the corporation affirms that it makes for its clients. It is almost superfluous to say that what he did receive was the customary circular intimating that in consequence of "an unexpected adverse movement in American Rails" the so-called "operation" on a 1 per cent. margin ended in a total loss. "V. Green" now asks me whether this business is genuine or not! Of course it is a flat-trap, which has been worked for years with precisely the same results to the innocents who are caught in it. The only real "operation" is the transfer of money from their pockets to those of the individual who styles himself a corporation. I hope that "V. Green" will be satisfied with this costly lesson, but if he has any more money to squander he can gain further similar experiences by patronising the London Scottish Stock Exchange, the United Stock and Share Corporation, or any of the other blind pool sharks.

"TRUTH" TOY FUND.

I hope that my readers will give special consideration to the urgent appeal on behalf of the Truth Toy Fund which appears on the first page of this week's issue. It will be seen that a very large sum is still required to complete the Fund for the customary Christmas distribution of toys and dolls among the poor children in the London workhouses and hospitals, and I feel sure that I shall not ask in vain for the generous assistance of those who have benefited by the information and advice and warnings against financial tricksters and swindlers given from week to week in these columns. Not infrequently correspondents are good enough to propose the payment of a fee for the inquiries they send to "Vigilant." No fee is required or accepted, but people who feel indebted to me for helpful counsel in matters of investment now have an admirable opportunity of showing their appreciation. Contributions to the Fund of any amount from one shilling upwards will be thankfully received and duly acknowledged in Truth.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of Truth.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered. Correspondents should state whether or not they are holders of the securities upon which an opinion is desired.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

Carlisle.—The stock is a sound one, and at present price should be worth holding. To attempt to answer question 2 would, I am afraid, mean venturing too far into the realm of surmise.

Epping.—The project is at present very much in the air, and even if it matures the completion of the service will be a matter of years. Discussion of the effect, if any, upon the steamship lines must be left to a later date. I would just say that if the scheme be carried through it would involve a great expansion in the trade of the countries concerned, and the shipping companies, instead of being hurt, might easily derive benefit.

Juvenis.—You do not give your buying figure; but there would be no harm in taking a profit. I am in favour of the stock, but there is a danger of it becoming too popular, and the over-sanguine dividend hopes being raised in some quarters may mean a set-back later if the wrong class of people have got in.

Minnicks.—At present the bonds are of a distinctly speculative character. They have ultimate possibilities, but look fully valued for the time being.

Perspicacious.—If you are willing to keep these as an investment by all means do so.

Wilts.—If you are prepared to wait awhile the stock ought to be worth retaining. The company is under good auspices, and will serve a district that to a large extent has a considerable traffic already waiting to be carried.

Mines.

Aurasastra.—I cannot trace any such concern.

Clatt.—Holding must be considered very much of a gamble
Crongie.—Better hold all in hope of some recovery sooner or later.

Engineer.—1. There is no life in this market at present, but I look for an eventual recovery, and think you should keep your shares. 2. Sell on a moderate rally. 3. A fair holding for dividends.

Inner Temple.—1. It is impossible to estimate the life of such a mine, and the shares are a highly speculative selection. 2. No; the money could be employed more hopefully. 3. There may possibly be a temporary reduction in the rate.

Surgeon, R.N.—A fair speculative lock-up. Surrey.—1. No. 2. A fair speculative holding.

W. R. (Glasgow).—Better put the additional money into something else.

Mixed Securities.

Acorn.—1. I cannot predict any immediate resumption of dividends, and would not average just now. Nos. 2 and 3 are sound stocks. Both have suffered in sympathy with investment securities generally, but No. 3 has also been affected by trade depression and a cut in the dividend. At present levels I would hold the two.

Egerlander.—I do not look for much further fall. In any case, as an investor, you ought to hold, and ignore market fluctuations. You could hardly have a safer stock. European.—The bonds are a high-class investment and suited to a person of the kind you name. Electro.—1. Hopeful speculation from a lock-up point of view. 2. Not the kind of share I can recommend Efinagh.—1. See answers under "Insurance." 2 and 3. You may be able eventually to secure a small profit in each case.

Fatima.—1. A good investment. Yield at present about 4 per cent. 2. No mining share is a "safe investment." 3. Excellent. The yield is 4 5-16 per cent.

Goat.—1. I cannot say. The question is one for the liquidator. 2. These are worth keeping.

Hopeful.—Sorry, but I do not initiate speculation in this column. I can only suggest that you study my weekly notes. Harked.—No. 2 is a very doubtful holding, but I know of no reason why you should sell 1 or 3.

Kent.—1. There does not seem to be much risk attaching to them, and I see no reason to advise a sale. 2. Keep these shares. The company's recently issued report was distinctly encouraging.

Lee.—No. 3 is worth buying. An averaging purchase of the catering companies shares seems almost worth making. Do not buy more of the other company's shares.

Mother Bunch.—Better hold Nos. 1 and 2. Nos. 3 and 4 are distinctly speculative, and not desirable holdings for a lady. I cannot recommend 5 or 6.

Nippon.—a. I do not care to recommend it. Place your account with one of the leading joint stock banks. b. Centrals. c. Cinderellas and Jupiters have lock-up possibilities.

Pine.—I do not know this concern. Have you given the name correctly? 2. Sell on a moderate rally. No. 3 are worth keeping. Pimlico.—You have made a very fair selection. I regard all of them as hopeful speculative investments.

Rechab.—They are all well secured and would make an excellent trust.

Seaview.—Keep the shares for the present. The company is understood to have some important business under consideration, which is likely to materialise as soon as market conditions are favourable.

Trefusis.—No. 1 is a fair commercial holding, but liable, like all ordinary shares, to fluctuations in dividends, and, therefore, in price. 2. Not a "safe investment," but a fairly promising speculative lock-up.

Woodlands.—Nos. 2 and 3 are all right, but No. 1 involves a good deal of speculative risk.

Rubber.

A Regular Purchaser of Truth.—1. Yes. 2. Hold c and d. Exchange the others for Strathmore. 3. A reasonable purchase at present price of 3s. 9d. 4. Yes. Alligator.—1. Alor Pongsu is a good purchase. 2. A sound dividend-payer, but the cheaper shares, such as Strathmore, offer greater promise of capital appreciation. 3. Worth averaging. Acorn.—All good. In order of preference, I should arrange them 2, 1, 3. Aaron.—Sell the more speculative shares—viz., 1, 4, 5 and 6. Hold

SPECIAL LITERARY SUPPLEMENT.

No. 1771. WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 7, 1910.

A BREATH OF COUNTRY AIR.

"A Shepherd's Life." Impressions of the South Wiltshire Downs. By W. H. Hudson. Illustrated by Bernard G. Gotch. London: Methuen and Co. 7s. 6d. net.)

Not here, O Apollo,
Are haunts meet for thee,
But where Helicon breaks down
In cliff to the sea

ries Matthew Arnold; but the haunts least meet for he god are those that most need him and should most welcome him. Therefore I should especially recommend own-dwellers and above all dwellers in London town, o read Mr. Hudson's "A Shepherd's Life." Dwellers n London town who are most of all antipathetic to Mr. Hudson should most of all and for that reason read im, since his horror of them is due to the unnatural nd unwholesome conditions of their lives, which only uch a breath of country air and such a sight of country cenes as you get in "A Shepherd's Life" can help you o realise. Mr. Hudson loves to live alone with the lonely hepherd, and to converse with these "dumb mouths," ince for him the solitudes are peopled and the inarticuate agricultural labourer speaks. With him Mr. Hudson sympathises, and him alone perhaps he envies. The agricultural labourer, leading a life of the xtremest simplicity, is the healthiest and sanest man n the land, if not also the happiest—as some believe." The deadest deaths are the best," says Montaigne, and perhaps so also are the deadest lives, lives that have given few hostages to fortune, and few openings to are. "Like a beast with lower pleasures, like a beast vith lower pains," if, in proportion as you rise above he beast, your pains are multiplied more than your leasures. If, however, Mr. Hudson believes in a rimitive life, at least, he can see through that merest nirage of the mind, "the good old times." Here is a ight assize of the year 1827, when Judge Park at Salisury congratulated the Grand Jury on there being no erious cases in the calendar—in fact, only twenty-eight ersons to be sentenced to death, one of them for the heft of half-a-crown! Two years earlier this same udge commented upon the heavy appearance of the alendar—not in the number of offenders (170) so nuch as the enormity of their offences; yet the orst case he had to try was one of sheep-stealing! No judge in that day ever took it into his consideration hat the men he sentenced to death for theft had o steal to save themselves from death by starvation. The highest wages of a strong man in those days vas seven shillings a week, and that during harvest. After harvest "every village had as a rule its dozen r twenty men or more thrown out—good steady nen with families dependent upon them; and besides hese there were the aged and weaklings and the ads who had not yet got a place. The misery f these out-of-work labourers was extreme. They would go to the woods and gather faggots of dead vood which they would try to sell in the villages; but there were few who could afford to buy of hem; and at night they would skulk about the elds to rob a swede or two to satisfy the cravings f hunger." Yet hanging was the penalty for hefts of this desperate kind! "Combien," exclaimed Montaigne, "ay je veu de condemnations plus rimineuses que le crime!" Occasionally even to-day here are justices whose sentences should set themselves t the dock.

However, these old-time horrors are not in the usual key in which Mr. Hudson's charming volume is set. The book has to do chiefly with gentle shepherds like Caleb Bawcombe, whose very dog in all the fifteen years he had him never killed or hurt a creature, not a mouse even, but caught it only to play with it and let it go. By the way, the theory that all wild creatures are born with an instinctive knowledge and dread of their natural enemies is not borne out by the experience of Caleb, who has night after night seen half-grown rabbits play with their natural enemies, half-grown foxes. Indeed, a gamekeeper assured Mr. Hudson that he had even seen a full-grown fox and a full-grown rabbit chase each other to and fro in a game to which they had obviously long been accustomed. Even cats are kindly in Mr. Hudson's experience, though the strangest things he tells about these uncanny creatures is the hypnotic fascination which attracts and rivets them to the rails till they are cut to pieces. In station after station Mr. Hudson learned that cats are always being killed on the line through paralysis at the sight of an approaching train. Indeed, the shining line itself seems to hypnotise them, and when the express comes thundering along they are too fascinated to move. Hares also get killed on the line through a like fascination. More interesting still are Mr. Hudson's tales of sheep-dogs and their training, the individuality of their characters, and the peculiarity of their tempers. In explaining Caleb Bawcombe's exceptional observation, memory, and power of describing all he had observed and remembered, Mr. Hudson gives away part of the secret of the extraordinary fascination his books have had for me always. "Caleb," he says, "was one of the few who could remember and tell you about all such things, because, I take it, he had sympathy for the creatures he had observed, and their actions, therefore, had stamped themselves on his memory, since he had seen them emotionally."

THE RUSSIAN PEASANTRY.

"A Vagabond in the Caucasus." With some notes of his experiences among the Russians. By Stephen Graham. With sixteen illustrations and two maps. (London: John Lane. 12s. 6d. net.)

Mr. Stephen Graham's "A Vagabond in the Caucasus" is a perfectly delightful book—almost Borrow-like! The gasping, staccato prologue, which records amongst other things Mr. Graham's worship of Carlyle, pays to the Chelsea sage the compliment of imitation, the imitation at least of emphasising every sentence. There is, in fact, so much emphasis that there is no emphasis. "When everybody is somebody then nobody is anybody," as one of the Gilbert and Sullivan operas has it. However, when this puffing, panting little tug-boat of a prologue, so to say, has towed you out of harbour everything goes smoothly so far as the style is concerned. For the rest, Mr. Graham had anything but smooth experiences in the Caucasus, and such adventures as those he encountered in his "two-hundred-mile walk" are more pleasant to read about than they could have been to encounter. The wonder to the reader is Mr. Graham's escape with his life from those Ossetine robbers who hailed down upon him rocks of the size of cannon-balls with the practised precision of gunners, or his subsequent no less narrow escape from perishing of exhaustion in his climb in a snowstorm over the trackless Mamison. It is odd to think how a few days' journey forward in space is equivalent to a journey of many centuries backward in time in this—that a trip like Mr. Graham's transports you practically into the Middle Ages. You can realise what "the good old times" were like when you find yourself among these Ossetines, who, as a Russian said to Mr. Graham, "have a tariff—to lay a man out, one rouble; to murder him, three roubles." Mediæval also is the Russian peasant, with whom Mr. Graham had much to do, and no less mediæval is his Government. What other Government than the Russian would encourage the peasant's besetting sin, drunkenness, because vodka was a Government monopoly? There was, during Mr. Graham's sojourn in Russia, a Slav Father Mathew, a holy priest of Sergievo, who had redeemed so many thousand drunkards that bands of pilgrims journeyed from Moscow, Odessa, and Kiev to be cured by him of their vice; and cured they were accordingly in such numbers that the Government, finding the sale of vodka seriously affected, banished the apostle of temperance! Perhaps another motive less short-sighted than a consideration for the revenue was at the bottom of this discouragement by the Government of a successful temperance crusade, since the more ignorant and degraded the peasant is the more abject and absolute is his subjection to the Church and to the Tsar. It has always seemed to me an astonishing lack of imagination in English politicians and journalists to suppose that sporadic outbreaks of revolution or Nihilism in Russian towns were as significant as if they had occurred in Manchester or Marseilles. In the first place, the immense mass of the Russian people is mediæval and semi-eastern, and, in the second place, it is isolated and agricultural. This vast inert mass is ignorant, fatalist, superstitiously and fanatically devoted to the Church and to the Tsar. "I have spoken," says Mr. Graham, "to peasants from all parts of the country, and I have not found one who had a word to say against the Tsar or who felt any grievance against his country's governors. There are a hundred million of peasants who swear by God and the Tsar, and who believe implicitly in both God and Tsar." No doubt in another place Mr. Graham speaks of the revolutionary promise of the growth of Puritanism in Russia. "If Elizabethan Puritans meant ultimately the Whitehall gallows, one may ask apprehensively for the significance of the Puritanism that is springing into existence in the reign of Nicholas II." But these small Puritan communities, chiefly Baptist, are even less formidable than the revolutionaries and Nihilists of the great cities, since, in the first place, they are peaceful, and in the second place they are easily suppressed.

LADY JOHN RUSSELL.

"Lady John Russell." A Memoir, with selections from her diaries and correspondence. Edited by Desmond MacCarthy and Agatha Russell. With ten illustrations, of which five are in colour. (London: Methuen and Co. 10s. 6d. net.)

In their Memoir of "Lady John Russell," a biography worthy of the admirable life which is its subject, Lady Agatha Russell and Mr. Desmond MacCarthy transcribe from the diary of Lord John Russell his account of an interview with Napoleon when in exile in Elba. In this interview Napoleon admits a charge which in one of his letters to Lady Clavering he denies—that of counselling the poisoning of two of his own plague-stricken men to prevent their falling into the ferocious hands of the Turk. In his letter he maintains that he delayed the march of his army for twenty-four hours—the limit of the life of the seven doomed men—in order to save them from both Turk and poison. This interview with Napoleon is one of the most interesting things in a volume of extreme interest; but it is not a little disillusioning. To whom, do you suppose, Lord John likens the Emperor? To Gibbon in the unwieldiness of his figure, and to Hume in the fat flabbiness of his face! In this portrait, too, the Emperor has a turn-up nose, a dusky grey eye which would be called in a horse vicious, and a mouth expressive of derision and scorn. Lord John's relations with Napoleon III., when, against the determined opposition of Queen Victoria, the British Minister pressed for the freedom of Italy, are more perhaps to his credit than all his other battles for the principles of Liberalism. What an example to our hooligan suffragettes you have in this life of a woman whose sweetness and light were an influence and an inspiration, and who, in the closing words of Mr. Frederic Harrison's memorial address, "kept her high courage under all adversities and opposition in the spirit of che sarà sarà—'stand fast come what may'—in the spirit of that other motto of her house, suaviter et fortiter, 'with all the gentleness of a woman and all the fortitude of a man.'"

AMAZING PAPUA.

"The New New Guinea." By Beatrice Grimshaw. With forty-nine illustrations and a map. (London: Hutchinson and Co. 12s. 6d. net.)

In a sprightly introduction to this lightest and liveliest of books of travel you find "the weary Titan" again and again fighting in vain against the "too vast orb of his fate." Again and again the British Government were implored to annex New Guinea, and again and again—in 1793, in 1873, and in 1883—it declined with scorn. It rejected it with the scorn wherewith the Trobriand islander used to eat an oyster and spit out on the midden the priceless pearl it contained. When we did at last accept a portion of the glorious island—only because Germany was beginning a boa constrictor meal upon it—we neglected it scandalously, and its prosperity dates from its annexation to Australia. Miss Grimshaw's account of all she experienced in this amazing Papua (and she proudly contradistinguishes herself from other travellers in that she confines herself to her own personal experiences) is extraordinarily bright and breezy, but I doubt if she will induce many readers to pack their "swags" and follow in her adventurous footsteps.

THE TYRANNY OF THE TRUSTS.

"Farthest West." Life and Travel in the United States. By C. Reginald Enock, F.R.G.S. With thirty-two illustrations and a map. (London: John Long. 15s. net.)

Mr. Reginald Enock's "Farthest West" confirms my long-established conviction that the great Armageddon between capital and labour will be fought out in the States. Mr. Enock's picture of the colossal fraud, violence, bribery, and tyranny of the Trusts, and again of the desperate hate of the men for such monstrous masters, leaves you in no doubt of the imminence of a day of deadly reckoning. By the way, Mr. Enock might have found in the Bible an earlier and greater example of the "cornerer of wheat" than those denounced by the prophet Amos. "The enterprising wheat kings," he says, "of Chicago and New York might find in the Prophet Amos that they are not the originators of these ingenious operations." But these wheat kings would probably read no farther than Genesis, where they would triumphantly point, as their prototype and justification, to Joseph, certainly the first Jew cornerer of wheat. When Mr. Enock considers venality the besetting and exclusive sin of a democracy he is forgetting our own history and the corruption that was universal here in the days when our Government was a Whig oligarchy, and Sir Robert Walpole found that every "gentleman" had his price. At any rate, Mr. Enock has written an extremely interesting, instructive, and opportune book.

PICTURE-BOOKS.

The enormous output of art-books in the present decade is distinguished first and foremost by its high standard of picture reproduction and illustration, and, secondly, by its immense variety. Thus the "Botticelli" published by Messrs. Geo. Newnes consists of a series of excellent photographic reproductions mounted on dark green paper of the painter's best-known works, made coherent solely by a short biographical study by Mr. Richard Davey, who should, however, describe Lorenzo as the grandson and not the son of Cosimo dei Medici. At the other extreme is a delicately nervous study of "Blake" (Duckworth, 2s. net). In which Mr. G. K. Chesterton makes use of all his subtle powers of psychological analysis to reveal the much misunderstood poet-painter. The book is illustrated with a number of beautiful little reproductions, but Mr. Chesterton's fine work renders them almost superfluous. Blake, he says, as a little boy, "lingered too long in the fields and came back to tell his mother that he had seen the prophet Ezekiel sitting under a tree. His mother smacked him. Thus ended the first adventure of William Blake in the wonderland of which he was a citizen." This acute analysis of Blake is a revelation to the average reader; it also causes him to be grateful to Blake for Mr. Chesterton's study of him. "The Songs of Innocence" (Herbert and Daniel, 5s. net) have been prettily illustrated by Miss Honor Appleton, and the hard facts of Blake's life are included in a preface by Mr. Thomas Seccombe. In the same series as Mr. Chesterton's "Blake" and written by Mr. Edward Garnett is an interesting, if somewhat incomplete, study of Hogarth (Duckworth, 2s. net), copiously illustrated.

In "Pages from the Book of Paris" (Constable, 7s. 6d.), by Mr. Claude Washburn, and illustrated by Mr. Lester Hornby, text and illustration complement each other harmoniously. Mr. Washburn has caught the subtleties of Paris in a way impossible to the average tripper point of view, and the "interview" with Anatole France is a delicious piece of irony. Equally subtle are Mr. Hornby's drawings, and the "Seine at Notre Dame" finds expression for something often seen but seldom realised. For sheer gorgeousness of pictorial reproduction I can recommend "Frank Brangwyn" (Kegan Paul, 10s. 6d. net), by Mr. Walter Shaw-Sparrow. In that it sums up the life and works of a man in his prime, the book has a certain use for reference; in that it dabbles with the "fors" and "againsts" of newspaper criticism, it shows that it has come too early. Mr. Shaw-Sparrow is unable, any more than his fellows, to make more than a guess at the scope of Frank Brangwyn's work; but he guesses too assuredly and marks the uncertainty of his position by over-emphasis. It does not greatly matter whether Brangwyn is a romanticist, a modernist, what not; it does not even matter very much if some scribe has expressed all the niceness of his displeasure in a carefully reasoned paragraph. What does matter is the grip and power of his "Plate-layers," the Velasquez-like "Brass-shop," the beautiful face of the Baptist in "The Baptism of Christ," the life-throb of "The Buccaneers." All these are admirably reproduced in this beautiful volume, and speak more for Mr. Brangwyn than any unripe criticism or admiration of Brangwyn as a whole, particularly as that whole fortunately does not yet exist.

"Our Village" (Macmillan, 10s. 6d. net) has received the care this year of two illustrators, Mr. Hugh Thomson, who is at his very best in an old-world work of this kind, and Mr. A. Rawlings, whose coloured plates of rural England are bright and sunny, if less delicate than the drawings. An introduction by Lady Ritchie contains a life of Miss Mitford, and dwells with the writer's accustomed charm on the conceptions and position of the literary woman in the early nineteenth century. While Miss Mitford's grandiose plays are forgotten, "Our Village" remains a standing testimony to the charm and simplicity of her genius.

Since it is not only difficult but undesirable to depart materially from the original illustrations to "Pickwick," Mr. Cecil Aldin's efforts in a fine large edition of the "Posthumous Papers" (Chapman and Hall, Lawrence and Jellicoe, 2 vols., 21s net) are the more praiseworthy in that he preserves the spirit if not the letter of the original. The illustration of Weller père, and Mrs. Weller with the "shepherd" bumping in an arm-chair, specially arranged for him, has all the spirit and merriment of the occasion, besides a good pictorial effect. Mr. Pickwick starting from the Bull Inn by driving on to the pavement is essentially in keeping with the character of the Pickwick Club, and the black and white illustrations are equally attractive. As a picture-book this edition of Pickwick is likely to find many admirers.

A much better idea of "Japan and the Japanese" (Methuen, 18s. net) can be gained from Mr. Walter Tyndale's delightful study, both literal and pictorial, than from many books with much greater pretensions. The mere fact, indeed, that Mr. Tyndale looked at the subject from two points of view, and in painting pictures acquired knowledge, and in acquiring knowledge painted pictures, may in some measure account for his just, reasonable, and very charming account of a remarkable country. His pictures give a real idea of flowers in the country of flowers, and are little celebrations of the azalea, the cherry-tree, the iris, the lotus, the wisteria, what not. The text deals with manners and customs in a sympathetic and enlightening manner. The reputation of the Japanese for dishonesty, so universally accredited by Eastern authorities, he holds as unjust, attributing it at least in part to the fact that European traders no longer have the monopoly of trade in Japan. Of the geisha he advances the plea that Rome does as Rome does, and not as London or Paris or Berlin profess to do. This is a most illuminating book.

AMONGST THE NOVELISTS.

The three daughters of Mr. Christopher Lambe, with whom you have chiefly to do in Baroness van Hutten's "The Green Patch" (Hutchinson, 6s.), are nearly as eccentric as their father, who takes them out in a boat in their childhood, bathes from the boat, and then forgets their existence, though the very loss of his clothes, you would say, might have dimly reminded him of them. They drift out to sea and are picked up by the hero in his yacht, who even then is struck by the marvellous beauty of the eldest girl, whose one weakness is that of the Fat Boy in "Pickwick," she is nearly always asleep. In fact, she is a mere vegetable, who has for her active rival in her love for the hero, her next sister, and for her triumphant rival, her third sister, who marries him. You are, in a word, in a wholly irresponsible world in "A Green Patch," which nevertheless interests you in spite of your lack of sympathy with all the characters except its chivalrous hero.

Mr. E. M. Sneyd-Kynnersley's "A Snail's Wooing" (Macmillan, 6s.), might have had for its motto Nat Lee's "Then he will talk—Good gods! how he will talk!" There is a superfluity of talk, much of it unfortunately humorous; and, indeed, the humour of the novel is most depressing. But the descriptions of places and scenes in the Alps are good, and the "snail's wooing," when you get at last to it and on with it, is interesting.

Mr. Richard Bagot shows no dramatic but much melodramatic power in his sensational "The House of Serravalle" (Methuen, 6s.). His characters all talk too much, and too much alike and, to say the whole truth, too prosily for dramatic life and liveliness. On the other hand, Mr. Bagot, who is thoroughly at home in Italy and with the Italian character, serves up an Italian dish of melodramatic crime with all the usual ingredients most skilfully and spicily mixed.

One can imagine no deeper contrast than that between Mr. Forster's "Howard's End" (Arnold, 6s.), subtle, psychological, poetic, and Mr. Alexander Otis's "Love at Cross Purposes" (Stanley, Paul and Co., 6s.), a roaring farce from beginning to end. I fear "Howard's End" will be caviare to the general, since its incidents are often as improbable as its character drawing is subtle and its descriptions poetic; but "the general", which enjoys farce of "a robustious, periwig-pated" kind will revel in "Love at Cross Purposes."

There can be no shadow of doubt about "Chains," by Edward Noble (Constable, 6s.), being a novel with a purpose. Indeed it might almost be said to have a twofold purpose, the one to picture the horrors of the white slave traffic as it exists in the tropical towns on the West Coast of South America, the other to picture the lot of women who call the customers of the slave traders husband. It is an ugly picture of life which Mr. Noble presents—vivid enough—yet this is not that one great novel which, like "Uncle Tom's Cabin," shall one day stir the heart of a nation to its depths over the trade which is a disgrace to all the nations.

That novel has yet to be written; meanwhile, Mr. Noble's will do good.

The admirers of Captain Kettle, and they are innumerable, will have a quarrel to pick with his creator. In the "Empire of the World" (Everett, 6s.) Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne has, it is true, added another portrait to his gallery of great impossibles, but he has spoiled the picture by making him just a common flag wagger like any mere bar-lounger. An emperor of the world stealing over the tiles into his attic to avoid his landlady is credible enough, when his empire is founded on the fears of the nations at the mysterious "new force" which he controls. But an Imperator Mundi, who is also an M.P., though a very hard up one, helping to mob a fellow M.P. in Whitehall because he is a pro-German is incomprehensible. Mr. Hyne has done better than this.

For a pleasant, cheerful surprise—well, no, it can hardly be called that—the opening chapter of "The Girl's Head," by Edgar Jepson (Greening, 6s.), would be difficult to beat. Figure a baronet newly come into his title and inheritance comfortably at breakfast, an unopened brown paper parcel the subject of his meditations. Then figure him opening it, and finding within the head of a beautiful girl. There is a situation with endless possibilities, and Mr. Jepson knows how to take advantage of them. It is a pretty plot which he has woven for Sir John Messiter to unravel, with black threads and golden in the woof and the unravelling enchains the reader's attention from the first page to the last, partly no doubt because the actors in the drama are not mere lay figures, but have human characteristics too often lacking in the novel of mystery.

There is a strong situation in the opening story which gives its name to Mr. Richard Marsh's volume of stories, "A Drama of the Telephone" (Digby Long, 6s.). It is a little difficult to credit that any ordinary business man, a matter-of-fact accountant, too, would have acted like Mr. Oswald Dale, when an unknown person rang him up on the telephone to inform him that a murder had been committed at a certain address, and then sent him mysteriously the latchkey of the house named in the mysterious message. Any average man would have straightway called in the police. But that would have spoiled Mr. Marsh's story by making it read like a police-court report, and no doubt Mr. Marsh's way is the best, for he gets innumerable thrills out of his theme.

One knows what to expect from Mr. Tom Gallon, and one gets it in "The Rogue's Heiress" (Hutchinson, 6s.). There are the innocent maiden, the complete villain, the incomplete villain with yearnings after better things, and the simple-minded good-hearted supers; all of the stage, stagey. There is a plot in which innocence is entangled in the toils of villainy, and innocence emerges triumphant, and half-hearted villainy is reformed by love to tread for the future the straight and narrow path. It is not too like life to be uncomfortable, nor too far away from life to be preposterous, in fact, it is Mr. Gallon's own mixture—life, perhaps, seen through sentimental spectacles.

As the title suggests, Miss Amy McLaren has gone to the Hielands for the hero of "Bawbee Jock" (Murray, 6s.), and she has found a most satisfactory one. It was Angela Tempest who really discovered the heart of gold which beat beneath the Glenmoira plaid, and considering the company in which she was at the time one hardly expected it of Angela. For the house party of which she was a member was—well, the sort of house party which one rather associates with the set known as smart and possessing a much keener appreciation of gold in concrete rather than the abstract. Very cleverly Miss McLaren describes that house party, and the little idiosyncrasies of its component parts. Later her story develops on stronger lines, and reaches the frontiers of tragedy. But the author is kind. Both Jock and Angela had a right to be happy. It is an admirable story, with much clever characterisation.

If things were only as they ought to be in this world "The Wonderful Bishop," by Morley Roberts (Nash, 6s.), would be right here in the midst of London. He is a deuce of a chap is this Bishop, and the way he knocked out P.C. Charlesworth, with the Inspector backing him, was superb. Such an example of the Church militant ought not to be left to vegetate in Milchester. And some of the other London adventures in Mr. Morley Roberts's book are just as good. If they do not really happen, Mr. Roberts at least makes them happen for his readers, and his light-hearted jesting with fancy makes for wholesome laughter.

Sir Andrew is one of those fortunate people who, in fiction, are universally popular. He lives at "Fancy Farm" (Blackwood and Sons, 6s.) with his rich cousin Norah and his Aunt Amelia, thinks to take a second wife and engages his cousin's services in the quest. Penelope turns up almost by accident at the Farm, and Sir Andrew sets to work to mould her, by means of dancing, fencing, and the like, to be mistress of the Farm, while Norah assists, albeit with a pang. One day Pen discovers that she is being moulded; one day Sir Andrew discovers that he has been moulding her in Norah's image. Luckily, there is another young man available, and Mr. Neil Munro's very pretty story ends up satisfactorily for every one.

Not even the broad back of the seventh commandment is able to bear Lady Angela Forbes to a literary victory in her "Broken Commandment" (Eveleigh Nash, 6s.). Breaking commandments indeed has attained such popularity as to require more than the inability of Margaret to be a wife "in the true sense of the word," the usual temptation, and final heroics to make it a "sauce piquante" to a jaded appetite. The other characters are more or less stereotyped. There is the woman who has suffered and thereby learnt to talk impressively about Karma; there is the husband, Jack, who, in his rôle of one of the crosses that are given us to bear, comes back from abroad with character enough almost to enjoy the opportunity of forgiving his wife's infidelity; there is the strong man, who, however, is only strong upon his wife's income. "The Broken Commandment" would have been much better hushed up.

A Jacobs-like humour is diffused through Mr. Robert Halifax's "Venturesome Virgin" (Digby Long, 6s.), and Mr. Casswade's efforts to circumvent the extravagance of the wife he so imprudently married give the author ample scope for the exercise thereof. Mr. Casswade conceals his marriage as long as possible; at the end of a twelvemonth any reference to it is as a red rag to a bull; finally Mrs. Casswade insists on recognition, buys sixty pounds' worth of new furniture, gives parties, and, adopting a highly refined accent, says "surpraysed" for surprised. All Mr. Halifax's characters are characters, the maid-of-all-work, Martha, and the business-like Mr. Baversham being among the best. Mr. Casswade's subjugation and the end of the Rendezvous Road venture are too good reading to be revealed beforehand.

It is a little difficult to place "The Raft in the Bush" (Ward, Lock, 6s.), by Miss Ethel Turner. As a piece of elaborate nonsense it hardly bears comparison with the regulation nonsense books; as a story it cannot be considered; as humour run amok it seems to stand the best chance. King Billy, an Australian, hears that there is going to be a flood, and he gets a raft and takes all the animals on board, Noah's Ark fashion. A good deal of clever conversation ensues, and after some very mild adventures the story ends. I prefer Miss Turner in her more coherent phases.

We hear a good deal of the charms of a young woman designated "Vic Victa" (Greening, 6s.), by Mr. Alfred Carey. There is a story attaching to Vic that causes her to be haunted by sinister Indians, without very sinister intentions. The story is a little incoherent. Vic develops the usual marvellous voice; she is kidnapped by the Indians to reign over thousands; and all this leads merely up to the fact that she gets drowned in the river, which is hardly a reward to the reader for all his pains in plot-unravelling.

THE AGE OF CHIVALRY AND SAVAGERY.

"Philippa of Hainault and Her Times." By B. C. Hardy. (London: John Long. 10s. 6d. net.)

Every one since his schooldays associates B. C. Hardy's heroine, "Philippa of Hainault," with the rescue from execution of the six burghers of Calais, whom her truculent husband, King Edward, insisted on sacrificing in atonement for the heroic defence of that city by its citizens; but it seems that the story is to be found only in the picturesque Froissart, Philippa's protégé. His famous chronicle, indeed, was produced for and accepted by her, and she is, therefore, little likely to show to disadvantage in it. However, she might well shine out to advantage against the background of those terrible times, which, if they are as full of romantic adventures as any novel of Dumas's, are no less full of treacheries and atrocities which would disgrace a Newgate Calendar. Neither the heroic Edward nor his more heroic son, the Black Prince, is unstained by these enormities, and they might well be taken to typify the amazing mixture of savagery and chivalry which distinguished the age. But at least it is a most interesting age, as every page of this volume testifies, and you have the satisfaction, while reading it, of feeling yourself an historical student. After all, there is much to be said for this pleasurable method of studying history, since, according to Shakespeare, in reading "no profit grows where is no pleasure ta'en."

FLORENCE AND VENICE.

Of the Italian houses perhaps no history is so remarkable as that of the great Medici family. For while the Medici somewhat resembled the Scotch in their native shrewdness and caution, they did not live under a clan system—which made of every man a potential gentleman—but under a hard-and-fast caste rule, which makes their progress from merchant to prince, from prince to royalty, the more astounding. In her "Lives of the Early Medici" (Chatto and Windus, 10s. 6d. net), Miss Janet Ross has adopted the commendable plan of avoiding all speculation by letting the chief actors tell their own story. Thus by means of letters, many of which have not been translated before, we have the story of the great Cosimo (1389-1464), who was banished by a jealous Signoria only to return with greater honour than before, and whose chief work was his consideration of the people as opposed to the nobles; of Piero, his son, somewhat overshadowed by his father, but shrewd and prudent; and finally of Lorenzo the Magnificent, to whom Italy and the Italian language owe so much. Ugly in person, Lorenzo possessed all the graces, besides having at twenty years of age the experience of forty. Interwoven with the main characters are the housewifely cares of Cosimo's wife, the attractive personality of Lucrezia, mother of Lorenzo, to whom no doubt, as well as to his father, he owed much of his brilliancy; of Clarice, his wife, a pale simulacrum of whom he was fond, though his grief at her death was mitigated by the news of his second son's nomination to the Cardinalate. The book is illustrated with excellent portraits of the Medici, and the connecting links supplied by Miss Ross to the letters bear evidence of knowledge and judgment. This is a book to keep.

Somewhat diffuse is Mr. Christopher Hare's "Romance of a Medici Warrior" (Stanley Paul, 10s. 6d. net), dealing, as it does, more forcibly with the great Caterina Sforza and Cosimo, Grand Duke of Florence, than with Giovanni delle Bande Nere, distant cousin of Lorenzo the Magnificent. On the whole, indeed, the story of the Madonna of Forli and her struggle against the Borgia Pope, and the oppression of Florence by Cosimo, eventually Grand Duke of Tuscany, is of greater interest than the somewhat monotonous battles and successes of the great Condottiere. The elevation of Cosimo to the Grand Duchy marked the high water-mark reached by the Medici family, even excluding the marriage of Catharine with Henry II. of France. Cosimo himself, however, formed the background of endless domestic tragedies, due perhaps to his neglect of the advice of his famous namesake Cosimo il Vecchio, "Be careful not to attract public attention." The "Romance of a Medici Warrior" is really the romance of several other persons besides himself.

Mr. F. C. Hodgson's "Venice in the Thirteenth and Fourteenth Centuries" (Allen) has little in common with the historical "savouries" that may at any moment be purchased for half a guinea, and digested in half an hour. Rather does it bear every evidence of solid and conscientious work in a wide field, and, correspondingly, ventures to demand from the reader his most serious attention. Mr. Hodgson gives a sketch of Venetian history from the conquest of Constantinople to the accession of Michele Steno, treating particularly felicitously with the careers of her great men, such, for instance, as Marco Polo. His book is a valuable addition to Venetian history.

FOR THE CHILDREN'S LIBRARY.

Sumptuously are the children provided for in the seasonal literature, and in no instance more sumptuously than in the collection of old fairy tales, "The Sleeping Beauty and other Fairy Tales," retold from the old French by Sir Arthur Quiller Couch, with pictures by Edmund Dulac (Hodder and Stoughton, 15s. net). The other stories are "Blue Beard," "Cinderella," and "Beauty and the Beast," but with all due deference to the author it is the artist who has given the volume its especial distinction. Each of the beautiful little pictures is so exquisite that it would be invidious to discriminate, while the manner in which the whole volume is produced does the artistic contents justice. Many old favourites are also to be found in "The Big Book of Fairy Tales" (Blackie, 7s. 6d. net), edited by Walter Jerrold. Here, again, it is the illustrator who gives the volume its excuse for existence, and as Mr. Charles Robinson is the artist the excuse is a very good one. Much the same may be said in regard to the volume of "Three Tales of Hans Andersen" (Macmillan, 3s. 6d.) illustrated by the late Linley Sambourne. The "Tin Soldier," "Thumbelisa," and the "Little Mermaid" are the "Three Tales" illustrated with all the late Mr. Sambourne's well-known grace of line. More old-time favourites are to be found in the tall, slender volumes published by Messrs. T. C. and E. C. Jack, retold by Louey Chisholm. "Jack o' the Beanstalk" and "Hop o' My Thumb," to mention only two of them, are fairy tales which never fail to captivate the child's mind.

Amongst those authors who weave new fairy stories Mrs. A. H. Spielman is not to be forgotten, and her this year's volume, "The Child of the Air" (Duckworth, 5s. net) will take rank with the best of its predecessors. It is a tale of an eagle and a maid, of the jealousy of women and the folly of men. Nor are the pictures by C. Wilhelm to be despised. In "The Sun Babies," by Edith Howse (Cassell), there is struck a more distinctive note of actuality. It pictures nature's fairyland in prose, verse, and pictures for the naturalists of the nursery. Another volume for children which should prove of more than ephemeral interest is "Brownikins and Other Fairies," by Ruth Arkwright (Wells, Gardner, 6s.). It is a volume of children's plays, with music by Mr. J. W. Wilson and pictures by Mr. Charles Robinson. For the little ones, too, is the little volume of "Poetry for Children" (The Priory Press, 1s. 6d.), illustrated with so dainty an effectiveness by Miss Llewellyn Toms. The poems are those old ones which the grandmothers of the present generation knew by heart, and somehow in spite of their unabashed morals appeal just as much to the child mind to-day. There is no such desire to instruct as that shown in these verses in the simple story of "The Slowcoach" (Wells, Gardner, 6s.), which Mr. E. V. Lucas has written. It is a joyous account of a caravaning tour made by one of those delightful families to which Mr. Lucas has introduced youthful readers before.

SOME POPULAR ANNUALS.

Boys, and girls too, are such omnivorous readers nowadays that a single volume to many of them supplies at the most an evening's diversion. For such and their generous uncles and aunts kind fate and Messrs. Cassell and Co. have combined to produce books which will satisfy the most ravenous appetite. There is, for instance, the yearly volume of "Chums" (8s.), with its 1,000-odd pages packed full of stories of adventure on land and sea, with pictures galore, and all sorts of information on the subjects about which boys particularly desire to be informed. Or there is the "British Boy's Annual" (5s.), a handsome volume of stories from the pens of all the most popular writers of boys' stories of the day. Nor do Messrs. Cassell and Co. cater for boys only. "The British Girl's Annual" (5s.) is a volume of stories for the girl of to-day contributed to by writers who know the modern girl far more truly than the sentimental writers who catered for the last generation. For them, too, the "Girl's Realm Annual" (6s.) is a storehouse of delight, with its stories long and short and its 1,300 illustrations.

Another volume which the house of Cassell presents to boy readers is a most exhaustive story of the conquest of the ocean. "The Sea and Its Story" (9s. net), edited by Captain Shaw and Ernest H. Robinson, will tell the lad everything about ships, from the Viking galley to the recently launched Dreadnought. Equally comprehensive in a different field is "The Sweep of the Sword," by Alfred H. Miles (Stanley Paul, 6s.). Mr. Miles is an indefatigable editor of books for boys, but never before has he gathered such a harvest as this in a single volume. It is the boy's own book of battles, and it contains an account of the wars of the world from the earliest recorded times down to the South African war. It is truly a stupendous volume, and should satisfy the most gluttonous appetite for fighting. There is quality as well as quantity to recommend, also, "Fifty-two Stories of Classic Heroes" (Hutchinson, 5s.), which Mr. Francis Storr has edited. The boy who cannot find something to interest him here must have something wrong with him mentally. Much more specialised is "The Boy's Book of Airships," by Harry Delacombe (Grant Richards, 3s. 6d.), but there are many young engineers who will find the facts, incidents, and illustrations which make up the volume full of interest.

ANIMAL STORIES.

However it may be in regard to airships, there can be no question that the animal story always holds its own, particularly when it is told by Mr. Charles D. Roberts. In "Neighbours Unknown" (Ward, Lock, 6s.) Mr. Roberts busies himself once more with the struggle for existence of the birds and the beasts in the great frozen land of the far North-West which he knows so well. His intimate insight more than condones the sentimental setting which gives almost human capacity for suffering to the denizens of waste and forest. In another vein altogether is the "Life of a Foxhound," by John Mills, illustrated by J. A. Shepherd (Hodder and Stoughton, 7s. 6d. net). It is a volume which in many a country house will fascinate the youngsters who, long before they reach their teens, find their way to the meet on the safe old pony which they learned to ride almost before they could walk. Indeed, these memoirs of Ringwood, from the days of his puppyhood until the time when he was recognised as the pick of the pack, will interest many older readers. Readers of all ages, too, will find much of interest in "A Book of Nimble Beasts," by Douglas English (Nash, 6s.). It is a book for youthful naturalists, all about the small things of the world, and illustrated with photographs from life. There are over 200 of these photographs, and the patience and care which must have gone to their preparation deserve wide recognition.

fiction. In adventure, for instance, "Heroes of the Polar Seas," by J. Kennedy Maclean (6s.), is certain of popularity, for it narrates graphically the terrors and hardships of the explorers who have striven to wrest the secrets of the ice-bound seas around the poles. Then there is the story of the boy-scouts in Northern Queensland which Mr. Finnemore has written. Boys who had the advantage of reading "The Wolf Patrol" last year will be eager to get "The Lone Patrol" (3s. 6d.), and to read how the young colonials, fired by the same aims as themselves, fare in their scouting in the bush. Mr. Finnemore knows exactly the boy's taste in fiction, and he shows his capacity again in "Teddy Lester's Chums" (5s.). This is a new story of Slapton School, in which the heroes of "His First Term" are reinforced by "The Bat." It is a rattling good school story. Then, for girls, Messrs. Chambers have books by Mrs. Mead and Raymond Jacberns. In "Pretty-Girl and the Others" (3s. 6d.) Mrs. Mead once again shows her skill in depicting the Irish girl. Really, there are four of them, who have been allowed to run wild in Ireland, and find themselves transplanted to an orderly English rectory to be broken in. "A Schoolgirl's Battlefield," by Raymond Jacberns (5s.) is sufficiently described by the title. It is an admirable story for girls. For the smaller girls "The Old Pincushion," by Mrs. Molesworth (3s. 6d.), should not be overlooked; while for the youngest of all the book of verse and pictures by B. and N. Parker, entitled "Out in the Wood" (3s. 6d. net), will be found full of delight.

NOTES.

The general election has stemmed the flood of new books, and a number which were on the point of publication will not now make their appearance until after Christmas. No doubt the publishers have as good reason as anybody to be aggrieved at the sudden and untimely eruption of the Parliamentary crisis. Still, so far as the postponed books are concerned, it is probable that they will have a much better chance of attracting attention a month or two hence than they would have done now, even if the country had not been in the throes of a fierce political fight. In the publishing season just over there has been a really prodigious output of new volumes, easily eclipsing all previous records. How far the demand has been keeping pace with the supply is best known to the trade, but one may venture a guess that for the moment at least the latter is somewhat ahead of the former, and the book market is hardly likely to suffer from a temporary slackening of production.

Apropos of the constitutional question, two recent books may be commended to people who wish to study it more seriously than can be done through the medium of mere electioneering literature. In "Senates and Upper Chambers" (Chapman and Hall, 5s. net) Mr. H. W. V. Temperley, Fellow and Tutor of Peterhouse, Cambridge, gives a most instructive account of the working of the double-chamber system in America, in the English colonies, and in Europe, and in a chapter on the House of Lords he outlines a scheme for the reform of its constitution, including the introduction of a majority of elected senators and life peers, and the revision of its powers, including the abolition of the absolute veto. "Peers and Bureaucrats" (Constable, 4s. 6d. net) is an interesting volume by Mr. Ramsay Muir, dealing first with the growth of bureaucracy in our system of government, and secondly with the second-chamber question. He argues in favour of a representative second chamber, so constructed as to command the real confidence of the whole nation, from which matters of finance should not be wholly withdrawn.

Mr. Harry Graham's volume on "The Mother of Parliaments" (Methuen, 10s. 6d. net) is frankly designed for the general reader rather than the serious student of constitutional history. The author gives indeed a great deal of information regarding the origin and development, powers and procedure of Parliament, but his object has been to combine entertainment with instruction, and his work is enlivened with an abundance of interesting and amusing anecdotes. At a time when the reconstruction of the Parliamentary machine is under discussion so readable a book on its history and working ought to have a wide popularity.

Mr. Lloyd George, Mr. Winston Churchill, Mr. J. L. Garvin, and Mr. Maxse are among the subjects of Mr. C. L. Graves's humour in "Party Portraits and Other Verses" (Smith, Elder and Co., 1s. net). It is a diverting little volume, containing many entertaining verses besides the political "portraits."

Not merely the sportsman, but every lover of country life will be delighted with "A Gamekeeper's Notebook" (Arnold, 7s. 6d. net), by Messrs. Owen Jones and Marcus Woodward. It embodies experiences and observations during many years of gamekeeping and a life-long study of woodcraft, and fascinating descriptions of the habits of game and vermin are varied with sketches and stories of keepers and poachers. The volume is enriched with some admirable photogravure illustrations.

"Commons, Forests, and Footpaths" (Cassell, 2s. net) is a revised and enlarged edition of Lord Eversley's history of the movement during the past forty years for the protection of the public interests in open spaces and rights of way—a movement in which the author has played a most important part as the founder and chairman of the Commons and Footpaths Preservation Society. Two of Lord Eversley's oldest colleagues in the society, Sir Robert Hunter and Mr. Edward North Buxton, contribute an introduction to the volume.

Sir Gaston Maspero's "Egypt: Ancient Sites and Modern Scenes" (Unwin, 12s. 6d. net) is a companion volume to his "New Light on Ancient Egypt" published in 1908. As Director of the "Service des Antiquités" Sir Gaston makes yearly voyages up and down the Nile for the inspection of monuments, and often in these journeys, made in an old dahabieh, he stops by the way to visit sites of secondary importance where he has been rewarded with interesting and unexpected finds. His impressions of these journeys and his comparisons between the ancient and the modern Egypt make attractive reading.

The new ENCYCLOPAEDIA BRITANNICA, 11th edition, is an entirely new work, founded upon a fresh survey of the world in every department of knowledge.

☞ Prospectus, specimen pages, special prices and terms for advance application, post free from THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY PRESS, Fetter Lane, London, E.C.

AT the time when preparations were being made, between seven and eight years ago, for the creation of the present edition, it was realised that all that could be done in the way of "bringing up to date" the Encyclopædia Britannica as it then stood had already been accomplished by the issue of supplementary volumes. No further process of renovation was to be attempted. The changes of the past thirty years called for something different—for a fresh start, for a new foundation. How was the fresh start made? Had it been possible to limit the effects of change to matters of fact, the foundation of the new edition might have been sought in the old. What need, indeed, to do more than examine separately each of the articles already in existence, and substitute new matter where the old was found wanting? But close upon the appearance, in any field, of new facts follow new points of view, and they require, not a corrective scrutiny of what already stands written, but a fresh survey of the field itself, and a treatment freely shaped according to the demands of the subject as it presents itself to-day. The thoroughness of such a survey evidently depends, not only upon the distinction of those whose services are enlisted in the task, but also upon the extent to which their labours are organised for the purpose in view. Reference, therefore, must first be made to the circumstance which, in the present case, permitted of an organisation more effective than had ever before been brought to the preparation of the Encyclopædia Britannica—the circumstance, namely, that the present edition was not prepared for publication volume by volume, as had always hitherto been the case. The work was planned and carried out as an indivisible whole, of which no volume was to be printed for sale until the entire contents, from A to Z, were practically completed.

Hitherto, all extensive publications have been prepared, printed and sold, volume by volume, and to this rule previous editions of the Encyclopædia Britannica afforded no exception. Thus the first volume of the 9th edition appeared in 1875, and the last not until 1889. Certain obvious drawbacks attach to the method: it is inconvenient to the purchaser, who for years remains the possessor of an incomplete book, and the work itself, when it is at last completed, contains information belonging to different dates. But these are slight faults compared with this less evident one, that piecemeal production is incompatible with the organized survey, and with the systematic treatment upon a well considered plan, of the immense field which an encyclopædia covers.

The old method, the preparation of one volume at a time, since it limits the extent of the task at any given moment, brings it physically within the capacity of a very small editorial staff. An editor, with one, or perhaps two, assistants can certainly see a single volume through the press, and then pass on to the task of "getting out" the next volume. But the real editorial supervision which he is thus able to exercise is of a very limited character, being confined, in fact, chiefly to the business of allocating the main articles in a forthcoming volume to the most competent specialists he can find. Thereafter he must trust entirely to his contributors, not only for the accuracy of their articles but also for their scope.

If there is no well-considered plan for the treatment of a given subject under a series of the most appropriate headings, the only safe course to pursue is to endeavour to say everything in one long article. This tendency is very evident in former editions of the Encyclopædia Britannica. Under such general headings as "Architecture," "Astronomy," "Chemistry," "Geology," much was included that would better have been accorded independent treatment, in separate articles, under other headings. The drawback for the reader was two-fold. The general article was rendered inordinately long by the inclusion of what was not essential to the clear development of the main theme. On the other hand, he looked in vain for articles which he reasonably expected to find upon topics that come within the province of architecture, astronomy, chemistry or geology. It is scarcely an exaggeration to say that the article "Geology," which occupied 163 pages of the 9th edition, accounted for all the geological information which the book contained.

The subject of geology in the new edition probably occupies four or five times as many pages as were given to it in the 9th edition; but the information is distributed under some 500 headings, in such a way that the inquirer upon any geological topic will find, under the heading to which he would naturally turn, the information which he seeks. The article "Geology" itself, by Sir Archibald Geikie, occupies 46 pages, and gives the reader precisely what he requires in turning to such a general heading, a history of the science and an account of its general purpose. The treatment of the subject was then elaborated in the manner which does most justice to the subject itself and will prove most useful to the reader—namely, in a network of articles within the field of geology. These were planned by Mr. H. B. Woodward (late Assistant Director of the Geological Survey), and were carried out with the assistance of the most eminent authorities. What has been said concerning geology might be repeated in connection with the treatment of every subject within the range of human inquiry.

It will be evident that the introduction of system into such a work as the Encyclopædia Britannica makes enormous demands upon the editorial function. It cannot be attempted if the editorial horizon be limited to a single volume. It cannot be achieved unless the whole material, from A to Z, is assembled before any portion of it is published.

It will be evident, further, that the thorough and systematic preparation of such a book exceeds the faculties of any single editor. Even did time allow him fully to enter, in respect of every subject, into the preparation of plans, the perfecting of which may entail months of correspondence and discussion with specialists all over the world, the insufficient range of his knowledge would prevent him from seeing to it that such plans worked well and were duly carried out. The present editor, however, from his experience in connection with the previous edition, knew that knowledge sufficient for this purpose was necessary to the exercise of an efficient editorial control, and he therefore gathered round him a permanent staff of men whose university training in divers faculties brought to the exercise of editorial supervision the desired range of learning.

An effective start may then be said to have been made in the preparation of the work, when the editor in charge of a given department conferred with his contributors as to the treatment of their subject throughout the book according to a well articulated plan.

Such, then, is the meaning of the phrase which has been used to express the degree of newness attaching to the 11th edition of the Encyclopædia Britannica—it is "founded upon a fresh survey of the world in every department of knowledge."

The extent to which the new work differs from the old, indeed, affords a measure of its value as a possession, a measure of the want which it was created to supply. For if the great difference between the present and the former editions bears witness to the advance which knowledge has made in our time, it also suggests how much there is to learn—how much, with such assistance, may be learned by any reader. The newness of the present edition also affords the best guarantee of its enduring usefulness. An edition, which gives throughout information up to the date of its final completion, may assuredly claim a longer lease of usefulness than was due to its predecessor, of which the first volume to be issued was 14 years old before the last came into the purchaser's hands.

The customary method of issuing extensive publications bit by bit, unfavourable as it was to their efficient preparation, possessed one recommendation in the eyes of the purchaser—he paid for his book gradually. But this convenience is offered to him in the present case also, and without the drawback of many years delay. For although the volumes of the new Encyclopædia Britannica have been prepared, and will be issued, simultaneously, so that the subscriber becomes at once the possessor of a complete book, he may, if he desires, pay for it in monthly instalments of 21/- Or, if he prefers to do so, he may, at an increase of but a few shillings, distribute the payment of the cash price over a period of 4, 8 or 12 months. Moreover, while the 9th edition, for the completion of which the purchaser had to wait 14 years, was published at 30/- a volume (850 pp.) the new edition may be obtained at the rate of only 15/10 a volume (960 pp.) by those who apply for a copy now, before publication. After publication the rate will be raised and the ultimate price of the new work will be the old price of 30/- a volume. No remittance is required with advance applications, nor need any payment be made until the volumes have been delivered.

A great reduction in price is offered to those who promptly signify their intention of taking the new Encyclopædia Britannica, because it is greatly to the interest of the Cambridge University Press to discover at once in what proportions the two forms in which the work is being issued will find favour. For this new edition, of which the contents mark so great an advance, will also recommend itself on account of an innovation in its material production, namely, the use of India paper, by which the size and weight of the volumes are reduced to one-third. If you would be interested to see the prospectus (with 56 specimen pages on India paper) and to learn the special prices and terms upon which orders for the new Encyclopædia Britannica will be accepted, in advance of publication, please write your name and address below, tear off this corner and post to—

Every day since the issue of the last edition all publications of importance have been thoroughly examined, and every item which would in any way add to the utility of the work has been duly noted.

IT IS ACCURATE, COMPREHENSIVE, EXHAUSTIVE, and so clearly arranged, Alphabetically and Chronologically, that the desired information can be found in a moment.

THE TIMES says: "The most universal book of reference in a moderate compass that we know of in the English language."

PUNCH says: "The volume is world-embracing. There is no subject, from Atoms to Zollverein, that is not dealt with compendiously, yet comprehensively. The art of condensation reaches its perfection in these skilfully arranged pages. Not only is the history of every nation in the universe brought up to date, but where since the last edition was published, history has been made, place is found for succinct record."

BALZAC'S BEST NOVELS.

Selected by Clement Shorter, Editor of "The Sphere."

EACH NOVEL COMPLETE AND UNEXPURGATED.

14 Volumes—First payment 2/6 only.

It will be good news to those who are only beginning to realise that the novels of Balzac more than those of any other writer will bear reading and re-reading again and again, to hear that the Caxton Publishing Company is now issuing in a small series a selection of the Best Novels of Balzac.

The selection of the Best Novels of Balzac was placed in the hands of Mr. Clement Shorter, the Editor of "The Sphere," an acknowledged authority on the subject.

What Mr. Clement Shorter says:

"I have been asked which, in my judgment, are the best novels of Balzac. There is little difficulty in coming to a decision. I would give them as follows:

|---|---|
| Cousin Bette. | Eugénie Grandet. |
| Cousin Pons. | The Lily of the Valley. |
| La Duchesse de Langeais. | The Illustrious Gaudissart. |
| The House of the Cat and Racket. | The Village Curé. |
| Gobseck. | The Country Doctor. |
| Old Goriot. | The Magic Skin. |
| | The Unknown Masterpiece. |

"Something has been said of the fact that the publishers advertise that their Balzac is 'unexpurgated.' This is of the utmost importance. The charge that a translator 'betrays' is justified where there is a prurient attempt to modify and alter phrases in the interests of Mrs. Grundy. Nothing can justify that. When face to face with a great classic we want the book as near as possible as the author presented it.

Each Novel Complete and Unexpurgated.

"Altogether, it would be impossible to speak too highly of the excellence of translation of this edition of Balzac's novels. There are those who say that Balzac should be read in the original, as only thus can you secure his peculiar charm. It is possible to lay too much stress on this point. At least half of Balzac's work relies not so much upon quality of style as upon strength of intellect, and that intellectual power can be captured in a translation, particularly in a translation so good as this."

But as some of these selected stories of Balzac are but short stories, or comparatively short stories, and as moreover their charm and interest are greatly accentuated when they are read in conjunction with other stories—the designs of which have direct reference to them—the Publishers, while they have kept this series a small and compact one, have not confined it strictly to the above list. To give merely one instance: The two first of the stories selected by Mr. Shorter are "Cousin Bette" and "Cousin Pons." Both of these, though each in itself is complete as a story, form a part of the admirable series known as "The Poor Relations."

And so the Publishers have thought it well to include the whole series of "The Poor Relations" in "The Best Novels of Balzac" series.

"The Best Novels of Balzac" in fourteen volumes include in all twenty-six Novels, each one absolutely complete and unexpurgated.

The Magnificent Illustrations.

These fourteen volumes are beautifully illustrated by great French Artists, who have embodied the very spirit of the Author. The frontispieces are etchings printed from the copper plates.

"The Best Novels of Balzac" are issued on the same advantageous terms which the Caxton Publishing Company has already made so deservedly popular. This is to say, the set of fourteen volumes is delivered for a first payment of 2s. 6d., the balance being paid by a few small monthly payments.

Two Opinions.

O. MADOX HUEFFER, Esq. (the well-known author and dramatist), writes:

"A really admirable translation, alike in spirit and fidelity, and I cannot imagine it being better done. Its production should be of real service to the cause of literature in England. Let me add that the binding, type, paper, and especially the very noteworthy illustrations are in every way worthy of the translation."

Mr. ANDREW LANG writes:

"It is impossible to enter on a detailed criticism of Balzac's novels. In them he scales every height, and sounds every depth, of human character. The qualities of Balzac are his extraordinary range of knowledge, observation, sympathy, his steadfast determination to draw every line and shadow of his subject, and his keen analysis of character and conduct."

A FREE BOOKLET.

We have prepared a charming detailed prospectus containing interesting information about Balzac, his life and his work, which will be sent post free to those who apply for it. It contains a list of the works included in "Balzac's Best Novels," their inter-relation and arrangement in this series. And it will tell you how the fourteen volumes are delivered for a first payment of 2s. 6d., the balance being paid by a few small monthly payments.

No. 2. See second reply to "Alligator" as to No. 3. Ace.—Hold Kinta Kellas, Merliman, Malacca, Beverley, Prye, and Sungei Bahru. With regard to Anglo-Malay, Cicely, and Linggi, see second reply to "Alligator." Take a profit on the others.

Boanerges.—A good property, but the market is limited. Quoted daily in the Financier. Present price, 18s. 6d. B. C. J. 1 and 2. Good speculative holdings. No. 1 is rather the better purchase. 3. Both companies expect to earn a dividend next year. Belsize.—Tremelbye and United Serdang.

Caesarea.—1. At 50s. I should exchange for a cheaper share. Such a course is likely to give better results in the end. 2. A good speculative share. Cheap at present price, and worth holding for improvement, but I should not treat it as a permanent investment. Cosmo.—1. Property not first-class, but the share is cheap at present discount. For permanent investment I should prefer Taiping or Pelepah Valley. 2. A sound investment. Worth holding for dividends, but there is no great prospect of capital appreciation. Celt.—Four sound shares. No. 2 is now quoted at 5s. 3d. The acreage valuation of No. 1 is high, but there is room for considerable appreciation in the others. Clatt.—Unpromising. Exchange for Taiping. Currie.—I have a good opinion of the company's prospects. The shares, of course, are speculative, but I should hold for a substantial recovery. Nothing yet decided as to dividend. Cockscomb.—1. Thanks for information. Scarcity of labour is, I understand, giving great trouble. 2. American imports of Guayule have largely increased of late, but I have no belief in the permanency of the supply. Oaxton.—Glen Bervie tapping commences next year. The company will have 1,600 acres planted by April next, and apart from immediate dividend prospects the shares are cheap at present price.

Drawer.—1. Not recommended. 2. Good for steady appreciation. 3. A two-shilling share. The company is now tapping in a small way. Dalkey.—See reply to "Currie" as to No. 1. Hold the other two for recovery, and exchange later for shares in Malayan companies. Eve.—See reply to "Currie." Eaton.—Buy Strathmore.

Falkland.—I see little attraction in any of them. Sell when you can do so without loss, and re-invest in the cheaper shares of Malayan planting companies. Fairway.—No. 1 is the better of the two, but Strathmore is more moderately valued than either. Fawjem.—1. The fully-paid shares are a very good purchase at 15s. premium. 2. They should eventually show you a profit. 3. Yes. Hold for a small rise.

Guiguet.—Now quoted at 6d. discount. Exchange for Strathmore, as you suggest. Gee Gee.—1. You might hold for some recovery, but there are more attractive issues, and I should not average. 2. You have a good profit on Glen Bervie. The company has excellent prospects, and the share is worth locking up for a year or two. 3. Hold Kuala Pahi. G. E. T.—700 acres of Ceara rubber, one to three years old. The purchase price was high. See my table of November 2. Not advised.

Hopeful.—Both poor. You would be more likely to recover your loss by exchanging for a sound share with good prospects, such as Strathmore or Jeram. Hinwick.—1. Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 are excellent holdings. 2. I do not recommend it. 3. A much better purchase. H. H. D.—Tandjong is a Sumatra company. The Tanjong Malim property is in Selangor. Both companies are excellently managed, and the latter is now producing in a small way. Halston.—The company was strongly criticised in Truth on flotation, and recent developments have confirmed my opinion. Harrow.—Interim dividend 1s. 6d. per share payable this month. They may touch your figure again, but an exchange for Tremelbye or Strathmore would probably give better results in the end.

Ingram.—I never recommend buying shares on borrowed money. Sell sufficient to repay the loan; but hold a and f if you can, and d is unduly depreciated.

Jonah.—Shipments from the property are expected to commence early in the new year. Hold your shares for three months.

Kent.—Strathmore, Jeram, Tandjong.

Lambruin.—A good speculative holding. Last year's drought and the reduced price of the raw article have affected the company; and present market conditions are, of course, unfavourable to the more speculative descriptions. Lynx.—Too speculative. In the long run you would probably do much better by investing only in well-managed progressive Malayan companies.

Meole.—1. Strathmore is quoted daily in the Financier. £1 shares now 18s. paid. Final call now pending. Quoted ⅝ premium. 2. The estate is in Selangor. 3. Tapping commences 1911. Mother Bunch.—1. Buy through your banker or broker. 2. Tapping has commenced, but dividends will be small for a year or two. 3. Yes. Minnehaha.—Hold a and b. Watch for an opportunity to sell c. Take a small profit on d. Mammon.—1. The circularisers are the bucket-shop firm who floated the company—though they have changed their name since then. 2. Worth averaging. The company expects to pay a dividend next year. Maud.—Speculative. A purchase of Strathmore would involve less risk.

Nilambur.—Make the exchange as you suggest. Nork.—1. Very sound, but the premium is high for a company which has only just reached the producing stage. 2. Good for steady capital appreciation. 3. Exchange now for Strathmore.

Oulton.—Glen Bervie and Lankat Sumatra are good purchases.

Primavera.—Good speculative prospects. The company is in the development stage. Lock up the shares for six months. Pulpit.—Hold for a few months.

Quedgeley.—See reply to "Currie," and average as you suggest.

Royal Engineers.—1. A cheap share, but the property is not first-class. Strathmore is relatively cheaper. See reply to "Meole." 2. Rubber output to date about 6,500 lbs. This season's coffee crop is expected to be a good one. 3. Yes. Regent.—1. I agree with your view, although Labu is rather the better property. 2. Yes. Strathmore. 3. I should prefer a planting company. 4. Very good.

Stanford.—An excellent company, but the market in the shares is limited. Selangorite.—1. Selangor should give the larger return. 2. The market expects last year's dividend (150 per cent.) to be maintained. 3. Quite in the front rank, of course. The Tremelbye output should increase substantially next year. The acreage valuation is lower, and, taking the long view, I prefer it. Stanmore.—Nos. 5, 8, and 11 are sound holdings. Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, and 9 are more speculative, but worth holding for substantial improvement. Sell Nos. 6, 7, 10, and 12 at first favourable opportunity. Sphinx.—The company is in good hands, and tapping has commenced. A gradual recovery may be looked for. Secure.—An offer of the new shares to existing holders at par would, in my opinion, have been preferable. Stanley.—Quite sound. Hold your shares.

Tricked.—There has been some heavy liquidation, which has now ceased. See reply to "Currie," and average as you suggest.

Waverley.—I do not recommend a purchase. Taiping should suit you better.

Yendal.—Hold both for a profit.

Zoo.—1. Strathmore. 2. Yes. The shares of the parent company are, however, relatively cheaper. 3. Not necessarily. It depends upon the circumstances of the case.

Miscellaneous.

A. B.—Companies formed to exploit patents are notoriously speculative, and at this stage I do not recommend the shares. Anxious (Bexhill).—Lever Bros. A Preference and Metropolitan Electric Tramways 5 per cent. debenture stock—one-third in the former and two-thirds in the latter. A. S. S.—The complaint you make is not an exceptional one, and I do not believe that there is much ground for it. The close prices you see quoted are those at which large lines change hands, and what your broker says about ten shares being an exceptional bargain is quite correct. Of course, if you have other ground for complaining of his method of carrying through your business, by all means make a change, but on the question of prices remember that it is not to your broker's interest to get a bad price, but just the reverse. Abroad.—1. Better go to one of the big banks. 2. It is not a strong company, and there is a heavy liability on the shares. A Nervous One.—They were noticed last week. A. B. K.—Thanks; I will refer to it.

Bruno.—A sound industrial, but the shares look high enough. To attempt to say what they will stand at next June is really to attempt the impossible. If I could divine events in this way I should have given up writing financial articles years ago.

Clerical.—1. At present I believe the deposit rate offered by the former is 3 per cent., but why not get the prospectus and compare the terms in detail? 2. I know nothing definite against it, but should prefer a more established institution. 3. Goldsborough Mort. 4 per cent. A debentures. Canary.—1. You might sell at present price. 2. The shares look about high enough. 3. I see no particular reason why they should be bought. China.—I think the prospects are rather in favour of a moderate rise, and for the present would not part with the shares. They are, of course, a high-class investment, though if you do not care for the liability I should not attempt to dissuade you from taking a favourable opportunity to make an exchange. C. H. B. B.—I frequently caution my readers against them. C. (Dorking).—See my rule as to coupon and name and address.

Doubtful.—The shares are a decidedly speculative holding, but you might hold, and await the first report. Fullani.—There is no market for them, so that I am afraid you have no option but to hold. Fillie.—I would not buy either. Doubtful.—Have nothing to do with the Anglo-American Investment Trust or any other bucket-shop.

Fern Hill.—1. About £4. You should sell it. 2. The bonds are quieter at 11. Hold and await the outcome of the negotiations for a settlement.

G. T. (Bedford).—They are bucket-shop keepers, whom you should shun. Have nothing to do with any firm conducting 1 per cent. cover gambles.

Hemiplegia.—I think they are all worth holding for the present.

Justice.—See reply under "Insurance."

Medico.—My unfavourable views have undergone no modification. Leave the shares well alone. Moab.—Probably you paid an excessive price for them. Apply to Messrs. N. Keizer and Company, 31, Threadneedle Street, E.C.

Nodrog.—1. In the circumstances I should be inclined to sell. No. 2 is doing well now, but the shares are necessarily of a speculative type. Nos. 3 to 6 are a sound lot, and should be worth keeping.

Oop.—I do not care much for the shares, and would be inclined to sell. Better hold 2. With regard to 3, I regret the company is one with which I am not familiar. It does not appear in either of the two chief standard reference works.

Plus de Place.—1. No information has been published so far as I am aware. 2. See Rule 2. Pyrmont.—1.

(first letter). The statement "commission of 5 per cent." is in this case the general consideration paid to the underwriters, while the overriding commission of 1 per cent. represents the payment that would be made to them for introducing others prepared to underwrite shares for the company. The phrase "have the right to enter into sub-underwriting" gives the underwriters power to sub-let part of their underwriting risk, though the company would not officially recognise sub-underwriters. 2. The premium is quoted on the amount paid up. As regards your second letter, I regard the dangers you speak of as remote. The possibility of confiscation is hardly worthy of serious consideration. In the first place, there is no reason to suppose it will be attempted; in the second, if it were, the United States Government, which has a very large stake in the country, not to mention other great Powers, would speedily have something to say. Perplexed.—In the circumstances, a deposit with one of the established banks ought to satisfactorily meet your requirements. Premium Bond (Canterbury).—Genuine, but Cunliffe, Russell, and Company charge prices greatly in excess of the market value of the bonds, so that whenever you sold you would be a heavy loser. Premium Bond (Madras).—I do not advise as to the selection of securities of this description, the dealings in which are illegal here.

Regent.—Keep 1. I do not care for 2. Robusta.—The shares of course involve risk, but the company possesses possibilities, and at the present price I would be inclined to hold. R. J. and Co.—Thanks, but Duncan Forbes and Company were the subject of a note in last week's Truth.

Springhill.—You might hold them as a speculation. Swindled.—1 and 2. You will find both matters referred to in this week's notes. Sceptical.—It is an ordinary bucket-shop flat-trap which I have already exposed.

Tyne.—1. I do not look for any recovery at present. 2. Better not buy these just now. Traveller.—1. No doubt there is room for investigation, but I have no knowledge of the individual in question, and would certainly not part with another penny unless I had ample assurance of his bona fides. 2. Very speculative, but you might hold for the report. Toto.—My readers have already been warned against T. Morton Harris and Company and the Anglo-American Investment Trust.

Uno.—Avoid dealings with outside firms and do your business through a broker who is a member of the Stock Exchange.

V. Green.—An old dodge; see note in another column.

Waiting.—I have not seen the list, and am consequently not in a position to give an opinion.

Yam.—To be avoided, but I have no evidence which would justify me in using your language about them.

VIGILANT.

Policy Twisting Rampant—How to Deal with the Twisters—A Suggestion for the Corporation of Insurance Brokers.

THE circulars of a new professor of the disreputable art of policy-twisting have been sent to me. The officials of several of the best life offices in the kingdom have been telling me during recent weeks that policy-twisting is more rampant than ever, and, consequently, I will once more do the best I can to protect my readers from the loss which the twisters seek to inflict upon them.

The policy-twister circularises people with a request for particulars of their present life assurance policies. He wants to know the name of the office in which the policy is effected; the amount and character of the policy; when the next premium falls due, and sundry other details. Having obtained particulars, he sees, or writes to, the innocent person who has fallen into his trap, and mystifies his victim into the belief that he had better discontinue his existing policy and effect his assurance through the twister. There are four reasons why this game of policy-twisting is a particularly dirty and reprehensible business. The first is that the sole reason for advising a change is that the policy-twister may obtain commission on a new policy. Sometimes the twister is the agent of one particular office, but for the most part the agents of insurance companies are too respectable to indulge in low-down tricks of this kind; usually they are played by unscrupulous people who pose as insurance "experts." I have no objection to the policy-twisters or anybody else, making money if they can do so honestly; but the policy-twister who professes to give impartial expert advice, which is in fact biassed and bad advice, ought to be shunned by all decent people.

The second objection is that almost invariably the holder of a life policy will lose by surrendering his existing assurance and going elsewhere. If he has had the misfortune to take a policy in an unsound office it may be necessary to drop his policy and assure elsewhere; but the policy-twisters attempt to persuade people to give up their policies in really good companies when it is perfectly certain that they can only lose by making a change. The rate of premium for life assurance increases with age, and part of every premium paid is saved and accumulated at compound interest. The discontinuance of a policy commonly means the loss of a considerable part of the premiums already paid, and it is exceedingly seldom that a policy can be changed without loss. It is perfectly certain that policies in first-class companies cannot be exchanged for assurance in the companies recommended by the twister without considerable harm being done to the twister's victim.

There is a third reason for regarding policy-twisting with disgust. The twister not only seeks to make illicit gain at the cost of his victim, whom he calls his "client," but the chances are that he is depriving some other agent or broker of fairly earned commission. There is said to be honour among thieves, but there is certainly none among policy-twisters. It might be thought that even a man who was unscrupulous enough to deceive and rob a policy-holder would hesitate to filch the income of a fellow agent, but it is not so.

My fourth reason for holding up policy-twisters to the utter contempt of every right thinking person is that their unseemly conduct tends to bring the whole system of life assurance into disrepute. They do not hesitate to cast reflections on thoroughly good companies; they are regarded as workers in the insurance field; and, since sooner or later their dupes find out that they have been victimised, there arises the feeling, based on personal experience, that insurance workers are a shady lot. In the vast majority of cases the workers at insurance are entirely fair and straight; but if a person merely has experience of the twister who calls himself an expert he is apt to judge the whole body of insurance workers by his own unfortunate experience.

There are various ways of dealing with the policy-twister. The least troublesome method on receiving a verbal request for information about existing assurances is to ring the bell and have the servant show the twister out. On receiving a written request for information about existing life policies, all the pamphlets and leaflets, which probably accompany such a demand, should be torn up and put in the waste-paper basket. If through ignorance any communications with the twister have been entered into, and a man's faith in his own office is in any way shaken, he should either see or write to an official of the company in which he is assured, or take the opinion of some respectable newspaper whose advice is entirely impartial, since it is precluded from taking any commission on any business which results from the advice it gives.

I should like to call the attention of the Corporation of Insurance Brokers and Agents to this matter. I have on more than one occasion referred to this Corporation as calculated to do a great deal to improve the conduct of insurance agency, and to the likelihood that it will become in due course a recognised body of men who can with confidence be consulted and employed for the placing of insurance proposals. Whether by legal licence or otherwise I hope there will ultimately arise the restriction of commission-paying to members of this Corporation, and the conduct of all insurance business direct with the companies, or through a licensed broker or agent. I think the Association might very well turn out of membership, or disqualify for membership, any person found guilty of policy-twisting, after the facts of the case have been duly examined by the council of the Corporation.

Why Pay Rent? Take an Immediate Mortgage, free in event of death, from the Scottish Temperance Life Office. Repayments usually less than rent. Mortgage expenses paid by the Company. Prospectus from London Office, 3, Cheapside, E.C.

For Insurance Announcements, see page 1467.

Some of these twisters and experts seek to secure people as agents to work for them; they are themselves mere agents, and why on earth anybody who wants to devote time to obtaining insurance proposals should become the agent of an agent, when he might become the agent of an office, I fail to see except for one probable reason. The worst offices pay the biggest commissions: the policy-twisters are out for commission, regardless of who loses so long as they gain. It is quite possible that the twister can get such a high rate of commission from the particular offices he recommends that he can afford to pay a sub-agent as much as a respectable life office would pay, and still make a substantial profit out of the deal.

There is another possible remedy against this evil of policy-twisting which might be adopted with advantage. The insurance companies know perfectly well who the men are who indulge in policy-twisting. For their own credit's sake an office which has a proposal sent in by a twister should ask the proposer whether he is giving up his assurance in another company in order to come to it, and if so should advise him to retain his policy in the other company. Very likely this course would be taken, but for one difficulty in the way of it. The big-commission paying concerns, which the twisters recommend, are keen to get business anyhow, and are probably not scrupulous enough to refuse business in order to benefit the assured and to promote the decent conduct of the business. The high-class offices which would take such a line are left severely alone by the unscrupulous people against whose practices I have been warning my readers.

Answers to Correspondents.

Cosmo.—1. The life office you mention is sound, and your best plan is to keep your policy in force by continuing the payment of premiums. Some of its methods of working are looked at askance by the better class of insurance officials. Medico.—For your purpose the Australian office you mention is the best there is. Kilkenny.—Take the fresh policy in the office in which you are already assured, you cannot possibly do better. Yerrav'da.—The society about which you ask is absolutely safe for any amount, however large. Cautious.—I suppose the company is sound, but I should not recommend you to buy the bond. If you want such things you can probably obtain through the company on better terms bonds which people would be only too eager to sell. Cynthia.—I have not seen recent accounts of the office you mention, but from what I know I should advise you to continue the policy you have. J. M. S.—The policy of which you send a prospectus is quite good for anyone who wants a contract of that kind. Warwickshire.—Certainly continue paying premiums. The office is entirely safe, and is likely to give you good bonuses. B. I. C.—Either the Ocean Accident or the General of Perth. Erin.—1. Perhaps on the whole you had better risk the small further amount of premium on the chance of receiving the capital next year; but I give you this advice with some diffidence. 2. This company is better left alone; I hope you have not paid it much. Green Howard.—I believe the office is respectable, and probably sound, but I have no particulars about it that would enable me to judge of its merits. Akin.—The Scottish Life Assurance Company is absolutely safe. G. P. (Fulham).—I am afraid you will not obtain any advance for house purchase purposes from the company in which you have taken a bond. You do not say how much longer you have to continue paying premiums, but it is very doubtful whether you would be wise to pay any more. Devonshire.—Quite good for sickness and accident, but for life assurance you can do better elsewhere. John Bull.—1. Prudential, if you can get appointed. 2. Sound, but you could do better elsewhere. Kim.—Both the offices in which you are assured are quite first-class. For your new policy I recommend the Commercial Union. Justice.—1. You can do your business quite satisfactorily with the Scottish Temperance, which I should recommend in preference to the others. Duco.—I should advise you not to invest in the company you mention. Preksa.—1. It depends on age and sex. 2. I cannot recommend this office. Mayo.—On the whole, the Scottish Amicable is best for you. The society you fancy will, I am afraid, give reduced bonuses in the future. D. O. N. E.—On the whole, you would do well to put your case in the hands of the committee.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

STRAND HOTEL.

The third ordinary general meeting of the shareholders in the Strand Hotel, Limited, was held on the 1st inst. at the Gaiety Restaurant, Strand, W.C., Mr. Joseph Lyons (chairman of the company) presiding.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said: Ladies and gentlemen,—It affords my colleagues and myself the utmost satisfaction to meet you here to-day to congratulate you upon what we feel sure you will regard as an eminently satisfactory result for our first year's trading. That the Strand Palace Hotel has supplied a want in this great metropolis is evidenced by the figures in the accounts it is my pleasure to submit to-day. It will be observed that the estimate of profits suggested in the prospectus has been largely exceeded, and your board only regret that the hotel is not of a flexible nature—(laughter)—so that we might have availed ourselves of the very large number of would-be patrons whom we have been unable to accommodate. Encouraged by our experience and the earnest requests of many influential and capable friends that we should give further facilities to the many thousands of visitors to London who daily seek, but cannot get, the comfort in accommodation, service, and meals upon a tariff comparable to ours, we have acquired a Crown lease of a site bordering upon Regent Street, in the very heart of the West End of London, upon which it is our intention to erect an hotel to be conducted on the same lines as those that have proved so popular at the Strand Palace Hotel. The site may not be available until 1912, so I need not go further to-day than to express our confidence in its perfect success, and to say that we are sure it will find as ready a clientèle as has the Strand Palace Hotel. The chairman went on to refer to the figures in the balance-sheet, and, continuing, said: The profit is £41,717 2s. 6d.; of this, debenture interest absorbs £4,818 13s. 4d., we allocate to depreciation the substantial sum of £6,500, to the redemption fund £1,000, and to reserve £3,000, as before mentioned; we distributed as an interim dividend £4,931 4s. 9d., and we now propose a final dividend on the participating preferred ordinary shares at the rate of £11 per cent. per annum for the half-year, making £9 per cent. for the year; and in terms of the articles of association the deferred ordinary shareholders receive the sum of £12,081 4s. 9d., which leaves us with a balance of £2,235 19s. 8d. to carry forward to the current year's account. Before moving the adoption of the report I should like to express the pleasure of my colleagues and myself in being able publicly to thank the members of our staff for their valuable services, and to state, without having to individualise, that they have one and all given us their loyal assistance in every department. (Applause.)

Mr. John Balfour, in seconding the resolution, said that they were led by the prospectus when it was issued to expect a profit of £25,000 a year, and that profit of £25,000 had been turned into one of £41,000. That was a thing which had very rarely occurred in the annals of an industrial company. He could only congratulate those gentlemen who had formed this company upon the success which it had already achieved.

The motion was carried unanimously.

A. DARRACQ AND COMPANY (1905), LIMITED.

The fifth annual meeting was held on the 5th inst. at Salisbury House, London Wall, Mr. J. S. Smith-Winby (chairman of the company) presiding.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said that the present year had, generally speaking, been more favourable to the automobile industry than the preceding one, and it must be a satisfaction to the shareholders to find that this company had enjoyed a fair share of the improvement. The trading profit for the period under review, after allowing for depreciation and making a special provision for bad and doubtful debts, was £134,466, as compared with £117,035 last year, and the net profit, after deducting all general charges and allowances, was £120,305, against £101,367. The board had been able to add £56,000 to reserve, thus bringing it up to £100,000, and that sum was invested in first-class securities outside the business. Their cash position was remarkably strong. They had £217,789 in cash on September 30, as compared with £174,817 at the same period last year, and, in addition, they had at that time, and still had, £50,000 in Treasury bills. In the United Kingdom in particular their sales showed a satisfactory increase for the first two months of the current year, and the General Election, instead of interfering with their business, seemed to have stirred matters up. They had had, and were having, quite a brisk demand for cars for immediate delivery from political candidates of all creeds. The board felt this year that they were justified in recommending a rather more liberal distribution on the ordinary shares. Last year they declared a dividend of 7½ per cent., whereas this year they recommended an increase to 8¾ per cent., free of income-tax, and next year, if nothing unforeseen happened, he thought they might fairly hope to do something more. The current season had opened propitiously, although it was yet too early to say much. The company's new models were meeting with more than ordinary interest and favour, and their new 15-h.p. car would be their leading line for 1911. It promised to eclipse in popularity even its famous predecessor of 1904. It was a superior model in every respect to that of 1904, while the price, £275, was something like 40 per cent. less. Another very popular model would be their new six-cylinder Darracq, sold for £400, or half what it cost a few years ago. They were also preparing a more powerful and luxurious car this season, which was not yet ready, but, when produced, it should satisfy the requirements of the most fastidious customer, though here, again, the price would compare most favourably with that of any really high-class car before the public. At Olympia last month the company had another marked success, and one of the best-known critics wrote that "last year Darracq was giving wonderful value, but this year more than ever," and this exactly described their programme. It was always a matter of wonder to competitors that Darracq were able to sell their productions at present prices and keep a fair margin of profit. The secret, of course, chiefly lay in their unique manufacturing facilities and exceptional factory management. The report was unanimously adopted.

HENDERSON'S TRANSVAAL.

The second ordinary general meeting of shareholders of Henderson's Transvaal Estates, Limited (incorporated in Rhodesia), was held on the 1st inst., at River Plate House, Finsbury Circus, E.C. The Right Hon. the Lord Oranmore and Browne (the chairman of the company) presided.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said that during the past year the company had obtained the transfer of all the properties and assets of the old company from the liquidator, and the liquidation of the old company was now complete. The net profit for the period under review was £10,342. This was not so good as they would have liked it to be, but it was an improvement as compared with the previous year, and arose to a large extent from an increased revenue of a character not likely to disappear. The board's aim was to build up revenue which would be, as far as possible, not dependent on the condition of the South African market. Turning to the company's chief interests, he said that the Henderson Consolidated Corporation represented a large portion of their capital account, and, of the 182 separate properties in South Africa which they controlled, 157 belonged to the Henderson Consolidated Corporation, but their productiveness was not commensurate with their area. Speaking of their interest in the Tweefontein Colliery, he said that its sales of coal for 1909 amounted to 271,470 tons, against an output for the previous year of 184,946 tons. The revenue was £15,380, and enabled the company, after paying all expenses, to wipe out the large debit at profit and loss from its first year's operations. As from July 1, the colliery company became members of a combine of the Transvaal colliery owners, an association of practically all the collieries of the Transvaal, with the result that they were allotted 18·340ths, or 5.5 per cent., of the orders secured by the combine. The colliery company's results for the current year to the end of last month showed an appreciable improvement in the profits over those for the corresponding period of 1909. With regard to mineral developments, the chairman said that he had nothing of an important character to announce. He read a long report from the general manager, Mr. Pott, respecting their agricultural interests.

Mr. W. Bryson Butler, in seconding the motion, said that he attached a great deal of importance to what Lord Oranmore had told them with regard to the Tweefontein Colliery Co. He would like to draw the attention of shareholders to the manner in which this undertaking was increasing in importance, and he thought they would find, in the course of the next year or two, that it would develop into one of the most important interests that this company possessed. He hoped that as the directors resolved from time to time on taking action to assist in any extension or development of this interest which might be necessary, they might rely upon the support of the shareholders in doing so.

Mr. Nicholas said they had had a very satisfactory speech from the chairman in every way. The directors had got the company on a satisfactory footing, and everything seemed to be going on right.

The motion was carried unanimously.

ALBY UNITED CARBIDE FACTORIES, LIMITED.

The fourth annual general meeting of the shareholders was held on the 30th ult. at Winchester House, London, Mr. A. E. Barton (the chairman) presiding.

The Chairman said that the shareholders would remember that at the last meeting he had mentioned that arrangements had been made with a view of overcoming the competition between the Northern carbide manufacturers. That arrangement had the desired result as far as the works interested were concerned, but, unfortunately, it was found that more serious competition than had previously been experienced from Southern manufacturers had to be met, and prices in some markets were reduced to quite an unpayable figure. It was thus made plain that the only way to overcome this was to broaden the arrangement for the division of sales, so as to include the Southern manufacturers, and a basis, satisfactory to all parties, had been arrived at, and an arrangement for ten years, embracing virtually practically the whole of the European manufacturers, had now been signed. Great benefit would result from such a sales organisation, as prices would no longer be subject to the fluctuations incidental to competitive endeavour, but could, in the future, be maintained at a reasonable level. The carbide industry should thus be placed on an absolutely sound basis, which would result in profits being earned by the company that would confidently warrant the payment of regular dividends. Had the prices now fixed by the committee of the sales for future deliveries been ruling during the past financial year the profits would have been increased by something like £27,000, which would have been sufficient in itself to pay a dividend of over 10 per cent. upon the ordinary share capital. An important benefit which would be derived from this amalgamation of interests was the increase in the demand for carbide, consequent upon a system of propaganda which was being instituted for the expansion of acetylene lighting in all parts of the world. The directors had declared an interim dividend on the ordinary shares for the current year, and he believed they could confidently look forward to the payment of regular and increasing dividends from now onwards.

The report was unanimously adopted.

CUBAN (PARENT) SYNDICATE.

The first general meeting of the Cuban (Parent) Syndicate, Limited, was held yesterday at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C., Mr. Alfred Benjamin (Chairman) presiding.

The Chairman said:—This is the statutory meeting held in accordance with the Companies Act. I propose to give you in as few words as possible an account of what we have done, what we are doing, and what we propose doing hereafter. Firstly, up to the present we have been spending your money on an expedition, and I venture to say that money has never been spent to better advantage. The reports we had on the property, and on which we took the option to purchase, were made by American experts, and although we ourselves were satisfied of their genuineness we were also aware of the fact that in this country it is impossible to successfully float a company on other than Englishmen's reports. We therefore formed this syndicate, the purpose of which was to verify the statements of the American experts. Having thoroughly satisfied ourselves of the bona fides of those interested in the sale, we decided to put down our money and secure the option. The English experts, as you know, were sent out. We were fortunate in securing the services of Messrs. Riley and Harbord, Messrs. Merricks, Crane and Company, and Messrs. Attwood and Hopper. The personnel of the expedition included Mr. C. D. Pullen, who, it is proposed, will represent the new company in the U.S., and my own partner, Mr. Joseph Gee, who accompanied the expedition to report on the whole proposition from a commercial standpoint. I am glad to tell you their reports are eminently satisfactory. There is on the authority of Mr. Hopper, who will confirm this, even more timber of excellent quality than the American expert reported. As to the iron, Mr. Merricks can tell you that by the analysis of Messrs. Riley and Harbord it is proved as having up to 68 per cent. of pure metallic iron, and is excellent in its other qualities. The firm of Riley and Harbord, who are acting as metallurgists to the company, and who have analysed all of the samples, have also made a special report which is considered very satisfactory, as it indicates the minimum price at which all the ores can be sold, and would leave us a profit varying from 8s. 6d. to 15s. per ton. As professional men are very conservative in making such assertions we can even look to larger profits than these, as within two years we hope to be putting a minimum of 300,000 tons per annum, and you can calculate for yourselves what splendid results we may expect from the iron ore alone. The solicitors for the new company, Messrs. Ashurst Morris and Crispe, are preparing the prospectus, and your directors are engaged in getting together a board of directors which will be of sufficient strength to control this great enterprise properly. Now as to the future it will be provided in the contract with the new company that this syndicate will make a handsome profit, and the amount now stated in the preliminary papers is £100,000 cash and 150,000 shares less the necessary expenses. We propose on receipt of the cash profit to distribute most of same to you, but the syndicate will continue to hold its interest in the new company as an investment, receiving the dividends from the new company and distributing them in the usual manner. It is estimated that the profits which will accrue during the first eighteen months will be of such a satisfactory nature as to enable the syndicate to pay a handsome dividend, and thenceforward the profits should be very large, as the property which the new company will acquire is capable of being cut up into several subsidiary companies, each one of which must, if properly managed, be eminently successful. Messrs. Wm. H. Hart and Company, the well-known stockbrokers, have agreed to act as brokers to the company. As regards our products, there is a large market for most of them in the United States of America as well as in Europe. I am told that one of our best markets is at our very doors—Cuba itself. What we import in the way of iron ore into England we have arranged to be sold by Messrs. Hughes, Bolskow and Company, of Middlesbrough. We expect to conclude arrangements by which the timber that we import to this country will be sold by Messrs. Churchill and Sim, of London. I can say that the possibilities of the new company are enormous. By the figures which will appear in the prospectus the ready saleable assets run into several million sterling As regards the purchase price, negotiations were entered into on a cash basis, and although we might have persuaded the original vendors to take part of the purchase consideration in shares, they would in the natural course have demanded a larger sum if paid in such manner, but, after consultation with the solicitors, Messrs. Ashurst, Morris, and Crispe, they agreed with us that, as we valued the shares at considerably more than their face value, it was better to pay cash; but I am pleased to inform you that on the cash price arranged the vendors have agreed just within the last two or three days to take £50,000 shares in the new company. The name of the company will be the Anglo-Cuban Timber and Ore Co., Limited, and will probably be capitalised at £1,250,000. I give the British public credit for having sufficient business acumen to know a good thing when it is brought before them, and if we show the British public that we have in sight many million pounds' worth of assets, and the certainty of a very large profitable income, and ask them only for £1,250,000, I believe and shall be greatly disappointed if the issue is not considerably over-subscribed. (Applause.)

Mr. Merricks said that the property had all the essentials of a profitable iron ore industry.

Mr. Hopper said that the quantity of cedar and mahogany on the property would prove to be about 20 per cent. more than estimated.

Mr. Gee remarked generally on the promising features of the property as they appeared to a commercial man.

A vote of thanks to the chairman concluded the proceedings.

QUEER STORY.

THE MARSHMINSTER ELECTION.

IT was nomination day in the Parliamentary borough of Marshminster; and the Duke of Ditchbury, with his eldest son, Lord Swampington, the official Tory candidate and his agent, Mr. Chittenden, had just returned from the Town Hall to their central committee rooms. None of the three looked particularly cheerful. The Duke especially appeared gloomy and indignant. He had some reason; for John Champneys, by putting up at the eleventh hour as an Independent Unionist, had made a three-cornered fight inevitable, thus converting this safe Tory seat into a gift for the Radicals.

His Grace, then, was naturally incensed, and quite as much on private as on party grounds—not only because he had long come to regard the Marshminster seat as a little pocket freehold of his own, but even more because it was abundantly evident that Champneys had sprung this thunderbolt upon them simply out of personal spite and with no other object than to make himself nasty. The fact was that until a few weeks previously Champneys and Lord Swampington had been intimate friends. Then a sudden and violet quarrel supervened. The cause of this quarrel was an open secret. It was a matter of common gossip that there was a woman in the case—to wit, that well-known little musical comedy actress, Topsy Wapshot, of The Levity. At the outset, Champneys had enjoyed the position of first favourite in that lady's affections. Then Lord Swampington had come on the scene, and Miss Topsy had transferred her favours. Hinc illæ lacrimæ. The quarrel between the two men was bitter and irreparable. Lately the Damon and Pythias of the neighbourhood, they were now no longer on speaking terms. They passed each other in the street without the slightest sign of recognition.

"I call his behaviour positively scandalous," said the Duke, very red and excited. "I never knew anything to equal it."

"Nor I," assented Mr. Chittenden.

"I must say that, badly as he has behaved to me in other ways, I never thought that Jack Champneys was capable of playing it quite so low down as this," remarked Lord Swampington, twisting his flaxen moustaches.

He was a tall, powerfully built young man of athletic appearance, whose healthy, weather-beaten, though not very intellectual face betokened him an ardent devotee of the open-air life. As a rider, a shot, a fisherman, and a sportsman generally, his prowess left little to be desired. But as a politician and a platform orator he could not truthfully be said to shine. Beyond a certain parrot-like acquaintance with the stock phrases of Tariff Reform literature and a hazy general notion that the abolition of the Lords' Veto spelt ruin to the country, he had no real knowledge of the burning public questions of the moment. All the ideas in his speeches were secondhand. The very words in which he clothed them were learnt by heart. And even so, he was a painfully hesitating speaker. One good point, however, he had—an easy, imperturbable temper which no amount of heckling could ruffle. In this respect he was the antithesis of his father, the Duke, who being at once dictatorial and peppery, could never keep his temper in the face of contradiction.

"Infernally ungrateful, besides," pursued the Duke, expatiating upon his wrongs (it was characteristic of his egoism that he regarded himself, rather than his son, as the aggrieved party) "considering all the civility we have shown the fellow in the past, such behaviour is not only ungentlemanlike; it is outrageously indecent."

"Yes, your Grace. That exactly describes it," nodded Mr. Chittenden.

"The worst of it is," continued the Duke, with a brooding scowl, "that the bounder seems to enjoy quite a considerable amount of popularity in the borough, and is therefore likely to alienate from us more votes than we can afford to lose."

"I fear that is so," assented the agent. "You see Champneys is hail-fellow-well-met with all the tradespeople. Deals in the place for everything, too. Of course, that goes down."

"There's another point in Champneys' favour," struck in Swampington. "To give the devil his due, he's a deuced good speaker. I'm not a patch on him. And, of course, that sort of thing tells."

"Oh, he can gas on a platform, no doubt," said the Duke, contemptuously. "There are plenty of that sort about. A good deal too many, indeed. The country is governed by windbags."

"Jack Champneys has a head on him, though," said Swampington, who, whatever his faults, was quite a fair-minded young man. "It isn't all talk with him. There's brains behind it—confound him."

"If you come to that, Beelzebub has a head on him," retorted the Duke, sarcastically. And after that, of course, there was no more to be said.

The result of the canvas during the next day or two was not flattering to the prospects of the official Tory candidate. In spite of the support accorded him both at headquarters and by the local Association, it was clear that he was making less way with the electors than his rival Champneys. The Radicals, of course, were jubilant. Of course, also, they did everything in their power to foment the breach in the Tory ranks. They patted Champneys on the back for his sturdy independence in daring to stand up for his just rights against Dukes and wirepullers, and their press took up the cry, belauding his stout British spirit in language which would have been extravagant of Pym or Hampden. The Duke of Ditchbury, on the other hand, was held up to execration in terms which would have been hardly fair if applied to Buckingham or Strafford.

The effect of these attacks was to render the Duke still more bitter against Champneys. He cursed that gentleman up hill and down dale for his spiteful impudence in putting up as a rival candidate. He also cursed Miss Topsy Wapshot for having been the cause, although indeed the unwitting cause, of the débâcle. Further, he relieved his feelings by calling his son all imaginable names for his folly in getting himself mixed up in the love affairs of a young woman of that description. Lord Swampington took the paternal ragging meekly and in silence. But he looked rather uncomfortable nevertheless.

While the political crisis in Marshminster was as acute as ever, Topsy Wapshot herself made her appearance one morning at the front door of Ditchbury Castle, in her 60-h.p. Wolseley-Siddeley, and requested to see his Grace the Duke.

The great man's countenance wore a forbidding frown and his manner was stiff with a chilling and dignified hauteur as he received her alone in his library. He disapproved of all actresses on general principle. Moreover, he could not forget that this one, however innocently, had been responsible for introducing the Apple of Discord into the Unionist ranks at Marshminster. It was in the most frigid of tones, therefore, that he invited her to explain the object of her visit.

Many young women would have been reduced to speechless impotence by such a reception on the part of so great a personage. Not so Topsy. All the dukes in the House of Lords at their haughtiest would have failed to disturb her complete self-assurance. She replied to his Grace's inquiry with a flippant unconcern that astounded him.

"Fact is," she said, "I want to have a word with you about those two naughty boys who have been quarrelling over me. They mustn't be allowed to cut one another's throats like this. It's too silly for anything."

"The fault lies entirely with Mr. Champneys," said his Grace, in his most distant manner. "He has behaved disgracefully——

"Oh! I don't think you can quite say that," broke in Topsy, as she surveyed herself complacently in an adjacent pier-glass. "It was rather rough on him getting cut out by Swamp, you know—when all's said."

"You are referring to my son, Lord Swampington?" demanded the Duke, with the appearance of one who has just swallowed a poker.

"Oh! I always call him Swamp," answered Topsy, with a light laugh. "Don't you? He told me you did, anyway."

"What I may choose to call my son in moments of family intimacy scarcely appears to me to justify the indulgence in a similar liberty by a comparative stranger," replied his Grace, with elaborate and cutting sarcasm.

"A comparative stranger! Come! That's a good one," retorted Miss Topsy, tossing her golden head. "If a girl can't call her own fiancé by his pet name, I'm sure I don't know who can."

The Duke started. All his self-possession forsook him.

"Your fiancé?" he ejaculated, in tones of mingled dismay and incredulity. "What on earth do you mean, madam?"

"Eh? Hasn't Swamp told you we're engaged?" said Topsy.

"Certainly not," answered the Duke. "He never even hinted at such a thing. If he had, I should have put down my foot at once. Engaged? My son engaged to you? Pooh! Preposterous."

"Why?" demanded Topsy calmly. "Members of my profession marry into the peerage every week."

"My son shall never marry an actress," declared the Duke, energetically.

"No?" smiled Topsy. "Well, I guess that's for me to say. He'll lead me to the altar right enough, if I make up my mind to go with him. But that's just the question. I'm not sure, after all, that it's good enough—for me, I mean."

The Duke stared at her in speechless amazement.

"That's just what I've come to have a talk with you about," pursued Topsy. "The truth is—I may as well be perfectly frank with you—that, though Swamp is a very nice young man, I can't pretend that I'm exactly crushed on him. And I might be willing to give him up—on a certain condition."

"What condition?" said the Duke, wondering how many thousand pounds she was going to demand as the price of her sacrifice. Her answer took him completely aback.

"My condition is a very simple one," she said. "It is merely that you induce Swamp to retire from this Parliamentary contest—in which, after all, he hasn't an earthly—and leave Jack Champneys a fair field, on his own, against the Radical."

"My son retire, and leave that fellow a fair field? Never!" exclaimed the Duke, excitedly.

"Very well. Then I shall marry Swamp. That's all," replied Topsy, with perfect composure.

"You will do nothing of the kind," cried his Grace. "I won't allow it."

"You can't stop us. And even if you should prevail on Swamp to back out (which I'm sure you won't), I still have my remedy in the Law Courts, and I shall press it, too, for all it is worth. Come, my dear Duke," she added, after a moment's pause, "you had much better compromise with me on the terms I have suggested; you had indeed."

"But why this condition of all conditions?" demanded the Duke, frowning suspiciously.

"Oh, as to that, I will be perfectly candid," rejoined Topsy, as cool as you please. "Although I threw Jack Champneys over for Swamp, I always liked Jack best; only I'm an ambitious, restless sort of person, and the idea of settling down as the wife of an insignificant country gentleman was a bit too dull to appeal to me. But now that Jack has blossomed out into politics and they're already saying at headquarters that with his brains and gift of the gab he's bound to make his mark in Parliament if he gets there—well, it's another pair of shoes altogether. See?"

"I'm not quite sure whether I do," answered the Duke, looking bewildered.

"My! How dull you are!" exclaimed Topsy. "To put it plainly, then, Jack is, and always has been, my Mr. Right. And, subject to the conditions mentioned, I have decided to chuck Swamp and take him on again."

"But how do you know Mr. Champneys will have you after the way you have treated him?" insisted the Duke.

"Don't worry about that. Jack will say 'snip' to my 'snap' fast enough if I give him the chance. What do you say, Duke? Is it a deal?"

"Ahem! I must think it over," replied the Duke of Ditchbury, temporising.

"Well, don't be too long thinking, else I may change my mind. You had better let me know your answer by this evening's post," said Topsy, as she rose to take her departure. "By the way," she added, "don't tell Swamp of the proposed arrangement. I'd rather he didn't know anything about it till it was all over. He might jib, you know. Ta-ta! Be good."

She blew him a kiss, and was gone.

The outraged Duke sank back limply in his chair. "Fancy that young person ever coming to preside as mistress of Ditchbury," he ejaculated. "Good heavens!"

After sitting immersed in thought for some time, he went and laid the whole matter before the Duchess. Her Grace, who was an eminently shrewd and practical woman, did not seem at all surprised by the news of Swampington's engagement to Topsy Wapshot.

"I knew the silly boy was infatuated with her. Trust a mother's eyes for seeing that," she said. "And I had been dreading something of the sort for some time. But how providential that the young woman should have changed her mind again in favour of the old love before it was too late, and so offered us an easy way out of the entanglement. Of course, you will have no hesitation about clinching with her at once."

"What! And play that bounder Champneys' game for him?" exclaimed the Duke.

"Well, think of the alternative, my dear," said the practical Duchess.

So in the end it was decided that Lord Swampington should withdraw his candidature, the Duke taking care to give his son no hint of his real reason for persuading the young man to take this step, but assigning it purely to his high sense of party patriotism. It happened, just then, by a fortunate coincidence, that the Duchess's brother was on the point of starting for a big-game shooting expedition to Nigeria. He was prevailed on by his sister to ask Swampington to join his party, and Swampington, who loved sport of all kinds, readily accepted the invitation. So the enamoured youth was got out of the way in the nick of time, and the Duke consoled himself with the reflection that, by the time his son returned, the Wapshot woman would be safely married to John Champneys.

The day Swampington sailed the polling in Marshminster took place. Champneys was returned by a handsome majority. Topsy Wapshot, who had spent the day in the borough with her motor conveying voters to the poll, was in high feather.

On the following morning she met the Duke in the High Street. She stopped to accost him. There was a wicked gleam in her lustrous eye.

"So we've dished the Radicals, after all," she said.

"To that extent I congratulate you, madam," answered his Grace, stiffly. "I have done my part; now I look to you to do yours, and marry Mr. Champneys without delay."

Topsy fixed her wicked eyes on the Duke. The spirit of mischief was strong within her. The temptation to administer a shock to this self-important old gentleman by giving him an inkling of the truth was irresistible.

"You may be quite happy on that score," she smiled; "I am already Jack's wife. I married him privately in London six weeks ago."

"What!" gasped the Duke, as the truth began to dawn upon him. "Then you were already his wife when you came to me the other day? It was all a trick, on your part, to ensure my son's retirement in favour of your confounded husband? How dare you? How dare you, I repeat?" ejaculated his Grace, hardly controlling his fury.

"Anything is fair in love and—politics," replied Topsy, demurely.

Then she passed on, leaving the Duke purple in the face, almost on the verge of apoplexy.

What would have been his feelings if Topsy had gone on to explain how Swampington, determined to get out of that "rotten Parliamentary game" (as the young sportsman described it), and, seeing no chance of obtaining his autocratic father's consent by fair means, had himself taken a hand in this little conspiracy, and had been secretly backed up by his doting mother, the Duchess—what his Grace's feelings would have been, I say, had he been apprised of all this, I shudder to think. Mercifully, Topsy Wapshot's irrepressible spirit of mischief had drawn the line at so outrageous a breach of confidence.

BOOKS.

MAX NORDAU in "The Interpretation of History" (1) is an advocatus diaboli with a vengeance! He digs down to the roots of things and shows you that the fairest flowers are grown from dung. Here is his epitome of the evolution of man. When the climate of the earth altered so that its creatures had either to adapt themselves to the new circumstances or to adapt the new circumstances to themselves, the species which was to develop into man emerged at last victorious over a hostile nature through the brain power which enabled it to master its environment. But the individuals of this species were unequal—strong and weak, clever and stupid—and the better equipped, perceiving that it was easier to exploit the less well-endowed than to struggle with nature single-handed, made slaves of its women, its captives, and eventually its subjects. Those thus exploited invented morality as their protection. This, of course, is not new; but I fancy only Max Nordau could have discovered that the development of morality known as philanthropy is a kind of madness. "Those men whose hearts are full of love for the world and dreams of universal happiness, whose thoughts and actions are not directed by their own egoism, but by the good of humanity as a whole, who find their highest satisfaction in sacrificing themselves for their fellowmen, fall within the category of the abnormal whose instincts are more or less perverted." Again, I fancy that only Max Nordau would rank Washington with those "parasitic egoists whose hunger for power makes unendurable to them any thought of resistance, any limitation of personal omnipotence, a form of egoism allied to the hypertrophy of self that develops into megalomania." These parasitic egoists are indeed a "happy family" in Max Nordau's grouping of them:—"Rienzi, Jack Cade, Masaniello, Cromwell, Washington, Napoleon I. and III., and Louis Kossuth; while as "a member of the same family but a poor relation, an unsuccessful cousin, they have the professional criminal who has to content himself with the poorest and least remunerative form of exploitation, because he only possesses the parasitic instinct without the intellectual equipment in himself or the social forces behind him to satisfy it on a large scale or in the grand style." The truth is, Max Nordau, in the excess of his advocatus diaboli zeal, proves rather too much; while, even allowing his dissection of human nature and his demonstration of the origins and of the functions of all its organs to be accurate, there still remains the result to amaze and perplex us.

No doubt if you dig down to the root of the rose you will find dung, but the rose is there all the same for those on the look-out, not for dung, but for the fairness and fragrance of the flower. "Non olet," said the Roman emperor of gold derived from an exceedingly unsavoury tax. "I once saw a beautiful woman flayed," says Swift, "and I assure you the sight was not pleasant;" but what disgusted Swift underneath the skin was only the root of its fairness. It does not detract from the goodness to be found to-day in human nature to prove that it sprang from vileness, but rather deepens one's wonder at the product. Nor, again, does the demonstration of the infinite number and occasional foulness of the steps of man's evolution lessen our wonder at the result or shake our faith that the result was designed. Emerson is really more reasonable than Max Nordau in seeing design in the very graduation. "Man is no upstart in the Creation. His limbs are only a more exquisite organisation—nay, rather the finish—of the rudimental forms that have been already sweeping the sea and creeping in the mud. The brother of his hand is even now cleaving the Arctic sea in the fin of the whale, and innumerable ages since was pawing the marsh in the flipper of the saurian. The lesson of life is to believe what the years and the centuries say against the hours." All the ages and all the stages and all the changes of climate, environment, etc., which it took to produce a man like Max Nordau, who can so clearly and conclusively trace every step of the evolution from origin of the solar system to to-day, render it inconceivable that so many and various factors should work together to so coherent an end without design.

I fear I shall be thought old-fashioned in quoting Tillotson here: "How often might a man, after he had jumbled a set of letters in a bag, fling them out upon the ground before they would fall into an exact poem? How long might twenty thousand blind men, sent out from several remote parts of England, wander up and down before they would all meet on Salisbury Plain and fall into the exact order of an army?" Even the evolution of everything that is good or noble in us out of everything that was bad and base—allowing that honey was thus distilled always from the weed—suggests a divine and beneficent alchymist. On the other hand, nothing could be clearer or more convincing than Max Nordau's exposure of the arrogance of the historian, who supposes his little hortus siccus of dried facts arbitrarily selected in accordance with his own caprice, temperament, or personality, to be the whole that is worth collecting or even to be adequately representative of the whole. History, says Max Nordau, is just as much guesswork as astrology and cheiromancy, and, if we have not detected the imposition, it is because we are not as much interested in what is behind us as in what is before us. "The historian," he says, "who described himself as 'a backward-looking prophet' correctly estimated his own credibility as about equal to that of the soothsayer who pretends to reveal the future." Here, as always, Max Nordau is extravagant, but he has but exaggerated the arbitrariness, inadequacy, and unreliability of history. On reading his extremely interesting and suggestive book you feel inclined to cry with Maupassant, "L'Histoire est une menteuse éffrontée!"

You have only to read Professor Villari's preface to his "Mediæval Italy from Charlemagne to Henry VII." (²) to find confirmation of Max Nordau's distrust of history. Professor Villari, the greatest expert on the subject of which he treats, exposes the bias, superficiality, inconsistency, and ignorance of his predecessors. Some carry into the past the ideas of the present; some, taking the Italians of the Renaissance as their type of this people, conclude that they have been always indifferent to religion, and even devoid of the religious sense; some ignore altogether the Southern provinces of Italy as negligible, though they were once the most flourishing and civilised portion of the peninsula—"Palermo being then the most beautiful and splendid city in the world." One and all, as Max Nordau says of historians generally, make a more or less arbitrary selection among the countless causes at work, till "we logically arrive at the droll conclusion that the writer of history creates it!" Whether Professor Villari himself even would win the approval of Max Nordau is doubtful; but at least he has written for the ordinary reader an extraordinarily interesting popular history of an extraordinary time and people.

Mr. R. F. Johnstone in his "Lion and Dragon in Northern China" (³) has the two pre-eminent advantages for the study of the Celestials of intimate knowledge and generous sympathy. You can understand nothing from the outside—a man no more than a watch, and least of all an Eastern; but Mr. Johnstone, who is the district officer of the recently annexed Wei-hai-wei, really seems to see the insorutable Chinaman from the inside. At any rate, he has something of that patriotic sympathy with the people which the Englishman, who has been long resident in Ireland, catches like an infection. Hence his book is as instructive as it is entertaining. I should specially commend scorners of the religion of the "heathen Chinee" to read pages 325 and 326, and ask themselves whether we in the Christian West have got much farther than these views of Confucius.

You get a yet more inward view of an Eastern people in "The Glory of the Shia World" (⁴), the tale of a pilgrimage translated from a Persian manuscript by Major Sykes and Ahmad Din Khan. It is delightful reading, its naïveté and quaintness having on the Western mind the effect of conscious humour. Nothing could better illustrate the difference between Eastern and Western moral standards than the enthusiastic appreciation by the author of the manuscript—a great, noble, and brilliant poet—of the wisdom and justice of the Khan who kept his promise to a bandit, made on the Koran and sealed with his seal, that "no harm should happen to him while he was upon the earth," by putting him to death in a specially prepared pit underground! "To reward him for this great service the title of 'Amir of Amirs' was bestowed upon the Khan, who a few years later again showed immense capacity in the art of government." Here is a later instance of the Khan's immense capacity for government. Some robbers had murdered a Hindu, to the great delight of the Khan at the earth being rid of an infidel. When, however, the British Consul insisted not only on the men being punished, but even upon their being duly tried before execution, the Khan thus addressed the prisoners:—"O my brethren, we are all Mussulmans, and I, like you, rejoice at the death of this infidel—may his soul remain in hell! I have dismissed all my servants that I might secretly congratulate you, and I wish to know to whom the most credit in this meritorious deed is due." When they all clamoured for the credit the Khan, having thus secured a confession that would satisfy the Consul, had the bandits led out forthwith to execution.

What most struck Artemus Ward in the amazing revelations of astronomy was the discovery by those scientists of the names of the stars—a discovery which if it had been real would, according to Mr. Algernon Blackwood's "The Human Chord" (⁵), have given the discoverer preternatural powers—especially if he had at the same time mastered their music.

> There's not the smallest orb which thou beholdest
> But in his motion like an angel sings,
> Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubims.

The novel has to do with the magic of music and names, but even Mr. Blackwood cannot thrill us with its fantastic occultism, though every reader will accept its Browning moral, "Love is best." You recall for a moment Thackeray's delightful "The Rose and the Ring," as you open Mr. Barr McCutcheon's "The Rose in the Ring" (⁶), but there is nothing here in the magic of names. Though, however, Mr. McCutcheon's novel is as different as possible from that which delighted our childhood, it has merits of its own to absorb you. Besides the chivalrous hero and charming heroine, there is a delightful old clown and a still more engaging pickpocket to interest you, not to mention adventures of all kinds and an adequate number of murders and mysteries.

ART.

OF recent years both saleroom and exhibition have testified to the growing favour with which Raeburn is regarded by a twentieth-century public. So marked indeed is this appreciation that no exhibition of the eighteenth-century portraitists can now afford to dispense with one whom Reynolds has hitherto so completely overshadowed. Nor is the reason far to seek. Raeburn has not only all the superficial prettiness of Reynolds; not only do his sitters look charming in the picturesque dress of the time, but his manner of painting, his broad yet slight brush work, while retaining the eighteenth-century finish, has more in common with modern ideas of portrait painting than has that of any of his contemporaries.

But while occasional appearances of Raeburn portraits may lead one, in the case of a "Mrs. James Campbell," to over-estimate—in the case of "The Countess of Aboyne" to under-estimate—the painter, the collection of Raeburns now to be seen at the French Gallery offers a rarer and more dependable test of his quality than could be the case with any number of pictures seen separately. And on the whole, and in spite of the present boom, it convinces the visitor that Raeburn can never be placed in quite the same category as Reynolds. Seen side by side with Reynolds, there is a certain naïveté and simplicity about such portraits as "Mrs. Douglas," "Mrs. Anderson," which relieves him of Reynolds' theatricality and makes for greater reality and charm; compared only with himself, the driving power that is behind Reynolds' worst is for the most part only found in Raeburn's best. While it is conceivable that Reynolds—an he would—might have painted some of Raeburn's pictures, it is inconceivable that Raeburn could have painted any of Reynolds'. In his "Son on Horseback," for instance, Raeburn makes a definite attempt to achieve the grand manner, but fails from the naïveté, which in his best portraits supply his greatest charm. Only, perhaps, in his pictures of old age does he show the "snap" that underlies nearly all Reynolds' work. Only there is he so completely master of his means.

Raeburn's portraits are remarkable for the depth that he managed to lend to the eyes of his sitters, and for the skill with which he contrived in a few broad strokes to reproduce the "soft clinging material" beloved of the novelist. In the sixteen portraits of women here exhibited, thirteen are wearing the white he loved so much, while the other three have his favourite grey and black; the Raeburn red is almost unrepresented. A superficial glance might lead one to suppose that Raeburn attempted less than Reynolds, and, on a smaller scale, achieved more. Really he attempted a good deal more, for his women are aiming, not at being nymphs and goddesses, but as plain Mrs. X., who would appreciate a good likeness even more than a good painting. And yet such artificiality as is Reynolds' strikes a deeper note than does Raeburn's reality. His range is markedly wider, his "means" undoubtedly greater. So excellently does the French Gallery give the visitor an opportuntiy of summing up Raeburn that, while Reynolds conforms the axiom about the parts and the whole, it may be said of Raeburn that the part is greater than the whole.

Mr. Brangwyn's water-colours and etchings at the Fine Arts Gallery are one more instance of his inability to be anything but rather colossal. There is indeed a richness and profusion about his work which, in a sense, recalls Rubens, and suggests that no frame could be relied upon to contain him for more than a limited time. It is not easy to imagine Mr. Brangwyn in difficulties. His broad sweeps of dark blue, with their equally broad red or orange contrasts, suggest five minutes' execution and then reconcentration till next time. With some painters this profusion might make for diffuseness, but in every one of these water-colours, in their different degrees, there is a strong dramatic "motif" and a remarkable human note, however that humanity be generalised. It is the human instinct that is responsible for such works as "The Plate-layers," "Bakers," "Winchelsea Mill"; it is the dramatic sense that predominates in the painful and decorative Messina work. And both have something of the other. Mellowed down you get the same feeling in the beautiful sketches of the Lot with the particularly happy treatment of the trees. A prejudice for the small etching is not entirely easy to put aside; but Mr. Brangwyn is on a large enough scale to use means whatsoever to his end. And both etchings and water-colours, with their larger-than-life suggestion, are eloquent of the strength and vitality that is in them.

It is a little hard, before viewing the etchings of Mr. Anders Zorn at the gallery of Messrs. James Connell, to be told—and in print, too—that "no European artist has a higher reputation;" that he is "robust," "audacious," "frank," "sincere," "virile"—all the gamut of adjectives, in short, without which art-criticism might hope for salvation. It is hard on the visitor; it is hard on Mr. Zorn himself. For some of us have really heard of him before—several times even; we should have admired without prompting the force and character of his "Madame Lamm," "Margit," "Verlaine," "Henri Marquand," since they are quite capable of speaking for themselves. The more intelligent of us might even have gone so far as to talk of the verve and spirit of his methods. I even know a man who bought some Zorns quite independently of the latter's European reputation, and merely because he liked them. I can only add that I envy that purchaser, further comment being superfluous in the light of the unbounded enthusiasm of the catalogue.

The suavity of Ingres and the virility of Hogarth form a piquant contrast in the two little books (T. C. and E. C. Jack, 1s. 6d. net) by Mr. A. T. Finbery and Mr. Lewis Hind respectively, issued in the "Masterpieces of Colour" series. Of the two, perhaps the Ingres lends itself better to illustration, but Mr. Hind's spirited account of the greatest of English painters will not fail to find readers. Similar in shape, design, and price are the "Pilgrim Books," of which "Wordsworth" (T. C. and E. C. Jack, 1s. 6d. net), by Mr. S. L. Bensusan, has just appeared. Copiously illustrated by Mr. H. Forestier, it quite sustains the standard set by the series. "A Little Journey to Switzerland" (Cassell, 1s.) is less a guide-book than a praiseworthy attempt by word and illustration to transport to Switzerland those who have not the opportunity of going there.

A SALMI OF "SALOME."

THE event of the week is, of course, the production of Strauss's "Salome" at Covent Garden fixed for to-morrow (Thursday). After long waiting and many alarums and excursions we are to have the terrible thing at last—though in a form carefully adapted to the requirements of the virtuous British public by the joint labours of Lord Spencer, Mr. Thomas Beecham, and Mr. Alfred Kalisch. Lord Spencer long ago informed a listening senate that he was not an agricultural labourer, and this circumstance constitutes, so far as I am aware, his only qualification for the rôle of literary expert which he has been called upon to play on the present occasion. But then he happens to be Lord Chamberlain, and before this august functionary mere men of genius hide their diminished heads. His task it is to put down the mighty from their seat, though not necessarily to exalt the humble and the meek. For long and strenuous months we are given to understand he has had the book of "Salome" under his anxious consideration, and in the result we are assured that the work is now one to which any daughter can take her father without the smallest risk of bringing the blush of shame to the cheek of old age.

I only hope that the opera will not meet in consequence with the fate which attended Handel's "Theodora," of which it will be remembered the composer observed that while the Jews would not go to it because it was too Christian, the ladies stayed away because it was too virtuous. While they were about it, it seems to me that Lord Spencer and his collaborators have missed a grand opportunity of converting the work into a really seasonable production by turning it into an up-to-date pantomime, combined with a skit on the Suffragette cause. Salome herself would of course stand for Mrs. Pankhurst striving in vain to capture the affections of the adamantine John the Baptist embodying the obdurate male anti-Suffragists. Herodias might represent Mrs. Humphry Ward, who resents the indecent overtures of her shameless feminist offspring; while Herod, who gives the baggage her quietus in the end, would offer obvious opportunities to the pantomime humorist to take a rise out of Mr. Winston Churchill. Then, of course, the services of Mr. James Glover would have to be requisitioned to introduce the comic element in Strauss's music, and a thoroughly amusing entertainment, "causing much fun and roars of laughter," would be the result. As it is, the work promises, I fear, to be nothing like so exhilarating.

But if the drama has been toned down, it is understood that Strauss's music has been left untouched. Yet in the opinion of many the score of "Salome" is even more open to criticism than anything in its book. A distinguished German critic wrote, for instance, that "it overthrows all accepted musical forms and heaps Pelion on Ossa in the matter of startling dissonances." Another said, "It exceeds in deliberate ugliness and in the mass of dissonances which compose it anything that has ever existed before in music." "Strauss and his school," wrote a third, "have reached the limit of their kind of music, and are now at the parting of the ways where all further effort in the same direction must end in absolute anarchy." Saint-Saëns wrote of the work as a "carnival of abnormality." And such pronouncements could be multiplied indefinitely.

Regarding the book of "Salome," it will be remembered that the poem was written originally by Oscar Wilde in French. From the French it was translated into German, and before ever Strauss thought of setting it to music it was frequently given as a play in Germany; at the same time an English translation of the French original was prepared and published by Lord Alfred Douglas. With respect to the Biblical foundation of the work it has been pointed out that all we learn from St. Matthew and St. Mark is that when the daughter of Herodias danced before Herod on his birthday he promised on oath to give her whatsoever she asked. The girl, "being before instructed of her mother," said, "Give me here John Baptist's head in a charger. . . . And his head was brought in a charger and given to the damsel, and she brought it to her mother." The whole story is radically altered in Wilde's version of it by making Salome's unholy passion for John the Baptist, of which there is not the smallest suggestion in the Bible, the leading motive of the action. Even Salome's name is not mentioned in the Gospels at all, though it appears that this is given by Josephus. It is worthy of note apropos of to-morrow's performance that "Salome" is being given for the first time in London almost exactly five years after its original production in Dresden, where it was first performed on December 10, 1905. It has, therefore, been quite a respectable period in quarantine.

Last Saturday's performance of "Carmen" at Covent Garden served to introduce an admirable artist in Frau Ottilie Metzger, who has not been heard in London before. She has a very sympathetic voice, acts with great intelligence, and made a very successful representative of the part. The work was sung partly in English and partly in French, Mr. Coates as Don José impartially employing both languages, a tour de force which must surely constitute something of a record. In "Tristan" on Thursday the Isolde of Mme. Litvinne was a good deal more acceptable than the Tristan of Herr Kraus, the deficiencies of whose vocal methods were painfully apparent. This week, in addition to "Salome" to-morrow, "Pelléas et Mélisande" is announced for Friday, with Miss Maggie Teyte as Mélisande.

Elgar's violin concerto was repeated at the second Philharmonic concert last week, and impressed again

An Invitation to Employers.

We invite every employer in the interest of an efficient staff, to send us the coupon at foot along with his business card. In reply, we will forward particulars of the I.C.S. system of training men for their work while at their work, described by one employer as "on a level with the very highest mediums of education in the country." We will also send details of the I.C.S. "Students' Aid Department," which puts employers and trained I.C.S. men in touch with one another free of charge.

It is well worth every employer's while to tell his employees about this efficiency-increasing training, and to utilise the I.C.S "Students' Aid Department" in making additions to his staff.

as a work containing some very beautiful and appealing music. If only the difficulties of the solo part do not stand in the way, which is hardly likely nowadays, I should think it will have considerable popularity, since it is as a whole more easily appreciated than the symphony, though not to my mind so great a work. A new quartet in A minor (op. 122), by Sir Charles Stanford, was an interesting feature of the Broadwood concert last week. Like all of Stanford's works, it is characterised by admirable workmanship, and makes very pleasant hearing even if its ideas are not particularly individual or inspired. On Saturday Mischa Elman was the bright particular star of the Queen's Hall Symphony Concert, and played superbly in Tchaikowsky's violin concerto, while on the same afternoon Miss Maggie Teyte, in conjunction with the Beecham Orchestra and Mr. Beecham, gave a very enjoyable concert of eighteenth century French and Italian music at the Æolian Hall.

THE THEATRES.

"Decorating Clementine," at the Globe.

I WAS quite interested in Miss Gladys Unger's adaptation of MM. Armand de Caillavet and Robert de Flers' clever comedy, "Le Bois Sacré," because it raises several important questions. In the first place, if a woman urges her reluctant husband to flirt with the wife of an important Minister in order that the said Minister may be induced to give her a coveted decoration, how far is she justified in "rounding on him" afterwards if the flirtation goes too far? Flirtation is an insidious and invidious game, and you very seldom get two people who play it correctly. One is pretty sure to go a little too far, and accordingly Paul Margerie goes a little too far with Mme. Morel. It would be difficult, I imagine, for anyone to avoid stepping over the line with Adrienne Morel. She has the most coming on disposition of any young woman I ever saw on the stage. She nearly faints with excitement at the sight of any attractive young man. She is a graceful, seductive, moral-less little witch, and as played by Miss Doris Keane she is entirely fascinating. You somehow feel that flirtation with her is an art, not a vice, and I congratulate Miss Keane most heartily on a really brilliant piece of acting. And this is the siren that poor stolid country-loving Paul Margerie is told to flirt with by his wife as a means to her getting decorated with the Legion of Honour! Little wonder that he gets his wings rather singed in the bright candle of her allurements! But has Mme. Margerie any real grounds for threatening to leave him at the finish? She herself has blandished the very susceptible Minister in order to gain her ends, and though it is true she slaps his face when he tries to kiss her she is not so very very angry with him. Of course, the play is a delightful exposé of the depths to which people will descend in order to gain decorations—let us hope that the picture is purely French, and that nothing of the sort could happen in England—and the second act scene at the Ministry of Fine Arts is exceedingly funny. Should women be decorated at all, though, if they nearly succeed in breaking up their home life because they get so keen on securing the honour at all costs? Clementine certainly seems to think that the game is not worth the candle at the finish, because she takes off her ribbon and hands it to her husband with the remark that she never wishes to see it again, so productive of unhappiness has it been.

Miss Hattie Williams, who plays the wife, is an American with a very pleasant personality, but the honours of the little comedy go to Mr. Louis Massen as the Director of Fine Arts and to Miss Keane as his volatile little wife. Mr. Massen is so good as the susceptible minister, who is always ready to come into personal touch with fair applicants for honours, that I would gladly see his performance again, and his chagrin when he discovers at a personal interview that he has been on the verge of giving the ribbon to a fossilised old gentleman who writes romances and romantic letters under a feminine alias is a beautiful thing to see. As for Miss Keane, I can hardly praise her performance too highly. She might so easily have made it disagreeable, particularly at one very risky moment, but she did not do so. She skilfully kept the character eerie and witchlike rather than human, and her Egyptian dance was a brilliant success. One curious thing is that Mr. G. H. Huntley is starred in the play when he really has little to do with it. He rambles about in his droll, whimsical way as a Russian Count and Director of the Ballet. He explains how irresistible he is to all women, and amuses you as only Mr. Huntley can, but when you come to think about the play afterwards you are inclined to forget that he was in it at all. He is an incidental character. He fills the place of incidental music merely, and I think he is rather thrown away.

"The Mellstock Quire."

On one of last week's most wet and dreary evenings I wandered to Cripplegate to see Mr. A. H. Evans's adaptation of Thomas Hardy's "Under the Greenwood Tree." This is the third year that the Dorchester Debating and Dramatic Society has staged a version of one of the famous Wessex novels, on previous occasions "The Trumpet Major" and "Far From the Madding Crowd" being given. The company had come from Dorchester (Casterbridge), where the play was originally produced, and now under the auspices of the Society of Dorset Men in London they gave the Cripplegate Institute a taste of their quality. Naive and amateurish though the whole production was, I found it quite delightful. Mr. Evans has not so much attempted to make a play as to preserve the spirit of the original, and the pictures of the passing of the quaint old "Quire" and the love-making of Fancy Day and her suitors were very charmingly set forth. Interspersed throughout the play were a number of pretty old Dorset carols. Dorsetshire songs were also sung with immense enthusiasm, and it was very interesting to find oneself among a crowd of people who were so obviously and sincerely proud of their county and of their great native novelist.

SPORT.

RACING NOTES.

MR. HOULDSWORTH, who died last week, had been an owner of racehorses for nearly forty years, and he was elected a member of the Jockey Club in 1874. He raced for sport only, and he never betted. It is a flagrant fact that with many rich men who own racehorses the aim, end, and final object of the whole affair is a successful gamble, and they think of nothing but betting coups, having no more idea of sport than a gorilla. Mr. Houldsworth raced on the grand seigneur system of the late Duke of Westminster and the late Lord Falmouth, and his colours were seldom seen in handicaps, and never in selling races. He was equal to either fortune, and no run of ill luck, however prolonged, ever disturbed his equanimity. It is the custom of too many owners, whenever a fancied horse is beaten, to regard the trainer as a fool or a robber, or possibly the jockey is suspected of being a thief, and they are both looked upon with acute suspicion. Mr. Houldsworth regarded all that sort of thing with the utmost disgust and contempt. One season, after his horses had been doing very badly, an acquaintance suggested to him that he would do well to employ a more fashionable trainer. "When I give up Ryan I shall give up racing," was the characteristic answer. Mr. Houldsworth was a friend of Mr. James Merry and of Mr. Redfern. When Mr. Merry sold off his breeding stud during the summer of 1873 some of the best mares were purchased by Mr. Houldsworth, but they did not produce any fliers for him. He owned a number of very useful horses, but the best animal which ever carried his colours was Springfield, who was purchased for a small sum at the sale of the Hampton Court yearlings in 1874.

I do not believe that Springfield would have beaten Petrarch for the Two Thousand or Kisber for the Derby, but it is highly probable that he would have won the St. Leger if he had been entered for that race. He had no engagements in the classic stakes. The merit of Springfield's easy victory over Silvio in the Champion Stakes has been extravagantly exaggerated. Silvio won the Derby and the St. Leger, but he was about a stone behind Chamant, winner of the Two Thousand, and as a four-year-old Verneuil made a dreadful example of him in the Ascot Cup. Lord Falmouth did not hesitate to express the opinion that Silvio would have stood no chance for the Derby or St. Leger if Chamant had kept all right Mr. Houldsworth always liked to win races at Ascot, and if he had any smart horses they were trained with a view to their engagements at that meeting. He was invariably most merciful and considerate of his horses, and his jockeys were not allowed to indulge in vagaries with either whip or spur. During one of his early seasons his colours had been dreadfully unfortunate, and in order to encourage him a handicap was made for one of his horses by Admiral Rous at one of the Newmarket October Meetings. Colonel Forester and Mr. Henry Savile had represented to the Admiral that it would be a great thing to arrange a race for Mr. Houldsworth, who was a simply ideal owner, and it would be unfortunate if repeated failures disgusted him with the Turf. The horse was accordingly thrown in, and it won the race, Mr. Houldsworth being heartily congratulated afterwards by all the most influential members of the Jockey Club. He had more Scotch grit than he was then credited with, for, as he afterwards showed, he was not the man to give up the Turf in peevish annoyance because his horses were beaten when he had expected them to win. Mr. Houldsworth always did his best to maintain the best and highest traditions of the Turf. He belonged to a very well-known Glasgow family, and he was an original member of the Eglinton Hunt and of the Prestwick Golf Club. His charities of all kinds in Ayrshire were most munificent, and he was a generous giver to the Ayr County Hospital in periods of financial depression. Mr. Houldsworth's residence was Rozelle, near Ayr, a place which he had for many years rented from Miss Hamilton. It is expected that his large fortune will pass to his two sisters, who lived with him.

Of all the big races which have been established during the last thirty years, none has proved more successful than the National Breeders' Produce Stakes of £5,000 at Sandown Park. It is the most valuable two-year-old race of the season, and far in front of the New Stakes at Ascot, while the events at Epsom and Newmarket are absolutely paltry in comparison with the Sandown stake. It is very strange that a race on the same lines was not long ago started at the Newmarket Second July Meeting, the programme of which is miserably poor. The entry for the race of 1913 fills nearly three columns of the "Calendar," and affords some interesting information as to the mating of most of the crack mares. French owners do not usually patronise races of this class, but M. Gaston Dreyfus has engaged thirteen mares, and Mme. Lemaire de Villers has twelve. The largest subscriber is Mr. J. B. Joel, with fourteen, six of which went to Your Majesty and six to Sundridge. Mr. Arthur James has thirteen entries, and Mr. H. Cholmondeley has engaged twelve of the Sledmere mares. His Majesty heads the list with eight of the Sandringham mares, including Laodamia, covered by Dark Ronald; Pearl of the Loch, by Sundridge; Ecila, by Cicero; Loch Doon, by The White Knight; and Princesse de Galles, by Marcovil. One of Mr. W. Astor's lot of four is Conjure (dam of Winkipop), covered by Zinfandel. Mr. W. B. Cloete has five entries, one being Quick (dam of Mushroom), covered by Orme. Lord Derby's lot of six includes Keystone II., covered by Bridge of Canny. Mr. Fairie's lot of four includes Galicia (dam of Bayardo and Lemberg), covered by Radium, and Galeottia (dam of Highness) by Beppo. Mr. Fairie goes on the excellent system of the late Lord Falmouth, who sent his mares to different sires, however successful a cross might have proved. The late Duke of Westminster made an immense mistake when he persisted in sending Lily Agnes to the sire of Ormonde season after season. Major Loder has done his best for Spearmint by sending him Pretty Polly, Sibola, and Hammerkop. Mr. Neumann's lot of four includes Siberia, who went to Eager, and Sirenia (dam of Siberia, Electra, and Cellini), whom he sent to St. Frusquin. The Duke of Portland has nine mares, including Stolen Love (dam of Wrinkler), covered by Radium; Mrs. Butterwick, by Sundridge; Quair (daughter of Memoir), by Eager; and La Roche, by Marco. Lord Rosebery's lot of six includes Chelandry (dam of Neil Gow), covered by Marco, the sire of the Two Thousand winner, and Gas, by Marcovil. Two of the mares in this lot went to Dark Ronald. Mr. W. Hall Walker has ten entries, and six of his mares went to White Eagle. Merry Gal was covered by Friary and Cherry Lass by St. Aidan, and in both cases the produce will have a breeding allowance of 10 lb. The Duke of Westminster's lot of seven includes Rydal Mount (dam of Troutbeck), covered by Ladas.

I noticed a few days ago that backers are advised to back Pietri for the Derby. It will be full time to think about betting on the Derby after the Two Thousand, which will be a very interesting race, as Seaforth is engaged, and if he defeated Pietri then Mr. L. de Rothschild's colt would be no longer the Epsom favourite. Some good judges are of the opinion that Mr. McCalmont's colt will prove deficient in stamina as a three-year-old. There are great possibilities in Stedfast and King William, but my own strong conviction is that M. E. Blanc will win the Derby with Lord Burgoyne.

I see it is stated that M. Michael Ephrussi intends to send Blinda II., winner of the Grand Criterium, over to England next season in order that she may fulfil her engagements in this country. As a matter of fact, Blinda II. has no engagements in England, nor is she entered for the Grand Prix de Paris. M. Michael Ephrussi has animals engaged in the Derby, Oaks, and St. Leger, but the name of Blinda II. is not to be found in any list of entries, which is unfortunate for her owner, as she must be a very smart filly.

THE PRICE OF GOLF BALLS—ROWING—TENNIS.

Among a certain section of the community—to wit, golfers—there is one matter that is more important than either a tax on food or the Referendum, and that is the price of golf balls. Now, from information received, as the policeman witness says, I am enabled to give certain details as to the cost of manufacture. It is not the price of the raw material at any moment that affects the manufacturers of golf balls. What they have to go by is the price of the rubber strip or the elastic which is wound round to make the core. The present price of this material, if bought by the ton, is in the neighbourhood of 10s. 6d. to 10s. 9d. per pound, and about a pound goes to the making of one dozen of the best balls, which have no solid centre. The ball-makers estimate that the cost of winding this rubber strip into a ball, covering it with the best gutta-percha cover, painting the balls with three coats of paint (the usual allowance), wrapping each ball in one or two papers to keep it from scratching, boxing in cartons of one dozen balls each, and carefully testing amounts to about 6s. per dozen. This brings the initial outlay on materials and labour for a dozen balls to, say, 16s. 6d. But to this sum must be added the wear and tear of the moulds (which soon wear out, and are very expensive to make), heat, light, management, rents, rates and taxes, insurances, freight, advertising, selling expenses, business risks, and other establishment charges. It is, therefore, perhaps, fair to add 20 per cent. to the cost of materials and labour to cover all these charges; so the gross cost of the best ball may be put at 20s. per dozen at the present cost of rubber thread. I may parenthetically observe that while establishment charges do not vary, the 20 per cent. item depending on the cost of the material, the manufacturer gets a bigger profit the dearer the material unless his percentage figure is increased when material is lower. That figure of 20s. a dozen certainly looks like a two-shilling ball. But then I am told that the manufacturer sells to the jobber (who sends his travellers round to the golf clubs and shops for orders) at 22s. per dozen, less a small cash discount. The manufacturer is, therefore, making less than 2s. per dozen—surely not a very extravagant profit. The jobber sells to the professional or retail dealer at 24s., less 2½ per cent. for cash, and the jobber pays freight, so that he cannot be said to get rich quickly.

The professional buying at 24s., less 2½ per cent., sells to the golfer at 2s. 6d. each, making a clear 6d. per ball, or three times as much as either the manufacturer or the jobber. It is quite true that the manufacturer may sell a few balls at the full retail price, but how many golfers buy balls direct from the maker? Very few indeed; not 1 per cent. of the makers' total sales are due to this class of customers. Then one naturally asks how could even the retail price of a ball be 2s. 6d., when rubber thread was as high as 20s. or more per pound early this year? The answer is that few, if any, manufacturers bought at this price, as they had contracted ahead. Those who had to buy actually lost money at that time on the 2s. 6d. ball if they made it entirely of new materials.

Having regard to these facts and figures, how then is it possible to buy a very decent ball at 1s. 6d. to 1s. 8d. retail? The answer is simple. The makers take back the old balls at 6s. to 8s. per dozen, strip off the cover, sometimes strip off also a little of the old elastic and wind on some fresh, and re-cover the old core. This may cost them 5s. to 6s. per dozen, according to the amount of new labour and materials, and the result is a ball plenty good enough for practice. My informant adds: "You can always cut a ball open and see its genuineness." This may be a very good tip from the maker's point of view, but as a simple-minded, small-pocketed consumer I curb my curiosity, although the more balls I use the more I create a demand, which in its turn stimulates production and so reduces the price.

Really the Royal and Ancient of St. Andrews is worried by the most ridiculous questions that ever the mind of man can conceive. As an example of infantile imbecility it was referred to St. Andrews to say what were the rights of a player at Hanger Hill Golf Club. He had won a competition on a Friday. On the Saturday he started forth to play again. While he was playing the committee altered his handicap, and then expected their decision to have a retrospective effect. If the committee cannot get up early enough to do the handicapping, they really cannot expect players to start on one handicap and finish on another.

There was absolutely no doubt about the river running by when the Oxford University Trial Eights were rowed over the Moulsford course. There was a tremendous stream and a tremendous race at a tremendous pace. The elementary Cambridge mathematical mind would easily convert this description into a mathematical formula. Everything was in the power of x, which equalled an unknown quantity, to wit, tremendous. There was a good gathering of old Blues. The elections did not trouble them. Wormald's crew had the Berkshire shore, and at the first bend led by a bare quarter of a length. Perhaps they increased this by the "Betel and Wedge," where Buller put in some ten hard strokes and took his men up. Wormald did not hurry his men, but responded and went away again. Entering the straight piece home Buller got a quarter of a length's lead. Wormald went for him again, but he just held his own and won by his canvas in time over two minutes faster than last year. There were seven Old Etonians rowing; five of them were in the losing crew. Young Coleridge, the Trinity Four stroke, rowed two for the winners. He is a bit too light for the University crew.

The Lawn Tennis Association is apparently fed up with the Davis Cup Competition. There is difficulty in getting players to take the long trip. The Australians will under no circumstances give guarantees for a challenge round. Wherefore the suggestion is made that home-and-home matches should be played in alternate years with the United States. There would be no difficulty in securing representative players for such a trip, which would only take a month, and the expense, it is said, would not be very great. This certainly appears to be a good scheme. Having got over primitive difficulties and idiosyncrasies, the leading players in the two countries are on the most friendly terms. The L.T.A. will certainly do good work if it brings about such a series of games. It will be bossing the show. The All England Lawn Tennis Club will have nothing to do with the matter. The L.T.A. will be able to select its own ground. It may be Queen's Club, or the Stadium, or the provinces. I only hope the L.T.A. will never again ask the Americans for guarantees. The mere mention of an American dollar almost makes me screech with patriotic disgust.

The South Africans are not doing too well in their tour in Australia. They persistently lose the toss and have to start off on a wicket affected with the rain. This is bad luck. However, what we are looking out for in this country is the triangular contest in 1912. Goodness only knows if the powers that be are going to send out a team to Australia next winter. That is the due date. But it will mean that our men will be playing eighteen months on end if our best team goes out, and a really good one is due for Australia. In addition, for nearly eight months they will be playing test matches at the rate of one a month. Under these circumstances the Australians as well as the Englishmen will probably

Where is the Solid Institution?
How am I to learn Advertisement Writing thoroughly?
What institution has qualified its students to become experts?
Where can I find the institution that gives the proper instruction?

There is a great deal more in the work of a competent advertising man than the process of writing a number of words, sending them to the newspapers to be set up in type and printed. If that were all, undoubtedly the whole subject could be exhaustively dealt with in a single book of some forty or fifty pages.

Attempts have certainly been made to deal with the whole art of Advertisement Writing, and the business of Advertising Management in courses of twenty-five—and even fewer—lessons. But it is manifest that if an honest endeavour is to be made to give really sound and really complete instruction in these subjects, which, directly or indirectly, affect every phase of commercial enterprise, so meagre an outline can but be of the most trifling—if indeed of any—practical utility.

think that tours and test matches are like general elections. One can have too much of a good thing. With regard to the trial games next year, these must not be arranged for middle-aged gentlemen. They must be for the young. Thus will they get to know each other's play and to know each other. Then when selected they, or some of them, will not be strangers wandering on the field together. They will realise each other's capacities, work better together, and so diminish the advantage that a touring team acquires from playing together.

A correspondent wants to know why so many university Rugby matches are played in London during this term. Of old the matches were played at the university. Then men playing on the same ground learned to play together, and this was a good method and it was good practice. I have no doubt that some men, especially the freshers, like the run up to town that the university matches afford during term time. But after all the team is a university one, and it is far better that it should play on its own ground. Cambridge would have pulled together much better if they had kept to Cambridge. After all, the university match is the thing. If preferred, do not play it until the middle of the Lent term. But nowadays the Rugby programme is lengthened out unduly. It encroaches both on the rowing and athletics, and who on earth cares what happens to the Rugby team after the university match is over. This is fixed for the end of the October term. Afterwards there are other university fixtures to be considered, and for these a strong and fast Rugby footballer is an acquisition. At Cambridge there seems to be a dearth of organising ability. The players flatter but to fail. The Oxford teams have been good; but the Cambridge play has been too pitiable for words.

* * * * * *

Mr. Norman Craig, K.C., has done something to bring the A.F.A. and F.A. together. It may be that there is a chasm that neither can bridge. But surely the high contracting parties should set the rest of the world an example. Of course, where there is a boycott you know where you are. The respective partisans never meet. Withdraw the boycott and apparently nothing matters. Really the simplest way would be for the two associations to form one rules' committee to arrange the rules of the game. International teams to be selected by joint committee, and the suspensions of each to be recognised. Furthermore every club must be affiliated to one of the two associations, but not to both. Friendly and charity matches to be permitted, and players to play for both or either clubs. As I have before pointed out, it is more than one association's work to keep the game clean and straight. The F.A. should welcome an organisation that is devoted to amateurism. The F.A. has a lot of work to do. Take things as they are and work on that basis.

FOG GOLF.

(After Keats's Ode "To Autumn.")

Season of mists and yellow fogginess,
  How oft I long to go and give you one,
Conspiring how to put me in a mess
  And spoil a round I'd only just begun.
I cannot see the clubhouse nor the tees;
  I cannot see my caddie, what is more
  I cannot see my ball, nor can I tell
What in the world you want to blind me for.
  How shall I drive with any inward ease,
  What are these shapes before me; what are these?
They cannot see me even if I yell.

Who hath not smelt thee when November's o'er?
  Sometimes whoever golfs this month may find
Thee lurking when December's frosts are hoar
  Or even of a slightly harsher kind.
There like a pall upon the putting green,
  If ever one should reach that hallowed spot,
  They'll find thee in the zenith of thy powers;
And oft-times by a bunker art thou seen,
  And present too at many a foozled shot,
  But mostly in a bunker. Oh, Great Scott!
I've stood and shivered there for hours by hours.

Where are the fogs of old? Ay, where are they?
  Speak not of them, thou hast thy colours too—
Banked up in clouds that clog us all the day,
  And thine the vilest fog I ever knew.
Now in a wailful choir the caddies mourn,
  Among the golfers feeling fairly sold,
  Who leave their last new golf ball where it lies.
I look for clearer weather in the morn,
  But here I cannot stand this foggy cold,
  I think I must be getting worn and old,
But anyway I have not fog-proof eyes!

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

THE election is now in full swing, and motor-owners are finding themselves in great demand once more for the purpose of conveying the free and independent ones to the poll, and on all hands they are responding nobly to the call. Testimony is universal as to the value of the assistance which is being afforded this time, as in January last—in fact, it is almost difficult to imagine nowadays how elections were conducted in the pre-motoring era at all. As on former occasions, the talk of organising motorists to exact pledges in regard to motor-car legislation has ended in smoke, and quite properly, too, since motorists are citizens first and automobile-owners afterwards. At the same time it is reasonable to hope that candidates who have benefited so largely from the patriotic exertions of motor-owners in their hour of need will not forget these services when the right time comes.

The motoring correspondent of the Morning Post has been collecting the opinions of leading representatives of the trade on the subject of the arrangements at Olympia, and there seems to be general agreement that reforms are desirable in the direction of raising the prices of admission, and reducing the attendance of deadheads so as to prevent overcrowding, prohibiting smoking, and so on. There would seem every reason for anticipating, therefore, that these reforms will be carried out next year, since the trade controls the show. I cannot help thinking, however, that a certain amount of exaggeration enters into some of the statements which have been made on the subject. Mr. E. M. C. Instone, for instance, is represented as saying, "I think we all feel that there were hundreds of visitors anxious to purchase cars, but who were deterred from doing so by the impossibility of carrying out their wishes in reasonable comfort." Was this really the fact, I wonder? In any case it can hardly be suggested that this amount of business was actually lost to the trade. As a matter of fact, under the best of circumstances an exhibition is hardly the ideal place for doing real business. But undoubtedly the real purpose of an exhibition is defeated when the articles shown cannot be inspected in comfort with a view to possible purchase at a subsequent date, and this is certainly the condition of things which has prevailed at Olympia as hitherto organised.

I was surprised to see an article in the Times the other day by Mr. Mervyn O'Gorman defending the existing system of motor-car classification for taxation purposes by groups, and deprecating the substitution of a system based on smaller units of power. Mr. O'Gorman persuades himself by a very far-fetched process of reasoning that the existing groups correspond broadly to various different classes of motorists, and argues that therefore they fairly meet the needs of the case. But even so, he makes no attempt to prove that it would not be a fairer method still to tax every owner according to the precise horse-power of his car instead of having a rough-and-ready scale, whereby one owner may have to pay £20 a year more than another whose horse-power is practically identical with his own.

The only reasons he advances against making the change seem to be (1) that it would give the officials more work, and (2) that the problem of ascertaining horse-power from engine dimensions is a very difficult one. Neither argument amounts to much. As to the first, there is no reason why the authorities should be more fastidious in verifying owners' statements under the one system than under the other; and as to the second, it obviously applies no less to the present system of classification than to any other. It is certainly to be hoped that the existing crude and essentially inequitable mode of classification will be abolished in the course of the next twelve months.

The accounts of the Paris motor show which I have seen so far hardly suggest that the display is one of sufficient interest to induce a trip across the Channel. Abroad, as at home, really novel developments seem to be more or less at a discount just at present, though if anything of this sort is going it is in Paris more than anywhere else that it is likely to be found. Perhaps, therefore, all has not yet been told in the accounts so far to hand. One statement which I noticed in one of the reports is rather surprising, namely, that there are many more chain-driven cars to be seen at the Salon than were shown at Olympia—from which it would seem that British designers are now actually more advanced in some respects than their French rivals, unless the latter are now going back again to the chain.

A minor aid to comfort which will commend itself to many as providing a very simple solution of an ever recurring problem is the petrol can opener which an ingenious inventor has just placed on the market. Every motorist knows the difficulty of opening a petrol can without some such appliance. In the old days the metal step of the car could often be utilised, but in the form of the modern running footboard it is no longer available, and some other method has to be adopted. The device referred to, consisting of a small metal disc to be fixed beneath the step, with a raised bar in the middle to take the slot of the ordinary petrol can's screw cap, would seem to meet a long-felt want in the most practical way. It is just one of those little things that one wonders no one ever thought of before.

Talking of minor conveniences about a car, one which is more often than not conspicuous by its absence, even in the case of the best appointed cars, is the provision of proper handles at suitable points for the purpose of moving the car about by hand in the garage and elsewhere. The result is that any and every part of the body will be seized on for the purpose, more often than not to the serious detriment of the car. In the case of taxicabs, for instance, it is quite common to see these hauled along on the rank by means of one of the door handles! Suitable hand grips put in the right place would obviate such barbarities; and even if they have not been provided by the makers, the owner who values his car will be wise to add them at his own expense.

Yet another small convenience which somebody has recently hit upon is a boot-scraper, also to be attached to the running-board—another notion as useful as it is simple. Nothing is more unpleasant in muddy weather than the dirty condition in which a car gets as a consequence of the mud deposited by the boots of the passengers; yet it is practically impossible to avoid this state of things in the ordinary way. The employment of a scraper should serve at least to mitigate the evil.

LETTERS TO MY MOTHER-IN-LAW.

DEAR Mrs. P.,—As everyone put off dinners, parties "At Homes" last week, and as I was afraid that James would get stout if he went to sleep every evening after dinner, we went down to canvass at Peckham. James felt I was doing it for his sake and gave me a long musquash coat that I have been wanting for some time to keep the cold out. I looked really nice in it, and as it turned out, had a great influence on the election; for, really, to show your keen sympathy with the lower classes you must dress as sumptuously as possible. I noticed it time and again when I was a Unionist. Between us James and I certainly secured fifty votes in the two days; without the coat we shouldn't have got more than twenty-five—quite apart from the fact that I might then have refused to go. Forty-one, as you know, turned the election. So that, in the present equality of parties, it is conceivable that James's action in buying my coat may have altered the whole course of English history.

Personally I think canvassing is very unsatisfactory. The clean people have a marked tendency to shut the door in your face, while in the case of the dirty ones you have a strong desire to shut the door in theirs. At the same time, the practice makes James more widely known and gives him confidence. He spoke at a street-corner the other day—in order later, in the House, to be able to recall how he had stood in the wind and the rain for his country's sake, without hope of personal gain. Unfortunately, however, he took such pains in getting up figures and blue-books, and, being weak in decimals, got his percentages wrong, so that the speech wasn't ready until the polling day. Then nobody wanted to listen except a nursemaid and a little boy dragging a cube-sugar manure box on perambulator wheels, and bearing the legend, "Vote for Gooch." James had invented a joke at the end about Peckham going a-Rye if it didn't return Mr. Richardson—that sort of election humour always tells so—but the perverted little boy stared at him so stonily that he got mixed in elaborating it. Really I think that James would do better as an unopposed candidate some day—or, at any rate, somewhere where the other man could be relied upon not to turn up in time.

Mme. Maeterlinck's revelation of her husband's works at the Little Theatre was on the principle of one for him and two for herself—a good arrangement, since he is much better left obscure; while the suggestions of St. Wandrille by means of Gothic arches, a high-backed wooden chair with armorial bearings, and a chatelaine costume were wonderfully theatrical. Mme. Maeterlinck is like Sarah as regards hair and waist-line, but she does not rant so much. James said he was so much occupied in watching her sing seated with her hand over her eyes, smiling radiantly up at the top-lights or outlining her knees in satin, that he forgot all about the song, which shows how well she succeeded in her intentions.

Though the Little Theatre was crowded there comes a time after all when people want to get out. The one exit was, however, blocked by two stout enthusiasts who fitted like corks that could not be drawn. James and I took exactly fifteen minutes to cross the vestibule. I doubt whether the Little Theatre will maintain its present popularity unless it provides a less dangerous egress, for though a few people more or less don't really matter, it might easily be oneself who got burnt, crushed, or suffocated.

Sir Edward Grey, as I daresay you know, has a reputation for taciturnity in one language. But his opening of the Royal Horticultural Society's exhibition of Colonial grown fruit was an occasion nearly after his own heart. For though Sir Edward may have no special yearnings for perpetually blushing apples or Brobdingnagian pumpkins, he is fond of the earth and the fruits thereof. Strictly speaking he is at his best in the precincts of a duck-pond. His great hobby is the flight of birds, and if you are getting on really well with him he occasionally offers you a look through his telescope, which you are generally too much overwhelmed to screw down to the right focus. On the whole, no hobby could be more suitable, since the one indispensable qualification for a Foreign Minister is to take the bird's-eye view Sir Edward is at so much pains to study.

One of James' City friends—I am rather hoping he may be able to give us some tips—took us to the German Athenæum the other night to hear Mme. Kirkby Lunn sing. Although I am anxious for the tip, I cannot help saying that this club is a serious and insidious menace to the future of this country, which it is endeavouring to kill by kindness. One day we shall wake up and find ourselves Germans, and willingly. The Adams house has come completely within the German sphere of influence by means of hangings and ornaments; the cooking is so excellent as to make the Englishman long for a country of Hausfraus; even the baldheads, who ought to know better, are won over by a complete absence of draughts—I might almost say air, since Adams did not calculate for "höchstmodern" heating arrangements. Suspicion is further disarmed by the fact that everybody speaks English fluently except the English members, who merely listen. Even Mme. Kirkby Lunn conformed to the atmosphere of the club with an Athene-like headdress, and Dreadnoughts are merely decoy ducks in this scheme of peaceful assimilation.

If you want to do things really smartly you should call in an expert to go over your housekeeping expenses. He will show you exactly where you are spending too much and explain that true economy does not consist in stinting your family of the drawing-room fire. He will point out that if you allow the butler to engage the second footman on the tacit assumption that the windows are done by a window-cleaning company there will probably be difficulties, but that you must be firm. He will also tell you to ascertain that the butler does not pocket a commission from the footmen, since it is apt to produce discontent downstairs and may lead to tittle-tattle. After all, it is much better not to know that your French maid sits in the drawing-room when you are out. You will find, when you have paid the expert on a fitting scale, that the main thing is not to be imposed upon and to get everything for as little as possible.

MRS. A.'s DIARY.

Thursday.—G—— who but lately abandoned her riparian retreat for a three weeks' jaunt to Paris, returned this morning to England, home, and duty, and telephoned me to meet her and lunch at the Ladies' Army and Navy Club. I wondered on what her membership was based, and decided that she must be Admiral of the Cookham fleet; I have often watched with admiration while she skilfully directed the boats at the lock on Sundays. However, I do not look a gift lunch in the mouth, and I joined her gladly. Everything was very comfortable and well done, and we sat over the fire afterwards discussing clothes and Christmas, and exhibiting considerably more fervour for the former than the latter. G—— was charming, and full of valuable information.

"There are two essentials to sartorial success in gay Lutetia—voluminous furs and prodigious spreys." I shook my head at the latter item, being definitely opposed to the policy of wanton cruelty thereby involved.

"Yours not to reason why, yours but to see and buy," persisted my best friend; "and every woman in Paris has a mass of osprey on her hat. I am sure it is dreadful, for I never contradict you on any point, but I am equally sure it is true; sad, though, if you will."

"I won't," I muttered; "and I hate women who wear ospreys."

"Then you hate all Paris, and at this season of the year——" commenced G——.

"Skip the moral and go on with your story of clothes."

"All the furs are magnificent—the world of fashion is enwrapped in miles of fur. Every ermine has lost its tail, or at least it is no longer definitely poised upon its body, but set in little close fringes borderways. Hats which don't exhibit your pet abomination show mountains of ostrich feather, and a feather brim-lining is a noteworthy novelty. The velvet hand-bag hanging on to a silken cord is indispensable, and a new theatre wrap is made of white thick plush of a soft, dull surface, liberally fringed with chenille, and this is accompanied by a monster muff of like detail. Muffs at the theatre are popular circumstances, and the tinsel turban is much in evidence." She monologued on and I sympathetically interjected.

"We ate well and often, and discovered Volnay's as the place for tea. Altogether, you know, Parisians have only of late years realised that afternoon tea is a pleasant institution, and they have adopted it with that enthusiasm which is their will or their wont. The plaque is a general favourite, worn round the neck from a narrow watered ribbon, and the newest inexpensive varieties are either formed of tiny seed pearls or of jet. An exclusive scarf well deserving your attention I found of black chiffon lined with white, with one side trimmed with ermine and the other with broadtail. Another good scarf was of palest pink tulle dotted with crystals, and a third was of black lace lined with white chiffon, with black chiffon laid over the black lace hemmed with white. All the evening frocks of thick soft brocade are swathed in princess form, and the satin gowns show very tight net sleeves. I heard Mme. Ackte is wonderful, and if you miss Salome you will regret it always."

So shall Robert if he permits me to do so.

From harmony we fell unnaturally to politics, and I talked while G—— listened, a habit of hers which has kept my friendship for some ten years.

And then we went out to buy some afternoon editions, and she proved an appreciative audience for the bon mot; "Whatever paper you buy you are sure of getting your harm's worth." Dearest friends are invaluable assets in life. Every wise woman should collect them early and keep them late.

Florence's suggestion for a simple home dinner gown.

Friday. — Florence's daughter has just arrived at the years of indiscretion when she needs chaperonage to dances, the creation of numerous frocks, and the recreation of social festivities. Florence is like to suffer much, and so, incidentally, are her friends and relations, for gaieties are most attractive in town, and hers threaten to involve a continual demand for indoor relief. She is shy of hotels, and she will be seeking a night's shelter for three able-bodied females, with dinner, and breakfast, and a latchkey inclusive.

She came up this morning, but for this occasion scorned my "beautiful home" and accepted Joan's, where she urged me to meet her and assist at the toilet of her blue-eyed treasure, who really looked extremely nice in a soft white satin Empire under-dress, well displaying blue shoes and stockings, a blue chiffon tunic fringed and dotted with pearls and a band of pale blue velvet holding a couple of gardenias at one side of her dark hair. Her evening cloak of pale blue cloth lined with white satin with a wide collar and long ends of white fox born of a rabbit completed the effect admirably. Out of sheer amiability, combined with some pride in the success which I had helped to achieve through the letter-box, I was one of the triumphant trio in a taxi to the Empress Rooms, where, however, I was only able to stay an hour, having vowed myself to return to the service of Joan, who was committing the unusual courtesy of a supper party.

The dance was a great success. The feminine race is improving. All the young girls assumed a beauty if they had it not, the modern old-fashioned styles are so becoming. The dancing man was by no means a rare bird, there were at least a dozen to spare, of years not too tender and manners to match. I admired a fair maiden in cerise chiffon lined with mauve satin, and felt considerable respect for her youthful mother, whose dark hair was entwined with a wreath of purple grapes, while she wore a dress of purple and gold brocade with some gold galon outlining the old lace on the top of the bodice.

Florence looked quite nice in black net sprinkled with the tiniest of jet beads and a scarf to match bound with black satin and heavily fringed with jet, while her chemisette was formed of very fine white tulle, which also made sleeves fitting tightly to the elbow. She wore a Juliet cap of diamond trellis outlined with bright jet beads, and round her neck a tight band of black velvet held an old-fashioned paste clasp with a little round pendant.

In the few intervals when she was not fatuously admiring her daughter she was composing for herself a new home dinner gown which is to ally gracefully and unobtrusively mauve satin, purple ninon, silver ribbon, cream lace, and silk and silver embroidery. "It sounds like a jumble sale; but I'll hope for the best," I reassured her and departed to find Joan's supper party in full swing and Joan looking her very best in grey ninon embroidered with pink and grey pearls and silver threads and small diamonds. She had a wreath of diamond barley in her hair, very novel and definitely attractive, and like to provoke all Simple Simons to question her about her wild oats.

She talked a great deal about the situation, a practice favoured of the idle many. Only the minority is persistently active on the voyage to victory. The majority founders midway. They are sorry, very sorry, vessels, glibly reporting themselves wrecks, with such casualties as cold, rheumatism, sprained ankles, invalid mothers, and unavoidable trips abroad. Most women like attending meetings, even like speaking at them, but when it comes to the serious business of canvassing I can't trace amongst my friends many removals from armchairs in front of fires. When it rains or the east wind blows they hesitate, and the woman who hesitates is lost to the cause.

But it was a merry party, and it was two in the morning before I reached home to find the post had brought me three inducements to an unrestful Sunday.

The afternoon must see me a witness to the re-opening of Olympia skating rink—a merry occasion. In the evening I should like to hear John Masefield's play at the Stage Society, and to greet Mme. Maeterlinck at the Little Theatre, where she sings and speaks for the greater good of the Middlesex Hospital.

Sir Boyle Roche's bird—which must have been the blue bird of illusive happiness—might fill the bill. Alas! I shall have to bear the tragedy of missing something of pleasure.

Monday.—A letter from Robert enclosing me a ticket for the unveiling of the statue of Sir Henry Irving. The circumstances of its erection are truly wonderful in these days when the worship of self is accredited ubiquitous, for the actors of Great Britain all contributed to this glorification of one whom they recognised with love and reverence as their leader and their inspiration.

Under the awning in Charing Cross Road there was a great gathering of the famous and the fair in feathers and furs. Sir John Hare spoke with an exquisite tenderness, and H. B. Irving's acknowledgment was manly, grateful, and proud as became him

Mrs. A's Letter-Box.

Terra.—I hope you duly received my letter, and obtained those patterns to your complete satisfaction. If in any doubt as to the cretonne, I'll gladly advise you further if you forward me small pieces of the conflicting claimants for favour.

Jean.—I have thoroughly searched the market. An expenditure of £5 will secure the lot at Debenham and Freebody's, in Wigmore Street. They issue special illustrated sheets of all the knitted woollen garments fit for winter sports, here or abroad—Cardigans, golf coats, caps, waistcoats, gaiters, and cravats. Just write for these. About that dark fur hat—line beneath with pale pink corded silk, and trim round the base of crown with a narrow piece of white ermine, one end crossed over the other, and terminating with a fringe of tails.

Principia.—The most attractive handkerchief sachets are of fine white lawn, hand-worked à jour, and lined with silk. At Robinson and Cleaver's, 170, Regent Street, you can buy these for 12s. 6d.

CHRISTMAS CHEER WITHOUT FEAR.

Tradition, sentiment, the ineradicable greed which produces schoolboy appetites in youth, gourmets and gourmands in maturity, and invalids in age—these things have taken Christmas food into their own hands. There are people who do not like turkey and abominate Christmas pudding; but there are few who have the courage to say so. They prefer to go abroad for Christmas, to hide their heresies in foreign lands.

We look down upon Dickens because he was openly as sentimental as we are secretly. We curl our lip at his Christmas and scorn the notion of its being a season of peace and good will. The sight of a snow-covered church disgusts us because it is so like a Christmas card. We are altogether very cynical and grown-up and uncomfortable about it; but we do not discard Christmas fare. No, at all costs we stick to turkey and plum-pudding.

Sometimes this means a Boxing-day in bed; but still we cling to the menu of our fathers. Old people and children, we tolerantly say, like to follow the old customs. Like aged uncles hunting up forgotten nephews and nieces to take them to "Peter Pan," we are only thereby seeking to hide our own desire to eat the Christmas things.

It is a great trial to a child, or an old person with a rickety digestion, to sit at the Christmas table and be shut out from participation in the traditional dainties. To put a lamb chop in front of Uncle, aged seventy, when the chestnut-enriched turkey steams from adjacent plates, is to be cruel; and I have seen a small boy of nine or ten, scarlet with manfully-repressed grief over a plate of custard while everyone else was hunting for nuts and sixpences through the opulent darkness of their pudding.

For such cases as these, I have thought it may solve a problem to give recipes for Christmas fare made as dainty and as Christmassy as possible, but rendered almost innocuous by judicious blending of materials.

The soup is delicious, and quite simple. It will do good service by giving nourishment as a healthy start to the dinner.

Tortue Fausse Claire au Croûte au Pot.—Simmer for four or five hours a well-washed half of a calf's head, with water and vegetables to season, adding the carcase of an old hen, after which take the head on to a dish, remove the bones, and press the meat with a flat dish and a 4 lb. weight. Strain the stock and leave it until next day. Then remove every particle of fat, pass a pound of lean veal and the meat from the legs of the hen (reserving the breast for quenelles) through a mincing machine; mix it with the stock, half a pint of water and two eggs; stir the soup incessantly on the stove until it is boiling; add a ham bone, a bouquet of herbs, a carrot, a stick of celery, and two onions tied together, also a dozen peppercorns, two cloves, and a blade of mace. The soup should simmer for two hours; then strain it through a cloth. When heating the soup add a glass of sherry, a pinch of cayenne pepper, and just a dash of lemon juice. Serve it with the croûte au pot handed separately.

Croûte au Pot is made thus:—Cut the vegetables that were used to flavour the soup into slices, put them into a silver soufflet, lining with neatly cut pieces of the pressed head, a dozen or more tiny quenelles and sufficient of the soup to well moisten them. Then make them very hot. Cut extremely thin slices of crumb of bread from a tin loaf, dry them a golden colour in the oven, and at the last moment put them on the vegetables in the soufflet dish.

Boiled turbot sounds uninteresting; but done in the following way it is quite otherwise:—

Turbot au Gratin Sce. Gasconne.—Rub the white side of a small, fresh turbot with half a lemon to preserve its whiteness, put it into a fish kettle with a large handful of salt, and bring it slowly to the boil, when it should be cooked. On removing it from the water, put it on a dish in the oven for ten minutes, well sprinkled with browned breadcrumbs mixed with chopped parsley and salt and pepper. Pour a little warmed butter over, and serve with the following sauce in a boat:—

Sauce Gasconne.—Chop a shallot, a small gherkin, and an ounce of lean ham, and sweat them with an ounce of butter in a stewpan; add to them two tablespoonfuls of sherry and a gill and a-half of butter sauce; simmer the sauce ten minutes, then squeeze it through the tammy. Warm the sauce, adding at the last moment half a teaspoonful of anchovy butter, a squeeze of lemon juice, and a dessertspoonful of chopped parsley.

Few people cook sweetbreads really well. Consequently very clear directions are given for these; and owe much of their cosy comfort to the use of gas fires. A gas fire gives a cheerful glow a few minutes after it is lighted, it needs no attention and when it's done with, you simply turn it out—that's all.

In your bedroom, too, what comfort there is in a gas fire! You dress in comfort, you retire in comfort, you rise in comfort, and all without the least trouble to anyone.

cooked in this particular way they can be best described as "a dream":—

Ris de Veau à la Toulouse.—Soak a pair of white sweetbreads in cold water for two or three hours. Put them on the stove in fresh water, and bring them slowly to boiling-point, without actually boiling them; then immerse them in cold water and draw out the pipe-like hard part that is usually found in the heart-bread; press them between two dishes until cold, after which lard the surface with strips of fat bacon. Place the breads in a stewpan on a bed of shredded root vegetables, which should be covered with slices of fat bacon; put stock to reach halfway up the breads; cover with a buttered paper, and cook the sweetbreads for two hours in a moderate oven; remove the paper to dry the larding, then glaze them; dish the breads on two nicely fried croûtes, pour creamy-white sauce round, and serve a Toulouse ragoût in a sauce tureen apart. To make this: Cook half a pound of button mushrooms with butter and lemon juice, pepper and salt in a stewpan. To them add a dozen small scallops of truffles; about as many quenelles of chicken that are moulded with two eggspoons; mix with creamy sauce, two spoonfuls of sherry, and the yolks of two eggs. The sauce must not boil after the yolks of eggs are worked in.

With the turkey we come to the national, traditional part of the menu. The stuffing is much more digestible when made without suet, and by handing the garnish separately the dish is made as rich as anyone can desire for those who are able to take the chestnut.

Dinde à la Maréchale—Stuff the breast part of a plump turkey with the following farce: Boil a finely-minced onion in half a pint of milk for twenty minutes, stir in about 4 ozs. of fresh bread-crumbs, add more milk if necessary, mix in 2 ozs. of butter, the yolks of three eggs, salt and pepper, and a tablespoonful of chopped parsley. Tie a greased paper over the breast and roast the bird in a "Household Roaster." Serve with bread sauce and gravy, and hand the following garnish in a white china casserole. Blanch and remove the skins from about twenty-five large chestnuts, cook them slowly with stock in a covered stew pan for half an hour, then remove the lid, add an ounce of butter, a sprinkling of sugar, and a squeeze of lemon-juice, boil until the liquor is reduced to glaze, add a dozen sausages, twisted into ball shapes and cooked separately, add sufficient brown sauce to moisten, with half a glass of red wine; season with a pinch of Nepaul pepper.

With the beef, which is plainly cooked, goes the following sauce:—

Sauce Raifort.—Scrape, and then grate, a large, white stick of horseradish, mix it with a tablespoonful of French vinegar, a saltspoonful of made mustard, salt and pepper to taste, and about three-parts of a gill of whipped cream.

The pheasants, plainly roasted, are served with a delicious winter salad:—

Salade à la Roi.—Blanch a large handful of parsley with a few sprigs of chervil, tarragon and chives; immerse them in cold water, dry them in a cloth, and pound them with two boned anchovies, the yolks of two hard-boiled eggs, and a spoonful of capers; add the yolks of two fresh eggs and a gill of salad oil gradually, interspersing two tablespoonfuls of tarragon, chili and French vinegars. Rub the sauce through a hair sieve and mix with it celery, beetroot, and cucumber cut in dice, and a little endive. Arrange the salad, dome-shaped, in a salad bowl. Make a border of curled endive and celery, and garnish the surface with passed hard-boiled yolk of egg.

On the pudding rests the glory of the dinner, and it is precisely with the pudding that convalescents must fall out. Here, however, is a recipe for a really light pudding, which will be found quite Christmassy, and can have as many rings and thimbles in it, and as much burning brandy round it, as the richest pudding that ever gave a poor reveller nightmare.

Plum Pudding.—Beat 8 ozs. of butter and 8 ozs. of sugar to a creamy batter; beat in four eggs, each one separately; mix in lightly 8 ozs. of breadcrumbs, 8 ozs. of stoned raisins, 8 ozs. of sultanas, 4 ozs. mixed, chopped candied peel, the grated peel of a lemon, a wineglass of brandy, half a grated nutmeg, and 2 ozs. of ground almonds. Put the ingredients into a buttered mould which has a close-fitting cover, and steam it incessantly for six hours. Serve with brandy sauce apart. To make this: Sift 3 ozs. of icing sugar with 3 ozs. of finely-pounded sugar; beat it until quite white with 4 ozs. of butter, adding a glass of old brandy at intervals; stand the sauce in a cold place to harden before using.

Mince-pie is a deadly thing as a rule. The fruit-mixture might pass, but hot pastry round it puts it out of court for all but the hardiest. Served with rice it is almost a nursery dish for harmlessness!

Mince Pie au Riz.—Boil a pint of milk with a piece of vanilla pod, and then shower in 4 ozs. of the best Carolina rice; cover closely, and cook the rice in a moderate oven for nearly two hours, when it should have absorbed all the milk. Remove the vanilla, stir in the yolks of two eggs, 2 ozs. of butter, and 2 ozs. of white sugar. Butter a French tart-tin, line it with the rice, fill the centre with the mincemeat, cover with the rice; then, with a palette knife dipped in beaten egg, smooth the top of the pie, dust it very lightly with sugar, and trace a simple pattern on the surface. Bake the pie very carefully.

An excellent and digestible mincemeat is made as follows: Pass 2 lbs. of stoned raisins through the mincing-machine, after which pass 2 lbs. of currants, 2 lbs. of sultanas, 2 lbs. of mixed candied peel, and 4 lbs. of apples. Now pass the whole of the ingredients again, mixing the apples with the fruit. This will effectually mix them without any lumps. Add 2 lbs. very finely-shred suet, an ounce of mixed ground spice, 2 lbs. of Demarara sugar, the grated peel and the strained juice of two lemons, a grated nutmeg, a tumbler of brandy, and one of sherry.

Finally, I append the recipe for the savoury, and perhaps these recipes for really wholesome fare may solve some of the problems, and avoid those dietary distinctions which sometimes cause such annoyance and disappointment.

Tartines de Jambon.—Pound 2 ozs. of lean cooked ham with a little of the fat and nearly an ounce of butter, season with a pinch of cayenne pepper and rub it through a wire sieve, cut thin slices of brown bread and butter, spread them with the purée of ham, and on them place strips of gerkin and chicken, alternately, first a strip of chicken then one of gerkin, cut them out with a cutlet-shaped cutter and dish them with a bunch of watercress to garnish.

prices to buy their Christmas presents. The Association is really doing a great deal to revive the spirit of craftsmanship in England. Queen Alexandra is the President.

I wish everybody who has not trained for the Civil Service could be compelled by law to use a typewriter. I am not a caligraphist, and however individual a handwriting may be, if it is illegible my interest in the writer's character is less than the detrimental effect on my own. To trail from Hampstead to Norwood on a wet Thursday, only to find everyone out, because you were really invited (if you could only have read aright) for Tuesday, which was bright and sunny, is enough to wreck the patience of Agnes Wickfield, and we are not all so much improved by a good fit of bad temper as she would have been. Nobody need consider the typewriter any longer in the light of a small, dirty printing press. It has been produced tiny, light, minus the ink-laden ribbon, capable of writing all languages (all known to the operator, that is), and I have even heard of a make so accommodating that it uses print for commercial and script for private correspondence! I do trust that many of these will be given for Christmas presents. A husband would, perhaps, need tact in presenting his wife with one, but not so much as in concealing from her that while away from home he has not gathered from her letters whether it was Willie or Winnie who has had a feverish cold, or if it was the doctor or the plumber she had to send for to see to some defect which was either in the bath-room or in Herbert.

I have received a request for early information as to where to obtain the weighted frying-pan suggested a week or two ago, when it shall be placed on the market. From various remarks I gather that it is a long-felt want; the amazing thing is that it has not been done long ago. Surely it is as simple as the theory that if one person sits on a see-saw another must sit on the other end before it can be balanced? We talk of our enlightenment, and perhaps our libraries are full of wisdom, but the discomforts of past generations hem us round in the domestic parts of the house. We want women of ideas in the kitchen, not the average servant. Then we should get sensible utensils. No one has ever, I believe, produced a broom with a couple of brush horns at one end, at right angles to the rest, for corners. At present one can easily brush dust into corners, but with great difficulty get it out. Will any "hardware" firm offer me a large salary for the use of my complaints as to the inefficiency of household utensils?

The uses of ammonia in a household are only just being realised. There is practically nothing which this invaluable cleanser does not touch with advantage—sometimes diluted, of course; sometimes in conjunction with something else—and of all forms "Scrubb's" is much the best. It is among the greatest labour-savers we have, but a good many servants need some persuading before they will use it. A certain amount of care must be taken with it, because its fumes are very powerful, but one of its charms is that very little need be used, and consequently it is not expensive. Briefly, ammonia is good for floors, painted walls, carpets, the toilet, furniture, washing-up, metals, marbles, china, and a host of other purposes of which I cannot think at the moment. It diminishes by at least half the time necessary to cleanse things.

BENGER'S

The particular and important feature of Benger's Food is that it can be prepared to suit any degree of digestive power. It contains in itself the natural digestive principles which act during the cooling process just before it is finally heated for serving. As the weak stomach of babe or invalid begins to strengthen by the assimilation of the Food, a gradually increasing amount of digestive work can be left to it, thus giving the advantage of a regulated exercise of the digestive functions

"TRUTH" DOLL AND TOY SHOW.

Readers of TRUTH will find the claims of the annual Toy Fund brought before them in another part of this issue. But for the benefit of any of my competitors who might otherwise miss the Editor's notice I desire here to call their particular attention to it.

The Show, which promises to be one of the most successful we have ever held, will take place at the Albert Hall on Wednesday and Thursday in next week, December 14 and 15, and it will be open free of charge. I trust, therefore, that every reader of TRUTH, who happens to be in or within range of London, will make a point of paying it a visit.

I may add that there is still a formidable deficit on the Fund, and I hope that when this is known all readers will promptly send their remittances to the Editor.

"TRUTH" PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best EPIGRAM, CONUNDRUM, LIPOGRAM, BOUTS-RIMÉS, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this Journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the TRUTH Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a quarter to the same competitor.

7. ALL NEW CONTRIBUTORS ARE REQUIRED TO FORWARD WITH THEIR FIRST ANSWERS THEIR REAL NAMES AND ADDRESSES FOR REGISTRATION; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed twelve, and must under no circumstances consist of more than fourteen, letters.

9. COMPETITORS MUST ON NO ACCOUNT CHANGE THE NOMS-DE-PLUME THEY HAVE ONCE ASSUMED.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed:—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," CARTERET STREET, QUEEN ANNE'S GATE, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, No. 1660.

The usual prize of Two Guineas is offered this week to that competitor who shall prove most successful in CONVEYING, IN FOUR LINES OF RHYMED VERSE, A SUITABLE CHRISTMAS GREETING TO MR. ASQUITH AND MR. BALFOUR RESPECTIVELY.

In case of any possible misapprehension, I would explain that four lines of verse are to be allotted to each of the two statesmen aforesaid.

Of course, it is open to competitors to chaff either or both of these gentlemen as much as they please, always providing that the canons of good taste are not transgressed and no offensive personalities are indulged in.

It only remains to add that no competitor may submit more than two greetings—one for the Premier and one for the leader of the Opposition; and all greetings must reach TRUTH Office not later than by the first post on Monday, December 19.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

EINNIM.—I will make inquiries about your solution, which appears to have reached the office too late. However, as it turns out, this is immaterial, as your list does not correspond in order of merit with the "ideal" list arrived at by plebiscite.

MUSICAL READER.—I fear I cannot alter the conditions of a competition already announced. But I will bear what you say in mind, if we should have another of the same character.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,657.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

RHYMED CENTOS OF FOURTEEN LINES, TAKEN FROM "TRUTH" CHRISTMAS NUMBER FOR 1910.

Oh! give me now a Homer's pen (page 2, column 1)
As big as any average ten (page 15, column 2).
Let others, as they will, explain (page 45, column 1)
Our island's in a parlous state (page 18, column 2)
Though backed by all the heavy weight (page 12, column 2)
Of what goes on in spirit-land (page 27, column 1);
Unless, with firm, controlling hand (page 19, column 2),
Ap Lloyd, with colleagues four in tow (page 47, column 1),
The spokesman of those Gammons' show (page 41, column 1),
Be schooled to prove my judgment true (page 36, column 2),
That we with ships should page the blue (page 13, column 2).
No thinking man but will agree (column 30, page 2)
To multiply our fleet by three (page 12, column 2). —Yola.

GOING TO THE DOGS; OR, THE SICK ISLAND.

Things with our island are not well (page 18, column 1).
Indeed, for those who've goods to sell (page 7, column 1),
We cannot but consider these (page 17, column 1)
Our fast-decaying industries (page 16, column 1).
In point of fact, as aye, we find (page 2, column 1)
Low wages and dear food combined (page 9, column 1).
The march, too, seems to near its end (page [illegible] column 1):
That those weakness we must mend (page 14, column 1).

Our Navy to the bow-wows goes (page 18, column 2)—
The real cause of all our woes (page 45, column 1).
Then there's our Army—things go wrong (page 26, column 1);
You think I put it, p'raps, too strong (page 12, column 2).
Our island's in a parlous state (page 18, column 2),
This nation once so strong and great (page 18, column 1). —Malignant.

THE CRANE'S CONFERENCE.

As big as any average ten (page 15, column 2).
To cure the land's distress (page 3, column 1).
You doubt? Then list this lyric lay (page 15, column 2),
The brains of those who've passed away (page 26, column 2)
To victory and success (page 13, column 2).
The remedy I shall declare (page 6, column 1),
With bland and quite immobile air (page 16, column 2);
To line our island shore! (page 14, column 2).
The Monarch wagged his Royal head (page 5, column 2);
The Thespi-Cranks turned tail and fled (page 39, column 2)
Henceforth for evermore (page 25, column 1)!
Then here's to all—Good luck in store (page 48, column 2)!
I need not now detain you more (page 47, column 2). —Alma.

Next came brave Candibobs along (page 13, column 2, line 33)
Materialising into song (page 27, column 2, line 20),
"'Tis on our Army we depend (page 14, column 1, line 16),
How few its service now attend (page 19, column 1, line 2),

Sire," he went on, "'tis sad, but true (page 36, column 1, line 25):
My friend here has expressed his view (page 13, column 2, line 63),
'The cloud of a Teuteonic scare (page 18, column 1, line 55)
Falls to the lot of labourers there'" (page 8, column 2, line 26).
"The real cause of all our woes (page 45, column 1, line 21).
Our Navy to the bow-wows goes (page 18, column 2, line 37):
My Irish friends will make a breeze" (page 26, column 1, line 15),
"Excuse my interrupting, please" (page 17, column 1, line 18),
The King replied, with genial smile (page 20, column 2, line 13),
Opined he'd rather wait awhile (page 33, column 2, line 4). —Whig.

THE PRESS.

'Tis clear, from what the papers tell (page 18, column 1, line 50),
They cater for your mind as well (page 45, column 1, line 2),
They worry us the live-long day (page 15, column 2, line 4),
The same propensities display (page 12, column 1, line 19).
The champions of the "fair" or "free" (page 4, column 1, line 50)
Appeal in earnest tones to thee (page 12, column 2, line 31).
How, when befals connubial strife (page 17, column 1, line 14)
Which poisons all the springs of life (page 18, column 1, line 61),
They urge that intellect and wit (page 1, column 2, line 31),
Experientia docuit (page 17, column 1, line 41).
Reader, your homes may Christmas bless (page 48, column 1, line 5)
With bland and genial smile (page 39, column 2, line 4).

Aye, don't yourselves, my friends, distress (page 13, column 2, line 4).
A truce throughout the isle (page 3, column 1, line 10).

—Votes.

O give me now a Homer's pen (page 2, column 1, line 32)
As big as any average ten (page 15, column 2, line 106).
To move and stir the godless crowd (page 20, column 1, line 48)
(To conjugal selection vowed) (page 30, column 1, line 28)
The marriage system to reform (page 29, column 1, line 4).
A job right snug and warm (page 6, column 2, line 28).
Yes, sire, 'tis neither safe nor meet (page 14, column 1, line 11)
Sad history should itself repeat (page 9, column 2, line 22).
When woman means to have her say (page 17, column 1, line 32)
They worry us the livelong day (page 15, column 2, line 73).
'Tis plain as a pikestaff for all to see (page 39, column 1, line 2)
This state of things ought not to be (page 30, column 2, line 108).
Hip, Hip, Hurrah! and one cheer more (page 48, column 2, line 9),
I need not now detain you more (page 47, column 2, line 21).

—Louma.

At once, with all despatch and speed (page 34, column 2, line 41),
The Government, we'll say, finds need (page 32, column 1, line 22)
To strike some startling stroke (page 13, column 1, line 37);
No thinking man but will agree (page 30, column 2, line 67)
It's simple as a thing can be (page 7, column 1, line 36)
To H.H.A. or A.J.B. (page 25, column 2, line 40),
They each must speak or choke (page 16, column 2, line 13).

Let others, as they will, explain (page 45, column 1, line 17)
That several thousands still remain (page 46, column 1, line 11)
To fight the battle o'er again (page 2, column 1, line 53)
In dictatorial way (page 4, column 1, line 11).
In anxious dread their eyes they strain (page 12, column 1, line 35),
Designed existence to sustain (page 44, column 1, line 7),
To say their little say (page 46, column 1, line 3).

—Redder.

THE COMING ELEATION AND CHRISTMAS.

When great Asquilles seized his shield (page 2, column 1, line 36),
Had forced the stubborn foe to yield (page 13, column 2, line 41);
Each party at the other's throat (page 2, column 2, line 24)
Holds, like a knife, the Irish vote (page 26, column 1, line 5),
With haughtily contemptuous pride (page 17, column 1, line 23)
Or Artibai, and more beside (page 2, column 1, line 43)—
Poor mites! Their doom they little know (page 30, column 2, line 37)
When fierce Ap Lloyd strode to and fro (page 2, column 1, line 39),
When seemed his country's case most dire (page 13, column 2, line 43);
Then all the fat was in the fire (page 2, column 1, line 27)!
Reader! your homes may Christmas bless (page 48, column 1, line 4)
(Aye, don't yourselves, my friends, distress) (page 13, column 2, line 4),
And make your land a heaven on earth (page 20, column 2, line 6).
A land of sunshine, wealth, and mirth (page 7, column 1, line 20).

—Hama.

A PARADOX.

'Tis paradox sheds the true light,
Give me a Homer's pen to write (page 1, line 15)
Convincing proof of what I mean.
A friend who round the world has been,
Who has her home in Carteret Street,
All obsessed with the instinct sweet
(You'll take my point—Has a hand quite free,
'Tis plain as a pikestaff for all to see),
To stop our bringing in a Bill
To fight the battle o'er again.
For those who get Form Four to fill,
In anxious dread their eyes they strain.
Methinks, as patriots, you should blend,
Resolved the State's disease to mend.

—Owen.

THE KING AND THE SUFFRAGETTES.

The monarch spake, and from their ranks (page 4, column 1)
The Suffragettes—men call them "cranks" (page 16)—
A deputation forward strode (page 25),
And so, the King's consent bestowed (page 15, column 1),
The opening verse, with verve and go (page 37),
One on the Lords the blame would throw (page 18, column 2).
"'Tis clear, my friends, from what you say (page 5, column 2)
To puny statesmen of to-day (page 25, column 1),
To H.H.A. and A.J.B. (page 25, column 2),
This state of things ought not to be" (page 30).
The monarch scarce a smile repressed (page 27, column 2),
"If you would see this island blest (page 20),
We couldn't have it, sire, not we" (page 25, column 2);
He thought he'd better "wait and see" (page 20, column 2).

—Nin-Nin.

A DANIEL COME TO JUDGMENT.

The monarch wagged his Royal head (page 5, column 2),
Then to himself reflective said (page 3, column 1),
Can Daniel none be got? (page 3, column 1).
Then here upon the scene there broke (page 7, column 2),
He's really Arthur B! (page 42, column 1),
And thus in eager accents spoke (page 7, column 2),
"Not Asquith, Lloyd George, and the rest (page 11, column 2),
With meddling Tommy Rot (page 15, column 2).
If you would see this island blest (page 20, column 1),
Hip, hip, hurrah, and one cheer more (page 48, column 2)
For the man at top of the tree, that's me (page 37, column 1),
On a bright December day (page 21, column 2).
Then here's good luck for all in store (page 48, column 2),
It's plain as a pikestaff for all to see" (page 38, column 1).

—Olive.

With no regard to health (page 15, column 2),
The nuptial standard now is wealth (page 31, column 1).
You doubt it? Then list this lyric lay (page 30, column 2).
Wrong, wholly wrong, and quite astray (page 15, column 2),
Belinda is a beaming girl (page 40, column 2),
She cannot love beneath an Earl (page 31, (column 1),
Her form no better than her face (page 40, column 1),
My lord explained the case (page 48, column 2),
Her chronic indigestion's fled (page 40, column 2).
Aye! There's the fact when all is said (page 39, column 2),
His choice of her, or her's of him (page 30, column 2),
Unless he's sound in wind and limb (page 31, column 1)
This love will merely regulate (page 31, column 1),
And his true love reciprocate (page 32, column 1).

—Spin.

JUSTIFIABLE ROYAL REFLECTIONS.

The monarch wagged his Royal head (page 5, column 2),
Then to himself reflective said (page 3, column 1),
Can Daniel none be got? (page 3, column 1).
Not Asquith, Lloyd George, and the rest! (page 11, column 2).
If you would see this island blest (page 20, column 1);
A motley band in sooth were these! (page 29, column 1).
With meddling tommy rot (page 15, column 2).
(Excuse my racy journalese) (page 3, column 2).
Ap Lloyd! An undercrustian he! (page 2, column 1).
'Tis plain as a pikestaff for all to see (page 38, column 1),
Let him by all means, cried the King (page 7, column 1),
Go straight to pot (page 12, column 2).
And I wish from my heart the whole d—d thing (page 6, column 2)
To —— let us say downstairs! (page 15, column 1).

Tim.

For ever since he first began (page 13, column 2)
To benefit his brother man (page 3, column 1),
Your poet, too, would like to sing (page 2, column 1).
When once hereto your mind you bring (page 14, column 3)
To listen to his voice awhile (page 3, column 1),
On the afflictions of our isle (page 6, column 1).
We cannot but consider these (page 17, column 1).
With pity and with grief he sees (page 6, column 1)
That we rely upon our fleet (page 14, column 1).
Our workless labourers tramp the street (page 18, column 1),
Our programme shrinks, the German's grows (page 18, column 2),
Though how he did it, goodness knows (page 16, column 2).
What happens in these cases three? (page 30, column 2).
Reveal the only remedy (page 25, column 1).

THE OPERATIONS OF THE COMPANY EMBRACE ALL BRANCHES OF INSURANCE.

DEATH DUTIES.—Special forms of Policies have been prepared by the Company providing for the payment of Death Duties, thus avoiding the necessity of disturbing investments at a time when it may be difficult to realise without loss.

INCOME TAX.—Under the provisions of the Act, Income Tax is not payable on that portion of the Assured's income which is devoted to the payment of annual premiums on an assurance on his life or on the life of his wife. Having regard to the amount of the Tax, this abatement (which is limited to one-sixth of the Assured's income) is an important advantage to Life Policyholders.

Full particulars of all classes of Insurance, together with Proposal Forms and Statement of Accounts, may be had on application to any of the Company's Offices or Agents.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE first thing I have to do this week is to invite every reader who is within reach of London to pay a visit to the Doll and Toy Show at the Royal Albert Hall either to-day (Wednesday) or to-morrow. This invitation includes every reader's family, friends, and acquaintance, and I hope that those who cannot come themselves will make a point of sending a strong force of representatives.

The show will be open each day from 10.30 a.m. to 9.0 p.m., and the only formality required at the door is the presentation of a visiting card. The collection of dolls, toys, etc., will be fully equal to any of its predecessors. There will also be three musical performances each day—an organ recital in the morning, an orchestral concert in the afternoon, and a miscellaneous concert each evening, besides selections on the Radiophone at frequent intervals. You may therefore come half a dozen times if you like with the certainty of finding fresh entertainment, or you may come immediately after breakfast each day and remain till suppertime. Whatever time you select you will be heartily welcome, and the more people you bring with you the better we shall be pleased.

There is only one condition attached to this invitation. It is that every visitor will kindly deposit a contribution to the Toy Fund in one of the money-boxes which will be found within easy reach in all parts of the hall. In response to many requests and suggestions, we are this year reverting to the old arrangement of opening the Toy Show free to all comers. This means sacrificing something like £100 in "gate-money" in exchange for an unknown quantity of coins voluntarily dropped into collecting boxes. It is a somewhat risky experiment, but I have the best hope that the generosity of visitors to the Albert Hall will fully justify it.

As innumerable readers of Truth will be beyond reach of the Albert Hall and the collecting boxes, I would again remind them that a great deal of money has still to be raised before all the contents of the Toy Show will be paid for. When I say "a great deal of money" I am considering the bill from my own point of view. In relation to the tens of thousands of people who read Truth every week the whole sum expended is insignificant, and if every one who reads these lines would at once put his hand in his pocket and send me the biggest coin he finds there, there would be no occasion to beg any more. In the meantime I am very grateful for the following contributions received during the past week:—

I have also received the following gifts in kind:—A Teddy Bear, from Mrs. W. H. Smith; twelve scrapbooks, from Miss Connell; parcel of scrapbooks, Miss M. J. Thomas; twelve dressed dolls, Mrs. Neild; six dressed dolls, Mrs. Carson; eight scrapbooks, Miss N. K. Brocklehurst; two scrapbooks, Miss Hurst; twelve scrapbooks, Lucy, Violet, and Harold; box of dressed dolls, etc., Two Little Girls.

I am very pleased to inform the ladies who have dressed the splendid collection of dolls exhibited this year that the Goldsmiths and Silversmiths' Company, Limited, of 112, Regent Street, have again presented a lady's gold watch, which will be awarded as the first prize for doll-dressing. The Goldsmiths and Silversmiths' Company have made this gift annually almost ever since their firm has been in existence, and it has been of the greatest value to the Toy Show. The whole of the prizes for doll-dressing, toy-making, etc., which also come from 112, Regent Street, will be exhibited at the Albert Hall, and will, I am sure, awaken the admiration of all beholders.

---

Once more I have also to thank Messrs. J. S. Fry and Sons, Limited, of Bristol, for a large present of chocolate in all shapes and sizes which they send for distribution with the dolls and toys. I expect that these sweetmeats and Mr. Tom Smith's crackers are as much appreciated by the children as any other presents they get, even if they do not last so long, and the donors cannot be thanked too heartily.

A new feature which was introduced at last year's Toy Show will be repeated this year. Small parties of children from a few of the larger Poor Law schools will come up to the Albert Hall this morning to see the whole collection of toys for themselves. I was assured last year that this was regarded as a superlative treat, and I know that many other visitors to the Show were greatly interested to see the children for whose benefit these good things are provided. My only regret is that, as the children have to be fed before they go back, the accommodation available for that purpose at the Albert Hall greatly restricts the size of the party.

I see it stated that "no Court will be held until the King and Queen go out of mourning on May 7." As a matter of fact, the King and Queen will hold a diplomatic and official Court at Buckingham Palace towards the end of February or early in March. It is probable that the recently introduced regulations for the ordinary Court will be considerably altered, as they have not worked well during the last few years. On the other hand, the new rules for the Levees have proved most successful. The King's first Levee will be held at St. James's Palace about the middle of February, shortly after the meeting of Parliament.

---

A morning paper announced on Friday that the King and Queen are to pay a State visit to Brussels "after the coronation," and they will be accompanied by the Prince of Wales, to which it is added that "King Albert will be present at King George's coronation." This is all a farrago of badly concocted fictions. There is no idea of the King and Queen paying a visit either to Brussels or to any other European capital next year. A foreign sovereign never attends a coronation, and King Albert certainly will not be in London next June.

---

The King and Queen, who are now on a visit to Lord and Lady Mount Stephen at Brocket Hall, will return to Buckingham Palace to-morrow afternoon or on Friday morning, and about the middle of next week they will go back to Sandringham for Christmas. There are to be several days of pheasant and wild fowl shooting in the Royal preserves during the holidays, and these will be the last battues for this winter at Sandringham. The Court will remove to Windsor Castle early in the first week of January for a stay of between three and four weeks, after which their Majesties will settle at Buckingham Palace for the season.

---

The Emperor William had his annual boar hunts last week in the Royal beech forest of Springe, in Hanover, and the Archduke Francis Ferdinand and the Archduke Frederick were his guests. The Emperor more than once invited King Edward to join in this historic hunt, but he was never able to go over to Germany at the time fixed. It is quite likely, moreover, that King Edward remembered the susceptibilities of his brother-in-law, the Duke of Cumberland, who would have been anything but pleased if a member of the Royal Family of England had joined in a hunt in one of the principal Hanoverian Royal forests.

---

The King of Denmark has been staying for a week at Vienna on private business in strict incognito, and he has paid a visit to the Duke and Duchess of Cumberland at their country seat near Gmunden. King Frederick may very likely visit Frankfort and Paris on his way back to Copenhagen. His Majesty travels as Count Kromberg, and he is attended by one equerry only.

---

Prince Waldemar of Denmark, youngest brother of Queen Alexandra, is coming to England shortly on a visit to her Majesty at Sandringham Hall, and he will probably be accompanied by his daughter, Princess Margrethe. Prince Waldemar's children will inherit largely from their grandfather, the Duc de Chartres.

Prince and Princess Nicholas of Greece have been the guests of the Duke and Duchess of Portland at Welbeck Abbey since the conclusion of their visit to Lord and Lady Savile at Rufford Abbey.

Prince and Princess Louis of Battenberg have decided to pass the winter in England, and they will reside at Chesham, where they have taken a small place for a term. Prince and Princess Andrew of Greece will be their guests for several weeks during the winter. Prince Louis is to vacate the command of the Atlantic Fleet next Tuesday, when he will haul down his flag at Portsmouth. There is no truth in the report that he is to be appointed Commander-in-Chief at Devonport when that post is vacated.

Prince Alexander of Battenberg has left London for Madrid on a visit to the King and Queen of Spain, whom he will accompany to Seville when the Court removes thither next month.

Prince Arthur of Connaught is staying this week at Blankney Hall, on a visit to Lord and Lady Londesborough. King Edward was several times a guest at Blankney, and King George has stayed there more than once. The estate now affords some of the best shooting in Lincolnshire.

Blankney Hall is a large, well-arranged house, but of no architectural interest. There are good gardens, and the grounds are extensive, the long avenue from the Navenby Lodge being a feature. The Blankney estate, which is a large one, passed about twenty years ago from Mr. Henry Chaplin to the late Lord Londesborough, who held heavy mortgages on the property. He had sold his Grimston Park estate, near Tadcaster, in 1872 to Mr. John Fielden for £240,000, and this money was afterwards lent out on mortgages, but the investments did not turn out a success.

Certain weekly journals are desperately anxious to send Queen Amélie and King Manuel to Cannes. It is announced by one paper that they will occupy the Villa St. Jean, which belongs to the Comtesse de Paris; while another states that the Duchess of Albany has lent them the Villa Nevada. As a matter of fact, the Villa St. Jean is let for the season, and the Duchess of Albany is going herself to Cannes in February, when she will occupy the Villa Nevada for several weeks. Queen Amélie and King Manuel are going to Naples when they leave England, but it is quite possible that they may decide to stay in this country for the winter.

My Dublin correspondent writes:—

Our capital is justifiably proud of the way in which the elections within its boundaries passed off. The forecast of peace and serenity was not only fully verified, but the contest between Lord Herbert and Mr. Brady in the St. Stephen's Green division gave an object lesson in the correct way of doing it as regards contested elections. There was no "language" and no blustering, the latter being absolutely left in the very capable hands of the weather. We feel worthy of getting a high place as a shining example in the Primer—the obvious need for which will no doubt soon cause its production at an early date—on "Manners and Good Taste in the Conduct of General Elections" that will give light and leading on future occasions and the opportunity, at least to those who have had no other, of "going by the book." Lord and Lady Herbert came as strangers to Dublin, though the Pembroke annual rental in the city and suburbs goes near to thirty thousand pounds, nevertheless they were received with more than politeness. Lady Herbert was a very active canvasser, and made speeches on platforms and in the open air which excited much interest. The climax of mutual politeness and amiability came at the end of the contest, when, as it were, the curtain went down in the old-fashioned way on a scene of general benediction. "There now for ye!" as we say over here.

It was unfortunate for Lord Iveagh that Lady Iveagh should have been ill at the time of the King's visit to Elveden. Lady Iveagh has not enjoyed robust health for several years, but has nevertheless been a leading hostess in society, where great wealth makes entertaining easy. Lord Iveagh makes a specialty of regal entertaining, and it is a special art in itself. Even the resources of Elveden were overtaxed in putting up the guests and their retinues on the occasions of King Edward's visits, when the neighbourhood had sometimes to be requisitioned for the "overflow." To entertain Royalty right royally, which is done at Elveden, needs generous disbursement from a very full purse.

There were many house parties throughout the week in Ireland—and very much "house" too, owing to weather sufficient to daunt the most enthusiastic disciple of the open-air cult. Lord and Lady Kilmorey have been entertaining at Mourne Park, in Down, where Lord Newry is also staying. In the south, Lord and Lady Bandon's stooting party at Castle Bernard included Lord Rosse, Lord and Lady Castlemaine, Sir Charles and Lady Barrington, and Mr. Percy La Touche. Lord and Lady Massareene are residing at Antrim Castle, an imposing residence on the shores of Lough Neagh, where they will have a Christmas party. Sir John and Lady Arnott are spending the winter at Doneraile Court, which they have again rented from Lord Castletown for the hunting season. Lady Arnott takes a leading part in Ireland in promoting the Suffragist cause.

Marriages of interest last week were those of Miss Toè Massy, the daughter of Lord and Lady Clarina, in Limerick, and of Miss Nutting, the daughter of Sir John and Lady Nutting, at St. Helen's, Blackrock, near Dublin. Sir John Nutting is, like the first Sir John Arnott, one of those who crossed from their side of the water to make a fortune in Ireland, and had great success in making it. He now lives at St. Helen's, the former residence of the Gough family, which he purchased from the present Lord Gough. Whilst the political genius of Irishmen leads them to throw more energy into political than into industrial life, it not infrequently happens that Britons and even foreigners find scope for their commercial genius and amass considerable fortunes in Ireland. Harland and Wolff, who founded the great shipbuilding business in Belfast, of which Lord Pirrie is now the head, are a case in point.

The King has approved of the appointment of Colonel Granet, late R.A., to be Military Attaché to the Embassy at Rome, in the place of Colonel Delmé-Radcliffe, whose term of employment expires at the end of February. Colonel Granet has lately vacated the appointment of Assistant Inspector of Remounts at the War Office. The Military Attaché at Rome is also accredited to the Legation at Berne.

Captain Cloman, who has been for some years Military Attaché to the United States Embassy, will vacate his post during the first week in January, when he is to leave London for Washington. He is to be succeeded by Captain Slocum.

Mrs. Ellice, of Invergarry, whose death has just occurred at the advanced age of ninety-three, was the widow of Mr. Edward Ellice, who was the Liberal member for St. Andrews Burghs for over forty years. He was the son of the well-known "Bear" Ellice, who was long a prominent member of the House of Commons and a very active and clever Whig wirepuller. He had much to do with the arrangement of the details of the Reform Bill of 1832, in conjunction with his brother-in-law, Lord Durham, both being sons-in-law of Lord Grey, the Minister. Mrs. Ellice was a daughter of Mr. T. C. Hagart, of Bantaskine, and her first husband was Mr. Speirs, of Elderslie, M.P., Lord-Lieutenant of Renfrewshire. He died in 1844, and in 1867 she married Mr. Ellice, who was himself a widower. Invergarry was for many years one of the great entertaining houses of Scotland, and every autumn it was filled for three months with a succession of notable and interesting people. It was Mr. Ellice's fancy to keep every clock in the house three-quarters of an hour fast, so that dinner, nominally at eight, was really served at a quarter-past seven.

When the "country" of the Macdonells of the Glen, in Inverness-shire, was sold in 1845 for £120,000, the Glenquoich portion was purchased by Mr. Edward Ellice, and Glengarry by the late Lord Dudley, then Lord Ward. A few years later Mr. Ellice also bought Glengarry. The estate includes the celebrated deer forest of Glenquoich, of over 50,000 acres, extending from the top of Glengarry to the sea at Loch Hourn, which was let for thirty-five years to the late Lord Burton, who twice entertained King Edward at Loch Quoich Lodge. The famous Garry salmon fishings (rented for many years past by the Duke of Portland) are on this property.

The late Mr. Ellice built Invergarry House in 1869. It is beautifully situated above Loch Oich, surrounded by fine trees, and with lawns and terrace gardens shelving down to the edge of the water. About 35,000 acres of deer forest and grouse moors belong to Invergarry, and Mrs. Ellice had a life-rent of the whole property, which now passes to her husband's nephew, Captain E. C. Ellice. Colonel Macdonell, of Glengarry, who died in 1828, was supposed to have been the original of Fergus MacIvor in "Waverley."

Mr. R. P. Phipps, of Buckenhill House, Herefordshire, who died suddenly last Wednesday while on a railway journey, belonged to an old Northampton family. He had for many years taken an active part in the public and social life of Herefordshire, and he was well known as an agriculturist. The estate of Buckenhill belonged to John Flackett, M.P. for Herefordshire, who was a zealous supporter of Cromwell, and at the Restoration he sold the property to John Tomkyns, in whose family it remained until 1810. The estate has since changed hands three times, and it was purchased by Mr. Phipps about 1880.

Lady Emily Kingscote, who died on Friday, was a daughter of the first Earl Howe, a sister of the late Duchess of Beaufort and of the late Lady Westmorland, and a half-sister of the Duchess of Abercorn. Her father held the office of Chamberlain to Queen Adelaide, and he was a prominent personage at the Court of William IV. Lady Emily was married in 1856 to the late Sir Nigel Kingscote, who sat in the House of Commons as Liberal member for West Gloucestershire from 1852 until 1885. She was a Lady of the Bedchamber of Queen Alexandra (then Princess of Wales) from 1872 until 1901, when she became a Woman of the Bedchamber, a post which she resigned when her husband died in 1908. Lady Emily was a great favourite at Court, and she was exceedingly popular in society. She had good temper and fine tact. The Kingscotes are one of the oldest families in England, having been settled at Kingscote, in Gloucestershire, since the reign of Henry II., when Nigel de Kingscote married the daughter and heiress of Robert Fitzhardinge.

The Duke of Richmond and Gordon and Lady Helen Gordon-Lennox are going back to Scotland to spend Christmas at Gordon Castle, and they are not expected to go into residence at Goodwood until about the second week in January. The Duke and Lady Helen have been visiting Lord Cadogan at Culford Hall, and Lord Durham and Lady Anne Lambton at Lambton Castle.

Sir John Gladstone has been entertaining his annual winter parties for low ground shooting over the Glen Dye and Fasque estates in Kincardineshire, and during the recent battues over 2,500 pheasants were killed in one day in the Fasque preserves, which is a record bag for Scotland. Sir John owns one of the best "all-round" sporting estates in Scotland.

One of the humours of election times is the reproduction of foreign or colonial press opinions which favour one side or the other. Probably the only effect of such reprints is to comfort a beaten party with the reflection that its merits are appreciated abroad if not at home. If votes are influenced at an election by such opinions it is most likely to be in the opposite direction to that intended, for all people resent being favoured with other people's opinions about their business—especially if the other people are not in a position to know much about it.

The last remark applies particularly to an extract from the Sydney Bulletin, which various Opposition journals have been joyfully displaying. The Bulletin finds it "more than quaint" that "alleged Liberals" should "howl down democratic Referendum proposals." Obviously an Australian paper can know nothing about any howling that has gone on in England during the last three weeks except what it has learned by cable. The Bulletin is, therefore, merely reflecting the views of some obscure press correspondent in London which have been wired to the Antipodes in order to be wired back, invested by this process with the air of independent and authoritative utterances. It is a pity that colonial papers should be guilty of the impertinence of expressing any opinion at all about domestic affairs at home in such circumstances. The Sydney Bulletin will possibly appreciate this when it learns in the fulness of time that what Liberals have been howling against is simply the sudden springing of an ultra-democratic proposal on the eve of a general election as a means of catching votes for the anti-democratic side.

The Referendum is neither likely to be adopted nor rejected on the advice of professors; and the fact that it has such a fascination for the professorial mind rather suggests that there is something about it which will not appeal to men who look at politics as a matter of practical business rather than academic theory. If we are to be guided by professors, however, I prefer Professor Pollock to Professor Dicey. The letter of the former in Monday's Times states very ably the limitations and difficulties that surround the adoption of the Referendum in this country. It seems to me that his arguments must appeal as much to Conservatives as to Liberals—in fact, rather more. The one thing which is absolutely certain, and which makes all discussion of the subject superfluous at the moment, is that, as circumstances now stand, the Referendum can only be adopted as an incident in the reform of the House of Lords and the limitation of its veto, and to talk about setting it up while the question of the Second Chamber still remains to be dealt with is putting the cart before the horse.

The difficulty experienced by the income-tax payer in obtaining restitution from the Treasury when he has accidentally overstated his income reminds one of my readers of an experience which once befell a youth of his acquaintance. This young man, being of a God-fearing disposition, was in the habit not only of attending church regularly every Sunday, but also of depositing a shilling in the offertory, which was fully as much as he could afford. One Sunday he put in a sovereign by mistake for a shilling. The mistake being a disastrous one for him, he went to the curate and asked for a rectification of the error. The curate looked doubtful, but promised to refer the matter to the vicar. But having done so he returned with a countenance suitable to the occasion and informed the applicant that the exchange could not possibly be effected "as the coin had been sanctified." The youth wondered in his own mind whether if he had proposed to exchange a sovereign for a shilling under the same circumstances the same difficulty would have arisen. Fortunately he was able to adjust the account by stopping his shillings for the next nineteen weeks. There is no such simple remedy for the taxpayer whose money has once been sanctified by the touch of the tax-collector.

CUTTING IT SHORT.

(After reading some recent remarks by the Rev. W. D. Ward, of St. Oswald's, Fulham.)

"The parson who'd to preach essay,
If he'd his duty do,
Should know what he has got to say
And how to say it, too:

"And when he's said it, he should stop."
In truth, a useful hint
It is that Mr. Ward lets drop,
And worthy well of print.

Yet many a parson's come my way
Who so much lacks the wit
Of knowing what he's got to say
And promptly saying it,

That, should we maxims of this sort
Enforce some pulpits in,
The preacher would indeed stop short;
He never would begin.

The Dean of Lincoln is to be succeeded as headmaster of Berkhampsted School by Mr. C. H. Greene, who has been second master there for nearly twenty years. There were thirty-eight candidates for the post, but Mr. Greene's appointment was generally expected, as he has done good work at the school, and he has been well known in educational circles as an active and useful member of the Assistant Masters' Association. Mr. Greene was educated at Wadham College, Oxford.

The compulsory Greek question will come up again next term at Oxford. A statute will be introduced relieving honour students in the schools of natural science and mathematics from the necessity of taking up two ancient languages in Responsions. The petition to Council in favour of the reform is signed by Sir William Anson and Professor Gilbert Murray, both of whom opposed the statute which was defeated the other day, and which is believed to have been directly inspired by Lord Curzon.

There has been much talk at Oxford about some alteration of the dates of next summer term, which, in the ordinary course, will extend over Coronation week, an arrangement which will cause much inconvenience both public and private, especially in connection with Commemoration. It has been proposed to the Hebdomadal Council that summer terms shall begin a week earlier than the day announced, but it appears probable that the last week will simply be cut off from the term, which will therefore be limited to seven weeks.

The late Dr. Friedlander filled the important position of Principal of the Jews' College from 1865, when he came to London from Berlin, until 1907, when he retired. He was a man of great learning and high literary culture, and his house was noted as being the centre of a distinguished intellectual society. He was in fact one of the most distinguished and respected members of the Jewish community in London, which has every reason to regret his loss, for he had served long and strenuously on nearly all its public bodies and learned and religious societies. Dr. Friedlander's versatility was remarkable, for he was eminent as a theologian, as a mathematician, and as a classical scholar, and there was no higher living authority on Hebrew literature.

The new appointment to the important living of St. Mark's, Broomhall, Sheffield, is exciting keen interest in evangelical circles. The living is worth about £650 a year, with house, and it is in the gift of the Church Burgesses of Sheffield. This benefice is regarded for many reasons as a most desirable charge. The vacancy has arisen through the resignation of the Bishop Suffragan of Sheffield (Dr. Quirk).

Mr. Quicke, of Newton St. Cyres, Devon, has presented the Rev. F. S. Eardley, district secretary of the B.F.B.S., to the rectory of Ashbrittle, near Wellington, which is of the net value of about £400 a year, with house. The last rector was a member of the Quicke family. This living has been vacant for several months, as the clergyman who was first presented to it afterwards withdrew his acceptance of the benefice.

The Lord Chancellor has presented the Rev. F. W. Fulford, assistant missioner in the diocese of Gloucester, to the rectory of Turvey, near Bedford, which is of the net value of about £250 a year, with house. The interesting old church was admirably restored by the late Mr. C. L. Higgins, of Turvey Abbey, the work being carried out by Sir Gilbert Scott. The celebrated Legh Richmond was rector of Turvey for many years. The church contains the monuments of the Mordaunts, Earls of Peterborough, who owned the Turvey estate for several centuries.

It has frequently been pointed out that nothing can be more fatuous than for the electors for colonial bishoprics to choose clergymen in England without previously ascertaining that the selected divine is willing to accept the post. There are great and obvious objections to this helter-skelter method of doing business. The other day the Synod of Auckland, New Zealand, elected the Rev. Canon Maud, Vicar of St. Mary Redcliffe, Bristol, to be their new bishop, to his great surprise, as he had never heard anything about the affair. Canon Maud at once telegraphed declining the see, but the hare-brained methods of the Synod inevitably place the next ecclesiastic to whom they make an offer in an invidious position. Canon Maud is widely known as an admirable preacher and one of the best parish clergymen in England. He is probably destined to fill some see at home, and he will make an excellent bishop.

The Bishop of Chichester has presented the Rev. W. C. Streatfeild, who has been for eight years Vicar of St. Peter's, St. Leonards, to the living at Eastbourne, which is of the net value of about £550 a year, with

The Bishop of Worcester would have been better advised if he had not attempted to correct Lord Beauchamp's statement that the Rev. A. H. Bancroft, curate of Leigh, was driven from the parish owing to his political opinions. The head and front of Mr. Bancroft's offending was that he refused to sign a petition against the Budget of 1909. Because of this refusal it was assumed—for he took no active part in politics on either side—that he was a Liberal, and at the beginning of this year Tory Churchmen put pressure upon the Vicar, with the result that he suggested to Mr. Bancroft that he would be happier in some other sphere of work, "owing to a prejudice entertained by some of our leading people against your political views." The Vicar added that he did not share this prejudice, but "some of the supporters of our Assistant Clergy Fund feel very strongly on the matter."

In March last Mr. Bancroft received six months' notice from the Vicar. The notice was not in writing, and in reply to an inquiry as to its validity the Bishop of Worcester wrote on July 25 that this was a question for lawyers. While, however, the Bishop could not say whether Mr. Bancroft would be able "to avoid the surrender of his curacy in September," his lordship went on to remark that the whole matter was in a delicate condition, "made the more so by the political incident," and that he could not help thinking Mr. Bancroft "would probably be happier elsewhere," though he was "far from laying this upon him authoritatively." In view of this letter the Bishop's present statement that the curate could not be dismissed without his permission, and that he would not have allowed a dismissal on political grounds, seems to me a rather unworthy quibble. Nor does the Bishop put a more favourable complexion upon this disgraceful episode by his statement that Mr. Bancroft was still curate at Leigh when he was given a benefice. He was only there because his notice had not expired, and it was in consequence of the abominable treatment that he had received that the Lord Chancellor presented him with a small living in Norfolk.

Considerable surprise, I hear, was caused at a bazaar held in Falkirk Town Hall by the police stopping a number of prize competitions. The bazaar was being held in aid of the funds of the Lambert Parish Church, and the prize competitions were nothing more than ordinary raffles, in which purchasers of picture postcards, stamped with a number, were entitled to enter. The simple-minded promoters imagined that by selling picture postcards as tickets they could evade the Lottery Act, and were greatly indignant that their little scheme should be treated as a mere ordinary gamble. The guilelessness of the clergy in this respect is remarkable, though it is not calculated to increase respect for the Church to see its promoters looking for ways and means by which they can evade the law.

I have to thank several readers for prompt and generous response to the paragraph in last week's Truth respecting a lady who was in great distress in a foreign town. In addition to those communications which I have answered privately, I have also to acknowledge the receipt of a postal order for £1 sent anonymously.

The list of Crimean and Indian Mutiny veterans is further reduced by the death of Sir Edward Bulwer at the age of eighty. He served in the Royal Welsh Fusiliers from 1849 until 1865, though after the Crimean War he was employed for eighteen months on special service at the Embassy at Constantinople. Sir Edward held several important staff appointments between 1865 and 1894, and got his K.C.B. in 1886. All his work was well done, and he had a full share of the family ability in many respects. He was a son of Mr. Lytton Bulwer, of Heydon Hall, Norfolk, and nearly related to the first Lord Lytton and to Lord Dalling.

Another Crimean veteran who has passed away at a still more advanced age is Sir James Browne, who died last week at the age of eighty-seven. He was the son of the late Dean of Lismore, and a brother of the late Baroness Bolsover, the stepmother of the Duke of Portland. He entered the Royal Engineers in 1842, and retired from the Army in 1888. He was very severely wounded during the siege of Sebastopol, and his services in the Crimea were recognised by promotion and the third class of the Order of the Bath, and by French, Turkish, and Sardinian decorations. Sir James Browne afterwards held numerous staff appointments at home. He was employed for several years at the War Office, and from 1880 until 1887 he was Governor of the Royal Military Academy, Woolwich.

Fathers with sons in the Army will sympathise, I imagine, with one of their number who sends me, with some forcible remarks, a circular addressed to his son—a subaltern in a Line regiment—by J. W. Benson, Limited, of Old Bond Street. The object of the circular is to bring to the young man's notice "our 'Times' system of monthly payments as a very convenient method of purchasing presents at this time of year." In plain English this is a system for tempting youngsters to get into debt with the least amount of risk to their creditor; and the liberty incidentally taken with the august names of the Times and the "Encyclopædia Britannica" disguises the transaction but thinly, for there is little analogy between offering a serious-minded person an encyclopædia to be paid for by monthly instalments, and selling jewellery to subalterns in the Army who have not the money to pay cash for it. A firm which approaches young officers with such insidious offers is little better than a touting moneylender.

Talking of tradesmen and officers, a mess president wrote to me the other day protesting against the incessant annoyance which men in his position suffer at the hands of touting shopkeepers who forward samples of goods and follow them up with serial letters soliciting trial orders. A good specimen of the impudence employed in this method of pushing business is to be seen in the following extract from a cigarette-merchant's follow-up letter:—

I must say candidly there is no cigarette on the market, both home and abroad, to equal it at the price, and I consider, in the interest of your brother officers, you ought to at least send me a trial order for 500 to verify my statement.

Apparently some mess presidents are ready to accept the tradesman's view of their duty to their brother officers, or he would not find it pay to write in this strain.

I sympathise with those who resent being pestered in this way because tradesmen are also fond, especially at this time of year, of sending samples of goods to editors—not in search of orders, but advertisements—and if the editor does not publicly testify his appreciation of the merits of the goods it is no uncommon thing for him to be asked whether he has not received them, and if so why he has not made a suitable acknowledgment. I conclude that cheap advertisements are to be obtained in this way in some newspapers, but Truth does not happen to be one of them.

---

I wish that I did not get so many letters like the following:—

Sir,—I am one of several hundreds of short-service men who enlisted during 1902 and 1903. If you remember, the Government was short of soldiers about that time, and asked the short-service men to extend their service to eight years' colour service and four reserve, and to go abroad.

Those of us who agreed were told by our officers that we should obtain first-class service pay, 6d. per diem, by becoming first-class shots and having third-class education certificates, or second-class shots and second-class education certificates; also that we should be sent back to England with eight years' colour service.

The first order has since been altered to this—every man must be a first-class shot and have either a first, second, or third-class education certificate. After drawing first-class pay for three years I was reduced 2d. per diem under the new regulation, together with hundreds of others. Further, with all these men, I am compelled to stay in India eight years three months under some other regulation. Should I make a complaint it would mean that my character as a "very good" soldier would be damaged.

There are a great many men who would be thankful if you would give space for this in your paper.

The poor fellows will be thankful for very little, I fear. Again and again protests have been made in Truth against the variation of the above-mentioned and other similar regulations in flagrant disregard that this is a flat violation of the terms under which men have joined or extended their service. It seems useless to appeal to the sense of honesty of the rulers of the Army. The rank and file are no better off in this respect than officers, whose contracts the War Office or the Indian Government is always ready to rip up and modify when the interest of the Government suggests it.

---

I can offer little comfort, therefore, to soldiers in India who are robbed by alteration of the rules governing service and proficiency pay. But perhaps one of these days, when the British Constitution has been overhauled vigorously and the millennium begins to dawn at Westminster, Parliament will give soldiers and other servants of the Crown the right to sue at law for breaches of contract. If it were to make Secretaries of State or other officials who commit such breaches personally liable to the plaintiffs the effect would be still more salutary.

---

A novel complaint has been made to me, having reference to the leniency of commanding officers when recording the characters of soldiers on leaving the colours. This leniency is, no doubt, due to the wish not to stand in the way of a man when he goes back to civil life, and for this reason a soldier is often given a good character when he deserves a bad one. Such leniency is misplaced, and recoils on the good men, of whom there are plenty, but whom employers will not take into their service if a wastrel has once been planted on them. Once bitten, twice shy.

A commanding officer is tied by regulation in regard to an "exemplary" character, which can only be given after six years' service, five of which must have been free from an entry in the regimental conduct sheet. In all other cases a colonel may give a man any character he pleases from "very good" down to "very bad." I think this discretionary power requires limitation to prevent abuse of that friendly understanding which now happily exists throughout the Army between officers and men. It would be easy to lay down conditions. The possession of two good conduct badges, for instance, might be made the minimum qualification for a "very good" character, and the possession of one badge for a "good" character, while if a man had no badges at all he should be classed as "fair."

According to paragraph 415 of the King's Regulations, "the guiding principle in examining a soldier's conduct sheet with a view to assessing his character is to differentiate between a man's character as a soldier and his character as a man." I should have thought that differentiation of this kind was not of much use either to employer or man. To label a man as a good soldier is of no labour market value unless he is also a good man. Character is an ex-soldier's all-in-all, for in 99 cases out of 100 he has no trade to fall back upon when he returns to civil life. What an employer wants to know is whether the man is steady, respectful, sober, and reliable. If he has not got these qualifications the employer won't take him on because he is a good marksman or a skilled performer of the bayonet exercise.

A very interesting communication reached me the other day from Gibraltar apropos of a court-martial at which no less than nine men of the 2nd Norfolk Regiment were arraigned. They were men of various gradations of character; but they had one and all struck against punishment drill in marching order. The battalion seems to have been rather prolific lately in military "crime" of a petty kind; and the view of the matter put forward by my correspondent is that this is the fault of the regimental police more than anybody else, and that the marching order parade in particular has been converted into a means of goading men to madness and desperation.

This is to inform the Patrons of the Grand Hotel, Cannes, that a large Restaurant has recently been erected, overlooking the gardens.—A. Menge, Proprietor.

As original sin is pretty equally distributed among mankind, it is generally a pretty fair inference that when one unit in the Army develops an unusual number of sinners the fault lies with somebody in authority. In this instance there is a good deal of evidence to support that inference; and if the C.O. of the 2nd Norfolk is concerned about the wickedness of his men, he would do well to try the effect of keeping a tighter hand upon his provost sergeant.

Captain J. A. Tuke, who since November, 1908, has held the pleasant little billet of King's Harbour-master at Plymouth, is to turn over his post on the 5th prox. to Captain Evelyn Le Marchant. This latter officer is relinquishing the command of the Southern Coastguard District.

Captain W. H. Baker-Baker, who has just been appointed to the President for command of the Southern Coastguard District, in succession to Captain Le Marchant, has seen a good deal of fighting since he began his active service career as a midshipman in the Minotaur during the Egyptian War. He wears the Order of the Red Eagle, conferred upon him by the German Emperor in November, 1907.

Captain Arthur Leveson, who has been gazetted to the command of the Indefatigable, is, according to the Navy List, at present unemployed. His appointment has just been further post-dated to January 17. This exemplifies one of those small anomalies only intelligible to the official mind. The Indefatigable is at present running her trials. The captain of a fully commissioned cruiser has been put in charge of her for this purpose. Why? (1) A captain is temporarily taken away from his own command; (2) the real skipper of the new ship is meanwhile unemployed; and (3) he is denied the opportunity of gaining valuable experience of his future command. The anomaly is heightened by the fact that the commander and engineer-commander of a new warship are appointed and join up before she begins her trials. If these officers are presumed to know all about the ship before she commissions, why not the captain?

I feel that I owe two apologies to Captain E. F. Bruen, who was twice in last week's Truth converted into Captain "Bowen" upon the occasion of his selection as Flag-Captain to Vice-Admiral King-Hall.

The gunboat Ringdove, employed on fishery protection service in Scottish waters, not long since requisitioned a new 40-ft. spar from her port of commission. This had to be sent by rail, which necessitated the employment of two trucks. An active and intelligent expense account officer shied at this reckless expenditure of public money, and directed that the spar be cut in two, so that it might travel on one truck. It was explained to him that two 20-ft. spars are not the nautical equivalent of one 40-ft., and happily the voice of reason prevailed. Zeal for economy in public departments is so valuable that it is a pity it should not be according to knowledge.

Within a week of having been appointed to the Forth, for the command of the Devonport submarine flotilla, Commander Wilfred Tomkinson has been re-gazetted to the Mercury, for command of the Portsmouth submarine flotilla. Changes of this character are not, of course, unprecedented, but it is possible that this particular case may have reference to the reported intention of establishing a submarine flotilla at Malta. Commander Tomkinson has had much experience of torpedo work in the Mediterranean. The submarines for this new station will most probably be drawn from the Portsmouth flotilla, where several units are about to be replaced by a later type. It would, therefore, not be surprising if Commander Tomkinson is the officer selected to form and take charge of this new adjunct to our Mediterranean Fleet.

No more naval prisoners are to be sent to the naval prison at Lewes. A great reform in the disciplinary procedure of the Navy will come into effect with the New Year, when the system of naval detention barracks is established. Men who are under sentences of not more than ninety-one days for offences against discipline, and who are to be retained in the Service, will henceforth go to barracks—not to gaol. This is a most salutary reform. Lewes gaol will consequently be closed altogether, the Bodmin naval prison being quite adequate to accommodate all the prisoners under sentence of court-martial.

A Conservative member of the Derby Town Council, Mr. A. Newland, last week moved at a meeting of the Council that an official inquiry should be made into an allegation against an unnamed member of violating the Public Bodies Corrupt Practices Act. Before he could make a statement, however, one of the leaders of his party, Mr. Alderman Hart, jumped up and moved that the Council should proceed to the next business, and the motion was seconded by another alderman, and carried without discussion. Mr. Newland has publicly stated that he intends to call a public meeting in order to place his fellow townsmen in possession of the facts, despite the fact that Alderman Hart has written to him, asking him "in the interests of the Unionist party" not to proceed with the matter. In the interests of the public I hope he will. Nor do I see how the interests of the Unionist party will be served by hushing up a scandal. It seems a very short-sighted policy to identify one's party with corruption.

After all the expense and trouble which Liverpool has experienced through its sectarian strife one would have expected that all parties on the City Council would have welcomed a measure to put an end to it. But the reverse is the case. The Commissioner, after the inquiry into the religious riots, recommended that the city authorities should obtain greater powers to regulate sectarian processions through the public streets. Accordingly, the Parliamentary Committee drafted a Bill for the purpose, and this was submitted last week to the Council. There was nothing objectionable about it. The preamble merely stated "that it is expedient for the Council, in the interests of the inhabitants of the city, to promote in the ensuing session of Parliament a Bill for regulating processions within the city of Liverpool." It awakened fierce opposition, however, and though the preamble was approved by 58 votes to 42, the statutory majority of the Council was not obtained, and the measure is automatically dropped. This decision is the price Liverpool pays for its Toryism, and the dropping of the Bill the reward of the George Wise brigade for political and municipal support.

Last week a report from the district medical officer for health concerning an outbreak of typhoid fever at Rosses Point was laid before the Sligo District Council. It set out that on November 12, 1909, a similar outbreak had taken place with one fatality, and since that date further cases had arisen with three fatalities. The disease was attributed to the absence of all drainage and consequent contamination of the water supply, which is obtained entirely from wells The reading of the report was met with cries of "throw it in the wastepaper basket," and a storm of protest was raised at the thought of spending any of the ratepayers' money in saving the ratepayers' lives. Even the suggestion that the outlay might be of financial advantage to the district owing to the fact that Rosses Point has many and varied attractions as a watering place had no weight with these penny wise and pound foolish councillors. A John Burns is badly needed at the Irish Local Government Board to teach such pig-headed barbarians that their duty to the ratepayers does not entirely consist of cutting down the rates.

It might have seemed difficult to discover any new objection to the Sunday Observance Act of 1677, but some tradesmen in Runcorn have done so. They had been convicted under the Act by the Runcorn magistrates, and appealed to the Court of King's Bench against the conviction. The ground of appeal in each case was that the appellant in keeping open his shop on Sunday was not following his ordinary calling. The Lord Chief Justice held that this was a material point, and remitted the cases to the magistrate for reconsideration. According to this reading of the law, it is only the man who makes his living by keeping a shop who can be convicted, while the regular traders' illegitimate competitors escape. The unfairness of putting the law into operation at all under such circumstances must be apparent to the strictest Sabbath observer on the bench.

I cannot say that I feel as concerned as Mr. A. C. Benson that the last moments of murderers should be uncomfortable. But it has often occurred to me that if a man condemned to death prefers to kill himself there is no reason why he should not be allowed to. It would save a great deal of unpleasantness and a certain amount of expense. The same thing may be said with even more force of the case of a man accused of a capital offence but not yet tried. When the late Dr. Crippen was arrested one heard of the careful precautions taken by the detectives to frustrate any attempts at suicide. Supposing that the man really wanted to kill himself at that date—as to which I know nothing—how much better it would have been to let him do so! Think of all the trouble, the waste of money, above all the demoralising public feast of morbid sensationalism that would have been saved. And who would have been the worse? Only the lawyers and the daily papers.

---

Mr. Filson Young, in a letter to the Times, observes that the "Church forbids suicide, and it is inconceivable that any such rational method is likely to be tolerated for a long time." That rather depends on what is meant by "tolerated." I quite agree that while the law and the general sentiment on the subject of suicide are what they are, it would be idle to suggest that a convict condemned to death should be formally offered the option of executing himself. All I would suggest is negative or passive toleration. The man's liberty of action should not be interfered with. Mr. Young deprecates the watching of the condemned man by day and night, the cruelty inflicted on his relatives by denying them a last kiss, and so forth. All this is not designed for the purpose of torturing the man, though it may have that effect. It is all part of the official arrangements for preventing his "cheating the gallows." If officialism chose to relax these precautions and put the blind eye to the telescope there might be a little foolish outcry when the first man contrived to kill himself, but common sense would soon prevail.

Suicide may, of course, be immoral and criminal in some cases, as, for instance, where a felo de se leaves his wife and children chargeable to the parish, or where he kills himself in such a clumsy way as to endanger other people, as by shooting himself in a crowd or in a railway carriage, or throwing himself out of a window when people are passing below. But when a man's life or death is of no consequence to anybody but himself his killing himself is obviously a matter with which no one else has any right to interfere, provided he does it in a decent and inoffensive manner. Indeed, in such a case, I should say that the mere fact of a man killing himself is a proof that he is better dead, and that the world is better without him. This being the rational view of the matter in all cases, it is indeed the very acme of unreason to deny a man's right to kill himself to-day when the State has decided to kill him to-morrow.

Sir Homewood Crawford contributes one of the most interesting items to the correspondence that has appeared in the Times on this subject. In his capacity of Under-Sheriff he had on one occasion to inform a condemned murderer of his reprieve. The convict replied: "Thank you for nothing; I'd rather be hanged!" If, as is probable, the man was only exchanging the gallows for penal servitude, his good sense is to be commended, though his manners may have been at fault. Personally, I would never sign a petition for the reprieve of a condemned man, however strongly I might believe in his innocence, if his reprieve meant penal servitude for life; and if I should ever be condemned to death myself, I hope no officious person will ever perform this mistaken kindness on my account.

The trick for which Ernest Druce, described as an author, was sentenced to nine months' imprisonment at the London Sessions last week was by no means uncommon, as reference to Truth Cautionary List will show. He wrote to hotel proprietors telling them that he remembered that he had smoked their cigars, which he very much appreciated, and asked that a box should be forwarded to him. Then when the cigars came he acknowledged receipt, and sent a supplemental order for whisky or more cigars. In some instances these were executed, and in others not. But none of the cigars or whisky were ever paid for. A little flattery seems to go a long way with hotel managers when they can be induced to send boxes of cigars to anybody who chooses to ask for them.

A scandalous injustice which the Scottish High Court has now pronounced itself incapable of remedying was perpetrated in the Dumbarton Sheriff Court in May last. A motor-car driver was convicted of negligent driving in consequence of a collision which took place between a car and a wagonette, a fine of £5 imposed, and his licence ordered to be endorsed. Afterwards an action for damages was brought by the owner of the wagonette and a counter-claim made on behalf of the owner of the car. The owner of the car won in each case, and thereupon the driver of the car appealed against the conviction. The appeal was dismissed on the ground that the decision of the Sheriff was final on questions of fact, though the judges concurred in the belief that a miscarriage of justice had taken place. The result is that an unfortunate chauffeur is penalised for life through the mistake of a dispenser of justice who has more than once shown a prejudice against motorists. If, as appears to be the case, there is no means of correcting his mistakes, he ought to be relieved of further opportunity of making them.

In the midst of his lightning electioneering work I hope Mr. Winston Churchill has had time to give attention to a sentence passed by Bailie Hamilton at Perth on a boy charged with stealing some bottles. The Bailie sent the boy to gaol for ten days without the option of a fine. It is true he had been before the court previously, but that was in his very juvenile days for the very juvenile offence of stealing apples. In his favour it might be pleaded that he is an orphan, and that the woman who had mothered him was lying ill in an infirmary. No doubt he does want a little kindly supervision, but between that and making a gaol bird of him there is a vast difference.

In March last a warning was published in Truth in regard to an appeal issued by a Mr. J. Anstee, of Leicester, on behalf of a man named George Flavell. The appeal was based on the ground that Flavell had been an earnest worker for Tariff Reform and the Conservative cause, and it was sent to dukes, lords, and earls all over the country. The warning put an end to the begging for a time, but the recent election seems to have stirred Flavell to renewed endeavour. As a result Flavell found himself before the Leicester magistrates last week charged with endeavouring to obtain charitable contributions by false pretences. As in the previous instance, Anstee's name had been attached to the appeal, but the police could not find him, and Flavell was found to be living at Anstee's reputed address. The magistrates gave Flavell the maximum sentence in their power—three months' hard labour—and Tariff Reform loses an earnest worker.

An old acquaintance in the person of William E. Scott, the one-time proprietor of Symond's London Stores, has turned up again, having reached New York viâ Berlin. His address is 1269 Broadway, whence he is advertising a new hair-growing treatment under the name of "Koskott." Scott gives one box of Koskott No. 1 to persons who answer his advertisement, and at the same time informs them that Koskott No. 2 and Koskott No. 3 are necessary in order to complete the scientific process which will make their hair grow. For these he asks two dollars, and gives also a guarantee that if he does not make the hair grow one inch he will forfeit ten dollars. The manager of the Koskott laboratory is given as E. J. Woods, which happens to be the name also of the "Former Alcohol Slave" who came a few months ago from the States with a brand new Yankee cure for alcoholism, and commenced an advertisement campaign from 10, Norfolk Street, Strand. Perhaps Mr. E. J. Woods, of Norfolk Street, therefore, will kindly inform me if the hair restorer and the cure for alcoholism are both brewed in the same laboratory, and whether Scott is the alchemist who has discovered both marvels?

One of the M. A. Winter circulars offering a position as quack medicine vendor to the recipient has reached a correspondent in an out-of-the-way corner of South China. He has been greatly amused by the statement in it that the retail orders coming direct from customers located near him have been increasing so rapidly that the appointment of a representative has become imperative. As there are a bare half-dozen European residents in the place this arrow of the M. A. Winter Company shot at a venture was bound to miss.

I have received a letter from the Strathcona Coal and Exploration Syndicate, Limited, of Glasgow, in reference to my recent paragraphs upon its sales of plots of land in the town site of Rosslyn, near Fort William, Ontario. Mr. Hancock, the city engineer of Fort William, informed me that Rosslyn was thirteen miles away from that town, but the company declare that this is a blunder, and that it is within seven miles of the boundaries of Fort William. No doubt the discrepancy is due, as I suggested last week, to the measurements being made from different points. People in this country, I am further told, have bought plots to hold for a rise in value, and the company are not aware of any purchaser having gone out to Rosslyn for the purpose of building.

As to Mr. Hancock's statement that the whole town site of 200 acres was sold less than two years ago for £300, the company say they are inquiring whether this is correct. The company, it appears, owns only thirty acres, acquired at a total cost of about £40 per acre. It has sold about two-thirds of its property at £10 per plot (which works out at £100 per acre—a very handsome profit), and the price has lately been raised to £15 per plot (or £150 per acre), because a purchaser had been offered that sum by parties on the spot. The space marked on the plan "municipal buildings" belongs, it is explained, to the municipality of Paipoonge, "and will no doubt be used in due course for that purpose." It is remarked that Mr. Hancock's pessimistic view of the prospects of Rosslyn differs widely from the opinion of the company's representative, who has had considerable dealings with land in Fort William and the neighbourhood. They certainly do differ, and only time can show which judgment is correct. For the sake of the buyers here I hope that the Rosslyn plots will have the predicted rapid appreciation in value; but I remain of the opinion that it is a foolish thing for Britishers unacquainted with local conditions to engage in such speculations in land in Canada solely on the advice of the vendors.

"COMING EVENTS," ETC.

Oh! the world just now is a pleasant place.
It matters not where one wends,
One's met by an affable grin on the face
Of each of one's lowlier friends.

Such bland politeness they all reveal,
So smilingly all salaam,
That I'm thrilled with self-satisfaction to feel
What a popular person I am.

The guard of my morning and evening train,
Indifferent now no more,
Comes running forward with might and main
To open the carriage door.

And the ticket collector you ought to see;
If I chance to drop my glove,
How he picks it up and hands it to me
With mingled respect and love.

The butcher's boy who brings the meat,
The urchin who blacks my shoes,
The scavenger-man who sweeps our street,
With suavity all they ooze.

And the man from the grocer's where I buy
My sugar and coffee and tea,
And the baker's and fishmonger's man—all vie
In showing their fondness for me.

Yes! the world just now is a pleasant place.
It matters not where one wends,
One's met by a Boxing-day grin on the face
Of each of one's lowlier friends.

SCRUTATOR.

UNIONIST HALLUCINATION.

PARTIES defeated at elections invariably devote themselves to extenuating their misfortune and explaining that though beaten in appearance they have in reality gained a great victory. This may be childish, but so is much that is said and done at election times, and the fact that it is childish is a good reason for not paying serious attention to it. The case of the Unionist party at the present moment, however, provokes comment because the whole party—judging by the public utterances of those who speak on its behalf—seems to be living in a state of chronic hallucination. Its reception of the results of the elections is only on a par with its behaviour prior to the election, and not only at this election but at the last. The party seems incapable of seeing facts as they are. It feeds itself on delusions, seizing on a fresh one almost before it has swallowed the last. Here and there one comes across a man who speaks out rationally and bids his fellows realise the truth, but none of them takes any notice of him. One can only regard this as a sort of mental disease in an epidemic form, and it cannot be unconnected with the plight in which the party finds itself after five years in opposition.

To take one or two examples of the latest delusions: It is now pretty clear that the general election will make little change in the balance of parties at Westminster. On this we are told from the Opposition side, in one form of words or another, that the election was unnecessary, that it has resulted as everybody expected, that it changes nothing, and that another election must necessarily follow at an early date. No doubt the election was unnecessary in one sense; I have already expressed that view myself. Like a more famous struggle, it "could and ought to have been avoided." But this does not apply specially to the Government. One party ought to have avoided it as much as the other. Obviously the Government are the least to blame for it, because they went considerably out of their way to obtain a settlement by peaceful means. Nobody can seriously dispute that the failure of the Conference necessitated a dissolution at an early date. The Government had propounded and carried through the Commons a Bill on which, if the Lords rejected it, they must dissolve or resign, and resignation would have necessitated dissolution. The party which was to blame for the dissolution is, therefore, the party which is to blame for the failure of the Conference. Which party was it? Here we come to a question which the result of the dissolution itself decides, and that is what the Unionists seem unable to perceive. The Liberals went to the Conference with a view to some sort of compromise or agreement on their Veto Bill and the further constitutional question behind it. The Unionists evidently would neither accept the Liberal proposals nor any modification of them which the Liberals would accept. Matters thus at a deadlock, the Government went to the country for a vote of confidence which would authorise it to settle the difficulty in its own way. In the hope of showing the electors that the Government had been unreasonable in its attitude at the Conference, the Unionist proposals for settling the difficulty were then formulated in resolutions of the House of Lords. What is the result? The electors pronounce decisively in favour of the Government. It follows that in the opinion of the ultimate court of appeal the Government proposals are preferable to the Opposition proposals. A fortiori the Unionists are condemned for refusing to accept some modified form of these proposals when the Government endeavoured to come to an agreement with them. If on the top of this we are to be told that the result of the appeal to the people was only what everybody expected, the case of the Opposition becomes worse. If they believed that the appeal would go against them, why in the name of wonder did they not come to terms while they had the chance, instead of declining the half-loaf which was offered them, with the certainty that an election must follow which would leave the whole loaf in the possession of the other side? The more the Unionists insist that the result of the election was a foregone conclusion, the more they condemn their own folly in refusing to take the best terms they could get by negotiation.

All sorts of attempts are made, in the usual style, to discount the effect of the voting. Whatever may be the case in seats, the Liberal majority in votes is reduced, and therefore the Government is "morally" defeated. This argument is not worth noticing so long as the object of an election is to return members to Parliament and questions in Parliament are decided by a count of members on each side. If you play a game subject to certain rules, what can be more childishly futile than to argue, when you are beaten, that you have "morally" won because you would have actually won if the rules had been entirely different? This childishness, however, is interesting as a fresh revelation of the new Unionist disposition to "blow upon" established constitutional rules and practice whenever these do not work out in favour of the party. The latest Unionist idea is apparently that M.P.s ought to be reduced to the position of delegates at a Trade Union Congress, each giving, not his own vote, but the votes of so many thousand constituents. Even, however, if this beneficent reform were carried out, it would still be impossible to adjust the value of the votes vested in each member by a mysterious standard of "moral" value, based upon comparison with the votes entrusted to him on some previous occasion. Nevertheless, it is by some mysterious standard of this kind that we are now invited to appraise the "moral" effect of the present election. A still more novel alteration of the rules of the game is suggested by an argument gravely propounded in the Times. The Prime Minister in one of his speeches called upon the electors to repeat their vote of last January "with still greater emphasis." The figures show that they have not done so; therefore the Prime Minister has received a heavy rebuff, and the majority actually returned to support him is discredited and deprived of constitutional authority. According to this view, if a Minister does not get from the country as big a vote as he would like, the vote which he does get loses its natural significance. The doctrine must apply to every member alike, so that if a candidate in an electioneering speech asks the constituency to give him a bigger majority than last time, and his majority proves to be half-a-dozen votes less, his opponent should be rightly regarded as the chosen representative of the constituency. When people talk in this style in public what can you think except that they are suffering from some form of temporary aberration? I say nothing of the calculations to prove that Unionism has the upper hand in this or that group of constituencies whose judgment counts for more than that of all the rest. This sort of flattering unction has always been a sovereign cure for wounds received in electoral battles.

A political party which lives in a world of illusions, which looks at every contemporary fact through a distorting medium, which in drawing its inferences and making its calculations resorts to every form of ingenious sophistry in place of natural reason and simple arithmetic, has little chance of gaining the confidence of the country at the present date. It is the fashion nowadays to tell a man with whom you disagree to clear his mind of cant. I would recommend our Unionist opponents, in all sincerity and friendliness, to clear their minds of fog. Two or three facts are at the present moment as certain as the Monument or the Clock Tower to anybody who will use his eyes as nature meant them to be used. A Liberal Government has for the third time in five years appealed to the country and obtained a big working majority to carry the programme which it has placed before the electors. For a Government to survive three general elections is an unprecedented event in recent years, and implies a corresponding distrust of the Opposition on the part of the electorate generally. Every individual Minister has kept his seat at the last of these three elections, which speaks with extraordinary force for the confidence of the electorate in Ministers personally. The one issue directly placed before the electors at the present election by the leaders on both sides was between the Government proposals for dealing with the House of Lords and those embodied in the resolutions of the House of Lords itself. A great majority of members—probably not less than 100, and possibly a good many more—will return to Westminster pledged to support those proposals. No scintilla of right remains after this with the House of Lords for refusing to accept the verdict of the country thus expressed in constitutional form, and should such refusal be attempted it must be defeated by such constitutional means as remain for enforcing the mandate of the electorate. This is the situation to which we have been brought by the events of the last few years. The House of Lords and the Unionist leaders have themselves alone to thank for it. They have now to accept the situation; there is no alternative, no longer any hope of escape. As a matter of decency, it would be better to bow to fate in dignity and silence than to denounce the executioner and rend the air with hysterical shrieks. As a matter of prudence and policy, it is imperative to make the best of a bad job—not by pretending, in the spirit of the late Mrs. Eddy, that concrete facts are merely metaphysical abstractions, but by recognising what the facts mean, and preparing to adapt policy and methods to the altered conditions which must follow the disappearance of the hereditary legislator from the British Constitution.

AN ANGLO-SPANISH EXHIBITION.

I have always imagined that it was an axiom with business men to ascertain full particulars about parties with whom they propose to enter into financial transactions. Apparently such is not the case even in the regions of haute finance. At least, particulars have been brought under my notice of one instance of confiding trustfulness on the part of certain English firms of high standing which would tend to dispel any such illusion. It is an interesting story, and its narration may serve to save other business men from wasting their time and money in pursuing a financial will-o'-the-wisp.

The story begins with a decision of the Spanish Government some eighteen months ago to hold an International Exhibition at Madrid in 1913. Effect was given to the decision by a decree authorising the municipality of Madrid to offer a concession for the exhibition by public tender. Shortly after the publication of this decree the representative of a well-known London firm, whom I will refer to as Messrs. A., happened to be travelling from Madrid to Paris, in company with two gentlemen with whom he had made acquaintance at his hotel. One was an American, named Austin Prince; the other a Frenchman—M. Marchais la Grave. In the course of the journey these two gentlemen began to discuss business, and eventually they confided to their English companion that they were in a position to offer a large contract which would produce between 50 to 100 per cent. profit. He was naturally interested, and there was eventually disclosed to him a scheme for obtaining the concession for the Madrid Exhibition. The scheme offered huge profits—nearly £2,000,000 sterling. The proposers appeared to be men of good standing, and Messrs. A.'s representative was induced to consider it with a view to placing particulars before Messrs. A. on his return to London. Accordingly on arrival at Paris a further interview was arranged, and this was succeeded by others, at which full details of the business were gone into. These interviews took place at the office of Mr. Prince, 9, Rue Pillet-Will, where to all appearances he carried on a prosperous banking business as Thorman et Cie. Armed with these particulars, Messrs. A.'s representative returned to London and laid them before his principals. The business was, however, not such as the firm could itself undertake, but closely associated with Messrs. A. was another firm (Messrs. B.), to whom Messrs. A. at once passed it on. Messrs. B. were much impressed by the calculations as to profits, and at once entered into negotiations with Messrs. Thorman, with a view to applying for the concession, and eventually an agreement was arrived at.

FOR XMAS give "Him" a box of Choice Flor de Dindigul Cigars or a Bewlay Patent Pipe—both most acceptable. Of all good tobacconists, or of BEWLAY, 49, Strand, London. Bewlay's catalogue, of a unique selection of smokers' articles, sent post free.

Roughly, the proposition was to secure the concession and finance it by the issue of lottery bonds to the tune of 100,000,000 fr. To do this would necessitate the deposit with the Spanish authorities of a sum equal to 2 per cent. on the capital issue. The agreement provided that Messrs. B. should at once place a sum of £40,000 with their bankers as evidence of their serious intention to proceed with the business, and that this, together with a further £40,000, was to be handed over to Messrs. Thorman when they were notified that the formal application was to be made at Madrid. Messrs. B. were, in fact, to provide the needful deposit, and in return they were to obtain a contract for the construction of the exhibition buildings at a cost of £1,000,000 sterling, 10 per cent. of which was to be their profit. Mr. Prince represented his firm as fully capable of placing the bonds when issued, and a syndicate was formed, of which Mr. Prince, M. Marchais la Grave, a Baron de Bournat, and a M. Jean Ganivet Lagrange were the French members, and the managing director of Messrs. B., a director of Messrs. A., and the representative who introduced the business, were the English members. Messrs. Thorman were to be the bankers, and finally, in order to strengthen the group, the services of the solicitor to the Spanish Embassy at Paris were retained.

The French members next proceeded to Madrid accompanied by the solicitor to make arrangements for proceeding with the business, and great was the solicitor's surprise when, on making a preliminary application to the municipality, he received an official notification to the effect that no application bearing the names of the French members of the syndicate would be considered. He thereupon refused to act any longer on behalf of the syndicate, warned the English members not to proceed further, and advertised in the French and Spanish newspapers that he was no longer connected with the French members of the group. It might have been thought that this would have been sufficient to open the eyes of the head of a big English firm. It was not. Messrs. B. disregarded the warning, and continued the negotiations until the time arrived to hand over as arranged the sum of £40,000 in pursuance of their undertaking. They would have done so had not their bankers flatly refused to part with the money on finding that their clients had made no inquiry with regard to the persons to whom it was to be entrusted. Faced by the new situation Mr. Prince made a new move. There still seemed some possibility of the concession being obtained, so he agreed to withdraw Messrs. Thorman from the syndicate on condition that the bank should receive £145,000 for its services.

By this time Messrs. B. were beginning to get rather nervous as to the ability of their French associates to place £4,000,000 of bonds, so they approached a well-known Spanish house, Messrs. C., with a view to securing their co-operation in financing the scheme. Messrs. C. on learning who constituted the French members at once recognised the names of some of them as having been engaged in obtaining money for the flotation of a syndicate for a non-existent concession to deal with compensation claims in connection with the Spanish-American war. They also warned Messrs. B. Notwithstanding all this, however, Messrs. B. stood nobly by their associates. Architects and assistants were despatched to Madrid to prepare plans, for time was running short, and eventually the managing director of Messrs. B. himself set out for Madrid. At Paris he was again personally warned by persons who knew the financial standing of the people he was acting with. But he seems to have imagined that anxiety to secure the profitable business for themselves was the motive inspiring those who had given the various warnings. He proceeded to Madrid in company with Baron de Bournat. On arrival there he was met by another member of the syndicate with a gorgeous equipage and liveried servants, and was driven at once to a mansion, where he was introduced to a gentleman who was represented to him as being the Mayor of Madrid. As a matter of fact, the real Mayor was at the time enjoying himself in the bosom of his family at San Sebastian. The interview took place two days before the expiry of the period in which tenders were to be presented, and the bogus mayor informed the managing director of Messrs. B. that he was delighted to see him, and in order to give him sufficient time to formulate his scheme he would at once extend the time for a further fifteen days. Being unacquainted with Spanish, the managing director was not aware that a notice of such extension had already appeared in the Gazette of Madrid on the morning of his arrival. Extremely satisfied with the result of his visit, he returned to London, and all parties renewed their efforts to obtain a bank of standing to undertake the matter. They failed, and ultimately Messrs. B.'s representative proceeded to Madrid again and deposited £72,000 in a Spanish bank to comply with the conditions, and applied for the concession. The result was published in La Epoca for November 26, when it was announced that all tenders had been refused, but that the Municipality would be prepared to receive fresh propositions.

Messrs. B. are both to be commiserated with and congratulated upon this unexpected result. They still have their £72,000, and they have learned that an English firm of the highest standing cannot afford to associate with every continental financier who brings a proposition to their doors. Personally I think they ought to feel deeply indebted to the Municipality at Madrid for having made the inquiries which have prevented them being entangled with a gang of needy adventurers, for that is in effect what the French members of the syndicate are. The leading spirit, Mr. Austin Prince, who, if I am correctly informed, originally bore a Polish name, started in business as a company promoter in New York. Having parted company with the New York Stock Exchange he proceeded to France. A month or two before he got into communication with Messrs. B. he started a bank as Thorman et Cie., and at the same time, in conjunction with M. Marchais la Grave, he formed a company to act as constructional contractors. The other two members of the group, the Baron and M. Lagrange, had neither the financial standing nor relationships which would lead anyone to suppose that they could do anything to finance such a scheme as that proposed. What they all lacked in means, however, they evidently made up in plausibility. So greatly were they gifted in this respect that they secured the co-operation and very nearly £80,000 of the cash of one of the largest firms of contractors in London. They failed to do so in this instance, but emboldened by the experience they have had of the ease with which British business men can be induced to put up large sums when a profit of half-a-million is dangled before their eyes, they are not likely to refrain from another attempt. Nor were these the only group of financiers who saw in the proposed exhibition a means of exploiting the Britisher. Eight tenders were received by the Municipality of Madrid. Not one of them was accepted. Evidently Messrs. B. are not the only firm which failed to make inquiries regarding the persons who brought proposals to them.

MR. ASHLEY LARKINS AT HOME.

A peculiar pleasure is always to be obtained by a peep behind the carefully arranged scenery before which the great ones of the earth pose for the public benefit. It is a pleasure not without alloy. It does not make for hero worship. In the intimacy of home-life the great man oftentimes appears very common clay indeed. Yet there are compensations. One sometimes learns more of the real nature of the man by observing him in the pursuance of his ordinary avocations than from the most careful scrutiny of the bedizened figure which appears before the footlights. For this reason I make no apology for bespeaking my readers' attention to a day with Mr. Ashley Larkins. Perhaps, however, it is unnecessary to use the prefixes since on occasion he himself dispenses with them, and signs himself "Larkins," like a lord.

Some of Larkins' claims to greatness have already been mentioned in Truth. His efforts on behalf of the unemployed, his dabblings with the drama, his ingenious dodge for selling copies of his essay on "England's Government of Her Dependencies" have each in turn called for remark. So, too, has the largeness of his views, as exemplified by his anxiety to interest any and everyone in his schemes who would, as a preliminary, deposit with him a sum of money in hard cash. One cannot help recalling also how, when the Benchers of Gray's Inn refused to call him to the Bar, he consoled himself by conferring upon himself the title of Chancellor of English Laws. But over his private life a veil has hitherto been drawn. It is true that hints about it have been allowed to escape. There was the little incident mentioned in Truth last week, where Larkins made glad the heart of a tradesman by sending a portrait of himself in payment of a little bill. That was a revelation in itself which, like most revelations, merely whets the appetite for more. It is through Larkins himself that I am able to fill up the gaps in the picture—unintentionally on his part, of course. Indeed, if he had not inserted in the Morning Post his advertisement for a literary person to whom he offered a good salary and free residence, I might even now be unaware of the manner of man he is. But the advertisement appeared, it was answered by a lady, and to this lady I am indebted for the picture of the Chancellor of English Laws in his home. She answered the advertisement, Larkins engaged her as secretary at a salary of 25s. weekly. A date was fixed on which at 2 p.m. she was to commence her duties.

The day arrived, and the lady secretary proceeded to 12, Army and Navy Mansions, Victoria Street, S.W., to commence her duties. She climbed to the Chancellor's abode, for Larkins, like the vultures, makes his nest on the heights, and in response to her timorous knock the great man appeared at the door. He was affability itself. He welcomed her with an expansive smile and introduced her to the scene of her secretarial labours. It was a modest apartment, modestly furnished with two chairs, a hinged flap which did duty for a table, and a telephone. Lest she should imagine that the furniture seemed scarcely commensurate with his greatness, the Chancellor proceeded to entertain his secretary with some account of his achievements as dramatist, author, and law-maker. Eager to assist him in any or all of his labours, the secretary suggested that she would like to begin her secretarial labours. The mention of work caused the Chancellor acute anguish. He waved his hands despairingly and protested that the secretary was "so cold." Then his mood changed. He remembered that he was hungry, and also too busy to dine. Would the secretary go out and purchase chops for his dinner? The secretary went, and on her return discovered that her secretarial duties were to include cooking the Chancellor's dinner.

Then Larkins found he had business abroad, and he left the secretary to her labours. She took the opportunity to make a tour of the flat. She discovered that the Chancellor was evidently an apostle of the simple life, since besides the two chairs and the flap the only other furniture was a bed, a gas-stove, two cracked cups, a couple of plates, a knife, a bent pickle fork, and one or two saucepans. Later she discovered also that, lest she should have altered her mind about cooking the dinner, Larkins had locked her in the flat when he departed. However, in due course the Chancellor returned; the chops were waiting, and he sat on an upturned box and ate them with the bent pickle fork. He even invited his secretary to join him in the feast. His meal finished, under the consoling influence of the chops the great man unbent. He began to exhibit solicitude for his secretary's future. He explained that he had become so interested in her that he could not bear the thought of a parting. There were empty rooms in the flat; she might order food and furniture by telephone to be sent in her name immediately. A chaperon? He waved the idea aside as not worth the consideration of great minds. In return for these advantages he only asked that his secretary would be "nice" to him. The secretary suggested that the question of salary was of importance. Larkins was pained at such gross materialism. What need to discuss questions of salary when he was laying his greatness at his secretary's feet? He only wanted his secretary to live with him and be his love. The secretary chose to consider the offer an insult, but the Chancellor of English Law smiled as one who had conferred a favour. He strove to prevent his secretary's departure, and when she at last succeeded in escaping he was still clamouring for niceness and a kiss.

With regard to this experience of a day with Ashley Larkins there is only one thing to be said. Larkins himself, as I have already pointed out, is an irresponsible person. But there is a point where such irresponsible persons become a danger to the community. That point is reached when they are allowed to carry on their operations by advertisements in the newspapers. Men who fall victims to Larkins' advertisements will probably only find themselves the losers of a few shillings. But far different may be the result to young women and girls who may all unwittingly find themselves in Larkins' Chancery, and as nearly at his mercy as the heroine of the above story. When in due course this account of "Mr. Ashley Larkins at Home" reaches the Morning Post office I trust that henceforth his advertisements for literary or any other assistance will disappear from the columns of that journal, as they ought to have done before now.

NEW STREETS FOR OLD.

Mr. William Willett is the nearest approach we have to a Baron Haussmann, and so long as he does not approach any nearer all will be well. Mr. Willett dislikes blank, level lines as much as did the early Tudor architects. Baron Haussmann considered the perspective of a street more important than the appearance of any house in it. On the site of wandering, round-the-corner-and-up-the-steps old Paris he conjured up a starched and painted reproduction of the miraculous alleys of Versailles. The effect, however, when such a plan is carried out with bricks and mortar instead of trees, a whirlpool of traffic round a policeman instead of a fish-pond with a dreaming Diana above it, and gutters instead of fountains, is—well, anybody knows what it is who has ever stood at the Arc de Triomphe and looked about him. It is undoubtedly "fine"; but the houses are enough to strike fear to the soul. They go on and on in the same line till the avenue seems to be eternity. Old places must vanish, like old people, but it is a pity when the new generation is a stiff, business generation, and wants to wipe out the pleasant, affectionate dalliance of the past. We are guilty of having replaced "Little Bell Alley" with "Copthall Avenue"; and where are the water violets which sweetened St. George's Fields? Rotted beneath the sewage of a Lambeth slum.

Human life is so bound up with the spirit of places that even the nomenclature of old streets brings us into touch with the youth and laughter of a long-silent generation. To read Mr. Foord's "Springs, Streams, and Spas of London" (Fisher Unwin) is to find the dry roaring monster of to-day changed into a place of running waters, where little streams talked to themselves over polished stones through such places as Wallbrook and the Curtain Road. Most of these were degraded to the status of drains; the others dried up, or, with a clucking gurgle of dismay, dived underground and were no more seen. Of the wells of London what remains to us? Camberwell and Clerkenwell and the remembrance of Holywell Street, Muswell Hill, and a few others. Even the far-away background of fine ladies and gallant gentlemen rustling down to take the waters, flirting, laughing, languishing, and teasing, has been painted out for us by the drab tones of mean streets and whirring machinery, the hum of electric trams, or the appalling aspect of a low-rented suburb.

How many people know that Streatham is still a spa? The waters are still bottled and sent out, or can be drunk on the premises. But who would have the heart to go and drink there, when Belinda and Clarissa have so long forgotten how to place a patch, and Sir Plume has lost his interest in his amber snuff-box and his clouded cane? Or take the courtly suburbs, which were once villages; when one rode out of London, braving the dangers of footpads, to reach Kensington, and went into the country—the birdy, flowery, lonely country—to Kew or Chiswick. We have not dealt kindly with these places. We have sent our Philistines to Kensington and our clerks to Chiswick and Kew. Hogarth and Pope and Burlington, and Georgiana, "Devon's fair," are buried beneath the cheap red brick of the suburban builder. Only Becky Sharp cannot be obliterated; she is cut too deeply upon that background which oblivion cannot paint out. In his "Old Kew, Chiswick, and Kensington" (Methuen and Co.) Mr. Lloyd Sanders has with great pains summoned many spirits from the vasty deep. They have come, but not approached; they were terrified by the compact mass of facts with which Mr. Sanders confronted them. When you are dealing with ghosts you must be careful to keep facts, the bull-dogs of knowledge, on the leash. You must not summon a ghost and leash him with a date—he will not like it, because his constitution is not robust.

Modern London has kept one great advantage over new Paris; it has kept the line of its ancient thoroughfares. The writing has gone, but the lines remain. Paris, thanks to a baron and a siege, has obliterated even the lines; one cannot tell where the writing ran. There is much in the shape and direction of a street. Mr. Chesterton has said that "the course of a London street is still in the shape of the beaten track made by the village drunkard." It would be less violent to say that it is still in the shape of the cattle track and the bridle-path. One cannot suppose that all the villagers chose to walk in the erratic steps of the drunkard, when they could make better choice themselves between marsh and hillock. But the theory remains the same; villages grow from clusters of cottages, towns from villages, and cities from towns. We are in touch with the past so long as we tread in its steps. Only when we make straight new tracks, as Paris has done, do we succeed in depriving a city of its pedigree—and a pedigree is quite as important to a city, if it is to mean anything more than money-grubbing, as a grandfather is to a human being who wants to establish his claim to his own niche. There is no writing under a Haussmann street; there is only a ruler. If the gates of Paradise themselves stood in the way of a Paris avenue they would be taken down and sold for old metal. An avenue will not go out of its way for anybody. It is a graceless parvenu, ashamed of its father and its grandfather. It considers most streets too old at forty, and practises euthanasia on a large scale. There is no reverence in a Haussmann city, though there is a great deal of handsomeness and convenience.

THE STANDARD OIL TRUST.

VIII.—OPERATIONS IN GREAT BRITAIN

LAST week's article was unavoidably broken off before the whole story of the flash-point scandal was completed. It has been shown how the Trust struggled against the raising of the flash-point in the United Kingdom, and what arguments were used in the course of the agitations it got up. Returning to these points, it is highly instructive to note that during the years that have elapsed since the Flashpoint Bill was rejected by the House of Commons in 1899, half the Standard's argument against raising the flash-point has been killed by itself. It asserted that it could not take out that proportion of naphtha which made its 73 deg. oil so explosive and dangerous without adding to the cost to the consumer. Since then there has arisen the demand for benzine or petrol for the motor industry, and the Standard finds that it can take out that naphtha. It is so short of naphtha that only last month it was buying naphtha in Scotland to meet the demand. Accordingly it keeps more naphtha out of its kerosene, and a friend of mine who has studied this subject as a chemist tells me that whereas the "Tea Rose" oil used to have a flash-point nearly down to the legal minimum of 73 deg., samples recently tested have a flash-point of 78 deg. or 79 deg. The Trust have made their oil to that extent safer to suit themselves, and it is notable that side by side with this the number of petroleum lamp accidents has been falling. What is now wanted is that they shall be forced by Parliament to make it safer still. As Lord Kelvin said to the Select Committee in 1896:—

> The principle of safety is that oil should never in a lamp reach the temperature of the close test flash-point. I advise the Committee to fix a flash-point which shall be higher than oil is likely to reach under ordinary conditions of ordinary use.

A Dumping-ground for Low-flash Oil.

One of the achievements of the Home Office during the controversy was the cooking of a list of legal flash-points in American States by which it was sought to discredit the statement that this country is a dumping ground for American low-flash oils that the Rockefellers cannot sell at home. Although Mr. Jesse Collings has denied that statement in the House of Commons it is perfectly true. A conclusive proof of its truth is furnished by that interview with Mr. W. H. Libby, the Standard's foreign marketing agent (to which I referred in a former article) appearing in the New York Herald of September 3, 1905. After describing in Mr. Libby's words their struggles with Russia for the European oil market, the interviewer goes on thus:—

> It is an open secret among people familiar with the oil business that the great and important reason for the Standard's activity in Europe is largely due to the fact that the European tests on oil are not as stringent as they are in the United States. In this country (U.S.A.) the first run of oil, or what is known as the flash-test at a high rate, is the only oil that is allowed to be marketed. The second run of oil contains much more inflammable ingredients, and when tested with the flash will explode at a much lower temperature. It is this oil that finds a market abroad, and the laws there do not demand the higher test of the product. To get rid of its second run the Standard naturally has to look to other markets than the domestic, and that is why it is so anxious to extend its operations in Europe and Asia, as otherwise the oil would be a drug on its hands.

The British Flash-point in India.

The case against the Standard and its liquid death could not be more concisely put than in the foregoing passage, and so far as they are concerned I leave the case there. But with regard to the British officials, it should here be mentioned that the lengths to which they have gone in defence of the 73 deg. flash-point was most conspicuously demonstrated in India. When the flash-point of 73 deg. was legalised there difficulties arose with certain petroleum which, owing to its large proportion of petroleum wax, became solid or viscid at 60 deg. The Indian authorities wrote home for advice in this awkward situation, and Sir Frederick Abel was invited to solve the riddle. Sir Frederick Abel actually recommended the Indian Government to melt the samples, then refrigerate them down below 73 deg., and then gradually heat them up again to 73 deg. to test them! Here is the exact language of his letter:—

> For the above reasons the application of the legal flashing test as prescribed by the Act to the examination of petroleum samples which are solid or viscid at a temperature about 60 deg. Fahr. must give entirely fallacious results.

Then he goes on to suggest a "modification" of the system of testing, of which the material portion is as follows:—

> The oil cup is then to be placed in a refrigerator, or plunged up to the projecting collar in water maintained at a sufficiently low temperature until both thermometers indicate the temperature at which the testing of petroleum is directed in the Act to be commenced. The oil cup is then to be removed, wiped dry, placed in the water-bath, and the testing effected in the manner prescribed in the Act (Select Committee's report, 1896, Appendix p. 747).

Of course, to the mind of any one but an official, it would be clear that when oil in a barrel or a tank was itself normally at a temperature of between 80 deg. or 90 deg., it was a farce to allow it to enter the country on the theory that it would not give off explosive vapour below 73 deg. Fahr. But to admit that would have been too awkward for the whole flash-point camarilla, and Sir Frederick Abel, in the Journal of the Society of Chemical Industry a few years before the safe-oil agitation started, stated that oil which in New York was exported as 73 deg. oil was found in India to have a flash-point of 66 deg. and advised that in order to take the flash-point in India it should be cooled down to 56 deg. Fahr., before the testing was started. Yet the Standard Oil agents in India successfully opposed any raising of the flash-point, and Sir Frederick Abel, in the letter quoted in the 1896 Blue Book, stated that public safety did not require it.

Later Agitations.

Another Standard Oil agitation which was run here by the Anglo-American was in February, 1900, when the railway companies issued an amended consignment note for benzine, petrol, and all varieties of motor-spirit, by which the consignor was required to indemnify the railway company against all claims for injury to person or property arising out of the "inflammable character" of the goods. The Anglo-American Oil Company first threatened that it would abandon the importation of petroleum spirit altogether, but as that "bluff" did not succeed it issued a circular to owners of motor-cars and users of petroleum spirit signed by Mr. Frank E. Bliss, director. It contained this instructive passage:—

> There is more likelihood of our protest being heeded if it be supported by similar protests from all users of petroleum spirit. We ask, therefore, your co-operation in our endeavour to induce the railway companies to revert to their old form of consignment note, and we shall be glad if you will address a letter of protest to your local goods agent of the railway company over whose line you have been accustomed to receive your traffic.

That is the way these spontaneous agitations are got up.

Of late years the Anglo-American's public activities have been chiefly concerned with its attempt to get the Thames Conservancy, and then the Port of London Authority, to sanction the bringing of petroleum spirit up the river in tank barges instead of landing it at Purfleet. The Thames Conservancy, whose meetings are open to the press, steadily refused, but the Port of London Authority sits in secret, and it would not be surprising if one day the Standard's constant efforts succeeded in this most dangerous project. "Petroleum spirit," legally, consists of petroleum which flashes below 73 deg. Fahr. In fact, some of its products will flash at zero, but all of it is far more dangerous than the petroleum lamp-oil, which flashes at 73 deg. or above.

The Vacuum Oil Co., Limited.

It is time now to turn to the Standard's other English branch, the Vacuum Oil Co., Limited, which posed at first as an American company entirely independent and unconnected with the Standard. It was registered at Somerset House as a limited liability company with a capital of £55,000 on May 13, 1901. Its object was to take over the business of its parent, the Vacuum Oil Company, of Rochester, N.Y., U.S.A., and it purchased all the assets of that company in the United Kingdom for £29,947. Up to October, 1905, its five directors were as follows—

John Dustin Archbold, 26, Broadway, N.Y.
Charles Millard Pratt, 26, Broadway, N.Y.
Charles Marvin Everest, Rochester, N.Y.
Howard B. Case, Norfolk Street, Strand.
Henry Forster Grierson, Farnborough, Hants.

Charles M. Pratt is a son of the late Mr. Charles Pratt, who founded the refinery already referred to in connection with Mr. H. H. Rogers. C. M. Everest has been mentioned in the Buffalo explosion prosecution, in which he was convicted. In 1908 the company adopted new articles providing that the number of shareholders must never exceed fifty, and binding the directors to refuse to register any transfer of shares which will have the effect of increasing the shareholders beyond that number. The directors are also empowered to refuse to register any transfer of shares without giving their reasons. The following were the shareholders on November 30, 1909:—

| | Shares. |
|---|---|
| Vacuum Oil Company, of Rochester, N.Y. | 50,000 |
| Charles Marvin Everest, Rochester, N.Y. | 2,000 |
| Howard B. Case, managing director | 50 |
| Henry Forster Grierson, Farnborough | 10 |
| Louis Chas. Panizzardi, Paris, merchant | 50 |
| Edward Prizer, 29, Broadway, New York | 2,790 |
| Ernest Michaelson, Copenhagen, merchant | 50 |
| Everett Oscar Wader, 29, Broadway, N.Y. | 50 |
| Total | 55,000 |

Mr. Archbold and Mr. Pratt have left the board of directors, which included in November, 1909, Messrs. Everest, Case, Grierson, Prizer, Panizzardi, Michaelson, and Mr. George Percy Whaley, of 29, Broadway, New York. (Probably 29, Broadway, is a copyist's blunder for 26, the Standard's home.)

The Vacuum and the Trade.

One complaint which the English trade makes against the Vacuum Oil Company is this: through the Anglo-American Oil Company the Standard sells large quantities of refined oils to British manufacturers, compounders, or blenders of lubricants. At the same time, through the Vacuum Oil Company, it goes to the customers of these firms and offers to undersell them, saying that it can supply the oils direct. A great deal of correspondence appeared in the Oil and Colourman's Journal on this subject in 1905. For example, one correspondent told this story of his experience with the Standard. He was dealing in illuminating oil, getting all his supplies from the Anglo-American Oil Company. In 1898 his trade was 60,000 gallons per annum, then the "Anglo" sent tank waggons to his customers, and in 1905 it was less than 15,000 gallons. He was persuaded then to devote his attention to motor-car spirit. After he had spent a considerable sum on bricks, concrete, iron doors, etc., for storage purposes, the Anglo-American began delivering broadcast motor spirit to cycle agents. This merchant when he saw his kerosene trade vanishing put up plant for blending, filtering, and refining for the lubricating oil trade. Then he found the Vacuum Oil Company underselling him with his own customers. Of course, it was quite obvious that if the Vacuum Oil Company could by these tactics secure the whole trade of the British lubricating oil blenders, the price of lubricants would go up as suddenly as the price of kerosene always did when the Standard had killed competition. This fact was pointed out in the press, and I understand that the Vacuum's great campaign in 1905 has not destroyed the British makers of lubricants.

Lubricating Steamships.

A gentleman connected with the lubricating trade wrote me the other day of the latest methods of these people. The Standard ships large quantities of oils for lubricating to the Anglo-American by the ordinary steamship lines. In a very attractive little booklet which I have before me, entitled "The Light that Fails Not," issued by the Anglo-American Oil Company in 1902, it is stated that their import of lubricating oil in a year was 462,000 barrels. This is now larger, and is a valuable freight, and so the Vacuum people go to the principal steamship lines, and say, "We give you this freight; you must let us lubricate your boats in return." The result is that the freight which the English maker of lubricants pays on what he buys from the "Anglo" is used to secure business for his trade rivals, who are undercutting him with owners of engines. This may be the American idea of "business," but it will take a great deal of acclimatising here, and the Vacuum is not growing in popularity.

Vacuum on Tramways.

But the Vacuum does not always undersell. Complaint is made that in some of the large tramway undertakings, especially municipal ones, no other lubricant but the Vacuum oils can get accepted, although other oils of equally good lubricating quality can be and are produced by British firms at lower prices than the Vacuum obtains. The reason for this phenomenon is simply that the engineers in charge of the plants refuse to use any other than Vacuum oils. Of course they must be able to supply a plausible reason for this to their superiors, and such an explanation is provided in the "Official Circular" of the Tramways and Light Railways Association for April and May, 1905. This "Circular" reports a paper read at a meeting of the association on April 28, 1905, by Mr. William E. Parish, jun., chief technical expert of the Vacuum Oil Company, on "Friction as Effected by Lubrication." The keynote of Mr. Parish's paper may probably be found in these lines:—

> It is possible to exactly duplicate a fine lubricating oil on the basis of chemical tests with an improperly manufactured article. The results from the use of both oils, while the chemical readings show they are exactly the same, are widely different when applied to actual work.

Translated into plain English this means that the lubricant supplied by the Vacuum's competitors (manufactured out of the Standard Oil Trust's own oils) are by every recognised chemical test as good as theirs, but yet that it is right and proper that the engineer who actually uses the lubricants on the machinery should prefer the Vacuum oils—a very satisfactory doctrine for both the Vacuum Company and the engineer!

Further on in his paper Mr. Parish was good enough to give various tables and experiments relating to what he called:—

> A full efficiency test of a textile mill where an effort is being made to reduce the total horse power by means of applying lubricants more suited to the work than the oils in use.

That means, in plain English, by applying Vacuum oils, whose chemical readings are exactly the same as those of their competitors, and whose virtues can only be discovered by the engineer. In the debate on the paper I notice that Mr. W. Scott Taggart, while congratulating Mr. Parish on his paper, let fall this very valuable observation:—

> I must say there is only one thing that spoils these tests for a society like this or any other society of a scientific character, and it is that these tests are all made by a person or an engineer responsible to the oil company making them. I think they would be of much greater value if carried out by some unprejudiced engineer.

In replying afterwards on this important point, Mr. Parish urged that comparative testing was very difficult, and that

> Engineers for work of this kind absolutely cannot exist outside the large oil companies, where they have practically all the world to operate in, and the unpublished knowledge of many experienced men in this particular line of work to draw upon.

Whether this reply is scientifically sufficient I do not know, but it is obvious that it is not likely to satisfy the competitors of the Vacuum Oil Company, who regard all these novel scientific merits, which cannot be distinguished by any recognised chemical tests, as so much clever "advertising bunkum"—to use Mr. Paul

MILAN.—The truth concerning HOTEL DE LA VILLE. First-class. Up-to-date. Near Cathedral. Post, telegraph and railway office in hotel. Central heating. Suite with baths.

Babcock's language about the Anglo-American Oil Company's orange barrel advertisement. But it can hardly be doubted that tramway and other engineers find such papers as that read by Mr. Parish, jun., before their technical association a very useful argument in justifying their exclusive use of Vacuum lubricants.

A Hint for the Inland Revenue.

Before I leave this subject I may note that Fairplay, the well-known shipping journal, has drawn attention to another aspect of this question, and that is how the Inland Revenue collects income-tax from this combination. As the Vacuum Company is a branch of the Standard it can buy its oils at a high price, and sell them at cost, so that its books would show no profit assessable to income-tax. That profit, of course, would have really vanished into the balance-sheet of the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey. The same applies to the Anglo-American Oil Company, which, according to the evidence in the Missouri case, sells oil here on commission. The lower commission the "Anglo" accepts from the Standard Oil Company of New Jersey, the lower its profits on its balance-sheet, and the less income-tax. But I advise Mr. Lloyd George to look after the "richest Baptist on earth." I fear that he is not paying his proper share towards the expenses of the country where he makes so many millions.

Summary of the Indictment.

Such, then, is the evidence, summarised, of course, which has accumulated in all parts of the world against the Standard Oil Trust. In the examination of this evidence, which has now been completed, I claim to have established the following propositions:—

1. That the Standard Oil group have always aimed, not at fair competition, but at absolute monopoly.

2. That they secretly obtained from the U.S. railroads rebates on the carriage of their own oil, and even larger rebates on all the oil carried for their competitors—thus rendering it to the interest of the railroads to decrease the shipments of "independent" oil, by refusing to furnish adequate cars, and by delaying delivery.

3. That by means of these rebates they were able to undersell their competitors, and either to ruin them or force them to sell out at heavy loss.

4. That, whereas in 1870 they controlled only 10 per cent. of the American oil refining business, by means of these rebates they had secured in 1880 control of 90 per cent.

5. That when the petroleum-well owners constructed pipe-lines to pump their oil to the seaboard refineries, the Standard used vexatious litigation, and even open violence, to obstruct the work, and when it was completed bought up a majority of the stock.

6. That although they were legally "common carriers," the Standard constantly refused to pipe oil for other refiners, and thus forced the well-owners to sell their crude oil to them at their own price, as in practice the Standard had become the only buyer.

7. That an elaborate system of espionage has been established by which information is corruptly obtained from employees as to shipment of independent refiners' oil; and that the oil-dealer who receives such oil is then undersold by Standard agents.

8. That in districts where the feeling against the malpractices of the Trust is strong, the Trust runs bogus "independent" oil companies and "anti-trust" oil shops, and uses them to undersell the oil dealers who really attempt to sell non-Trust oil.

9. That although the rebates are not paid on all the railroads now, there existed as late as 1907—and probably still exist—widespread railroad discriminations giving the Standard advantages over other refiners.

10. That although the Standard constantly claim credit for improving the processes of manufacture and transport, most of the important inventions of the industry were invented by others. The only thing the Trust invented was the secret rebate.

11. That in regard to the Standard's claim to have reduced the price of illuminating oil to the consumer, the Hepburn Congressional Committee found that it had only done so when fresh supplies of petroleum had come on the world's markets, or in order to kill competition.

12. That Mr. Rockefeller and his associates have frequently made on oath before Congressional Committees and in judicial proceedings false statements about the Trust.

13. That the Standard Oil group has systematically adopted the methods of bribery (direct and indirect) in dealing with politicians and newspapers.

14. That in Great Britain it has successfully obtained official support for the maintenance of a dangerously low flash-point of illuminating oil, which enables it to dump here "export oil" that it is not allowed to sell in the majority of the American States.

15. That the Trust has been successfully prosecuted in the courts of its native land, and that in every country that it enters it is the enemy of legitimate commerce. It either ruins the dealers in its commodities, or reduces them to the position of "tied houses."

In fine, the Standard Oil Trust is the most unscrupulous, as well as the most ambitious and successful, combination of capitalists that the world has yet seen. The men it has ruined, the businesses it has wrecked, the little children it has roasted in its oil-fires—all these constitute a hideous record of death and destruction which not all the long prayers and the huge alms of John D. Rockefeller should ever induce the world to forget.

NOTES FROM PARIS.

The Duc de Chartres.

THE Duc de Chartres was very rich. When he gave up Morgan House, Ham Common, to live in France he could afford to buy for a residence the house, or palace, of Prince Demidoff, in the Rue Jean Goujon. His fortune had two sources: the personalty left by Louis Philippe in an ostensible will to the ex-Queen of the French, and in a will signed in England but never witnessed, and intended for her direction, the best part of this fortune was left to the two sons of the Duc d'Orléans. The other source was in his share of the appanage estates of the Ducs d'Orléans, which Napoleon III. alone confiscated, leaving the wide-reaching Penthièvre estates and those of the Condé heritage to the sons of Louis Philippe on the condition of their being sold within a given period. Fictitious sales were effected, so that as soon as the Orleans Princes came back to France they found their chateaux and their endless tenants ready to receive them. The Prince de Joinville could afford to give his only daughter, now the Dowager Duchesse de Chartres, a very comfortable dowry on her marriage, and as his only son is, like General Tom Thumb, "always owned by somebody," he left her all the property that French law allowed him to dispose of by will. The place where the Duc de Chartres died and the beautifully kept game preserves at Aspremont were held on a lease of ninety-nine years at a nominal rent from the Duc d'Aumale. The house, very unpretending but roomy and handsome inside, served formerly as a dower residence of Princesses de Condé. Its cour d'honneur is entered from the village of St. Firmin. The property is completely shut in from village and high road by a high and never-ending wall. On the far side from St. Firmin are lovely grounds planted to right and left of a lawn sloping down to the Nonette river, which there begins to widen into the ponds that surround the castle of Chantilly. This stream is clear, fairly deep, with a gravelly bottom, and alive with roach, bream, gudgeon, and other fish. Beyond it are the garden of Sylvie, of romantic repute, and the forest of Chantilly. The prospect reminded the Duc de Chartres of that seen from the lawn of Orleans House, Twickenham, and is not inferior in beauty. One does not see the kennels of the De Chartres staghounds, which the Duc used to be so fond of hunting with, but which since the death of his son Prince Henri he kept up entirely for the pleasure of his rich neighbours and the profit of the others. While he carefully managed his fortune, he spent freely and handsomely to right and left. The Duchesse had also an open hand and a tenderly charitable heart, with whose emotions the Duc never interfered—au contraire! He allowed, from the passing of the Briand Separation Bill, a large pension to the parish priest of Saint Firmin.

The late Duc de Chartres had the rustic tastes of his far-back Frankish ancestors, who became nearly eleven centuries back Comtes de Paris and Ducs de France. He delighted in sylvan surroundings, in hunting with hounds, in shooting parties, in morning rides in the forests of Chantilly, Halatte, and Compiègne. His baptismal name he owed to that Comte Robert de Paris who faced the Normans and successfully defended his good city, whilst Charles the Bald sought as king to buy them off, and ceded to them the whole territory that has since been Normandy. The name was suggested to Louis Philippe by the historians who had become statesmen in the revolution that raised him to the throne. He had known, more from Scott's novel than from history, all about "Count Robert of Paris." In calling his eldest grandson Comte de Paris, and the second one born after Robert Le Fort, he reminded the partisans of the Comte de Chambord that the line of Capet usurped the throne on the line of Charlemagne. The Duc de Chartres, when volunteering to fight the Germans under Chanzy, in memory of his far-back ancestors' resistance against Norman onslaughts, took the name of Robert Le Fort, as a law ostracising his family had never been repealed. He had at once impulsive bravery and rapid decision. An instance. When his immediate chief, General Briand, said to him, "What sum would I not give to have a general staff map of this country. My only map is one I found in a tourist's guide book." To this Lieutenant Le Fort, his orderly officer, replied, "If, General, you give me thirty-six hours' leave of absence you shall have all the maps you need." General Briand taking him at his word, he started off instantly, only taking time to change his clothes, for Morgan House, and took there from his library the full collection of the maps of France drawn for the use of the General Staff by Marshal Soult's orders in Louis Philippe's reign. He returned in good time to his post. Weather had favoured him in crossing and re-crossing the Channel, and his knowledge of German had been of service to him in a perilous adventure on the way. He had learned it in his four years' stays at Eisenach as a small boy. Gambetta, without suspecting who he really was, promoted him to the grade of major for this service and excellent intelligence work due to his hardihood and Saxon accent in speaking German.

Gambetta spoke of the conduct of Lieutenant Robert Le Fort almost in the same terms used by Victor Emmanuel II. in congratulating him on a deed of daring at Palestro, where he served as an orderly officer to that King: "Cette action porte le cachet d'une belle audace, poussée jusqu'a la témérité." It was accomplished as the Duc de Chartres kept guard at an outpost near the King of Sardinia's lodging. A patrol of Austrians, led by some Bavarian Prince, came up. They were out of pistol-shot range, but the King's orderly fired, none the less, to give the alarm, and then, vaulting into the saddle, made a dash at the party. He took three prisoners. The rest, including the Prince, gave rein and spur to their horses and made off. The Nive cavalry regiment gave in the evening a "punch" in honour of their comrade De Chartres. At the close of the party the hero of the evening received a message to attend on the King at his quarters. He went. Victor Emmanuel, with streaming eyes, embraced him, pinned his own decoration on his breast, and informed him of his profound grief at having to dispense with the services of a young officer whom he loved as a son. To retain him would be to alienate the Emperor Napoleon.

I may here touch on the attachment which the Princess Clotilde of Sardinia had formed. In her early teens she and her sister Pia used to meet at lunch at the Royal Palace their brothers and Sub-Lieutenant de Chartres from the cadets' school of Turin. The Princes Humbert came from the Montcalieri, where they were inured to every military hardship under a stern old general, and the Princesses from the conventual tutelage of the Countess de Foresta. The young hearts went out to each other after the oppressive constraints of the week. Clotilde dropped her shy reserve. She had often prayed never to be a queen, as her sister had as often prayed ardently to be one. The French sub-lieutenant could never mount any throne. He had fortune, the highest possible birth, a heart of gold, and the courage of a lion, with a chivalrous character. And so the poor young thing dreamt out a romance between her twelfth and fifteenth years. The arrival of Prince Napoleon as her suitor dispelled her fond hopes, and made her bridal crown a crown of thorns. The Duc de Chartres was not indifferent to the love-lighted eyes of the Princess; but, agog for an exciting military career and of a temperament that kept him out of dreamland, he easily reconciled himself to the part of an Iphigenia which, for the good of Italy, Cavour and Victor Emmanuel had constrained her to play. He ever after showed a preference for a well-turned, round, tidy figure and cherub cheeks. The Duchesse de Chartres, who gently put up with this preference, was very tall and grew thinner as she advanced in life. Her appearance looked its best as she rode on her well-groomed Irish mount to hunt.

The Duc de Chartres enjoyed the favour of his brother officers as colonel and general, but never won popularity with the rank and file. Nobody could be nicer when he was nice, and nobody more rasping when he chose to be otherwise. He had many German ways that his relation to the late Prince Consort accounted for. One was an attention to small details which was worrying to those under and around him. If quite unpretending, he had in a great degree the pride of birth, and held the old-fashioned view of the private soldier. In some respects he was more a Mecklenburg duke than a French prince; but he had some taking French qualities, one of which was a hospitable instinct. At different times I saw the courts of Denmark, of Marlborough House, and of Portugal at the De Chartres hunts and shooting parties. Badminton could not have done better. Those parties that immediately followed the betrothal of the Princesse Amélie de Paris to the Hereditary Prince of Portugal were scenic beyond description, and yet free from all the ugliness of "heavy-swelldom." It deeply grieved the late Duc to think that nearly all those who appeared at his most brilliant hunting fêtes had vanished like smoke from the world. Nobody could be more loyal to an elder brother whom he looked up to as his king, to his friends, or warmer in his family affections than the deceased prince. The death of his eldest son Robert at the age of twenty-two was a deliverance. The deaths of Prince Henri de Chartres and the Princess Waldemar were bereavements from which he could not recover. Her death gave him a shock that disabled him from attending her funeral. He felt as if she called for him at the anniversary memorial Mass, where he took the chill that carried him away so rapidly. The Duc d'Aumale had a similar feeling at a Mass at Palermo, in memory of his niece, the Duchesse d'Alençon, who lost her life in the Charity Bazaar fire. He not long before fancied he had received a distinct call from the Duchesse d'Aumale. To be ready to answer to it, he had all her trinkets of small value collected, with her gold watches, chains, and his own engagement ring. So as to prevent them ever going to the Rue Drouot Auction Mart, he engaged a working jeweller to come to Chantilly and melt them in a crucible. The smelted gold this man beat into a lump, and the Duc sent it to the mint to be coined. When it came back in coins he declared himself "ready to go," there being no longer "any fear of Auction Mart desecration." He ordered the head valet to burn all his wardrobe and some personal effects that he had set down in a list.

The Madeleine Church never, I dare say, witnessed a wedding so parliamentary as that of M. Paul Dupuy. He and his brothers, if still young, are deputies. His father, the Minister of Commerce and Director of Le Petit Parisien, is a Senator. The bride's father is his Senatorial colleague. M. Senator Dupuy's son-in-law, Arago, who is in the Diplomatic Service and the spokesman of Cannes, lost his seat in the Chamber of Deputies at the last general elections. But his father-in-law, who holds him in paternal affection, hopes soon to help him into another one. Never, since the gala soirée at the Opera House in compliment to their Bulgarian Majesties, was such a gathering of legislators and their wives, with the widows of defunct ones, and the better halves of shelved ones. All the three Presidents attended. The company I mention left hardly room for other guests, though they were great traders, Presidents and Judges of Tribunals of Commerce from everywhere and boss manufacturers.

M. Arago, Senator Dupuy's son-in-law, belonged to the deputation sent to present Beauvais tapestries to the German Crown Princess on the eve of her marriage. He had been a frequent guest at the Villa Wenden, the residence at Cannes of Grand Duchess Anastasia Michaelevna, her mother, and had been acquainted with the bride from her childhood. She looks like M. Camille Pelletan, but with the prettiness of youth and of her sex; has his piquancy and his keen sense of the ridiculous. While trying to look, as the Emperor would have her, the future Majesty and the queen of a State function, she seemed vastly amused. Off the official stage she and the Grand Duchess mother expressed in the friendliest way the kind regard in which they held M. Arago. He is a brother of Mme. Benjamin Constant, whose late husband painted that portrait of Queen Victoria now hanging in the dining-room at Windsor Castle.

M. Clemenceau's comedy, the "Voile du Bonheur," was revived last week at the Porte Saint Martin Theatre, one of the actors, M. Mosnier, who plays the part of Li-Kiang, belonging to the cast of the first night nine years ago at the Renaissance. Like Renan's "Abbesse de Jouarre," M. Clemenceau's "Veil of Bliss" is not so much a comedy for the stage as a philosophical tale put into dialogue form for the pleasure and entertainment of a refined and literary public. The scene is laid in China, for no other reason, I suppose, than that M. Clemenceau has been for the last forty years a passionate collector of Boccaro teapots, of pentachrome jars of the Ming dynasty, and of Outamaro water-colours—the latter, of course, being, not Chinese, but Japanese.

You know the tale: A mandarin, Chang-I, has lost his sight after two years' marriage. Yet he lives a life of complete happiness with his wife, his son, and his friends. His bliss is wrecked by a Western barbarian who restores his sight. Chang-I sees that his friends rob him, his son despises him, and his wife does everything that would entitle a husband to a divorce. But this would break up his family, and Chang-I prefers to lose his sight a second time. M. Clemenceau does not tell us whether he recovers his happiness. Ignorance may be bliss, but doubt, it would seem, must be more torturing than visible misfortune. M. Signoret played remarkably the part of Chang-I, and the scenery was full of delightful local—that is, Chinese—colour.

THE NEW PEPYS.

December 5: I taking up my pen after soe great an intervall to resume writing in my diary; from which I have been hindered now these four months by mine old distemper of the eyes; albeit my doctor have discovered some new-fangled name for it, as is the way of the Faculty, who for ever lighting upon novel disorders and these but the old ones modishly rechristened. Whereby I am reminded of the case of one Ephraim Scroggins, for forty years parish clerk under mine uncle Matthew Pepys, vicar of Knapton-Parva in Suffolk; he once saying of himself: "First I was a beetle, then did I become a sextant, and now they calls me a virgin."

To the Club, where all the talk is of elections, and no one have a word to spare for aught else. I chatting with General Wigg, who do commend Balfour's card of the Referendum as one mighty well plaid; and I do observe that most of our Tory journals expound this same view. But Lord! I cannot but find these kaleidoskopic changes mighty bewildering; the more so when I do remember what foul scorn my Tory friends did cast on this principle of Referendum a few months since, when certain Radicals were proposing it as the criterion of the Chancellor's Budget. And then it was anathema, but to-day a blessed Mesopotamia, which to a plain man is strangely perplexing.

December 6: I this day to my friend Pearsall's, of Copsley, in the County of Loamshire, Esquire, who is again up for that division and I am to help him, even as I did last January, with his canvass. Among the friends whom he have there assembled to help him is again Lady Bridgworth, she looking fairer than ever—to my great content.

To a meeting this night in the parish schoolroom. Much stirring oratory, I speaking third. And I did make the audience laugh and put them in good humour by telling them the pretty story of the country farmer, the sick horse and the veterinary chirurgeon. Which story is to this effect: The horse being sick, the farmer did summon the veterinary, he prescribing a certain powder, and instruct the farmer how to administer the same—to wit, by blowing it down the horse's throat through a tube or trumpet of stiff paper. Called again the veterinary next day to inquire after the horse, and is met by the farmer's wife.

"And how," saith he, "is the horse this morning?"

To whom the woman: "Oh, the horse be well enow! But my old man he be mortal bad. And 'tis all along of they powders."

"How, then, is this?" saith the veterinary. "Did he not place the powder in a paper tube and blow, as I instructed him?"

"Aye, he did that sure enough," made answer the woman; "but the horse blew fust."

Soe when I have tickled the rusticks with this story and catcht their attention, I did enlarge on serious politicks in a fervent oration, wherein I did prove how the Lords' veto alone do stand betwixt this country and the bottomless pit; yet did I allow the need of reformation in that Upper House. Whereat my old enemy, the village cobbler, fall to shouting out: "Don't mend 'em. End 'em." I retorting, "Same as you do with the boots of those hapless folk who entrust them to you for repair." Which, albeit personal and wholly libellous, methought happy enough for a publick platform, and provoke the cobbler to such indecent blasphemies that he is presently ejected foaming.

Anon defending Balfour, and in so doing am catcht up by a little wag of the villagers in the following manner. Say I, "Of course, no man is perfect——"

"I beg your pardon, governor," interrupted the little wag, jumping up at the back of the room. "Some men are perfect. And I myself do know of one."

"I would fain see this paragon of yours, my friend," said I.

"You will never see him," he made rejoinder. "I myself have never seen him. But I have often heard of him. I am always hearing of him. He was my old woman's first husband."

December 7: Vext by the ill-election tidings in this morning's papers—seven Radical gains to one Tory. I feeling as if I must pinch some one, and lamenting my wife's untimely absence. But Pearsall's pointer pup running under my feet in the shrubbery after breakfast, I kickt the brute for his clumsiness. Soe better.

Anon I go canvassing with Lady Bridgworth among the labourers of the village, whom we catcht at home in their dinner-hour; and they are, for the most part, a meagre, insensate lot, being nowise concerned with high politics, but all their present thoughts are for a certain local charity known as Plumridge's Gift, being an annual sum of £1 5s., distributable in sums of 2s. 6d. between ten poor housekeepers of the parish, who shall be selected by the vicar and churchwardens. Concerning which the Radicals have put about the wicked lie that, if the Tories be returned, the Vicar will be granted a toll of one-half of this £1 5s. for his own uses; but as a counter-stroke thereto (not, methinks, in the circumstances unjustified) some of Pearsall's people have spread the rumour that if the Radicals be returned the Baptist Minister will pocket the whole. So this is the burning issue of the election with the villagers. And how their votes will go do depend wholly upon whether of the two they shall swallow, the black lie or the white counter-fib. And I pray it may be the latter.

December 8: Better election news this morning—six Tory gains to two losses, which do serve to hearten us. And I am most of all pleased to see that my young friend, Ninian Crichton-Stuart is in for Cardiff.

Canvassing this day in an adjacent village, where is sad ignorance on the subject of the Veto, which do figure in these yokels' minds in various strange guises; for one do confuse it with the restriction on moving pigs (for the prevention of swine-fever); another with the compulsory fumigation of his cottage after measles; another with the interference of the school-attendance officer; while yet another do somehow connect it with the canker in his brussels-sprouts. Nor can my utmost endeavours persuade them otherwise. And yet, an the Radical be returned, their Press will all hail his victory as a signal triumph for reasoned enlightenment and freedom. Yet dare I to hope that Pearsall will get the better of their candidate in the polling, and thereby administer to them a triumphant object-lesson in the consistible logick of our Tory cause.

December 9: This is polling-day. I busy from morn to night conveying voters by motor to the poll. But as I am starting to bring up my last lot from an outlying hamlet, come one of our workers (who is potman at the village ale-house) and warn me that the four men I am after, albeit they have promised to vote Tory, are in truth Radicals, who are pluming themselves upon a free ride at Pearsall's expence. I in a quandary; for I am under pledge to these men to convey them and it mislike me to go back on my word. Soe I give a hint to the chauffeur, and, when we are half-way to the polling station, with these men aboard, the car break down, and they are too late to record their votes. I priding myself not a little on my neat stratagem.

Anon discover that the potman have been bought by the other side to cajole me; soe by this iniquitous treachery four good votes have been lost to Pearsall. I mad. But Lord! These be Radical tactics all over, to whose lying and deceitful devices there is no limit. And may Heaven confound them!

THE TRUE EXPLANATION.

(A Philosopher's Reflections on the Polling.)

Both sides with irritation glow,
Both in a horrid pet are,
And both convincing reasons show
Why they have not done better.

"A stale old register we had;"
And neither party waver
In vowing this for them was bad,
But in their rivals' favour.

"The other side like blazes lied;
Old Nick could scarce excel 'em."
(It always is "the other side,"
When lies are told, who tell 'em.)

"Intimidation lent its force,
Corruption barefaced, shameless"—
Upon the other side, of course;
For they themselves were blameless.

In fact, to judge by the complaints
Of losers both and winners,
The grumblers' side were plaster saints,
Their foes Satanic sinners.

Meanwhile, my simple honest souls,
Philosophers amused are
At you, the victims of the polls,
Who both so much ill-used are.

'Twas e'er the way of those who thought
To gain five tricks, and gain one,
To seek their failure's cause in aught
Beside the true and plain one.

The People are not abject fools;
To common sense they're running.
Don't fash yourselves. They're not the tools
Of either party's cunning.

They size you both from top to toe
With eyes as keen as ferret's,
And then proportioned votes bestow
According to your merits.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

THE Chinese, dear Lady Betty, when we were at war with them more than half a century ago, dreaded especially our big drum, which they imagined to be a terrible instrument of destruction. They discovered at the restoration of peace, to their great astonishment, that the drum was "a large hollow thing which made much noise and was absolutely harmless." The General Election has rendered it obvious to all that, like the big drum, Lord Rosebery is "absolutely harmless" to the party he opposes.

Irreverent Unionists now apply the lines from "The Hunting of the Snark" to the programme provided by Mr. Arthur Balfour for the purposes of the Election:—

"Other maps are such shapes, with Their islands and capes!
But we've got our brave captain
To thank
That he gave us the best—
A perfect and absolute blank."

* * * * *

They are, moreover, indisposed to countenance the efforts to represent by ingenious and intricate mathematical calculations that the defeat is a victory, and sarcastically quote the verse:—

"Taking three as the subject to reason
About—
A convenient number to state—
We add seven and ten, and then multiply out
By one thousand diminished by Eight.
The result we proceed to divide, as
You see,
By nine hundred and ninety and two.
Then subtract seventeen, and the Answer must be Exactly and perfectly true."

The decline of the political influence of the press in England is attracting most attention at the moment. Almost all the great newspapers have been fighting desperately since the dissolution to produce a reaction against the Government, and to the titanic effort cannot be traced the capture of even a single seat. A leading Tory peer maintains that the "combined endeavours of the Unionist newspapers have not caused the transference of five thousand votes to the Opposition." Compared with the influence possessed by the press here twenty years ago, when a "leading article" would overthrow a Government, the extent of the decline becomes obvious.

* * * * *

It is, moreover, no longer so generally believed as it was a fortnight since that a general election injures trade. The election has caused over a million of money to be spent directly, and more indirectly, throughout the country, much of which amount would not have been distributed in ordinary circumstances, or would have been taken abroad by those who generally leave for the Continent early in December. Electors when excited, besides, spend money more freely than they would in a normal condition. There must, of course, have been tradesmen, especially in the West-End of London, whose customary sales have been diminished through the election, but many in the district express surprise that personally it has caused them no obvious injury.

Mr. Albert Hartshorne, the distinguished antiquary and the chief authority on Old English glass, died on Thursday last at Worthing after a short illness. A most learned and cultivated man, the late Mr. Hartshorne was singularly simple-minded and gentle, and utterly unaffected. His devotion to his friends was only equalled by their devotion to him, which he fully merited, for a kinder and more loyal man there was not, nor a more charming companion. It is most painful to write this appreciation of one whose friendship it was a great compliment to have possessed, and is a severe blow to have lost.—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

ROUND THE MARKETS.

POLITICAL FEVER ABATES—MARKETS REGAINING THEIR EQUILIBRIUM—SPURT IN COLOMBIAN BONDS—REASSURING NEWS ABOUT THE COUPONS—HONDURAS AND MR. TAFT—PERUVIAN CORPORATION REPORT.

THE Stock Markets last week continued for a time to suffer from the disappointment over the polling results. It is a pity that the House does not exercise more control over its political emotions at these times, for such vagaries as have been witnessed during the past week or so are certainly not calculated to enhance its reputation as a business institution in the eyes of level-headed men, whatever the party to which they belong. To a dispassionate observer nothing could have been more ludicrous than the elation that followed Mr. Balfour's Referendum speech, and caused the simultaneous "bull" movement in Consols and "bear" movement in Coalition Majorities. As usually happens, the House's impetuous judgment proved to be entirely wrong, and following the Unionists' failure either to sweep Lancashire or to put Radicalism in London to rout came a spurt in Majorities from 45 to 134 and a set-back in Consols from 79 9/16 to 78 1/2. The pendulum, in fact, swung from one extreme to another, but it has since been moving more reasonably. At first those people who had lost heavily on their political bets were inclined to revenge themselves by going "bears" of Consols. But they soon thought better of it, for with the trade of the country, as exemplified in the last few days by the Board of Trade Returns, rapidly expanding towards new record figures, and with money cheap and likely to become cheaper in the new year, Consols are not safe things to "bear" at their present level. At the time of writing markets seem to have found an equilibrium.

Among the few movements of outstanding interest have been the rises of from 2 to 6 points in Colombian securities, including Colombian Government Threes, the various guaranteed issues of the National Railway, and the 5½ per cent. debentures of the Great Northern Central Railway of Colombia. No official news has come to hand, but a cable said to be authentic reached this side the other day to the effect that the Colombian Government would in the new year meet the due interest on its various obligations plus arrears. Colombia, it may be remembered, incurred default last July. In August she managed to meet the July 1 coupon on her own 3 per cent. Consolidated bonds, but the interest on the railway obligations that fell due either in July or October has not yet been paid. For the sake of the country and the bondholders it is to be hoped the period of default is about to end. Colombia a few years ago appeared to have entered upon a new era of existence, much being hoped for from the establishment of railways planned during the presidency of General Reyes, and it is a great pity that political disturbances have since been allowed to interfere with the programme. Given a stable and progressive Government and there is no reason why the State should not, as time goes on, attain to a considerable degree of prosperity.

The bonds of Honduras, the oldest defaulting State of Central America, have been inquired for on the reference made in President Taft's Message to the steps being taken to rehabilitate the finances of the country. The market quite reasonably argues that Mr. Taft would scarcely have troubled to refer to Honduras unless there were good reasons for believing that the settlement of the debt was in sight. It may be recalled that an option has been given to Messrs. Morgan by a majority of the bondholders to purchase each £100 of the bonds, with overdue coupons, for £15. This option expired on August 4, but was renewed until February 4 next, owing to the negotiations which were carried on under the auspices of the United States Government not having been completed. A session of the Honduras Congress will be held in January, and it is hoped that sanction will then be given to arrangements now being made between the American banking group and the Honduras Government. In the circumstances Honduras bonds at 11½ look a likely speculative purchase.

With the dividend statement of the Peruvian Corporation for the year ended June 30 I have already dealt. The report shows that the chief source from which the Corporation derives its revenues, namely, its railways and lake steamers, produced good results. The total receipts from the transport industry were £916,477; this amount is £69,704 less than in the previous year, but the difference is more than accounted for by the fact that the company's own material carried has not this time been included in the returns; the revenue from public, in other words profitable, traffic discloses a gain of £48,000. Guano takings, always an uncertain item, declined by £37,839 to a total of £103,015, but the directors look for increased receipts from this department in the current year. The board announces that arrangements have been made to purchase the Guaqui-La Paz Railway, which it believes will turn out a remunerative investment. At present the corporation works this line under a lease from the Bolivian Government, and at June 30 a sum of £216,000 was owing to the corporation, in respect of advances made to the Government on construction account, at 6 per cent. The purchase price has been fixed at £374,912, less the amount due to the corporation. So far in the current year the Peruvian Corporation has made good headway. From July 1 to November 30 the railway and steamer revenue amounted to $4,106,254, an increase of $206,945, or about 5 per cent.

RAILWAYS.

Home Rails Firm—Stocks to Buy—Yankees Still Out of Favour—Argentines in Demand—The New Rosario and Western Railway—A Bond to Leave Alone.

Home Rails in the last few days have shown symptoms of renewed strength. Favourable trade returns and the better labour news have combined to stiffen the market, which does not need much encouragement in view of the moderate level at which prices stand in relation to the dividends that are expected in the new year. Such stocks as Brighton A, Chatham first preference, Great Northern deferred, South-Western deferred, Midland deferred, Great Western ordinary, and Great Central 1891 preference, to name what are perhaps the most promising, are still worth purchasing by investors able to pay for what they buy—many of my readers who followed my recent notes are holders already at lower prices. So far as I can see, the only danger for Home Rails in the next few months is the possibility of a weak bull account being built up, but for the present this danger is not very apparent.

Americans in the early part of last week suffered a fresh break. There was nothing of an adverse nature in the Presidential Message, which, in fact, was of the kind that should soothe Wall Street's nerves. But in the present slack condition of American trade and in the absence of a public demand for shares it is bull points of a very positive kind that are needed to send prices up. The list has rallied from the worst as the outcome of a completion of urgent pool liquidation, but purchases of American common stocks hardly strike me as attractive just now. Argentine Rails still wear a healthy look. The period has now been passed when the crops are in danger from late frosts, and speaking generally the outlook for the agricultural and pastoral industry is very promising. For the investor I still regard the ordinary and deferred stocks of the Central Argentine as the pick of the basket. Traffics are being piled up by this company in wonderful fashion.

A newcomer in the Argentine Railway world was publicly announced the other day, with the title of the Rosario and Western Railway. The principal object of the company is to acquire a concession from the Provincial Government of Santa Fé for the construction of a metre gauge line from the Port of Rosario to Canada, San Antonio, a distance of about 140 miles. The share capital of £1,000,000 is taken by the vendors as the purchase price, and the public is asked to subscribe at 95 per cent. for an issue of £540,000 five per cent. first mortgage debenture bonds, part of a total of £1,500,000. In other words, the public is to find the money to build an entirely new line with all the attendant risks—they are not nominal risks—and if the line prove a success the reward goes to the vendors, the public being restricted to a trifle over 5 per cent. It is really not good enough. Five per cent. is all very well if there be security, but the security merely of a concession is altogether too nebulous. Therefore as the public is asked to take the risks it should be offered a speculator's terms. There are other considerations which make me advise my readers to leave these Rosario and Western Railway bonds alone. In the original prospectus it was stated that the company had been formed with, inter alia, the right under a concession granted by the Province of Santa Fé to construct and equip a new port at Rivadavia, 34 kilometres north of Rosario, and that it had the right to import material for the construction, equipment, and exploitation of this undertaking free of taxation, direct or indirect, existing or hereafter to be created, during a period of twenty years. These statements promptly drew a letter from the Minister of Public Works of the Argentine Republic to the effect that they were incorrect. The Minister declared that the National Congress alone was enabled to grant a concession for the construction of a port and to grant freedom from import duties, and that no law had been passed giving these privileges to the company mentioned. It is true that the prospectus generally advertised was amended in a manner that satisfied the protests raised by the Argentine Minister, but that the statements in question should ever have been made suggests either ignorance or carelessness to a degree that certainly does not raise one's confidence in the proposed undertaking. Since the above was written the President of the Argentine Republic has published a decree to the effect that the National Government does not recognise the validity of the concession granted by the Province of Santa Fé, and will not permit the construction of the company's line without the sanction of Congress. Such being the case the directors of the company apparently have no option but to return the moneys subscribed by applicants for the debentures. This course, it is already announced, will be taken by the French bank that receives Continental subscriptions as soon as it has received confirmation that the announced decree is official and irrevocable.

RUBBER.

Linggi Rumours—The Vallambrosa Position.

Although business in the Rubber share market remains quiet, there has at times been a fair amount of buying shared between a few of the moderate-priced issues. The heavy floriners have been dull and featureless, would-be sellers complaining because prices are too low, and prospective buyers preferring to wait for a drop of a point or two before venturing into the market. When dealers are not engaged in political discussions market gossip is centred on the rumoured Linggi subsidiary, the issue of which, it is said, is being held over for more favourable market conditions. The new company, it is understood, will take over one of the outlying Linggi estates. Financially, of course, Linggi is the strongest of the big producers, and it cannot be said that any necessity for increasing its cash resources renders a division of the property desirable. The company, however, possesses more than one estate large enough to merit the dignity of independent administration, and as the Kamuning flotation provided so acceptable a bonus to Linggi shareholders it may be that the directors contemplate a further slicing of the melon. While no great anxiety is felt in the market as to the ability of the big producers to continue to earn dividends which compared with their modest capitals would in any other industry be regarded as stupendous, market sentiment is undergoing a change, and there are many who realise that as the estates of the younger companies reach maturity and competition increases it will become increasingly difficult for the older issues to maintain their lead unless an active development policy provides them with a substantial acreage of young trees. The cash and investments held by the Linggi company are quite large enough to enable it to develop its large uncultivated area, and the proposed flotation may perhaps mark the opening of a new chapter in Linggi history.

Anyway, the Linggi market is worth watching if only for the purpose of taking advantage of any spurt in the price to exchange into shares of coming producers. A comparison of Linggi with Vallambrosa does not reflect favourably on the latter, for while the policy of the former has enabled it to accumulate resources apart from its estate far in excess of its original capital of £100,000, Vallambrosa, although eminently successful as a dividend payer, has allowed its estate expenditure to exceed its capital resources by several thousand pounds. The new area which Vallambrosa is opening can no doubt readily be financed by temporary loans and bank overdrafts, but recurring deficits have eventually to be met either by the issue of fresh capital or by the allocation to reserve of substantial sums which would otherwise reach the shareholders' pockets in the shape of dividends. The proud position which Vallambrosa has attained rests very largely upon its 930 acres of old rubber from which some magnificent dividends have been earned, but it is a question whether old rubber cannot be bought at too high a price. It must be remembered that Vallambrosa's young rubber is worth perhaps no more than that possessed by some score of other companies, and if we separate the young rubber from its old 930 acres an analysis of the company's position may be obtained:—

|---|---|
| 506,000 shares at 39s. | £986,700 |
| Deduct Scale Valuation of 957 acres of rubber planted 1905 onwards, and 725 acres now being opened | 197,211 |
| Market Valuation of 930 acres of old rubber | £789,489 |
| | Say £848 per acre. |

Reasonable enough as is the valuation of the younger areas of 957 and 725 acres, it may be doubted whether the older rubber will always command a market value of £848 per acre, and the equanimity with which the market in a time of depression bears so high a valuation is a proof of the unbounded confidence which exists as to the probable course of prices for plantation companies' outputs during the next few years. High profits for only one or two years would not justify so extraordinarily high a valuation, and any argument which supports the payment of heavy premiums for the shares of the older companies to my mind supports with equal force the contention that the acreage valuations of the well-managed younger companies must steadily rise in value.

Strathmore—The Glen Bervie Report.

Last week I called attention to the claims of Tandjong as compared with United Serdang, and on some inquiry for the shares an advance of ½ has been scored, raising the quotation to 2¾ premium. Malacca, an old favourite which has temporarily fallen on evil times, is again making a bid for popular favour, and on active support from Paris a rise of 1⅛ has been marked since the last make-up. After rushing up to ⅞ premium, Strathmore is rather easier on profit-taking. Offers of the new shares in the latter company have now been posted, and recent purchasers should claim their rights of three new shares for every ten old. The new issue will provide the company with ample working capital, and, having now surmounted its early difficulties, Strathmore should make rapid progress during the coming year. From the housekeeping point of view, the continued rise in the price of tea is to be deplored, but holders of Duckwari Tea and Rubbers, which I mentioned last week at 2s. 9d., will not regret the rise in the shares to 3s. 3d. Tea profits are, in a general way, more stable than those derived from most other forms of tropical agriculture. Coffee cultivation, for instance, is very largely a gamble with the weather, and the unusually heavy rains which prevailed in the blossoming season this year largely accounts for the reduced crop now reported by Glen Bervie. The directors are not, of course, to be held responsible for the weather; and their decision to cut out the old Liberian coffee appears to be a wise one. Many of the best companies, in fact, have decided to dispense altogether with catch-crops, and, although the interplanting of coffee may occasionally give very satisfactory results, investors would do well not to base any great expectations on catch-crops as a source of dividends.

The 2 per cent. now declared by Glen Bervie is so extremely moderate a dividend for a rubber company that my readers may, perhaps, wonder why the amount involved was not carried forward to next year's accounts. The explanation is probably to be found in the excellent bargain which the Glen Bervie directors made on the formation of the company that for the first three years the vendors' shares should not rank for dividend until the shares held by the public had received a dividend of 5 per cent. for the year. To carry forward the current year's profit would possibly have meant distributing one-fourth of it next year to the holders of the vendor shares. It is a rubber proposition, apart from the question of catch-crops, that Glen Bervie should be judged, and upon this head the report gives no ground for dissatisfaction. During the year under review an additional 700 acres have been planted, and by April next the acreage under Para rubber should be increased to 1,600 acres. So far, the cost to the company has been under £20 per planted acre, and, as tapping of the Para trees commences next year, it may reasonably be expected that the time is not very far distant when its advantages of low capitalisation and able management will enable Glen Bervie to outdistance many of its rivals.

Vine and General Meeting—Madagascar Prospects—Bukit Sembawang.

The announcement of the results achieved with the Guiguet machine was well received by shareholders at the Vine and General meeting last week, and the resolution to purchase the patent rights was passed by the meeting without a word of criticism or a single dissentient voice. Based chiefly upon the actual results obtained by the operation of the machines on the Madagascar company's property, the account given to the meeting by the Vine directors is of especial interest to Madagascar shareholders. Not only is the number of vines per acre found in the latter company's territory larger than the prospectus estimate, but the expected yield per vine is found in practice to exceed the estimate by 30 per cent., thus making for economy of operation. The cost of extracting rubber has so far worked out at 1s. 4d. per lb., and a reduction to a lower figure is looked for as the company's operations are extended. It may be remembered that the Madagascar company's prospectus estimates were based upon an expected yield of 4 kilos of rubber for every 100 kilos of virgin bark treated, but in practice from 5 to 5½ per cent. of rubber has been obtained from virgin bark, while as much as 4 per cent. has been obtained by passing through the machine bark which had already been drained of its rubber by crude native methods. Within five months of its incorporation the Madagascar company was able to complete its organisation, to receive and erect the plant, to recruit and secure labour, to accumulate stocks of bark, and to make its first shipment of rubber. Regular fortnightly shipments are now being made, and although recent sales of the rubber at 4s. per lb. exceed the prospectus estimate, manufacturers intimate that higher prices will be paid for the commodity when a regular and sufficient supply can be relied upon. Methods of preparation leave some room for improvement, and it is hoped that the sheeting and creping plant which has already been despatched to the estate should within a very short time enable Madagascar to turn out rubber of a quality which will compare favourably with the already well-known brands of plantation sheet and crepe.

The statement put before the meeting would appear to justify the payment of an interim dividend to Vine shareholders at an early date, and a Madagascar subsidiary is talked of, the successful flotation of which should go a long way towards providing the directors with sufficient funds to wipe out the 100 per cent. bonus claim of the Madagascar preference shareholders.

Bukit Sembawang is an important issue which is being made this week by the group which was responsible for the Bukit Mertajam and Taiping flotations. The underwriting has been much sought after, and the issue promises to be a success. Mr. Bryce values the property at £262,000, and the purchase price has been fixed at £224,000, the original vendors taking the whole of the purchase price in shares. A comparison of the age and acreage details given in the prospectus with the report of the meetings of the vendor companies in Singapore shows that the prospectus has been prepared on cautious lines, and that the shareholders in the vendor companies, in agreeing to take the whole of the purchase consideration in fully-paid shares, have been largely influenced by the prospective advantages which are likely to be derived from a freer market and a London share quotation.

MINES.

Unsettled Markets—The Drop in "Tanks"—Rand Returns—Ivanhoe's Dividend Prospects.

Unsettled conditions prevailed in the mining markets last week, partly in consequence of political influences. Although in no section was business very active features of interest were not altogether lacking. Perhaps the most noteworthy movement was in Tanganyikas, which slumped on the issue of the annual report, which shows the company not only to be already indebted to the Zambesia Company, but also to require further financial assistance. Besides the interest on its own first and second debentures, to which is to be added a third debenture, the Tanganyika has guaranteed the interest on the Benguella Railway debentures, and on the bonds of the Rhodesia-Katanga Junction Railway. Excluding the third debenture, which is to carry 6 per cent. interest and be repayable in three years, but the amount of which is not yet known, the Tanganyika's principal liabilities are calculated to amount to over £200,000 per annum, failing conversion of the first debentures into shares. The interest on these bonds is being paid in scrip, in further debentures, thereby increasing the lien upon profits ahead of the shareholders. The Tanganyika has always appeared to be a concern having enormous possibilities, and the report is considered satisfactory so far as it goes regarding the opening up of the large area in which the company is interested. But the prospect of substantial dividends on the share capital is still remote, and market men who have not forgotten the experiences of the Chartered Company have adopted the view, in consequence of the financial question, that the premium on Tanganyika shares is more likely to be reduced than increased in the early future.

The drop in "Tanks" temporarily cast a gloom over the Rhodesian group as a whole. It encouraged bear operations, and in addition there is said to have been a certain amount of realising of stock pawned with the Scotch banks. With the turn of the half-year, however, it is hoped that business will revive, and a general rally in Rhodesians is expected, but those who buy at current prices should not hold too long, or they may miss their opportunity. Not a few people already hold Rhodesians bought at a higher level, and are waiting for a chance to get out.

West Africans have been further depressed by liquidation on the part of weak or tired "bulls," but Kaffirs have been fairly well maintained. Considering the recent falling off in the labour supply, the latest Transvaal gold production statistics do not make at all a bad showing; indeed, the daily average output last month was in excess of that for October. There was a net decrease of 2,000 in the labour complement of the gold mines in November, but from this month onwards a fair influx of natives is anticipated, and it is believed that the labour movement will be greatly encouraged by the Union Government's regulations formed with the object of putting the matter of recruiting in the South African territories on a more reasonable and business-like basis.

Since I last referred to the position of the Ivanhoe Gold Corporation the shares have fallen in price to 6⅝, which is certainly disappointing. For several years past the company has maintained its dividends at 24 per cent. per annum, but a reduction in the rate is now in prospect. The manager of the mine has cabled that he considers it advisable to reduce the grade of the ore treated so as to yield a profit of £18,000 instead of £20,000 per month. This, the secretary states, will leave an annual profit, which, together with income from other sources, will amount to over £220,000. A reduction of £2,000 per month is equivalent to nearly 2s. 5d. per share per annum. Assuming, therefore, that the annual dividends will have to be reduced by 2s. 6d.—that is to 21s. 6d. per share—the yield on the £5 shares at the current market price of 6⅝ will be fully 16 per cent. So that the fall in the shares would appear to have gone quite far enough, if not too far, especially having regard to the fact that in addition to substantial ore reserves, the corporation has invested in high-class securities a sum equivalent to fully £1 per Ivanhoe share.

Mexico Mines of El Oro—Foreign Attack on two of the Directors — Chairman Accused of Undue Pessimism.

Those of my readers who are holders of shares in the Mexico Mines of El Oro were probably very much surprised last week to receive, or to read in the press, a circular announcing that a demand for a special meeting had been sprung upon the board, the object being the removal from office of Mr. R. T. Bayliss, the chairman, and Mr. J. H. M. Shaw, another director, and the transfer of the company's offices from the present address in Cornhill. The requisition, signed by French or other foreign shareholders purporting to hold 27,790 out of the 180,000 shares in the company, gave not a single reason for the attack on the chairman and his colleague, which is the more surprising seeing that a representative of the foreign interests has recently joined the board. Since the first intimation was given by the secretary that an extraordinary meeting will be held next Friday another member of the board, Mr. R. M. Bird, has announced that he desires to associate himself fully with the wish of the requisitionists, although it would appear that this gentleman was present at a meeting of the directors when the original circular, which contained a defence of the two members attacked, was drawn up. Mr. Bird is connected with the firm of S. Pearson and Son, Limited, who in a communication to the press say:—

> The action of the French shareholders is due to the belief that there is a want of sympathy between themselves and the London board, more particularly with the chairman. They complain especially of the pessimistic nature of the chairman's last speech as entirely unjustified, and as having been made without any previous intimation to their representative on the board. They point to the monthly returns and the manager's last report in justification of their view. They assert that the effect of that speech was to create a panic in the shares of a highly successful mine.

The Mexico El Oro has done very well in the short period of six years the company has been in existence. Since the productive stage was reached three years ago it has distributed £315,000 in dividends (on a capital of £180,000), has provided a sum of £5,583 for the equipment of the property, has written off out of profit £59,043 of the preliminary expenditure incurred, and has to-day a cash reserve in London of over £90,000. Had the policy of the management been to divide profits up to the hilt, and had the chairman indulged in flights of undiluted optimism at the annual meetings, it is quite possible that the price of the shares might have reached even a higher level than the £10 touched some months ago, when a Mexican mining boom was engineered in Paris. I well remember that when the skilfully worked up enthusiasm over Mexico El Oros and Carmens was at its height about the middle of the current year one of the principal parties engaged in the booming crusade objected to my criticism and assured me that Mexicos would climb up to £15 and Carmens to £5 apiece. My reply was that although the Mexico was a fine mine the position, according to the official data, did not justify the then existing quotation of about £10, to say nothing of £15. Mr. Bayliss, instead of assisting in "boosting" the shares, has always maintained the cautious attitude of a practical mining man who feels his responsibility towards the general body of shareholders. If only there were more directors really experienced in mining matters and believers in showing both sides of the shield as frankly as possible the investing public would have less reason to complain of disappointments, the great majority of which arise not from over-caution but from undue optimism.

Rand Results Reviewed—Van Ryn's Satisfactory Report—A Record Yield.

One or two of the mines of the Albu group have not been making a very grand showing of late owing in some measure to labour scarcity, but the Van Ryn, which has been among the steadiest of the Rand's profit earners for a good time, has managed to fully maintain its position. In more than one respect the report for the financial year ended June 30 last, which Van Ryn shareholders meet together in London to-day to consider, constitutes a record in the history of the company. As will be seen from the appended summary of the last two years' results, the quantity of material treated, the revenue and net profit, were all larger in 1909-10 than before:—

|---|---|---|
| Ore Milled | 392,911 tons | 358,230 tons |
| Mining Revenue | £560,772 | £551,138 |
| ,, Expenses | 288,829 | 277,664 |
| ,, Profit | 271,943 | 273,474 |
| Total Revenue | 291,301 | 280,627 |
| Net Profit | 287,928 | 279,386 |
| Dividends | 225,000 | 225,000 |
| Taxes, &c. | 63,986 | 56,483 |
| Brought Forward | 19,228 | 21,325 |
| Carried Forward | 18,170 | 19,228 |

The net profit for last year was swelled by the inclusion of a sum of £10,086, officially described as being "balance of account for amounts charged against working expenditure in excess of actual cost." Dividends for both periods were at the rate of 45 per cent. per annum.

Since the close of the financial year reviewed in the report, the grade of ore treated has been further reduced, but costs have also come down, and the profit has been maintained at just over £25,000 a month. When the whole of the work in connection with the reconstruction of two mills is completed—it is expected to be finished in course of the current financial year—the monthly returns should show further expansion as regards tonnage, but whether or not the profits are likely to be materially affected depends upon the policy of the management. In this connection shareholders will no doubt be given some information at to-day's meeting. Even though dividends may not be increased in the early future, however, the shares appear to be one of the best possible purchases in the Kaffir market at the present time. At 4½ Van Ryns yield 10 per cent. per annum on the basis of last year's distributions, and the company is in a strong position as regards ore reserves, the development of which it should be noted has all been paid for out of past profits. Moreover, recent developments in a portion of the company's property hitherto unworked have been of such a character that the managing director says in his report he confidently anticipates being able to add considerably during the current financial year to the present ore reserves by opening out the new ground.

INDUSTRIALS.

L.G.O. Prospects—The Dunlop Companies—Amalgamated Press—P. and O. Shipping Recovery.

In the industrial share market interest during the week has again been practically confined to three or four stocks. Anglo A has again received strong backing, and the demand for Associated Cements has continued in evidence. London General Omnibus stock received a fresh fillip from the meeting. The chairman attributed the large savings made last year to the amalgamation and to the better net results achieved by the motor as compared with the horse omnibus. He said the final victory of the motor 'bus over the horse 'bus was now certain. In July, 1908, when the new company was started they possessed 14,116 horses, and they had 1,209 horse omnibuses running and 441 spare omnibuses, whereas at the end of September last they had only 4,533 horses, 343 running horse omnibuses, and 461 spare omnibuses. The chairman defended the board's action in not writing off anything for depreciation of the motor omnibuses by stating that the omnibuses were running better and earning more money than a year ago. The company were proceeding fast with the construction of two new classes of motor 'buses of an improved type, and in view of the improvement that had taken place in the motor-driven vehicle they were less afraid of the competition of the County Council trams. The chairman of the L.G.O. is confident about the ordinary stockholders getting a dividend next year.

Some interesting figures are given in the accounts of the Dunlop Rubber Company and the Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company. The former, which is the more important of the two, did well in the twelve months ended August 31, owing to the high price of rubber. Its trading profit at £343,600 showed an increase of £5,900. The charges against trading profit, however, were much heavier, the principal new item being a credit given to the Tyre Company, the chief selling organisation of the Rubber Company, to mitigate the loss incurred by the latter in its sales department owing to the unprecedented conditions that prevailed in the rubber trade. The actual net revenue was £262,800, compared with £304,800 in the previous year. The dividend for the year works out at 41 5-16 per cent. on the present capital, including the new shares given as a bonus, or at the rate of 100 per cent. on the capital as it stood before the bonus addition. The company has built up to £100,000 its reserve against abnormal fluctuations in rubber. A further increase in the capital from £720,000 to £1,000,000 is proposed, and 64,000 ordinary £1 shares are now being offered at a premium of £2 per share. As regards the Dunlop Tyre Company, the accounts, which cover only eleven months, disclose a total revenue of £212,900, of which apparently £141,900 represents the dividends received from the Rubber Company. This would leave a balance of £71,500 for trading profit income, and as "other income" included £68,500, the special credit from the Rubber Company and £63,700 profit on the sale of investments, it is evident that in the trading department the company incurred a substantial loss. It is interesting to learn that a fresh arrangement is being made with the Rubber Company whereby the difficulties attendant on violent and unforeseen fluctuations in the price of rubber will be avoided. The dividends are the same as a year ago, namely, 8 per cent. on ordinary and deferred. By applying the profit realised on the sale of investments, and by raising the book value of the rubber shares held from 9s. 11½d. to £1 17s. 3d. each, the board has scaled down the goodwill item by £849,500 to £682,500. The book value of the Rubber Company's holding is now £1,072,100, and the directors say it is still £1,000,000 below market value, so that there is here a reserve which more than offsets the balance of goodwill. The fluctuations to which the profits of the Dunlop Tyre Company are subject render the ordinary and deferred shares suitable only to the speculator. The 5 per cent. cumulative £1 preference at 1⅝ look a very fair commercial investment. They yield just over 5¼ per cent., and on the basis of last year's profits the interest is covered three times.

The Amalgamated Press, which owns the Harmsworth weekly and monthly publications, has increased its gross receipts to the record figure of £1,004,600, which compares with £972,800 a year ago. The net profit, after allowing the usual £25,000 for depreciation of buildings and plant, and applying £15,000 as the nucleus for a pensions and allowances fund, and setting aside £11,450 to writing down investments, is £259,600, which admits of the payment again of a dividend of 40 per cent. and the addition of £25,000, as before, to the reserve fund. The report contains evidence that the company does not mean to rest content with the marvellous record of prosperity already attained. A development which is likely to mean much to the business is the building of new paper mills at Gravesend. It is expected that these mills will commence the manufacture of paper by the beginning of May next, and they will be provided with wood pulp by the Anglo-Newfoundland Development Company, in which the Amalgamated Press has a large interest. The solid position that has been built up by the Amalgamated Press is reflected in the prices of its shares. The 5 per cent. cumulative £1 preference shares stand at 21s. 6d., and are, of course, a high-class investment, while the £1 ordinary shares are quoted at 5⅞.

A welcome revival, after three years' depression, is shown by the Peninsular and Oriental Steam Navigation Company for the year ended September 30 last. The freight receipts of our premier shipping line rose by no less than £215,430, against which the gain of £15,984 in passenger revenue looks very mild, especially considering the great outlay incurred in the past five years in providing a new service of passenger ships. The directors have written off the £25,000 paid for the goodwill of the Blue Anchor Line, and, in addition to allowing £426,751, compared with £375,916 for ordinary depreciation, they have appropriated £59,000 as extra depreciation. The dividend on the deferred stock for the tenth consecutive year is 13 per cent., and the carry-forward at £67,181 is rather larger than a twelvemonth ago. The outlook for the current year seems all in favour of that improvement making further headway.

THE FRENCH PALACE DEBENTURES.

In Truth of November 30 reference was made to the French Palace Development Syndicate, Limited, apropos of the appearance among the directors of "Charles Harrison, Hollyside, Victoria Road, Kensington, gentleman." My suggestion that this gentleman is a bucket-shop keeper, trading under the nom-de-guerre of Duncan Forbes and Co., at 49, London Wall, has not been denied. I never expected that it would be, and, taking that point as settled, I now have something further to say regarding the prospectus recently circulated by the syndicate. According to this document, the following are the directors, in addition to Charles Harrison:—

Thomas Edward Crispe, K.C., 3, Pump Court, Middle Temple, E.C. (chairman).

Vicomte de Lapré, manager of Le Gil Blas, 30, Rue Louis-le-Grand, Paris.

Thomas Goodall, J.P., West Drayton, Middlesex, gentleman.

John Thomas Lever, Witham, Essex, architect and surveyor.

Eugene Parent, 24, Rue du Moul, Thabor, Paris, financier.

In the prospectus and an illustrated brochure distributed with it particulars are given of the grandiose scheme for the erection of a Palace of French Arts and Industries on the Aldwych site belonging to the London County Council—a scheme much canvassed in the newspapers a few months ago. Last March the Council granted to M. Ernest Gerard an option for the acquisition of a building lease of this site, and the syndicate was formed in April to acquire the benefit of this option and to operate as a parent company in the development of the project, upon which an expenditure of £750,000 for building and equipment is estimated. The nominal capital of the syndicate is £100,000, divided into 85,000 preferred shares of £1 each and 60,000 ordinary shares of 5s. each, the former being entitled to "a cumulative preferential cash dividend of 25 per cent. per annum." The contract for the transfer of the option provides that, in addition to paying M. Gerard £2,000 in cash and discharging for him "a certain obligation" (not detailed in the prospectus), the syndicate is to allot him as fully paid the whole of the ordinary shares and 7,000 preferred shares. Harrison is entitled to participate (with M. Gerard) in a moiety of the said ordinary shares. No public issue of shares has been made, and so far as I have been able to ascertain none have been allotted—at any rate no return had been filed at Somerset House down to Monday last. I had previously sent a representative to the office of the company to inspect the register of shareholders. He was first of all asked to call again, and when he did so he was told that there was no register there, that all the "documents" were at the offices of the company's solicitors, and that he had better apply to them, saying that Mr. Harrison had sent him. He pointed out that the law required the register to be at the company's office, and as he expected the solicitors, upon whom he subsequently called, explained that they had nothing to do with the keeping of the register. A company having a K.C. for its chairman ought not to be conducted in this way. Failure to keep a register and produce it to any person tendering the required fee is, of course, an offence for which the officials and directors of a company can be prosecuted.

Three weeks ago this company, which apparently has no subscribed share capital beyond the nominal subscription of £1 each by the seven signatories, sent out a prospectus inviting applications for £80,000 mortgage debentures, bearing interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum and redeemable at a premium of 25 per cent. forthwith, "after the formation of the Development Company, which, according to arrangements with the London County Council, must take place before April 1, 1911." On the front page the prospectus describes the mortgage debentures as "operating as a first charge upon the property and interests of the syndicate as herein defined." In the body of the document the statement is that the debentures will be secured upon "the building agreement to be entered into with the London County Council upon the exercise of the option, and the profits to be derived from the promotion of the enterprise, including those realised from the Coronation stands." A paragraph in the brochure indicates that a payment of £55,000 (in which would be included a deposit of £5,000 already made) for the first year's rent is one of the conditions to be fulfilled before the option can be exercised. To my mind a building lease only procurable if and when these and other onerous conditions are fulfilled is but the shade of a shadow of what is ordinarily understood by a debenture security. However, investors are to be found who would resist an offer of shares in such an undertaking, but who succumb at once if essentially speculative securities are boldly labelled mortgage debentures.

Accompanying the prospectus, which was distributed broadcast through the post, was a circular from the directors in which they stated that Sir Thomas Barclay had consented to act as trustee for the debenture holders in conjunction with Mr R. D. Yelverton. I was informed by Mr. Yelverton last week that the use of his name and Sir Thomas Barclay's was entirely unauthorised. Both had been requested to act, but they had not consented to any announcement that they would do so, and the publication of their names prior to the settlement of the terms, let alone the execution, of any deed creating their trusteeship for the debenture holders was manifestly an improper proceeding. Mr. Crispe, K.C., ought to have known this. So, too, should his colleague the bucket-shop keeper. It is only a few months since the late Sir Charles Euan Smith called upon me to explain that a similar unwarrantable use was being made of his name as a trustee in a circular sent out by Duncan Forbes and Co.

It is worthy of note that applications for these debentures had to be forwarded with the application money to the directors of the syndicate instead of to its bankers, which is the usual procedure in such issues. The prospectus mentioned that members of the board and their friends had subscribed a substantial portion of the amount offered, and, that being so, the response of the public must have been disappointing, for since November 30, the date fixed for the closing of the list, efforts have been made to obtain further subscriptions or underwriting to justify the directors in going to allotment. If they have not already done so, I should advise applicants for the debentures to telegraph to the syndicate at once withdrawing their applications and demanding the return of their money. Even if allotment has been made it is possible that, in view of the character of the prospectus and circulars and the absence at the time of any trust deed, applicants would be entitled to the return of their money, for which the directors would be individually responsible.

Harrison's part in this business—he is apparently the most active of the directors, having a room for his own accommodation at the offices of the syndicate—is an amusing commentary upon the pretensions of Duncan Forbes and Co. That bucket-shop claims that it has a system of "investment" whereby "cautious and judicious investors" can secure fortnightly dividends at the rate of over 414 per cent. per annum with "absolute safety," their capital being "guaranteed against loss" by Duncan Forbes and Co.! The system consists of 1 per cent. cover deals, whose bogus character the firm have unwittingly revealed by sending out accounts in which the cover and the alleged profits were calculated on the supposition that Grand Trunks were $100 shares instead of being £100 stock! Duncan Forbes and Co. assert that they have carried on these deals for the last four years without one single reverse, but where and in what name? It is difficult to understand how anybody with an atom of intelligence can believe the statements in these bucket-shop circulars, or imagine for a moment that a financial genius capable of making over 400 per cent. per annum with absolute safety would at the end of four years still be worrying Tom, Dick, and Harry to send him £5, or beating up applicants for such securities as the debentures of the French Palace Development Syndicate.

Since writing the above a hazy recollection of the name of J. T. Lever, of Witham, in connection with Duncan Forbes and Co. has caused me to look through my bulky dossier relating to that bucket-shop. The result was the discovery of a correspondence showing that in August last, when an inquirer at Liverpool asked Duncan Forbes and Co. for a banker's or a local "reference," they named "J. T. Lever, of Witham, Essex," as a person "who will give you all the information you may require about us." Presumably the J. T. Lever who now figures as a director of the French Palace Development Syndicate is the same individual who was thus being used as a decoy-duck for the bucket-shop.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

Skating-Rink Disappointments.

Eloquent testimony to the unwisdom of putting financial faith in the skating-rink craze is afforded by the results just disclosed by the Holland Park Skating Rink. Instead of an annual profit of £53,500 and dividends of 100 per cent., as the prospectus foreshadowed, the net balance for seventeen months is £400, and as nothing has been provided for depreciation or for the writing down of commission on shares or formation expenses, it is obvious that the company has really sustained a loss. The position of the shareholders is rendered the more unsatisfactory by the fact that the directors have issued £11,000 debentures, bearing 8 per cent. interest, to satisfy "sundry creditors."

Mr. Adnam Sprange, secretary of the Camberwell Skating Rink, Limited, has issued a circular announcing that it is proposed to amalgamate that concern with the Hammersmith Skating Rink, Limited. For this purpose a new company is to be formed and holders of the existing shares are asked to accept an equivalent number of new shares of £1, credited with 15s. per share—in other words, with a liability of 5s. each. Beyond the statement that the directors "deem it desirable," no reason for this amalgamation is given, and, in the absence of further information, I think that the shareholders will be foolish to put another penny into either of these concerns. Both are obviously in a bad way now, and there is no evidence whatever that they will do any better under one proprietary. The shareholders should refuse even to consider the scheme until Mr. Carlton Roberts and his fellow directors have given a detailed account of the present position of the companies' affairs.

One Use for Worthless Scrip.

Apropos of a paragraph published last week, I have received an interesting explanation of the New York circulariser's offer to buy old repudiated or defaulted American railroad bonds, etc. It seems that such bonds are always in demand to be used as "assets" by fraudulent bankrupts, who thus account for the disappearance of money which they have "stored away" out of the reach of their creditors. I do not understand precisely how the dodge can be successfully worked, unless bankruptcy investigations in America are conducted in a very perfunctory manner, and I should certainly advise debtors not to try it on here. Official receivers are rather suspicious-minded, and this worthless scrip trick might easily have awkward consequences for the trickster.

Rupee Share Broking in India.

In a letter on this subject which I have received from Messrs. Scott and Tod, of Madras, it is suggested that there is need for a reform in the methods of rupee stock realisation and investment prevailing in the Bombay and Calcutta share markets. According to my correspondent:—

> It appears to be the custom there for all charges, including 1 per cent. Government stamp duty, agency brokerage, and registration fees to be borne by sellers alone, and although quotations are net to the buyer, something extra is frequently, if not generally, added by way of brokerage and charged to the buyer in the contract price and paid by him to his broker in addition to agents' commission. The methods of delivery and payment enable brokers to work in this way as jobbers or dealers, and although the custom appears to be known to all the Indian bankers and agents acting on behalf of rupee investors, they have hitherto refrained from raising any efficient protest.

Being quite unacquainted with the conditions under which the Bombay and Calcutta share markets are carried on, I express no opinion on the matter myself, but perhaps its ventilation in Truth may be useful in eliciting the views of the local brokers as well as of investors in Indian rupee securities.

Cover Gambles in French Rentes.

M. Valentyns, director-proprietor of "L'Intermédiaire," which is at once a bank and a newspaper, has written to Mr. Labouchere with reference to an article in Truth of November 23. He expresses surprise that a friend of France, as Mr. Labouchere has often shown himself to be, should protest against French enterprises being established in England; but, of course, Mr. Labouchere was not in any sense responsible for the article in question, though the present writer, who yields to nobody in his friendship for France, is quite confident that it would meet with his full approval. Needless to say, it contained no protest against the establishment of legitimate and desirable French enterprises in this country. What it did jocularly suggest was that our native bucket-shop philanthropists should demand protection from such foreign competitors as "L'Intermédiaire." Through agencies at 91, Cannon Street and 36, Camomile Street, E.C., this concern is exhorting the British public to subscribe sums from £10 upwards for "genuine dealings in French Rentes," which, it is asserted, produce an average profit, payable monthly, of 50 per cent. per annum. It is casually disclosed that these dealings are gambles on the 1 per cent. cover system, but nevertheless the business is boldly described as an investment, in which there is not the slightest risk to capital, in which a loss is impossible, and so forth. M. Valentyns invites me to send a representative to Paris to inquire into his operations, but I regard this as a work of supererogation. The circulars issued to the public here supply all the information that any intelligent critic can require, and neither M. Valentyns' statement that he has paid profits regularly every month for the past three years nor his offer to put me in touch with some of his clients makes the least impression on my mind. I have seen too many schemes of this kind to be impressed in that way. I should, though, have been interested if M. Valentyns had attempted a reply to my comment upon the strange circumstance that a Paris bank—a bank which has, moreover, the unusual advantage of being also a newspaper—comes over here to raise funds from small investors for an "absolutely safe investment," which, according to its own account, has for three years past yielded the very handsome profit of 50 per cent. per annum. This circumstance seems to indicate that the "investment" is looked upon with some scepticism in Paris, for otherwise, I imagine, M. Valentyns would be overwhelmed with subscriptions from French capitalists eager to obtain the safe 50 per cent. Britishers, I think, will be well advised to be similarly sceptical.

Recent Publications.

Mr. Wyndham A. Bewes's new book on "Stock Exchange Law and Practice" (Sweet and Maxwell, 12s. 6d. net) is doubtless intended primarily for lawyers, but at the same time it discusses difficult and complicated questions with so much lucidity that it will prove equally useful to many laymen. Beginning with an account of the constitution and working of the Stock Exchange, Mr. Bewes proceeds to deal in detail with the whole of the legal relationships arising directly or indirectly from the business of that institution. He refers also to the position of bucket-shops, and a chapter is devoted to gaming and wagering contracts, a matter upon which the customers of the bucket-shops continually receive expensive lessons in the courts. The volume contains a table of cases, and in an appendix the rules and regulations of the Stock Exchange are given.

The 1911 edition of the "Business Prospects Year-Book," edited by Messrs. Joseph Davies and C. P. Hailey, of Cardiff, has been issued, price 5s. net, from the office of the Financial Times, 72, Coleman Street, E.C. In the past four years the editors' estimates of the course of markets for the coming twelve months, based upon very elaborate and careful statistical studies, have been, on the whole, singularly near the actual results, and the book contains a mass of valuable information for commercial men and investors.

Investors must not suppose that "How to Judge Rubber Investments" (Alexander Moring, Limited, 2s. 6d. net) is intended to give them advice or warning in regard to the shares of particular companies. The author, Mr. F. W. Knocker, was formerly a Civil servant in the Federated Malay States, engaged in scientific work, and his book is an instinctive treatise on the cultivation of rubber in British Malaya, dealing, too, with the matter of catch-crops and the important question of labour. Mr. Knocker expresses an unalterable faith in the future of the rubber industry in British Malaya—a faith acquired by a long and close acquaintance with the industry dating back to its birth.

NEW ISSUE.

The British-Austrian Oil Investment Company, Limited, has been formed with a share capital of £220,000 in £1 shares, together with £55,000 in 7 per cent. convertible first debentures to purchase as a going concern an oil-producing estate in Galicia. Applications are invited for 165,000 shares, and the whole of the debentures, which latter can be exchanged for shares on or before December 31, 1912, and any not so exchanged will be redeemed in five years at 5 per cent. premium, thus showing a return of 8 per cent. On the basis of present returns from the property it is estimated that after providing for the debenture sinking fund the annual profits would allow of a 20 per cent. dividend on the share capital now offered, or enough to pay the debenture interest eleven times over. The purchase price for the property is £135,000, and the vendors are willing to take £73,333 in shares and debentures, being the largest amount permissible under the regulations of the Stock Exchange for official settlements and quotations.

Applications are invited for 990,000 shares of two shillings each in the Bukit Sembawang Rubber Company, Limited, which, with a capital of £335,000, has been formed to acquire properties in the Sembawang district, Singapore, Straits Settlements. A reference to this company appears in another column under the heading of "Rubber."

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of Truth.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered. Correspondents should state whether or not they are holders of the securities upon which an opinion is desired.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

A. L.—Nothing is easier than to job backwards, which is what the writer in question has been doing. There is, of course, more scope for a rise in the stocks than in the bonds, and there is more scope for a fall. If you want to eat well buy the stocks, if you want to sleep well keep the bonds. Amyl.—I do not regard any of the low-priced shares as cheap at present. Atchison or Milwaukee preferred would be sound investments.

Meddler.—I agree entirely with your broker. The extra interest you would get on the best of the preference stocks in question is scarcely sufficient to make the exchange worth while.

R.A.M.C.—The guarantee makes the bonds a fair investment, but as the line has yet to be built it is much too early to offer a complete judgment.

Mines.

Artro.—Ask your broker or your banker to try and get an offer for the shares. I have not seen a recent price quoted for any of them.

Bon Accord.—Unless prepared to hold for a fairly long period for the dividends and in the hope of eventual recovery in price, it might be as well to secure the present price and put the money into something with earlier prospects of improvement.

Contangos Rob Royd.—The course mentioned is not unusual. If you are dissatisfied you should change your broker.

Delaware.—No. 3 has fair lock-up chances, but I do not care for either of the others. Doubtful.—I believe all the companies you mention went into liquidation some years ago.

Erinagh.—Fair speculative holdings for dividends, but you should regard part of the distributions as return of capital.

George.—Prospects do not appear very hopeful in respect of any of the concerns named.

Jack Sax.—See Note in another column of this issue.

Lawhill.—1. A hopeful speculation from a lock-up point of view. 2. I see no reason to expect much early advance. 3. New Era have lock-up possibilities in view of the company's substantial interest in the Brakpan, which company is expected to commence crushing during the first half of the next year.

Minting.—I am not attracted by the shares you mention.

Resolve.—1. Your money could be better employed. If you want a steady dividend-yielding share you might do worse than buy Van Ryns, as to which see my Notes this week. 2. The company went into liquidation two years ago, and the scrip is of no value.

Snapshot.—Langlaagte Estate, Knight's Deep, and Van Ryn should suit you. The position of the last-named is dealt with in this issue. Snave.—The offices are at 58, West Smithfield, E.C. The shares appear a fairly promising speculative lock-up. Somorrastro.—Sorry, but I cannot trace it.

Waterfall.—1. The shares have been freely "puffed" on this side with the object of getting the public to buy, but I have never recommended them. Better take what you can get for your holding. 2. The buyer pays registration stamp and fee and the broker's commission on the purchase; the seller pays brokerage on the sale. 3. Eventually a purchase of the shares named should yield a satisfactory profit. Wotton.—I do not care to recommend a purchase. The fact that they are so frequently being "puffed" suggests that there is a block of the shares to be unloaded on the public if the latter can only be induced to buy.

Mixed Securities.

Aeger.—1. I should not care at this early stage to take responsibility for recommending the concern. You would probably be better advised to stick to a firm that would act solely as your agent. 2. The concern has not done much up to the present. As stated in an Insurance article a week or two ago, I do not advise the public to buy the shares of any new insurance companies. The field is already fully covered. Albatross.—1. They can be exchanged for Inscribed Stock free of charge. 2. The term guaranteed in this case is a misleading label. The stock ranks ahead of the company's first preference, and interest is non-cumulative.

Boney.—No. 1 is all right. Either 2 or 3 would make a fair investment, but you hardly need to buy both. You might add the new 5 per cent. debenture stock of the British Insulated and Helsby Cables referred to in my Notes a few weeks back. Of course, I have assumed you are not bound down by the Trustee Act.

Chesterfield.—I have a fancy for No. 2, but the shares are hardly suitable for a small investor owing to the liability. Instead, therefore, I would suggest Metropolitan Electric Trams 5 per cent. debenture stock. C. E. W.—Nos. 1 and 3 are sound holdings. Sorry, but I am unfamiliar with No. 2.

Dreadnought.—1. They have fallen in sympathy with other shares of the group. Hold for a better market. 2. The company has done nothing yet to justify confidence. I retain the poor opinion I have held from the outset about the concern. 3. I do not recommend them.

Erin.—1. See notes in another column. If you want better security exchange into the preference. 2. They may have a moderate recovery when business generally becomes more active, but are, of course, a speculative holding.

Hopeful.—1. Both might be held in hopes of a further recovery. 2. You might be able to realise to better advantage by waiting for a revival in the market. 3. A further purchase would probably turn out well in time. 4. Keep what you have for an eventual recovery, but I would not buy more. As regards the call, write to the company. 5. Some recovery may be expected sooner or later. 6. I see no special reason to advise the exchange.

Irish Gerrie.—1. You paid a high price. In view of the severe fall, better keep them for a possible rally. 2. Prospects appear poor.

Likely.—No. 2 is the pick of three speculative investments. Likely.—Your present holdings are of a sound character, and I would not part with either. At the same time, I regard 2 and 3 as very fair purchases. Laxfield.—Metropolitan Electric Tramways 5 per cent. debenture stock.

Mother Bunch.—I would not buy No. 1. As regards 2, the stock is sound enough, but for a lady I think a fixed interest-bearing stock would be preferable—say, Royal Mail Steamship 5 per cent. debenture stock.

Nap.—You could get 4 per cent. with safety in Merchants' Trust 4 per cent. debenture stock. A trust company, of course, knows no geographical limits. Newcastle.—I would suggest London and North-Western Railway 3 per cent. debenture stock, Central Argentine Railway 4 per cent. debenture stock, and Canadian Pacific Railway 4 per cent. debenture stock. The sanction of the Public Trustee would be required to enable you to invest in Nos. 2 and 3.

Orpheus.—You might find what you require from the advertisement columns of the daily papers. West Ham 3 per cent. stock gives nearly 3¾ per cent.

Pine.—1. There is an element of speculation about them, though having thought the shares worth applying for in May last it is early days to think about selling. Keep 2 and 3, which are good investments. Your second query answered last week referred to Amalgamated Properties of Rhodesia.

Texas.—1 and 2. Lever Preference would be the more suitable of the two. You might get rid of 3.

Union.—I do not care for either 1 or 3. There is very little market for the latter here. The guarantee on the former ranks, I believe, after the guaranteeing company's own debentures. 2. At the present time the East Rand position appears to be the sounder, as the company's earnings are well in advance of its dividend payments.

Viridian.—I doubt whether you could do much better than divide the money between Royal Mail Steamship 5 per cent. debenture stock, Metropolitan Electric Trams 5 per cent. debenture stock, and British Insulated and Helsby Cables new 5 per cent. debenture stock.

Rubber.

Abel.—I understand that the Malacca local management has been reorganised. The dividend for the current year must be small, but the outputs are now showing increases every month, and the company should do well in 1911. Hold your shares. A. G.—1. Cut the loss. 2 and 3. Worth holding. 4. Is developing very slowly. The price now is very low, but on any improvement, sell and re-invest in a share of the Taiping type. A. B. (Liverpool).—1. The company is making satisfactory progress. See Rubber Notes. 2. A good speculative share, but I cannot fix a selling limit at present. 3. The outlook generally is good, but much depends on an improvement in the American trade position. Ancient.—1. On any improvement sell No. 1 and reinvest in cheaper shares, such as Tremelbye—a dividend-payer—or Strathmore. 2, 4, and 5. Hold these. 3. Sell. Re-invest in Taiping. 6. See Rubber Notes. Worth holding for the present in view of possible developments early in the new year, but on any substantial rise exchange for a cheaper share. Aden Den.—Strathmore now quoted at ½ premium, and Taiping at 2s. 10½d. The other is less suitable for a resident abroad. Both are good for capital appreciation, but dividends will be small for a year or two. Ad.—I will deal with the Crude position at an early date. The works are ready, and apparently the promised demonstration is being deferred purely for market reasons. The company is in sound hands, and is making a good business.

Baccy.—1. You are more likely to improve your capital by buying low-priced shares in sound companies. I do not look for any heavy appreciation in the big producers. 2. Strathmore. Belvedere.—Val d'Or is the better of the two. Taiping should suit you. Boof.—1. A sound company. You would probably do better by buying shares in a plantation company. 2. Yes, Strathmore. 3. Quoted ⅛-¼ premium. £1 shares.

Cambridge.—Has great possibilities, but I hardly expect a dividend next year. Cantab.—Cut the loss on No. 2. No. 1 may be worth holding in the hope of some recovery, but I do not recommend it as a permanent holding. Cot.—1. See my Notes. Glen Bervie prospectus estimates were:—1910, nil; 1911, 18,000 lbs.; 1912, 42,000 lbs.; 1913, 100,000 lbs. The shares are an attractive purchase. 2. Not a first-class property, but the price is low, and there is certainly room for appreciation. Caledonian.—The rise was a sharp one. Buy on any reaction. Carthusian.—Good for steady appreciation. Cura Peculi.—The company is quite sound, but it is small, and it might be difficult to sell the debentures. As they are not convertible you would not be likely to derive much benefit from the future prosperity of the company. Cockscomb.—1. Strathmore is quoted daily in the Financier. 2. Many thanks for enclosure. C. R. Smith.—1. A reasonable limit. See reply to "Ad." 2. Yes. Chelmsford.—Strathmore, Lumut, and Glen Bervie.

Dad.—From your list I should select Jeram, Pelepah Valley, and Sempah. Dunham.—Hold them all. See my Notes as to No. 2 and reply to "Ad" as to No. 3. Denar.—Tremelbye, Strathmore, Lumut.

E. G. Travers.—I have a very poor opinion of the concern. Sell if you can. The issue was criticised in Truth on flotation. Erydoc.—I should select No. 1. It is a cheap share, likely to rise in value. Ehru.—Nos. 1 and 2 are fair Ceylon shares. No. 3 is a very speculative venture, much over-capitalised. The others are not worth holding. Watch the markets, and sell on the first favourable opportunity.

Freddie.—1. You should see your price again; but the shares are speculative. 2. A good Ceylon company. Worth holding for appreciation. 3. A reasonable purchase at about par, but the market is limited. Fairway.—I should arrange them 3, 2, 1. Falkirk.—1 and 2. Speculative, but likely to improve in value. No. 1 is the better purchase. 3. Good for steady appreciation. 4. Is now profit-earning. Dividend date not yet fixed. I cannot fix selling limit at present.

Gyp.—Sell No. 1 at 15s. Hold No. 2 for 25s. Gunner.—1. An excellent board. 2. Not before 1914. 3. Such shares are not often officially quoted. 4. Yes. 5. I have no recent news, but the felling of 500 acres was completed and planting commenced. 6. Lock up the shares for six months.

Horton.—Success seems to be an improbable eventuality. Sell at first favourable opportunity. Hants.—Ventures are a good speculative holding, and the company has some profitable business in hand. In any return of market activity your limit should be reached. Hopeful.—1. Nyassa developments should follow on much the same lines as Madagascar. See Notes. Hold your shares. 2. See fourth reply to "A. G." 3. Strathmore or Taiping. Hornblower.—A good list. Hold them all for substantial improvement.

Ingram.—You have taken the right course, and your present holdings are sound. I have a good opinion of Johore Rubber Lands. Lumut would make a good purchase.

J. Finch.—I have a good opinion of Nos. 1 and 7, both of which should prove profitable investments. Nos. 2 and 3 are good purchases.

Jay.—Hold Sekong and Glen Bervie.

Kells.—See fourth reply to "A. G." as to a. Hold the others. Kempton.—Unpromising. You would probably do better by exchanging for Strathmore. Kensington Court.—There is a freer market in the ordinary shares, and the quotation is occasionally higher. Last year the dividend was payable on December 29, but no dividend is expected this year until after the year's accounts are closed. See reply to "Abel."

Lengthington.—1. See first reply to "Hopeful." 2. A cheap share. Well worth holding. Lynx.—1. See fourth reply to "A. G." 2 and 3. Both worth holding for recovery, but on any substantial improvement exchange for shares in the rising Malayan companies. Lonely.—Hold No. 2. Sell the others at first favourable opportunity.

Major.—Glad to hear that you have profited by my advice. No. 9 is very poor. Hold Nos. 5 and 7. Exchange the others for Strathmore, Lumut, and Jeram. Moonraker.—All are now producing, but no official estimates have yet been issued for 1911. Manxman.—See my Notes as to No. 1, and hold for the present. Nos. 2 and 3 should see higher prices within the next few months.

Naruhodo.—Gula-Kalumpong is a good purchase. Nestor.—1. Your formula is applicable. Capital cost does not affect the cost of production. 2. Approximately correct. The figures do not apply, however, to very small outputs. 3 and 4. See Rubber Notes as to Vallambrosa. 5. Hold Tempeh for a profit. It is not a first-class property, but the shares are cheap at present price. 6. Averaging is effected by making a further purchase at a lower price, so as to reduce the average cost of the holding. Nagar.—Buy Strathmore and Lumut. Nap.—Sorry you missed the market. Buy on any reaction. Jeram is a sound lock-up. Noswad.—1. See reply to "Ad." 2. No. Nork.—Sell your present holding, buy Strathmore. Nogard.—1. Yes. Certainly take up your quota of the new issue. 2. Strathmore as an additional purchase.

Out.—1. It is rather behind Bukit Mertajam, but the shares are cheaper. 2. Including planting programme, the figure would be 12s.

Plus de Place.—1. See reply to "Ad." 2. Not before 1912. Pimlico.—1. Neither is first-class, but both are in good hands. Worth holding. 2. No dividends for a year or two. 3. Calls will be made as the capital is required. Dates not yet fixed. Parke.—The shares are undervalued at present quotation. Hold for par.

Rathmines.—1. See Notes. Hold for the present, but sell on any substantial advance. Instead of averaging, buy Strathmore. 2. See fourth reply to "A. G." 3. See reply to "Ad." R. K. T.—Hold them both as you suggest. Rosyth.—A poor concern. Sell on any advance, and do not average.

Stilts.—1. Hold for the present. See my Notes. 2. Exchange for Taiping. 3. Good for steady improvement. S. Hess.—1. See reply to "Ad." 2. Buy Strathmore. Sugarloaf.—1. A good holding. 2. Worth holding for the present. 3. Sell this and buy Strathmore. Sidmouth.—See reply to "Ad." Shorn Lamb.—1. See Notes. I prefer Strathmore for present purchase. 2. See fourth reply to "A. G." 3. The cost of production is too high to please the market. 4. The outlook for 1911 is good. Slainte.—1. The estimate holds good. 2. The land is held rent-free, and is a valuable asset, but it was never intended to develop the whole. See Notes. 3. Yes. 4. No. See reply to "Abel."

Woolly.—1. See reply to "Hopeful." 2. I think so. 3. Yes. 4. A portion of it will be required. 5. It compares very favourably. Soil good. 6. Nyassa has no preference shares, and as the capital arrangements differ the comparison does not apply.

Yorkshire.—1. Buy Strathmore instead. 2. Yes. See Notes.

Miscellaneous.

Aberdeen.—It is a sound old company, and although its dividend record has been rather erratic I would not sell the shares now. Ajax.—1. A purchase should turn out all right eventually, but I cannot attempt to say how the market will go in the immediate future. 2. The company is sound enough, and at the present price the stock possesses scope for a levelling up. Its investments are, on the whole, an excellent lot. Apis Diligens.—If the reconstruction is adopted, and you stand out, you will be entitled to have your shares sold, but as they will probably prove absolutely unsaleable that right will not be worth much. I certainly should not put in any more money.

B. L. C.—I do not suggest that it is unsafe, but at the same time it is not an institution which I care to take the responsibility of recommending. Bishop.—It would not be worth while to sue for such a sum, and whether you will get your money back by waiting is a matter of chance. You may if the firm does not disappear. It will continue to pay out so-called profits so long as sufficient money is coming in from fresh dupes. Burtoft.—Do not put another penny into this concern. Probably I shall refer to the matter next week, and the papers shall be returned in due course. Blind Pool.—Not the same, but in my opinion you will be well advised to avoid the other concern. Do your business through a broker who is a member of the Stock Exchange.

Colborn.—Certainly not. See article in another column regarding the French Palace Development Syndicate. Coriolanus.—I have heard nothing since the issue of the last report, a copy of which you doubtless received.

Doubtful (Leeds).—See reply to "B. L. C." Stick to the P.O. or some well-established trustee savings bank.

E. S. J.—1 and 2. As a lock-up the shares are worth buying, but the immediate return is only moderate. 3 and 4. The financial methods of the concern are not such as make me particularly confident, and I would be inclined to leave the shares alone. E. W. W.—Thanks; you will see a reference to Duncan, Forbes, and Co. in an article in another column. Etak.—1. Bucket-shop keepers, whose remarks are not worth notice. 2. No, but most of these lottery touts are unprincipled tricksters.

G. W.—Lever Bros.' "A" preference would suit. Gusher.—I have no recent information about this concern.

H. J. C.—1. I hold a very poor opinion of the company. 2. Yes. Hyacinth.—The shares would make a very fair trade investment. Haverhlip.—Melville, Glyn and Co. sell such bonds to unwary buyers at prices greatly in excess of the market quotations. The over-charge may be anything from 25 to 40 per cent.

Jinkee.—1. Yes, the sale was referred to in Truth on June 22. It was considered that the price paid was rather heavy. 2. I know of none that could be prudently drawn "generally speaking." Everything depends upon the circumstances of the particular case. J. Ll.—See reply to "B. L. C." J. Lucey.—1 and 2. See notes in another column. You must be prepared to take the risk of a good deal of fluctuation in prices and dividends. 3. The business is essentially liable to ups and downs, and I do not regard the shares as particularly low priced. J. H.—See reply to "E. W. W."

Kilworth.—I do not see any particular attraction in the shares.

Mateesh.—1. Such a delay is not very unusual. It is the fault of the company, not the broker. Meanwhile, as the company has accepted the transfer your position as a shareholder is already established. 2. A good industrial, but liable, of course, to ups and downs. Montgomery.—Not a publication which I see, so cannot express an opinion.

Perap-ma.—A good purchase for mixing purposes, but I am unable to predict a considerable rise. Pirapenna.—I know of no particular reason why they should be bought.

R. C. W.—This is not a class of business I should care to have much money in. If you can get a fair offer, better sell. Resolve.—Never before heard of it. Responsible journals, however, do not undertake to act in the capacity of brokers, but advise their readers to do their business through members of the Stock Exchange, and that is the advice I give you. Roddy.—I see nothing in the circular to justify enthusiasm. The company will have to do something more than possess lands or options on lands if it is to achieve success. Samples of oil do not go very far towards producing dividends.

Tishmah.—The local company appeared to be successful, but the new concern has a heavy capital, and the debentures must be regarded as of a distinctly speculative character.

Worried.—I refer to the reports this week. The shares of both concerns are essentially of a speculative character, and hardly of the type in which it is advisable to put a very large proportion of one's capital. Wilhelm der Grosse.—Nothing since the prospectus. Shares necessarily a risky holding at this early stage, and it is premature to talk about dividends.

VIGILANT.

INSURANCE.

An Excellent Example—The Best Provision for Girls—A New Policy of the Star.

It is only about three months since I described the advantages of deferred assurances for children; but a recent experience of a very pleasant kind causes me to mention them again. The experience emphasised the truth that there is no one more likely to take out fresh life assurance than the man who is already assured, while in this particular instance the principle has extended to three generations. A man who has policies on his own life for some £40,000 or £50,000 consulted me a few years ago as to the best assurance to be taken by his son in view of his approaching marriage. The son's policy, if I remember rightly, is about £15,000. Now there is a grandson, and the eminently sane grandfather is arranging for a policy of £10,000 to be taken for this child. Could anything be more sensible and refreshing than actions of this kind? We cannot all take policies for such large amounts, but it is the principle, not the magnitude, of the thing that counts, and it is well worth imitating.

By paying £100 a year there is secured the return of all the premiums paid in the event of the death of the child before age twenty-one. On reaching that age the policy comes into force for a little more than £10,000, which will be paid at death whenever it happens. At age twenty-one the policy becomes entitled to share in the profits. The premium continues unaltered until age fifty, by which time forty-nine premiums of £100 each will have been paid, after which there are no more premiums to be paid at all. The policy continues to share in the profits on the same basis as previously, and the sum assured is paid at death whenever it happens. If death occurs at age twenty-one more than £10,000 will be paid, in return for an outlay of £2,000 in premiums. If death occurs at forty-one £4,000 will have been paid in premiums, and the policy would yield more than £14,000. If death occurs at sixty-one the maximum number of premiums payable—namely, £4,900—will have been paid to the life office, who will give £20,000 in return. The longer the life assured survives the larger will the amount payable under the policy become. The primary purpose of this particular policy is to provide for death duties at some distant date.

The economy to an estate of dealing with death duties in this way is extraordinarily great. If death occurs at twenty-one £100 a year has been paid for twenty years, while the £10,000 that would be received would yield, at 4 per cent., £400 a year for ever. If death does not occur till age sixty-one, the outlay of £100 a year for forty-nine years secures £800 a year in perpetuity. I can quite imagine anybody saying that results of this kind are impossible, or that they are the result of the fantastic imagination of some third-rate company. On the contrary, the office is one of the highest possible class, the results are likely to be better rather than worse than those I have quoted, and if anybody wants to see how it is that such things can be done they can refer to Truth for September 14 last.

Why Pay Rent? Take an Immediate Mortgage, free in event of death, from the Scottish Temperance Life Office. Repayments usually less than rent. Mortgage expenses paid by the Company. Prospectus from London Office, 3, Cheapside, E.C.

It is often supposed that policies of this kind are taken only for boys, but in many respects they are of still greater advantage for girls. This is especially the case when effected on the endowment assurance plan, which provides for the payment of the sum assured on reaching some selected age, such as forty, fifty, sixty, or at death previous to the selected age after age twenty-one. Thus if a policy is effected during the first year of the child's life at a premium of £10 a year the premiums paid will be returned if the child dies before twenty-one. After twenty-one, if the endowment age is fixed upon as being forty, the annual premiums remain at £10 and the sum of £760 would be paid in cash at age forty. Anything from £537 up to nearly £760 would be paid at death between the ages twenty-one and forty.

If age fifty is decided upon for the maturity of the endowment the policy would yield £730 at age twenty-one, gradually increasing to £1,236, which would be payable in cash when the age of fifty is reached. If the older age of sixty is chosen for the maturity of the endowment the policy would come into force for more than £900 at age twenty-one, and would be increased by bonuses from time to time, until it would yield over £1,850 at age sixty.

There must surely be many parents who can foresee the probability of their daughters having to earn their own income. Quite possibly the parents could find the small premiums required during childhood, and later on the daughter herself would very likely be able to pay the small premium necessary, and thus provide for herself a substantial sum at some such age as forty or fifty, which would mean also a goodly amount being available for others in the event of her death before the end of the endowment period.

Of course, larger or smaller premiums than £10 a year secure proportionately larger or smaller policies. The rate of premium for a given amount of assurance increases with the age of the child. Such policies can be taken at any time up to age fifteen, and are always singularly advantageous, but the earlier in life they are effected the better. It may be as well to add that no medical examination is required, and if at age twenty-one, or at any other time, it is found impossible to continue the payment of premiums, cash surrender values or paid-up policies can be obtained, which still yield an excellent return for the money invested, though naturally not so good a return as when the premiums are paid until the end of the endowment period or previous death.

There are many men and women whose parents have not made for them any such sensible provision as that which I have been explaining, and for these a new prospectus issued by the Star Life Office presents points which are worth consideration. A young man who has no one dependent upon him at present may regard a life policy as unnecessary. It is not unnecessary, but because he is young and does not understand he thinks it is not essential. It may, however, dawn upon him that life assurance may be needed a few years later, when the rate of premium will be higher; when, it may be, impaired health will still further increase the cost, and when possibly it cannot be obtained at all through his being unable to pass the medical examination. The Star enables him to provide for these contingencies at a very small outlay, and to decide the precise form of policy he wants later on in life. He pays a low rate of premium, doing so monthly if he finds it convenient, and if he dies within the first five years the premiums paid are returned to his estate, but nothing more. At the end of the five years he can continue the same low rate of premium until a specified age, after which premiums cease, and have the sum assured paid at his death whenever it happens. He can, if he likes, for the same premium, select endowment assurance of a smaller amount, or if he thinks it will suit his circumstances better he can have a large amount paid to himself if he survives to an agreed age, subject to the condition that in the event of his death meanwhile the premiums paid will be returned to his estate, perhaps with interest in addition. There is a convenient elasticity about a policy of this kind; it enables a man to take what he wants, when he knows what he wants; no medical examination is required; the rate of premium is very low; the policy contains no restrictions in regard to travel or occupation, and the whole of the benefits and conditions are definitely guaranteed.

Porthcawl.—1. The plan you suggest is quite the best if you are reasonably sure of an increased income in the future, not otherwise. 2. Law Union and Rock. 3. With-profit policies in good companies are better than non-profit. 4. No, unless your income is stationary, in which case write again. A. S. (Stoke-on-Trent).—The Essex and Suffolk is entirely safe and good. Erinagh.—You can obtain policies similar to those issued by the French company from the Commercial Union and the Norwich Union Life Offices. It does not strike me as a particularly attractive scheme. Lokis.—1. The company is respectable. 2 and 3. Continue the policy if it is fully guaranteed by the other company you mention, which makes it quite satisfactory. C. Y. S.—The company is good, though new, and I think you might safely trust it, even for the amount mentioned, since the greater part of the risk would be re-insured with other offices. Yam.—Repeat your question, giving age and sex. Granite.—I am greatly afraid you must regard your money as lost, and I think you had better pay no more. F. A. S. (Wrexham).—The accident policy of the Key Company is guaranteed by a thoroughly sound office, but I am entirely unable to see that the particular accident met with entitles the policyholder to compensation. No such injury is mentioned in the schedule of injuries for which compensation will be paid. Cathay.—Tavener's Old-Age Pension Trust is utterly unsatisfactory, and figures in the Cautionary List. I hope to say something more about it in the very near future. Buff.—The society is quite right in declining to estimate what the tontine bonus will amount to. I am still less able to guess the amount, since you give no details about the policy. A term policy such as is suggested would cost very little, and I see no reason why you should specially limit it to the probable amount of the bonus. X. Z. Y.—I am afraid I do not understand your question. Has the proposed life assurance anything to do with the loan? and do you wish to lend money or to borrow money? If you want to borrow money do you propose to use the policy as security in any way? Write to me again, and I will gladly reply. Zanskar.—I cannot see that the present value of your policy is more than it would fetch at the present time if it were sold. It is not likely that if sold by auction or private treaty it would fetch much, if any, more than the surrender value.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

MOZAMBIQUE COMPANY.

The annual general meeting of the Mozambique Company was held at the offices of the company in Lisbon, M. Carlos Santos (the president) being in the chair. In addition to the Portuguese shareholders who were present, the following members of the London and Paris committees were there: Sir Alfred Sharpe, K.C.M.G., C.B., M. Jean de Breuil de St. Germain, Mr. William Seyrig, Mr. John Arthur White, and Mr. T. Lennox Gilmour.

The report and accounts for 1909 were presented and adopted by the meeting, and the following directors were re-elected: Sir Alfred Sharpe, the Hon. M. W. Elphinstone, M. Theodore Mante, Mr. Libert Oury, M. Jean de Breuil de St. Germain, and Mr. William Seyrig.

M. Antonio Eduardo Villaça (the administrator delegate of the company) took the opportunity of placing before the meeting information as to the actual situation of the company of a much more recent date than that contained in the report for 1909. M. Villaça began by stating that, both from a financial and an economical point of view, the figures contained in the report for last year demonstrated that notable progress had been made in the company's territories. He recalled that the total African receipts had amounted to £171,491 15s. 5d., while the African expenditure had only reached £131,294 5s. 6d., leaving a credit balance of £40,197 9s. 11d. In Europe the expenditure had exceeded the receipts; but after making provision for the deficit out of the credit balance in Africa there still remained a credit balance of £28,666. As to the economical situation, the increase in the Custom-house returns, the rise in the receipts of almost every kind, the larger number of vessels which have utilised the port of Beira, the development of the sugar industry, the impetus whi h has been given to the cultivation of maize, and other facts, which were fully dealt with in the report, proved unmistakably the progress which had been made. As, however, it was now the end of November, it was quite reasonable that the shareholders should desire to know if the favourable conditions of the past year had continued, and he would therefore endeavour to satisfy this legitimate curiosity in touching on some of the more salient features of this year's operations. In the first place, the European receipts had already reached the sum of £14,594, which thus showed an increase over the previous year of £11,948. In Africa the receipts under the ordinary budget up to the end of the month of August amounted to £121,333, which presented an increase of £11,777 over the same period of the previous year. For the same eight months the company's commercial operations showed an increase of £4,921, so that the total increase was £16,698. Adding together the increase in the receipts in Europe and Africa, the not unimportant figure of £28,646 was obtained. As to the present financial resources of the company, the available cash in hand, or in easily realisable securities in Europe and Africa, amounted in round figures to £400,000, a fact of the highest importance, not only because it improved the credit of the company, but because it placed the company in a position to meet any demands which might be made on it in connection with the development of its territories. At the same time the company still held 300,000 unissued shares out of the 500,000 shares by which their nominal capital had been increased at the end of last year. Turning now to the economical aspect of the company's operations in Africa, the receipts from the Customs alone showed an increase of £14,196 over the estimates to the end of August, while the other sources of income had also shown gratifying increases, thus demonstrating that the territory was making real progress from the point of view of its economical development. There were other factors which proved this progress, such as the increase in the mineral production. At the end of September the gold won was 6,556 ounces, of the value of £27,475; so that the first nine months of the year showed an excess of £5,000 in value over the total production of the previous twelve months. An equally encouraging result was shown with reference to the production of copper. The rubber received this year already exceeded the whole weight of the rubber received last year by 10 tons, while the minimum price received this year was higher than the maximum received last year. In 1909 the highest price received was 12s. a kilo, while the lowest received this year was 12s. 5d., and some sales had been made as high as 17s. a kilo. The port of Beira was exceptionally well situated, and its fortunes were closely connected with the railway, of which it was the ocean terminus. Beira was thus directly interested in the progress of the Beira Railway Company, and it was therefore interesting to point out that for the year ended September last an increased profit of £112,000 had been made by the railway over the profit for the period ending in September, 1909. The Mozambique Company had entered into a contract with the Beira Railway Company and the Beira Junction Railway Company for important works to be carried out at the port of Beira, which would permit sea-going vessels to tie up at the pier, and would thus facilitate the movement of passengers and merchandise, and contribute greatly to the security of both these operations. It was anticipated that this improvement would involve an expenditure of about £100,000. On its own account the Mozambique Company have taken various steps to improve the conditions of the port of Beira. It had already acquired five luminous buoys and a new steam tug for the service of the port, and had just executed a contract with a well-known British firm for a new dredger. The board had also authorised the construction of central workshops, with a section for repairing the company's naval material, and a capable mechanical engineer had been sent out to take charge of this establishment. Arrangements had also been made for carrying out a mineral survey of the territory, which would thus provide the board with the indispensable information as to the riches which were hidden beneath the surface.. A topographical survey of the territory was also on the point of being undertaken, and it was anticipated that new mining regulations would very shortly be published, which would further increase the facilities for mining operations in the company's territories. In view of this survey of the actual present condition of the company, M. Villaça claimed that a brilliant future lay before the Mozambique Company, and that the facts he had quoted justified the favourable anticipations contained in recent reports.

SALVADOR RAILWAY.

The ordinary general meeting of the Salvador Railway Company, Limited, was held on the 12th inst. at Winchester House, E.C., Mr. Mark J. Kelly (chairman and managing director) presiding.

The Chairman: The gross receipts for the year under review were better by £6,921, while the ratio of expenses was also satisfactory. After payment of all charges there is £8,565 available for distribution, and the directors recommend the payment of a dividend of 3 per cent. upon the preference shares (against 2 per cent. paid last year), which will leave a balance to be carried forward slightly in excess of that of last year. Shortly after I had the pleasure of meeting you here a year ago I went to Salvador, staying there three months, which I need not tell you were busy ones, devoted to a complete survey of all the conditions under which we work there. I had been unable to visit the country during the preceding seven years, and naturally found much demanding organisation and improvement; unfortunately, at the same time the need for greater expenditure of money was borne in upon me at almost every turn, if your property was to be maintained at the standard desired by the directors. The constant exactions of the suppliers of wood for fuel, as the forests have been cut down in the neighbourhood of your property, and wood has become scarcer and with a longer haul, imposed upon me the urgent necessity of a closer and wider survey of the fuel proposition. In the result we will probably have recourse to oil fuel for the future, provided we can protect ourselves by a reasonably long contract with suppliers on the coast. The calculations have been gone into very carefully as to the necessary storage plant, which would require a capacity of about 35,000 barrels, American standard, say, a trifle over 4,000 tons of oil, to be periodically renewed. If we can secure conditions enabling us to adopt oil the fuel bill should show a saving of about 40 per cent.—some authorities say 50 per cent.—besides reducing train hands as well as insurance charges upon goods in transit over your railway, which are necessarily heavy with wood-burning engines, the great sparkage of which has been a fruitful source of claims for damage to goods, which have had to be met. We are proceeding very cautiously in this matter, and do not intend to commit ourselves to the adoption of oil fuel unless and until we can see our way to making a contract for oil upon which the board may reasonably rely. In the rolling-stock department, and having immediate regard to the larger crop which will be in movement this month, I found it absolutely necessary to provide two additional engines and ten additional large box-cars. We had to scrap one of our eleven engines, and the two new ones were urgently needed. The wood-work of the box-cars is being done in our shops, and the iron-work has been shipped out, so these cars, as well as the engines, will be available for the coffee haul. I found the staff both on the railway and in our auxiliary undertakings of lighterage and pier were dissatisfied, and clamouring against the growing accumulation of work, mostly unaccompanied with better remuneration. This was also prudently dealt with, and I need only add that in all these matters I acted with the knowledge and approval of the board. I think I can assure you that we shall now be able to deal economically with a larger traffic. Before leaving this subject I may mention that I have found we had been hauling thousands of tons of sugar-cane at an unremunerative price, except that it secured to us the eventual haulage of the sugar. I succeeded in obtaining a price of $14 per car load, where we had been getting $8, and I think this information will be satisfactory to you. In my remarks last year I dwelt at length upon the unsatisfactory condition of the foreign exchanges, but I found them still worse when I reached Salvador, and in the early months of the year the high-water mark was reached with our purchase of drafts on London at 198 per cent. Against the combination of circumstances which contributed to rendering hopeless, at all events for the present, any attempt to induce the Government to adopt a gold standard—or, as I said last year, a standard which, though fluctuating, should have some reasonable relation to the price of silver in the markets of Europe, which the present haphazard system certainly has not—there was little to be done, and my missionary work to that extent failed of its purpose. I would not care to say that it failed utterly, because, as it was pursued with vigour in all quarters, I have reason to believe that a considerable number of important converts have been made, and perhaps the adoption of a gold standard may be considered at this moment as probably nearer than it was at the same period last year. Continuing, the Chairman said that, with respect to the steamship service, the company had not only emerged out of the experimental stage, but they had actually become a fairly settled institution as a steamship line. Instead of one boat they were now represented by three steamers, and they were making the service from Salina Cruz clear down to Nicaragua, embracing all the ports of Guatemala, Salvador, Amapala, the only Honduranean port on the Pacific, and Corinto. They had reason to believe that the service would be represented in the future by a substantial figure in the earnings. They were now receiving on account of the steamship service a subsidy of £100 per month in gold from the Government of Salvador; and President Diaz had promised favourable consideration by his Government of an application for a subsidy from the Mexican Republic. The Chairman concluded by moving a resolution for the adoption of the report and the payment of the dividend recommended.

Mr. Maurice Ulcoq seconded the motion, which was unanimously agreed to.

Messrs. M. Ulcoq and Charles T. Spencer were re elected directors and Messrs. Woodthorpe, Bevan, and Co. were reappointed auditors.

A vote of thanks to the chairman, directors, secretary, and staff, both at home and abroad, closed the proceedings.

VINE AND GENERAL RUBBER TRUST.

An extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders of the Vine and General Rubber Trust, Limited, was held at Salisbury House, E.C., on December 8, for the purpose of receiving a report from the directors and the company's experts on the working of the Guiguet machines in the forests of Madagascar, and to approve the exercise of the option acquired from the vendors over the patent rights for the Guiguet machines for the extraction and cleansing of rubber.

Mr. F. W. Baker presided, and, in the course of a long and interesting address, remarked that on August 5 last, at the statutory meeting of the company, he had occasion to say that no time had been lost in commencing operations, and expressed his belief in the strongest terms in the future of the enterprise. That day he had pleasure not only in confirming those expectations, but he would give details which he trusted would fully satisfy the shareholders as to the conservative basis on which the estimates were founded. The results of the past few months' work opened up prospects which appeared to be almost unlimited. As regards the number of vines, the prospectus of the Madagascar Rubber Company estimated an average of eighty full-grown vines to the acre, but reports proved that the density of growth was much greater. This was a fresh proof, if any such proof were needed, of the great wealth of rubber vine in the vast tropical territories which could be worked by the Guiguet machines at an enormous advantage. It was also of special importance to the shareholders of this trust, because the trust had taken a leading part in the flotation of the Amatongaland Rubber Corporation and the Pongola Rubber Estates, Limited, and owned a large interest in them, and, therefore, the results to be obtained by those two companies—as to which every mail brought exceedingly favourable news—would have a direct bearing on the trust's profit and loss account. As to the number and growth of rubber vines the good reports contained in the prospectuses of both those companies gave very strong and satisfactory evidence, but that day they had the advantage of being able to say that those reports had been checked and verified on the spot by the manager in Natal of the Amatongaland Corporation, who not only confirmed those estimates in every way, but, as the result of actual chained measurements, stated that the estimates were very much below the reality. In the course of his report the manager stated that he had chained out various portions of the forests taken at random, and found 300 rubber vines per acre, yielding an average weight of 70 lbs. of bark, containing 5 per cent. and more of that weight of rubber. This was a statement of such importance that he could scarcely exaggerate it. It proved how enormously rich the tropical forests were in rubber vines—wealth which hitherto had been almost entirely neglected, and which practically and to a great extent was at the command of the trust. This information also confirmed the great value of the trust's holding in those two companies. If one remembered that a density of sixty to eighty full-grown vines per acre was already quite enough to prove a remunerative business by using the Guiguet machines, shareholders would realise the results which must accrue from a growth of vine averages of 300 to the acre, thus making it possible to obtain a rubber production four or five times greater, with practically the same general and management expenses. Coming to the question of the quantity of rubber extracted from the vines, the estimates of the Madagascar Rubber Company had been made on a basis of extracting something like 4 per cent. of rubber from the weight of the bark—that was to say, it was expected that 100 kilos of bark would yield 4 kilos of rubber, and each vine having been estimated to give an average weight of 23 kilos bark, would, therefore, give 2 1-5 lbs. of rubber per vine. Instead of this estimated yield of 4 per cent., actual results reported by the management in Madagascar showed a yield of from 5 per cent. to 5½ per cent., or about 30 per cent. above the estimates, and for Amatonga the actual figures were more than 50 per cent. above the estimates. The Madagascar Rubber Company had sent to London some average samples of bark taken from stock at Bevile Camp, where the first Guiguet extracting plant was in operation. Five extracting machines were now working in Madagascar, two more were en route, and others would be shipped during the early part of next year. He felt justified in believing that the Madagascar Company would be able, at the end of its commercial year, to place before its shareholders results which would prove absolutely decisive. Other companies which had been floated subsequent to the Madagascar Rubber Company had benefited by the experience gained in Madagascar in the use of the Guiguet machine. The Amatongaland Rubber Corporation, which was incorporated on July 7 last, had now three complete sets of extracting machines on its property, three other complete sets would be erected during January, and further machines were on order. The manager of the company had advised that his rubber shipments would begin on November 30 last. As to the quality of rubber obtained by the mechanical treatment of the vine bark, he was glad to be able to state that vine rubber, treated by their processes, had found a ready market, and that the shipments were easily disposed of in reasonably large quantities, and the Madagascar Rubber Company had already sold on the English market over 56,000 lbs. As to price, while the price of fine hard Para declined from 8s. 1d. per lb. on August 31 to 6s. 3d. on November 23, the prices obtained by the Madagascar Rubber Company on the same dates, instead of declining, had improved from 3s. 1d. to 4s. per lb. He had had an opportunity of seeing the monthly accounts of the extraction plant of the Madagascar Rubber Company at Bevile, and these showed that the cost delivered in London was somewhat under 1s. 4d. per lb. of rubber. Taking as the basis of calculation the cost at 1s. 4d., there would appear to be a net profit of 2s. 6d. per lb. of rubber, and taking 800 kilos of bark per machine per day, and 300 days in the year, the profit per machine per year would result at over £3,500, and, the cost price of a complete extracting plant being under £800, this represented over 400 per cent. on the capital outlay. This result, absolutely proved, appeared almost incredible, but the estimate was based on vine bark containing only 5 per cent. to 5½ per cent of rubber. What profit might, therefore, be expected where vines contained 10 per cent., 12 per cent., 14 per cent., and even 16 per cent. of rubber? Continuing, the Chairman said: I now come, gentlemen, to the special object for which this meeting has been convened—namely, to the exercising of your option over the Guiguet patents and processes. I have shortened, as far as possible, these remarks, but, nevertheless, I have had to appeal to your indulgence in order to clearly put before you the principal points upon which to base your decision. From what I have said you will have foreseen the conclusions which have been arrived at by your board, and which your directors will invite you to adopt. Before this I wish to bring to your notice as briefly as possible the results of the operations which have been carried out in relation to the Guiguet process during the three months of our corporate existence, and, while in my judgment these results are amply satisfactory, having regard to the fact that the period covered represents a period of organisation and negotiation, I feel confident in expressing the opinion that these results will be largely increased, with greater prosperity to the company, as our organisation is completely perfected, and we have derived the benefits which only experience can give in the creation of a new industry. Dealing now with what we have done during these few first months. Two companies, the Amatongaland Rubber Corporation, Limited, and the Pongola Rubber Estates, Limited, have acquired licences for the use of the Guiguet machines on their territories, and the price which they have paid for these grants has been £13,536 in cash and £126,216 in fully-paid shares. The excellent news received by the boards of those two companies allow us to anticipate very favourable returns, which will justify the quotation of these shares at par, and perhaps at a substantial premium. These shares and cash are being held in trust in accordance with our agreements, and on the option being exercised they will belong to your company, and can therefore be set off against the purchase price which we have to pay. Negotiations have been started, even more than that, preliminary agreements have been discussed and arranged for the granting of licences to four other companies already existing or about to be formed, and if, as we have every reason to believe, these businesses will be carried out in the near future, the price for the grant of licences to be paid by these four companies amounts to about £40,000 in cash, with a considerable sum in addition in fully-paid shares. Now, I ask you, what are two businesses concluded and four more near completion as compared with all those which are open to our initiative throughout the whole world, and of which many more, although not as far advanced, are actually under consideration? You will agree with me that what has been done and what may be realised in the nearest future is but an infinitesimal part of what is still left, and it is difficult to appreciate, even in an approximate way, the large interests which our trust may realise by the grant of licences throughout the tropical districts where rubber vines grow, and in all the centres producing rubber which requires cleansing and rectifying. From the facts and information which I have laid before you it seems clear to your board that this company should exercise the options which they have under the agreement, as set out in the prospectus, to purchase the world's rights over the Guiguet machine, but, before deciding to advise you to exercise this option, your board entered into negotiation with the vendors, and, due partly to the initiative of Mr. Schlesinger, one of your managing directors, I am glad to report that a reduction of the purchase price by £150,000 in fully-paid shares has been effected, and conditions arranged whereby the cash consideration as to one-half of it has been spread over a period of five years, or, in the alternative, to be derived from the purchase price or consideration which we shall receive for selling the right to use the machines or granting licences. I will call presently on one of our managing directors to give you information as to results obtained by the trust during the few months of its existence, as to its actual condition, and as to its prospects for the future, and I have reason to believe that you will be more than satisfied with the very substantial results which will be communicated to you. But before this, and in order to bring to a conclusion the special object of this meeting, I have much pleasure in inviting you to decide the exercise of the option under the amended conditions to which I have just referred, and I have the honour of proposing the following resolution:—"It is hereby resolved that the directors shall immediately exercise the option acquired by the company with reference to the patent rights of the Guiguet machine for the extraction and purification or rectification of rubber and other gums for all countries of the world (with the exceptions referred to in the company's prospectus, dated May 2, 1910), as contained in an agreement made April 20, 1910, between the said L. G. Schlesinger of the one part and the L. G. S. Syndicate, Limited, of the other part, the benefit of which agreement has been acquired by the company, subject, however, to the following modification in the purchase consideration to be paid by the company to the L. G. S. Syndicate, Limited, and which has been agreed to by the latter—namely, in place of 500,000 fully-paid ordinary shares of the company, 350,000 fully-paid ordinary shares, the £50,000 cash, to be paid as to £25,000 on the exercise of the option, and as to the balance by paying to the L. G. S. Syndicate, Limited, 50 per cent. of the net price realised by the company on the sale or disposal of any patent or the granting of any licence relating to the Guiguet machine as and when received until the total of £25,000 has been paid, such sums not in any event to amount to less than £5,000 per annum."

Mr. L. T. Boustead seconded the resolution.

Mr. Louis G. Scheslinger (one of the managing directors) said that the company's profits already were sufficient to allow of a dividend being declared at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum on the amounts paid up on the shares. He referred to the promising prospects of the trust, and said that to deal with new business the board had decided to make a call of 2s. per share, payable on the 14th prox.

The resolution was carried unanimously.

RUSSIAN MINING CORPORATION, LIMITED.

The third ordinary general meeting was held on December 7, at Salisbury House, London Wall, under the presidency of his Excellency Basile de Timiriazeff.

The Chairman, in the course of his speech, said: I hope that the report of the directors for the year ended October 31 has produced a favourable impression on you. Last year the credit balance amounted to £7,697 7s. 5d. only, whilst the balance-sheet of this year shows a credit balance of £120,797 9s. 3d. This big progress is easily explained if we turn to the profit and loss account. On the credit side of the account we can see that the receipts during the year under review amounted to £127,756 18s. 8d., against £22,616 1s. 9d. in the year 1908-9. The item of "Profits realised on shares sold" alone shows an increase of more than £87,000. Thus has been achieved the highly satisfactory result that the net earnings of our company during the twelve months ended October 31 have reached the above-mentioned important item of £120,797 9s. 3d., and that gives, after the deduction of the interim dividend paid on the ordinary shares in December, 1909, a balance of divisible profits amounting to £111,582 12s. 11d. Out of this the directors recommend a dividend of 7s. 6d. per share on the 75,000 ordinary shares, which, with the 2s. 6d. per share paid towards the end of last year, will amount to 10s. per share, and will repay to the holders of ordinary shares the whole paid-up amount on their shares. It would not be easy to find another financial undertaking which during three years has succeeded in acquiring a widespread reputation and prestige, which had enabled it, first, to float a large, sound, and solid gold-mining enterprise—the Lena Goldfields; secondly, to accumulate such a substantial cash reserve and easily realisable assets that it becomes possible to repay in dividends to the holders of the ordinary and deferred shares the whole amount of the paid-up capital; and, lastly, to distribute on the ordinary shares a dividend of 50 per cent., on the deferred shares a dividend of 400 per cent., and, after deduction of £74,875 for all these payments, to be able to point to a balance in cash and assets of about £187,500. With such achievements in the past we can look to the future with confidence. There will be no lack of business to deal with. All the official data referring to the economic progress of Russia shows that during the last years the material well-being of the Russian people, consequent upon the growth of the productivity of the country, has been advancing by rapid stages. The Russian Government is desirous of encouraging foreign—and especially British—enterprise in Russia. Its wish is that foreign capital should be attracted to Russia only through the medium of serious companies by proposals based on sound business lines, and it is fully disposed to welcome and facilitate the work of those who are prepared to invest capital for the mutual benefit of all concerned.

The report was unanimously adopted.

LENA GOLDFIELDS.

The second ordinary general meeting of the Lena Goldfields, Limited, was held on the 7th inst. at Salisbury House, E.C., his Excellency Basile de Timiriazeff (the chairman) presiding.

In moving the adoption of the report, the chairman said the shareholders would gather from that document that the affairs of the Company had been progressing most propitiously. Whilst the balance-sheet to June 30 last year exhibited a debit balance of £8,316, the balance-sheet to September 30 this year showed a credit balance of £130,718, and that after the deduction of the interim dividend of £112,221 paid on November 25, 1909. One item on the credit side of the balance-sheet to which he wished to call attention was that entitled "Proceeds of sale of shares in the Lenskoie," from which they had netted on shares of a nominal value of £17,000 more than £209,000. That sale had been undertaken in connection with the chief operations which the directors had carried out during the year, including the acquisition of the mining and other properties of the "Industrial Company in Russia," and their re-sale to the Lenskoie Company, and the acquirement of Lena shares of the new issue. The profit earned during sixteen months had reached the very satisfactory figure of £250,957, while, after charging the previous year's debit balance and the dividend already paid in advance, there remained the sum of £130,418 appearing on the balance-sheet. Out of this sum the directors recommended the distribution of a final dividend of 2s. per share, making, with the interim dividend, 20 per cent., and the carrying forward to the new financial year of £14,589. The working of the mines at Lenskoie during the financial year 1909-10 had given the following results:—57,038 cubic sargens of gravel had been mined and hoisted, the washing of which yielded 765 poods 23 lbs. 29 zol. 9 dolis of gold, including 4 poods 11 lbs. 9 zol. 15 dolis of nuggets picked by the workmen and delivered to the company's offices. A further amount of 18 poods 14 lbs. 92 zol. 94 dolis had been delivered by tributers, making 783 poods 38 lbs. 26 zol. 15 dolis, or 139 poods 35 lbs. 44 zol. 26 dolis in excess of the previous year. In addition to these figures, account must be taken of 32 poods 35 lbs. 41 zol. 7 dolis of gold purchased. Assuming that every pood of gold would leave the same net profit as during 1908-9, they might foresee a net profit of roughly Rs. 6,000,000, which, after due deduction for charges to reserve fund, amortisation, prospection fund, taxes, etc., allowed them to anticipate a dividend of something like £400,000. Among the important operations of the year, the chairman mentioned the purchase of the mines formerly belonging to the industrial company, while the Lenskoie also acquired the undertaking of the Sibiriakoff-Basanoff Steamship Company. The acquisition, too, of the Bodaibo Railway had resulted in a total economy in transport of over Rs.300,000.

Lord Harris seconded the motion, and, after Baron Alfred de Gunsburg had given a favourable report as to the prospects of the Lenskoie enterprise, the resolution was adopted.

CAMP BIRD (LIMITED).

The adjourned ordinary general meeting was held on the 8th inst. at Salisbury House, London Wall, Mr. A. M. Grenfell presiding.

The Chairman stated that during the past year the gross revenue from the mine was £544,000—being the largest in their history, and an increase of £78,000 over the previous year's figures. After deducting all mining and milling expenses, the balance carried to profit and loss account was £389,000, or over 28 per cent. on their total capital. Of that amount they had had to pay to Mr. Walsh, under their contract, £88,000, so that their net profit for the year was £286,000. Adding the amount brought in from last year, a total of £476,876 had to be accounted for. From that amount they had paid the usual dividends (free of income-tax) at the rate of 20 per cent. per annum, which had absorbed £178,000; and after paying directors' fees and income-tax they had appropriated £270,000 odd for the purchase of Santa Gertrudis shares, and they carried forward a balance of £10,000. The profit in the ore reserves was estimated in the report at £284,000—£188,000 less than the profit for the previous year; but as they had drawn profits of £389,000 during the year, they had in reality added during the twelve months under review £201,000 to the estimated ore reserves given to them by him last year. The final payment in respect of the 2,000,000 dollars under the Walsh contract was made in March last. The Chairman went on to refer to the recent developments in the mine, and stated that on Tuesday he received a telegram from Mr. Cox stating that the ore reserves of the Camp Bird on November 1 contained profits of 868,000 dollars. This meant that even if nothing else were found they would be able to go on with the present monthly output until well into next year; and before the Camp Bird's present ore reserves became exhausted they would have had ample opportunity of getting the big Santa Gertrudis mill into full operation. Even if they had no great stroke of luck in finding a new Camp Bird in their Coronado claims the company's prospects were so bright through their holding in Santa Gertrudis that there was every chance of their continuing to show extremely satisfactory balance-sheets recording the payment of large annual dividends for at least five or six years ahead of them now. The Camp Bird mine had done them splendidly for the last eight—nearly nine—years. Let them hope that the Santa Gertrudis would do the same. In his opinion, the prospects before them in the Santa Gertrudis were certainly better than the prospects were when they brought out the original Camp Bird.

The report was unanimously adopted.

Resolutions were afterwards passed re-electing the retiring directors and auditors, voting £1,000 as a bonus to the staff, and according a vote of thanks to the chairman, the directors, and the staff.

CARRERAS, LIMITED.

The seventh annual general meeting of the shareholders in Carreras, Limited, was held on the 8th inst. at the company's offices, Arcadia Works, City Road, E.C., Mr. Bernhard Baron (chairman and managing director) presiding.

The Chairman, in the course of his speech, said:—

Ladies and Gentlemen,—I welcome you to our new home, and congratulate you on last year's business. It is a great pleasure to me to meet you again and to give you the same assurance as I have done in the past—that our future looks very bright. You will see that the available balance for distribution is £52,060 17s. 1d. From that amount your directors have decided to pay a dividend for the period of fifteen months at the rate of 10 per cent., which is a little higher than last year; to put £10,000 to reserve fund, making £18,000 in all, and to carry forward £25,425. The figures before you are all the more remarkable when you remember the difficulties with which we had to contend in our business on account of the 1909 Budget, under which we had to pay an extra duty of 8d. per lb. from April 29, 1909. We took the strong stand of not increasing the prices of our tobaccos; but tried instead to increase our trade, and I am happy to report that the sales of our renowned Craven Mixture, Black Cat Mixture, and other tobaccos have increased, both at home and abroad. With our present facilities in our new factory, "Arcadia Works" equipped with the latest and most scientific machinery and plant for the manufacture of high-class tobaccos and cigarettes, and where our employees work under the most hygienic conditions—I claim that there is not another factory in the world that can surpass ours—we shall endeavour to outgrow even the capacity of this building. Before concluding, I wish to say that with the experience I have had in the past year, I am convinced that I have been mistaken in accusing the great Imperial Tobacco Company of trying to monopolise the trade of every independent manufacturer. I find that they are only trying to protect their own interests, not to imitate or interfere with anyone else, and therefore I must say publicly that if I have ever said anything against them I have made a mistake. As individuals, I have always known them to be gentlemen—collectively, as a company, I thought that they acted like other combinations—but I find that they are different, and I am happy to acknowledge it, especially the old and honourable house of W. D. and H. O. Wills, who are actually sending us orders every day. Gentlemen, I am sure that our future is assured if we attend to our own business. He then moved the adoption of the report and accounts.

Mr. W. H. Rouse said that as he had on various occasions criticised the policy of the board he would take that opportunity of being the first shareholder to congratulate the directors upon the successful result of the year's working. On that occasion there was no need whatever for any adverse criticism. The directors had done everything to his entire satisfaction; indeed, they had done more than the shareholders could have expected.

Mr. W. J. Yapp (director) seconded the motion, which was unanimously adopted.

CHAMPION AND SLEE, LIMITED.

Presiding at the third annual general meeting of the shareholders, held on the 12th inst. at the Cannon Street Hotel, E.C., Mr. Herbert H. Slee, in moving the adoption of the report, said: Considerably more vinegar has been sold during the year, and the profit on trading shows an increase which would have been more marked had not the insane competition entailed lower selling prices. The competition has been very keen, but the directors have determined at all costs to maintain the high standard of quality of their vinegar, their experience being that in the long run quality always tells. After crediting deposit interest and transfer fees amounting to £53 4s. 4d., and deducting £2,214 11s. 4d. for mortgage interest, income-tax, and management expenses, also £5,176 16s. 10d. for depreciation of buildings, plant, etc., and one-third of preliminary expenses, there remains a sum of £6,586 5s. 4d. From this sum is deducted £3,067 17s. 6d. for preference dividend paid to June 30, 1910, and after adding £916 13s. 10d. brought forward, the divisible balance is £4,435 1s. 8d. The directors recommend that this should be applied as follows:—In providing for preference dividend from July 1 to September 30, 1910, £1,022 12s. 6d.; in paying a dividend of 4 per cent. on the ordinary shares, £2,467 11s. 2d.; and leaving a balance to carry forward of £944 18s.

Mr. J. Browne-Martin, in seconding the motion, said that an increased output of nearly 10 per cent. was shown as compared with the previous year. If a business was progressing in volume he did not look so much to dividends for one particular year, his experience being that dividends always followed an increase in output.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. W. Cobden Samuel, in proposing the re-election of Mr. J. Browne-Martin as a director, said he thought the shareholders were very fortunate in having such a keen, hardworking business man on the board. Mr. Browne-Martin's motto was sound finance.

Mr. Isaac N. Lyons seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously.

HEVEA RUBBER TRUST, LIMITED.

An extraordinary general meeting, convened in compliance with a requisition by shareholders, was held on the 8th inst. at the London Chamber of Commerce, London, Mr. J. L. Shand, presiding, to consider the following resolution:—That this meeting dissents from the policy of the board in investing in dividendless and unrealisable assets, and directs the board (a) to forthwith take all such steps as may be feasible (without incurring undue liability or loss) for the purpose of withdrawing from the undertaking entered into by the company to invest £15,000 of the company's funds in the Kuala-Nal Kelantan Rubber Company, Limited, or for disposing of any interest acquired by the company therein; (b) to refrain from pursuing such policy hereafter.

The Chairman said that there was not a single investment which this company had undertaken which he would not have undertaken on his own account. He was perfectly satisfied with them all, and as long as he was chairman that was the policy which the board would adopt.

Mr. Maurice Jenks said he did not wish to introduce any personalities into the discussion. He saw no ground for any attack upon the personal integrity of the directors. But he complained of the way in which the directors had exercised their judgment, particularly with regard to the investment of £15,000, which apparently was the most important investment that the company had made up to now. Speaking for himself and those he represented, they had thought, when going into the Hevea Rubber Trust, that they were investing in a company which would spread its interests widely on remunerative terms, and with a view to a quick turnover. From this point of view it was impossible to understand the policy of the directors in putting £15,000 into the Kuala-Nal Kelantan Rubber Company. He hoped the chairman would tell them what was the great attraction of this investment. He did not want the meeting to think that his motion was merely a factious interference with the management of the company by the directors. He and his supporters thought that the matter was very serious indeed. In conclusion, Mr. Jenks formally moved the resolution.

Mr. Lustig, in seconding the motion, said he did not wish to impute to the directors any but the most honourable motives in the course which they had thought proper to adopt; but their policy was, in his opinion, and in that of many other shareholders, a mistaken one, and could not be in the best interests of the present shareholders.

After a long discussion, the resolution was submitted to the meeting, and negatived by an overwhelming majority.

Mr. Jenks thereupon remarked that, as the requisitionists had received large support, he must demand a poll; but it was pointed out that, against proxies for 9,000 votes in favour of the requisitionists, there were 43,000 votes against their resolution, inclusive of the holdings of the directors, but exclusive of their supporters present.

The demand for a poll was therefore not pressed, and the proceedings terminated with a vote of thanks to the chairman, proposed by Mr. Jenks.

QUEER STORY.

THE USE OF SARAH.

STODGE was feeling very blue that morning. There was reason. He hadn't tasted alcohol for three whole days and some odd hours, and it was almost more than he could bear.

Such an unexampled abstinence on the part of Stodge demands a word of explanation. The fact was he had taken a vow, and this is how he had come to take it.

A chill on the liver was the primary cause. Stodge felt so ill that he almost wished himself dead. The thought of food made him shudder. At the mere suggestion of ardent spirits all his gastric economy rose up in horrified revolt. It was while he was in this chastened mood that young Smigson made a determined effort to reclaim him.

Young Smigson, who had only just come down from Oxford, was engaged in what is known as "reading for a title" with our vicar. In a few months he was to be ordained deacon. Meanwhile he devoted all the time he could spare from his studies to working in the parish as a sort of lay-curate. He was very earnest, very impulsive, very boyish, and very impressionable. His besetting sin—if sin it could be called in so essentially harmless a young man—was a weakness for a pretty face. This circumstance had led him, in the past, into more than one mild scrape. Conscious of the failing, he was trying with all his might to overcome it, and was just now in the full glow of that virtuous resolve.

This young man, greatly sanguine, took upon himself to convert the incorrigible Stodge. He found that worthy reclining upon an improvised couch of three Windsor chairs, with his hands clasped on his stomach, in a state of limp collapse.

"I'm awfully sorry to see you like this, Stodge," began young Smigson, sympathetically.

Stodge groaned.

"I tell you it's chronic, sir," he replied. "All my insides feel like sinking away into nowhere. I doubt if I shall ever live through it."

"Come! Come! We'll hope it's not so bad as that," said young Smigson, encouragingly. "You'll be better by-and-by. And look here, Stodge! This sickness hasn't come upon you for nothing. There's the hand of Providence in it. It's a blessing in disguise. Be sure of that."

"Oh! indeed, sir! And where does the blessing come in?" murmured Stodge, with a half-hearted attempt at sarcasm.

"It's a lesson to you," pursued the other. "A salutary warning to live more temperately in the future. There's no doubt what the real cause of the mischief is; and we may as well look it frankly in the face. It's the drink, Stodge."

And there was a note of reproving gravity in young Smigson's boyish tones.

"For the love of Heaven, don't speak of it, sir," ejaculated Stodge, shuddering and holding up feeble hands in nauseated protest.

Young Smigson saw the hour of his advantage and pressed it.

"There's only one chance for you, Stodge," he declared, with earnest conviction. "You must take the pledge."

"Oh! sir," remonstrated Stodge, "I could never wear a bit of blue ribbon—I couldn't, indeed. I get chipped enough as it is without that."

"Well, I won't insist on the blue ribbon, Stodge," answered young Smigson, smiling in spite of his earnestness, "if you'll give me your solemn, sacred promise, in the sight of Heaven, that's good enough for me. I know you won't go back on that, Stodge—will you?"

Stodge reflected a minute.

"D'ye mean I'm to swear off whisky for ever and ever, sir?" he inquired.

"For ever and ever," answered young Smigson.

"For ever and ever's a long time, sir," said Stodge, dubiously. "If it was only for a limited period now —— But there! How can you understand? You haven't my temptations."

"I have my own temptations," rejoined young Smigson.

"Ah! You mean the girls, sir," said Stodge, with the faintest suspicion of a wink in his left eye.

Young Smigson blushed from brow to neck at the home-thrust. He was still very juvenile.

"I admit some foolish flirtations in the past," he acknowledged, with repentant humility. "But it's never going to happen again. I assure you of that, Stodge."

"Not that I blame you for it. There's no great sin in kissing a pretty girl, sir," observed Stodge, magnanimously. "Lord love you! I've done it myself, scores of times, when I was your age."

"There may be no great sin in it, but it is unbecoming in a Christian," declared young Smigson, in the full fervour of his newly-formed good resolves.

"Look here, Stodge," he added, earnestly, after a brief pause. "Shall it be a bargain between us—a solemn, sacred bargain? As long as I abstain from my besetting weakness, you'll abstain from yours? Come! What do you say to that?"

In the end Stodge allowed himself to be talked into it. He felt too limp and sick to offer much resistance. Besides, he couldn't bear the thought of whisky at the moment. It seemed quite easy to vow abstinence just then. . . . Anyhow (which is all that matters for the present purpose), the mutual vows were taken, and reinforced by the most sacred adjurations.

But now, after less than three days, Stodge was bitterly sorry for what he had done. You see, the doctor had been, and had prescribed a course of Epsom-salts; and Stodge, having taken the medicine for two days, was feeling more like the old Stodge again. His thirst had come back—his own old craving, blistering thirst. It cried aloud for whisky; and Stodge couldn't respond to the cry. No wonder he was blue and mopish.

Knowing Stodge, you may wonder that he was sufficiently scrupulous to hold himself bound by his vow. But Stodge was a queer mixture. There was an odd, half-superstitious streak in him, which, while he was careless of keeping his promises in general, impelled him to respect this solemn oath fortified by the phrases of religion. He felt inclined to kick himself for taking it. But having taken it, he was afraid to break it. The oath stood between his thirst and the promised land of the Red Deer—an impassable Jordan.

His gloomy ruminations were interrupted by the sound of a girl's voice.

"Hulloa, dad!" it said.

Stodge looked up and saw his eldest daughter—a good-looking young woman, somewhat over-dressed in a peacock-blue frock and a particularly florid hat.

"What brings you home to-day, then, Sarah?" he asked.

"Oh! The missis has given me a day off," she answered. "I've got till ten to-night. So I thought I'd just come over and see how things were with you."

She laughed, rather flippantly.

"You'll find your mother inside," nodded Stodge.

The girl passed into the house. Stodge proceeded to fill and light his pipe. The bitterness of his humour made him caustic, hypercritical.

"What's the use of a girl like that to a man?" he said to himself, as his eyes followed her into the passage. "Puts all her wages on her back, and never a dollar to spare for her poor old dad! Bah! I'm about fed up with Sarah."

He expectorated, eloquently.

Just then the parochial Scripture Reader came along. He stopped and spoke to Stodge.

"We shall see you and your wife at the club tea to-night, I hope," he remarked.

"Thank'ee. We'll be there," nodded Stodge.

"And, oh! I say," added the other. "I suppose your wife couldn't come in to cut bread-and-butter beforehand, and stay to help with the washing up afterwards? I know Mr. Smigson's very short of helpers. He told me so."

"I don't doubt but what she will. I'll ask her," replied Stodge.

"Do! There's a good man." And the Scripture Reader, who was evidently in a hurry, passed on.

Presently, Stodge turned indoors t dinner. He had now recovered his temper somewhat, and was, consequently, in better form. He chaffed Sarah, quite in his old vein, and made various facetious inquiries about her love affairs, of which that flighty damsel always had at least half-a-dozen on hand. Sarah, who didn't lack for pert wit, gave back as good as she got; and altogether there ensued some very pretty passages of spirited repartee.

"By the way," remarked Stodge, presently, as he sipped his dry-ginger ale. "They're short of helpers at the club tea to-night. They want you to go and lend a hand, mother. I said I was sure you would."

"Then you said more than you had any right to do," rejoined his spouse. "With Sarah home for the day, I'm not going to leave her. Not me."

"Well, the fact is, my dear," said Stodge, "I kind of half-promised that Sarah should go, too."

"I like your cheek, dad," cried the girl, tossing her much-frizzed head.

"You won't find it so bad," said Stodge. "There'll be plenty of nice young men there."

"Oh, go on," answered Sarah.

"It's truth, though," pursued Stodge. "All the members of the Men's Christian Endeavour——"

Sarah burst out laughing.

"Christian Endeavour, indeed! Fancy me in that sort of company! I'm not troubling the milk-and-water jug. Thanks all the same, dad."

"Christian Endeavour young men are much the same as other young men where a pretty girl like yourself is concerned, Sarah," said Stodge, with adulatory tact.

"Chuck it, dad," answered Sarah.

But the flattery had pleased her. Moreover, the prospect of spending her day out alone with her mother was not altogether an enticing prospect. The tea at the Institute, even though held under Christian Endeavour auspices, would be better than that. Presently Sarah came to the conclusion that she might as well go; though, for the sake of appearances, she put her acquiescence on altruistic grounds. In other words, she made it clear she was doing it for her mother's sake, purely in order that Mrs. Stodge mightn't be deprived of her little outing.

"Now, that's kind of you, my dear, I must say," said the simple old body, who, in her heart of hearts, had wanted to go all along.

"Very kind," added Stodge.

He could scarcely repress a grin as he said it. He was not deceived. It took a far cleverer young woman than Sarah to deceive Stodge.

The tea was a success. Young Smigson was in great force. He was here, there, everywhere. So, for that matter, was Sarah. They were constantly running up against one another. Once or twice they collided and apologies ensued. On young Smigson's part they were profuse; on Sarah's, becomingly embarrassed. When their eyes met, hers fell almost instantly. Almost, but not quite. They showed themselves to him just long enough to make him wish for a further glimpse. Sarah had uncommonly fine eyes. Also, she knew how to adapt the use of them to the particular brand of young man who was engaging her attentions for the time being. It was a natural gift, perfected by practice. And Sarah had had a great deal of practice.

When at length the tea and entertainment were over, there came the washing up. Sarah, with her sleeves rolled back, displaying a pair of plump, shapely forearms, was energy personified. She and young Smigson happened to use the same basin. Their hands were coming perpetually in contact. In more senses than one, it was Sarah's day out. She was enjoying herself (as she herself would have expressed it) "a treat." The washing up was just completed. The last tea-spoon was being wiped, when Mrs. Stodge—the only other washer-up then left—was called out of the room by a message from her husband, who wanted to speak to her. For the first time during the evening young Smigson and Sarah were alone. They had a playful contest (which I rather fancy Sarah began) for the privilege of wiping that last tea-spoon. In the scuffle their fingers became entangled. Sarah was an uncommonly pretty girl. No less certainly, young Smigson was an uncommonly impressionable youth. The temptation was too great. He succumbed. He kissed Sarah. I blush to write it, but so it was.

And just at that unlucky moment, as the fates would have it, Sarah's father entered the room in quest of his cap.

Stodge's face was a study. More in sorrow than in anger, he held up astonished hands.

"Oh, Mr. Smigson, sir!"

I cannot convey the pained reproach of Stodge's tones. I wish I could. But it is quite beyond the power of pen and ink.

"I'm—I'm—awfully sorry," stammered the culprit, overwhelmed with shame and embarrassment. "I meant no harm. I——"

"I'm grieved, sir, deeply grieved and sorry that you should have so far forgotten yourself," interposed Stodge, very sad and hurt. "I will say no more, Mr. Smigson. Your own conscience will reproach you. Sarah, my dear, this is no place for you. Come home with your poor old dad!". . .

On their back they passed the Red Deer.

"You run on, Sarah, and tell your mother I'll be along presently," said Stodge. "I've a bit of a thirst on me. I'm just going to step in here for a small lemon."

* * * * * *

Stodge, you will remember, had asked himself earlier in the day what was the use of Sarah. The answer was now supplied. He had found a very practical use for that young woman, after all.

BOOKS.

"KINGS in exile" are a sorry spectacle. Like Elia's "poor relations," they are a source of continual embarrassment to their prosperous Royal cousins, who have to entertain and to maintain them; but, unlike Elia's dependants, they rather exact arrogantly than accept gratefully the welcome and precedence magnanimously accorded to them. Naturally, "the right divine of kings to govern wrong" has been so driven into their heads from infancy that they cannot believe in its forfeiture by misgovernment. The Stuarts, e.g., are even more amazing examples than the Bourbons of indomitable pig-headedness. After Cromwell, as Bozzy's father put it to Dr. Johnson, had "gart kings ken they had a lith in their neck," and after James II. had had his crown kicked off into the Boyne, and after Bonnie Prince Charlie himself had had his lesson at Culloden, still this last and most disreputable of the ill-fated family insisted, to his own continual discomfort and discomfiture, upon having paid to him everywhere and by every one all the honours of royalty. No wonder the "going" royalties in whose dominions he settled, from the Pope down, fought shy of their disreputable cousin, who was always begging, nearly always drunk, and yet as arrogant and exacting as though he were really what he continued to style himself, "King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland." What a picture you get of "Bonnie Prince Charlie" in Mr. Herbert Vaughan's "The Last Stuart Queen!" (1) "The Pretender," writes Sir Horace Mann, in 1779, "is insupportable in stench and temper, neither of which he takes the least pains to disguise to his wife, whose beauty is vastly faded of late. She has paid dear for the dregs of Royalty!" And such dregs!

After a convivial debauch on St. Andrew's Day, November 30, 1780, the Chevalier, maddened by the fumes of wine and strong waters to a point beyond his habitual condition of drunkenness, suddenly attacked his wife in the privacy of her bed-chamber, accusing her of infidelity—a charge which she denied with such warmth as angered her tipsy spouse yet further. A disgraceful assault of the intoxicated man upon the young and lovely woman followed. The countess was not a little injured, and was certainly alarmed for her life, and Sir Horace Mann even hints at conduct too nauseous to relate. The piercing cries of the terrified lady soon brought the servants to her rescue, and Louise was dragged from the clutches of her infuriated husband.

There is, however, this much to be said in extenuation of the Chevalier's blackguard onslaught: that his wife had been for two years carrying on an intrigue with Alfieri, and, I think I may add, was from almost the first days of her marriage eager to carry on an intrigue with any attractive cavaliere servente who presented himself. I certainly cannot accept Mr. Herbert Vaughan's description of her encouragement by letter in these first days of her marriage of her young Swiss friend, Carl Victor Bonstetten, as suggestive only of "a mild intimacy, almost an innocent flirtation." Here are two of those "mild" advances:—

> I like to occupy myself with writing to you, for you are one of my most cherished friends; perhaps you even reign with too much authority in my heart. Would that we were in the Desired Island!"

And here is another:—

> You are the most delightful of men, and the only one made to capture my heart, my mind, and my soul. How lively our friendship would be if we could but cover the five hundred leagues which separate us! The tender Maltzam often tells me, "Monsieur de Bonstetten was the only man who would have been dangerous to you," and I quite believe it, for you are gay, captivating, and intellectual by turns. That is the type of lover I desire—one who will play the lover only when we two are alone.

Who can doubt that only "those five hundred leagues" prevented this very oncoming young woman from having with Bonstetten the intrigue she had later with Alfieri, and which she contrived with such consummate adroitness to conceal for years from her jealous husband and from her ascetic Cardinal brother-in-law? Indeed, not the least repugnant features in the character and conduct of Mr. Herbert Vaughan's heroine are the consummate hypocrisy and ingratitude which she showed towards the kindly Cardinal, who on all occasions shielded and sheltered her. The truth is, the Chevalier was at least as much sinned against as sinning in the relations Mr. Herbert Vaughan impartially describes between him, his wife, and her lover. To begin with, the lady deliberately and delightedly married this disreputable old man, and immediately after the marriage made the unmistakable advances I have just quoted from her letters to the attractive young Swiss, Bonstetten. "You alone," she writes to him in a third letter, "have succeeded in touching this heart of stone. I felt and feared it, but the vast mountains between us serve as my rampart, and I needed nothing less for my protection!" Such a "country wife" was little likely to resist the advances of any Mr. Horner who pressed his suit; and really Alfieri, at the time when Louise made his acquaintance, seemed, like Wycherley's Horner, to devote his whole life to the deliberate seduction of married women.

I am not sure that the exchange the Countess made of masters was so very much to her advantage, since Alfieri "was a human fiend of egotism, selfishness, and bad temper; a veritable Eastern potentate whose every wish was law and whose constant outbursts of passion made the whole house suffer, from the poor Countess of Albany down to the meanest servant in his employment." Though, however, none of the three characters in this Wycherley comedy is sympathetic, yet Mr. Herbert Vaughan's presentation of the characters, scenes and incidents of the imbroglio is extremely interesting.

"In the Heart of Africa" (2) is "a round, unvarnished tale," which is like Othello's also in its record of "most disastrous chances, moving accidents by flood and field, hair-breadth 'scapes, antres vast, deserts idle, rocks and hills whose heads touch heaven." Nothing could be more business-like, and German business-like at that, than the elaborate equipment of the expedition, unless it be the modest and matter-of-fact record of its progress and of its results. Not the least interesting chapter of this extremely interesting book is that devoted to the much-debated—the Duke would say "much-maligned"—administration of the Congo State. What are we to say of the Duke's assurance that this administration sins on the side—not of inhumanity—but of humanity! Possibly the Duke's standard of humanity may differ from that of other travellers through the region, since he says it is impossible to maintain discipline even as an explorer without constant resort to flogging.

Mr. Putnam Weale's "The Conflict of Colour" (3) is a somewhat pretentious but extremely suggestive book. The mere statistics it gives of the relative numbers and relative growth in numbers of the white as against the black, brown, and yellow races are startling. Not only is the white population of the globe less than half of the black, brown, and yellow, but "the blacks double their numbers in forty years, browns and yellows in sixty years, and whites in eighty years." Mr. Putnam Weale believes the Yellow Peril to lie, not in the swamping of Western civilisation by an Eastern wave of invasion, nor in the swamping of Western markets by cheap eastern products, but in a federation of Eastern Asia for the absolute exclusion of Western commerce and manufactures. "This is the policy which Japan has already instituted in Formosa and Korea with such conspicuous success, and which she is beginning in hidden ways to carry out in Manchuria."

Those who with me have been tantalised by Elia's raptures over the Life of the Duke of Newcastle by his Duchess, "A book at once both good and rare, where the individual is almost the species, and when that perishes

> We know not where is that Promethean torch
> That can its light relumine," will eagerly open "The First Duke and Duchess of Newcastle." (4) As far as Elia's "thrice noble, chaste, and virtuous, but again somewhat fantastical and original-brained, generous Margaret Newcastle" is concerned, the book is disappointing. The specimens given of her plays are terrible, while of the specimens that dare not be given our author says, "It is not too much to say of them that they combine indecency and obscenity with the stagnate dulness so usually the accompaniment of literary ditch-water." But the story of the Duke and Duchess's adventurous lives is extremely interesting and well written.

Dr. Berry Hart's "Phases of Evolution and Heredity" (5) is a small volume of homeopathic pilules of science which are rather appetising than satisfying. Its subjects range from Darwinism and Mendalism, Biometry, Mnemism, down to Pepys' revelation of himself through his diary and the Suffragette's revelation of herself through her hooliganism. The scientific papers are—as you might expect from such an expert—particularly illuminating. Mr Fred Whishaw's heroine in "An Empress in Love" (6) suggests at the close of the novel that "if my husband had been another Peter perhaps I should have been guilty of her peccadilloes"—the peccadilloes of that mere animal—so far as her multitudinous amours are concerned—Catherine of Russia! However, it is a stirring story of the vain attempt of this modern Messalina to seduce the English hero from his allegiance to virtue and to Madge.

DESMOND B. O'BRIEN.

Mrs. T. P. O'Connor's "I Myself" (Methuen, 12s. 6d. net), now in a second edition, has been one of the most popular of recent autobiographies. It is a vivacious narrative of the writer's life in America and in England, enriched with entertaining reminiscences of the many political, literary, and theatrical celebrities whom she has known. There are a number of illustrations, some being from drawings made for the author by Mr. William Strang, Mr. Max Beerbohm, and other artists.

Mr. Arthur Ransome's new anthology, "The Book of Love" (Jack, 6s. net) is like its predecessor, "The Book of Friendship," in its unlikeness to the majority of anthologies. In the place of the usual collection of short and often fragmentary pieces of prose and verse he gives a number of complete works, including, for example, the whole of the old French tale "Aucassin and Nicolette," translated by Mr. Laurence Housman; essays by Bacon, Montaigne, Emerson, and others, and many poems. Mr. Ransome has made an admirable choice from a wide range of authors, old and new.

It will be news to the vast majority of the people concerned to learn that what is described as a small private conference was held in London last month "to consider the state of religion among the upper classes." The fact is now made known through an announcement of the forthcoming publication by Messrs. Longmans, Green, and Co. of a shilling pamphlet entitled "Religion and English Society," which will contain the addresses delivered at the conference by Dr. Figgis, of Mirfield, together with some additional matter.

"Highways and By-ways in Cambridge and Ely," by the Rev. Edward Conybeare, is the latest addition to the well-known series in which Messrs. Macmillan have published so many fascinating volumes. Mr. Conybeare shows that the countryside districts abound in picturesque nooks and corners which well repay exploration; but the chief purpose of his work is to describe the unique interests of the two ancient cities of Cambridge and Ely, with special regard to the points mostly passed over in the guide books. Mr. Frederick L. Griggs, an artist who has illustrated several previous volumes in the same series, contributes one hundred delightful drawings, those of the ancient churches and colleges being particularly good.

"In Praise of Oxford" (6s. net) is the first of a comprehensive and interesting series of anthologies which Messrs. Constable have in hand for early publication. There is, of course, a rich abundance of literary material for several anthologies about Oxford alone, and the present volume of prose and verse, dealing with its history and topography, is to be followed by another devoted to "Society, Life, and Manners." The compilers are Messrs. Thomas Seccombe and H. Spencer Scott, who have brought to their task an encyclopædic knowledge, combined with good judgment in the selection of extracts from the writings of historians and poets "in praise of Oxford." Messrs. Constable's series will include similar anthologies dealing with Cambridge, Eton and Windsor, Harrow, Edinburgh, Paris, Rome, Switzerland, and Greece.

"Red-Letter Days of Samuel Pepys" (Sidgwick and Jackson, 3s. 6d. net) is a well-printed volume of extracts from the famous diary which will be acceptable to many people without the leisure or perhaps the inclination to read the whole work. Carefully selected by Mr. E. F. Allen to present characteristic views of "Mr. Pepys's many-sided personality," the extracts are grouped under such headings as "Mr. Pepys the Gossip," "Mr. Pepys and the Fair Sex," "Mr. Pepys's Devotions," and so forth, and the book is furnished with an introduction by Mr. Henry B. Wheatley.

ART.

THE ROYAL WATER COLOUR SOCIETY.

"A FEW choice water-colours," is so often the highest expression of furniture in the mind of the modern novelist—unless, indeed, he sustains originality on Japanese prints—as to account for the generous profusion of cheerful red tickets indicative of the sales at the present exhibition. Reasons of a less æsthetic nature no doubt contribute partly to this result. They are less costly than oils; Christmas is coming; people are getting married every day; and water-colour has ever been popular in a country that was one of its principal exponents.

There is a little of everything at the R.S.W. The historic scene that used to fill half the Academy is represented by Mr. Cadogan Cowper's small version of the mural painting, "The New Learning in England," recently completed in the House of Parliament. The "New Learning" is likely to be popular, since a number of us still regard history in terms of the historic picture. The future King Henry VIII., aged nine, is surrounded by his brother and sisters, while Erasmus, More, and other worthies are received by him with a well-simulated appreciation. Mr. Cadogan Cowper has a cheerful colour-scheme; the lime-light flashes duly upon young Henry, while Erasmus is after strict Holbeinian canons. In the baby, Edmund, Mr. Cadogan Cowper has attempted a certain amount of naturalism. The painting is instinct with conscientious work and historical accuracy, without raising too much controversy as to inspiration.

To an earlier school of water-colourists belong Sir Ernest Waterlow, Mr. Albert Goodwin, and even Mr. Alfred Parsons. His smiling skies, meadows and downs, his peaceful blue distances, fully justify the president in adhering consistently to what is unmistakably his walk in life. Sir Ernest never attempts great depths and hidden meanings; hence the undeniable charm of his work. Mr. Albert Goodwin retains the fine delicacy of water-colour while adding such dramatic effects as are contained in "After-glow, Cairo." Alone Mr. Alfred Parsons is out of date. Since his revelation of Japan much water has flowed under the bridge, and we are able to understand less obvious whispers of Japan than his otherwise pretty "Old Wells Road." Rather less meticulous, and striking a somewhat deeper note, Mr. Little and Mr. Thorne Waite can always be relied upon for such excellent work as they are now exhibiting.

Mr. Walter Crane's "Porte de France, Tunis," shows the old old school stereotyped. Each figure in his work stands out with the stiff insistence of every other figure, and the difference between these almost topographical representations of hard fact and the more modern art of suggestion can be seen by comparing this picture with Mr. J. Paterson's imaginative "Beaumanoir Gateway, Dinan." For some reason—and not a very good one—Mr. Paterson has been either skied or badly hung. It is thus not as easy as it should be to see such delightful little studies as "The White Cow" and others. Together with Mr. Hughes Stanton, who is showing some fine studies, Mr. Paterson is responsible for some of the most advanced landscape work in the exhibition. Mrs. Laura Knight is very refreshing with her love of gorgeous colour, and her "Sun Hat" is an admirable blending of flesh tints with the glowing red of the hat. Mr. Walter Bayes shows his usual charming sense of design in "Padwick Regatta," while Mr. Anning Bell's classic figures are instances of how familiarity breeds appreciation.

* * * * *

Two very sumptuous volumes act as finger-posts to the art tendencies of the day. "The Louvre" (T. C. and E. C. Jack, 21s. net), by Mr. P. G. Konody and Mr. Maurice Brockwell, caters for the conviction that if you do not know pictures you must at least know of them, while Mr. Lewis Hind's "Turner's Golden Visions" (Jack) prescribes for the hero-worship which so often does duty for heroism. Incidentally, of course, it is by their lavish supply of coloured illustrations that both books will be known. It is nevertheless a little difficult to discover the exact place of "The Louvre." It contains fifty somewhat harshly reproduced plates in colour; it gives a conscientious analysis of the art represented by the great gallery, and it corrects the numerous false attributions for which the Louvre is notorious. Several of the pictures are well chosen, but it is impossible not to regret the inclusion for mere popularity's sake of Murillo's "Immaculate Conception," of Greuze, and of Mme. Le Brun, of whom the infinity of sepia reproductions should be sufficient warning of their character. Also, if the reader is not on the spot, he can have little use for an unillustrated number of painters of whom he hears perhaps for the first time; and if he is on the spot a book weighing several pounds is not likely to take the place even of the very inferior handbook provided officially for visitors to the gallery. On the whole, "The Louvre" is more suggestive of a Christmas present than of anything else. "Turner's Golden Visions," on the other hand, contains really beautiful reproductions, the delicacy and transparency of colour being admirably preserved. Incidentally it is a psychological study of Mr. Hind—"the boy that became a man"—as well as of Mr. Turner, though the over-personal note of the narrative is bravely redeemed at the eleventh hour by the justness of some of the criticism. Owing, however, to the Turner boom, and to the beautiful plates, I have no hesitation in prophesying a lasting popularity for this work.

MUSIC.

"SALOME" has been produced, and the head of St. John the Baptist threatens to prove the boar's head (I had almost written bore's) of the coming Christmas festivities. The management did not take my tip to convert the whole work into a pantomime, but the Lord Chamberlain certainly did his best to contribute to the humours of the production by the comic amendments which he insisted on. As to the work itself, Wilde's poem makes an effective book, and Strauss's music is wonderful, if not always beautiful. It is, indeed, a strange mixture of originality and commonplace, of the impressive and the trivial, but as a whole I certainly prefer the work to "Elektra." If its best pages are not quite so fine, its musical interest is more evenly distributed. But, speaking generally, the resemblance between the two works is a good deal greater than might have been expected in view of Strauss's much-lauded powers of characterisation. As a matter of fact, his powers in this respect are confined more to externals than essentials. He can paint a woman's jingling jewels better than her soul. There is just as little to suggest the East in the music of "Salome" as there is to suggest ancient Greece in "Elektra." The work obtained its third performance on Monday, when a new Salome, Fräulein von Rappe, gave quite a good account of herself.

Mr. Lionel Monckton's unsuccessful attempt in the Courts to secure redress at common law for the appropriation of one of his songs by the Gramophone Company was hardly regarded beforehand as likely to succeed, but it was quite worth making, and the case has served to call attention once again to the injustice which composers suffer under the existing condition of the law. At present, the composer has no voice whatever as regards the reproduction of his work in this particular way. Any one who chooses is at liberty to make thousands of pounds out of the product of his brain by offering it to the public in this form without paying the composer himself a penny.

The leading case governing the matter is Boosey v. Whight, in which it was decided that the perforated rolls sold for use with a mechanical organ were not "copies" within the meaning of the Copyright Act of 1842, and did not, therefore, infringe copyright. The reasoning adopted was that the perforations in the rolls were not such a mode of notation as an ordinary reader of music would be able to decipher, and that consequently the law was not transgressed. Phonograph records escape in the same way. Statutory redress being thus barred, there was just the off-chance that such reproductions might be assailable at common law on the ground that the composer's proprietary rights in respect of his own creations were manifestly infringed, but in the event this proved not to be so. Fortunately, composers will not now have to suffer in this way much longer, since forthcoming copyright legislation expressly provides against this form of piracy in conformity with the recommendations of the last Berlin conference.

A regrettable feature of last week's case was the character of some of the obiter dicta of the learned Judge (Mr. Justice Joyce), such as his remark that "when a man has written a song or got a trade mark he thinks the whole world belongs to him." Even more open to criticism was his observation, in reference to composers' already existing performing rights, that "these nonsensical restrictions ought not to be allowed"; and more amazing still was his question:—

> Supposing I buy this song, why cannot I go and sing it in public? (Laughter.) Is there anything to prevent my doing so?

"Judicial nescience" is a well-established branch of legal humour; but it does not usually take the form of assuming ignorance of the most elementary principles of the law itself. Mr. Justice Joyce's attitude was all the more noticeable since counsel for the Gramophone Company actually went out of their way to acknowledge that Mr. Monckton's case was a very hard one.

Not very much surprise, probably, will have been caused by the announcement that the negotiations between the Vienna Imperial Opera and Herr Nikisch have fallen through, and that Leipsic is to retain his services after all, though at a price, for his contract has been prolonged and his salary increased. I fancy I am not wrong in stating that this sort of thing has happened more than once before. Nikisch knows his value and is quite right to exact his full price. He is the Caruso of the conducting world and commands fees accordingly. But even so, the salary which he gets at Leipsic is probably only a fraction of what he could command in America, say, if he chose to go back there, or even in England, if it suited his purpose to settle here. Meanwhile Herr Gregor and the Vienna authorities will have to look elsewhere.

Apropos of Vienna, that seems to have been an amusing kind of demonstration which the male members of the Imperial Opera chorus recently resorted to for the purpose of getting their pay increased. They did not actually refuse to appear, but they sang persistently pianissimo throughout the performance (the work being "Lohengrin"), "despite," we read, "the desperate efforts of the conductor, Herr Schalk, to elicit from them the usual volume of sound." The effect must certainly have been rather comic, and one can readily realise the hopelessness of the conductor's position under the circumstances. You can lead a horse to the water, etc.—the parallel need hardly be completed. The choristers' procedure suggests a sort of inversion of the "no song, no supper" principle, their motto being apparently, "Poor wages, poor singing." By a somewhat similar method, it may be recalled, Mme. Patti on one occasion extracted her fee from an embarrassed impresario. He scraped together half the amount, whereupon she put on one stocking; then he found the balance, and she put on the other, and the performance proceeded. So, at least, runs the story.

Mr. Bernard Shaw, who was once a musical critic, has been discoursing in characteristic fashion on music and musicians, though in what he himself once described as the "appallingly violent perspective" of a newspaper report his words seem to contain less of wisdom than might have been expected. Among other things, he suggested that "if people would make actual records of the particular chords and effects that sound strange to them in Strauss or any other modern master, they would be making real contributions to the history of music and of the growth of the tolerance of the human ear." But surely there is not much doubt as to the particular chords which have proved stumbling blocks from time to time.

Miss Marion Snowden, in whose début this week a good deal of interest has been taken, is a young artist of whose career as a pianist high hopes are entertained. A daughter of Mr. Keighley Snowden, the well-known novelist, she has displayed marked musical ability since her youth, and after delighting a large circle of friends for many years in private she now comes before the larger public with every reason to expect that her great talents will win recognition at their hands.

THE THEATRES.

Little Plays at the Little Theatre.

MISS GERTRUDE KINGSTON is proving so exceedingly energetic at the pretty little playhouse which she has brought into being on the old site of Coutts's Bank that I cannot help wishing she would direct her energies a little more wisely. Here is a house which should be an intellectual oasis in a desert of commercial drama, and yet consider the new programme which she provided the other evening. There were four items in it. The first piece, "Denton (Lab.)" is not so much a play as an inconclusive argument between capital and labour. This was followed by a duologue by Mr. Roy Horniman, called "The Walk," which is not only no novelty, but is a trifle only suited for amateurs to play in a village schoolroom. It deals feebly with the old, old humours of a dilatory wife exasperating her husband by taking an unconscionable time to get ready to go for a walk. After these two brilliant efforts came Mr. Charles McEvoy's "Lucifer." This proved to be a pretentious little drama quite unworthy of its really clever author. Lucifer is a vicious hunter which a child in a dream sees throw its rider. The question is who will ride it—the drunken master of the house or his wife's lover? In the end the lover rides it and is killed, and the curtain falls on the body being brought in, while the wife, who has undoubtedly hoped and manœuvred for her husband to be the victim, falls fainting to the ground. In none of these plays was the acting such as to call for any particular comment, and only a stern sense of duty kept me from leaving the theatre. Fortunately, however, I stayed, and was rewarded, though it was in no way flattering to one's national pride that the only item in the programme worth seeing was "The Dragon of Wrath," a Chinese play with Chinese acting. I had heard much of Mme. Chung, but nothing to make me understand how great an artist she is. A plaintive, pathetic, diminutive little person, she has really remarkable gifts of comedy and tragedy, and I have seldom seen finer or more subtle acting in an English theatre. The scene where she accepts one of her lovers, a tall, thin prince (admirably played by Mr. Hung Loo or Mr. Yangtse Chin—it is impossible to tell which from the programme) is exquisite; while her death scene, when years afterwards she meets her death at the hands of the discarded lover, is marvellously played. She has the tiny, distorted feet of a high-born Chinese, and when she struggles with the murderer you cannot help feeling that it must be exceedingly painful for her to be so active in three-inch-long shoes, but I daresay this was merely my imagination. Her two children, who act with her in the second scene of the play, are the quaintest and most stolid little mortals conceivable, and to see them alone is worth a visit to the Little Theatre. There are, by the way, some very beautiful lighting effects in the sort of variety entertainment which is held to celebrate the betrothal of the Prince and Princess. These are the invention and creation of Miss Loie Fuller, and they are very fascinating.

Since seeing the above I have been to one of Miss Kingston's "Causeries du Jeudi" at the same theatre. There was not much "causerie" about the one, though Prince Bariatinsky delivered himself of some quite interesting reminiscences of Tolstoy in the interval between two plays in which his wife (Mme. Lydie Yavorska) figured very prominently. Princess Bariatinsky is a very striking personality, and her Russian English is quite attractive. She was particularly good in the satirical comedy by her husband called "The Career of Nablotsky," where she plays the good-hearted slangy wife of an unscrupulous adventurer. In Mr. John Pollock's drama "Rosamond" I did not like her so well, but here she was more handicapped by playing in a strange language and by the extravagance of the plot. I am seldom very greatly impressed by these mediæval dramas in which the authors dip their pens in blood and seem determined to show you how diabolically strong they can be. I am grateful to Miss Kingston for introducing Mme. Chung, but I am hoping that in the near future she will give us something more distinguished in the way of English plays and acting. Her theatre might have a great future, but it has begun badly.

"Pompey the Great," at the Aldwych.

Mr. John Masefield's fine tragedy, "Pompey the Great," which the Stage Society produced last week, is one of those plays which I suppose we are not likely to see mounted for a run until some sort of a national theatre comes into being, and herein lies the only excuse for a national theatre. I much question whether in any circumstances it would prove a financial success, but I do wonder that the part of the great Roman has not appealed to one of our actor-managers. Whether this noble, high-souled statesman is the real Pompey I doubt exceedingly, but he is a fine, impressive character, and he is very plausible. He is almost as "chatty" as Hamlet and has almost as many reasons for inaction, and indeed I do not wonder that his great rival Cæsar vanquished him if this was the real man. The play deals with the period when Cæsar, flushed with his triumphs, crossed the Rubicon and Pompey was sent to punish him for his temerity. It ends with the hero's assassination in Egypt. Mr. Masefield has broken away from all convention. His dialogue has the modern—I had almost said the shaw touch—it is so strenuously anti-Wardour-Street English, but there are great thoughts and great ideas in the play, and the Stage Society is as much to be congratulated on having produced it as Mr. Masefield on having conceived and written it. Mr. Herbert Grimwood played Pompey earnestly and well, with a great sense of the dignity of the character, and smaller parts were excellently played by Mr. Edmund Gurney, Mr. Grendon Bentley, and Mr. Guy Rathbone, to mention only two or three out of many.

"The Captain of the School," at the Gaiety.

It seems strange to find schoolboy drama flourishing at the Gaiety Theatre, but the holiday season is responsible for the innovation, and there seems no reason why Judge Parry and Frederick Mouillot's comedy of school life, which has just migrated from Manchester, should not prove a great Christmas attraction. It is well written, full of incident, and for the most part exceedingly well acted. The troubles of Tom Brant, the "captain of the school," arise out of the fact that he falls in love with the headmaster's pretty daughter—headmasters in school plays must always have pretty daughters. He is going to play Romeo to her Juliet in some theatricals, and he is so carried away at rehearsal that he kisses her and decides to play the rôle in real life also. The kissing in itself would not matter, but he is seen doing it. Plays dealing with school life of necessity contain certain stock characters, and you find them all here, and first and foremost comes the "sneak," who sees the kissing episode and runs away and tells. Naturally he tells the usual unpleasant undermaster (very cleverly played by Mr. E. F. Mayeur), and then the fat is in the fire. The authors have broken away from tradition in one respect, however, and given us something more than a boy and girl love story by introducing the "captain's" professorial uncle with an affection for the headmaster's widowed sister. Out of this comes a sort of "Charley's Aunt" or Tommy's Uncle touch, for when Tom Brant is expelled for knocking down his enemy, the undermaster, he reappears on the scene in the guise of this uncle who is about to pay a visit to the school and conduct an examination. Wild farce comes out of the imposture, for the real uncle, when he arrives, is incarcerated—sans breeches—to preclude any possibility of his escaping, but it is all very good fun, and thoroughly pleased an appreciative audience. Birchester, where the action takes place, is probably intended for Winchester, and the several scenes showing the garden, the "tuck shop," and the dining hall are very charming, while the singing of school songs by boys from Stedman's school choir contributes to the local colour. Mr. Mackinder is best when he is the lad and not when masquerading as his own uncle. Mr. Charles Macdona is an agreeable headmaster, while Mrs. Mouillot is excellent as the widow, and Miss Dorothy Parry pleased everyone with her simple naturalness as Rhoda.

* * * * * *

Novelties at the Empire include an amusing little farce by George Arliss, called "Widows' Weeds." Two husbands go away, ostensibly to America, but really on a jaunt of which they know their wives will not approve. When they come back they find two widows—the ship they were supposed to have sailed on had foundered with all hands! This shows you how inadvisable it is to deceive your wife. Well played by a cast including Mr. Clarence Blakiston and Miss Millie Legarde, the piece goes well in spite of, or perhaps because of, its extravagance. The remarkable fox-hunting pictures on the bioscope taken by the Barker motion photography are another great feature, and excite enormous enthusiasm. But how the pictures were taken affords food for thought—Can bioscope cameras go a-hunting?

SPORT.

RACING NOTES.

ENGLISH breeders are suffering very severely from the immense number of yearlings which are now sent to this country for sale from the United States. The competition is simply ruinous, as everyone knows that yearlings are bred very much more cheaply in the United States than in England, so that American owners can afford to sell at small prices. It is not only that horse breeders are seriously injured, but the breed of horses will soon be greatly and irreparably damaged, as many of the American strains of blood are very poor. Breeders and owners are petitioning the Stewards of the Jockey Club to impose a registration fee on yearlings which are sent from the United States to England for sale. This is a perfectly reasonable request, but I doubt very much whether the Stewards will think it prudent to comply with it. Any such step might bring the Jockey Club into collision with the House of Commons, and Government interference would be the inevitable result. It is not likely that the Stewards will take action without consultation with the members generally, and no doubt the matter will be fully discussed at the winter meeting of the Jockey Club, which usually takes place in London in February.

It may appear a very simple business for the Stewards to impose a fee, but the powers and prestige of the Jockey Club would receive a most disastrous blow if it turned out that the Stewards had acted ultra vires, and they were compelled to withdraw their order. However, the Stewards are not likely to make any serious mistake, and there are numerous members of the Jockey Club who are in the habit of taking large views of affairs, and who may be trusted to consider well all the difficulties of the position. It is highly desirable that the suggested fee should be imposed, but the matter is by no means so simple and easy as the sporting papers appear to consider it.

The £10,000 races for 1913 have both been well supported, there being 247 entries for the Eclipse Stakes and 216 for the Jockey Club Stakes. The Sandown Park race is the more popular among owners because the conditions are so much more sensible. There are none of the ridiculous breeding allowances, nor is there even a maiden allowance. Of course this is all in favour of the best horses engaged. In the Newmarket race there are both breeding and maiden allowances, which, moreover, are cumulative. It is simply idiotic that a horse which has won £10,000 or £20,000 in stakes can still claim its breeding allowance. At Sandown Park there is a deduction of £1,150 for owners and nominators of second and third horses, but at Newmarket £2,850 is taken, which is exceedingly unfair to the winner.

There are numerous French entries in the Eclipse Stakes, but very few i the Jockey Club Stakes. The fantastical conditions of the Newmarket race do not "sing" to French owners. The King has entered three foals in each race, and the names of nearly all the principal owners are to be found in the lists. One of Lord Rosebery's foals is a half-brother, by Bachelor's Button, to Neil Gow, and another is a filly by Cicero out of Montem. The Duke of Westminster has a foal which is half-sister, by Spearmint, to Troutbeck, and another of his lot is half-sister, by Troutbeck, to Flying Fox. M. E. Blanc has entered two yearlings in the Eclipse Stakes—Radeal, by Ajax out of Chrysothémes, and Zuai des Fleurs, by Delaunay out of Belle Fleur, but he has not engaged Permanent, the half-brother, by Flying Fox, to his Derby colt, Lord Burgoyne.

I see that the Gimcrack Stakes at York is described as "one of the oldest races in the Calendar," whereas it only dates from the forties of the last century. So far as I remember, the first race for the Gimcrack Stakes was won by a two-year-old owned by Admiral Octavius Harcourt, of Swinton Park, a younger son of the Archbishop of York, who won the Derby of 1856 with Ellington.

There have been no really notable performances during the past season. Bayardo had nothing to beat in the Ascot Cup, and he was himself defeated in the Goodwood Cup by a moderate three-year-old. Bayardo has not been a lucky horse, for he certainly ought to have won last year's Two Thousand and Derby. He was not half fit when he ran at Newmarket, and at Epsom he was seriously interfered with. He retrieved his reputation at Ascot, and the remainder of his career as a three-year-old was a blaze of triumph. There has been a deal of trumpeting about Bayardo's Ascot Cup success, but he defeated only non-stayers and animals which were either not fit or groggy. As to the other four-year-olds, Sir Martin failed to stay at Ascot, after he had cantered away with the Coronation Cup at Epsom; and Bachelor's Double merely represented good handicap form, Louviers could not be trained, William the Fourth broke down at Ascot, and Minoru was not seen after his ignominious defeat in the City and Suburban, while Mirador ran only to disgrace himself.

The three-year-olds have constantly beaten each other, but Lemberg, Neil Gow, and Swynford are the best of them. Charles O'Malley went amiss during the summer, or it is quite on the cards that he might have won the St. Leger. His stable-companion, Placidus, was one of the great disappointments of the season. Winkipop was certainly the best filly of the year, but her St. Leger running showed that the fillies were (as usual) much inferior to the colts. The two-year-olds appeared to be all "heads and tails" together, the only conclusion to draw from so much inconsistent running being that they are all moderate.

The victory of Borrow in the Middle Park Plate was nearly as inexplicable a performance as Signorinetta's success in the Derby. On paper it is clear that Mushroom must be one of the very best two-year-olds of the season. There was no excuse for Pietri's defeat at Newmarket, but Lord Derby's colts—King William and Stedfast—were both obviously backward, and capable of great improvement. Cellini and Prince Palatine won valuable races, but afterwards they failed to justify their private reputations. St. Nat showed excellent form, and his running was consistent, but I fancy that Seaforth was really the best two-year-old of the season, and his defeat in the Middle Park Plate was absolutely unaccountable, as his running a week later at Sandown Park showed clearly that he was in good form.

Duke of Westminster was up for sale at Newmarket last week, and I have seen references to the "seridus mistake" and the "error in judgment" committed by Mr. George Faber when he purchased this horse in preference to Sceptre. The blunder was certainly disastrous, but the fault did not lie with Mr. Faber, who wrote to me as follows on the subject in January, 1904:—"At the time when I was offered Duke of Westminster, I was also offered Sceptre, the latter at a materially lower price than the former. Acting under the best professional advice I could get, I selected Duke of Westminster." It is curious how often the most clever experts give bad advice. As the Frenchwoman said, "Que les hommes d'esprit sont bêtes."

Last Call was the great disappointment of the "back end." After this horse's excellent running in the Newbury Autumn Cup he appeared certain to win an important handicap before the season closed. He unluckily met with an accident which prevented him from fulfilling any engagement during October, but he was heavily backed for the Derby Cup, and was also fancied for the Manchester November Handicap. He ran very badly in both races, and he certainly was not in his Newbury form. If Last Call "winters" well he ought to win a good handicap next season, and he will be worth remembering. This horse stays well, and his performance at Newbury was a very good one, as he ran the six-year-old Admiral Togo III. to a head at 5 lbs., which was highly creditable for a three-year-old gelding.

ATHLETIC HISTORY—CRICKET—GOLF—FOOTBALL.

No doubt our divers athletic bodies consider themselves creators of no mean legislative codes when they disqualify competitors and impose fines on erring clubs and associations. But these methods are as old as the Olympic games themselves. Of course, the Olympic games were run in unity and brotherly love—that is the theory. But in substance and in fact things were different. Such were the memories of a long-neglected classical education. These recollections were refreshed by a haphazard perusal of Sir Walter Raleigh's "History of the World." There, in chapter II., section 3 of the third book of the first part one reads: "These Eleans, being Presidents of the Olympique games, had set a fine upon the city of Sparta, for non-payment of which they forbad them to come to the solemnity; and publiquely whipt one of them that was of note for presuming to contend against their decree." On these matters one observes fines, disqualifications, faked entries, discovery, and punishment. I wonder what the penalty of the lash would do for amateurism nowadays. For these and other matters of minor importance the Lacedaimonians made war on the Eleans in the cause of liberty, which, as Raleigh caustically observes, was the usual pretence, though little they cared for liberty. Modern politicians of both parties please note. They taught the Eleans a lesson. As to the Eleans, Raleigh says: "Only the presidentship of the Olympian games was left unto them, which it was not to be doubted that they would in time comming use modestly, finding themselves at the mercy of Sparta." Truly a pretty picture indicating that after all civilisation is only skin deep, and that people and athletes A.D. 1910 are pretty well what they were some years B.C.

Another matter of temperament concerns us. In politics a win used to be a win, a loss was a loss. People then knew where they were. The simplest and the most erudite understood. Nowadays, politicians for their own purposes are always ready and willing to prove that a majority is a minority, or a minority a majority. They twist figures and score up points in a wonderful way. Unfortunately, the same dissatisfaction with the old ways permeates cricket. Neither in first-class county cricket nor in second-class county cricket are the powers that be content with win, draw, or lose. Points are given for one thing and another until the average man does not know where he is. And, of course, it is all done for his benefit. He is to be interested in the game. His enthusiasm is to be fostered by making things appear to be not what they are, but what others think they ought to be. His side ought to have won, but the others just played out time, and so there was a draw. His anger must be assuaged, and so his side get $x$ points, and the other side, who led on the first innings, and who would certainly have lost if the fieldsman had been steady, get $y$ points. And all the $x$, $y$, and $z$ points are added up at the end of the season, and all the county teams, first and second class, cry out in chorus, "How clever we are! Public interest has been stimulated until the last ball of the season was bowled, and our bank balances are still as bad as ever."

These reflections arise from the recent meeting of county secretaries at Lord's, where the M.C.C. has the veto. In first-class cricket there is the suggestion of a new method of scoring points. The second-class counties adopted another alteration in scoring. What it is I do not know and I do not care. And yet I confess to having tender feelings for the second-class counties. They turn up in force at Lord's, and these counties deserve every support from those who inhabit them. These teams are nurseries for minor cricket. Their influence is for the good of the game. They raise the standard of play. Their matches are interesting to watch. There is not the awful business air that prevails amongst the very best of the first-class counties. It is really a piece of luck, that the average man may be thankful for, to see a second-class match in August. One can read the results of their games with interest, and one need never worry how many points they win or lose or which is champion, and for this simple reason, that one is pretty certain that the champion of one year would not have been champion under the current system of scoring if it had been in force during the previous year. All these chopping and changings no doubt make for pleasant conversation, and provide the zealous representatives with material for important and statesmanlike pronouncements when they forgather at Lord's.

With regard to first-class cricket, the dates for the Possible and Probable matches were announced. There will be three of these games, and the object is to give the Selection Committee some idea of the lines on which they shall proceed to select men for the triangular contest in 1912, when the South Africans and the Australians will be over here. These matches will be played at Sheffield, Lord's, and Manchester, and the gate-money will go in part to the counties as in the case of test matches. Furthermore, the Gentlemen and Players match at Lord's is to be used for the same object. Truly a stupendous undertaking, and one that might be useful in selecting a team to go out to Australia in 1911, but one of little value for matches a twelvemonth ahead. One may express the pious hope that no newfangled dreamland ideas will prevent the Gentlemen and Players match being in every way representative of the two classes of players at the date when it is played. Men who ought to be selected ought not to be left out for the sake of giving a trial to possibles and probables. By the way, in these teams the Selection Committee might consider the claims, if any, of bowlers or batsmen who can, as things are at present, only play for second-class counties. There may be Barnes-like bowlers and others who at present are born to play unseen and waste their cricket on the desert air of the second-class county cricket championship.

A novelty next year will be a team of native Indian players, who, irrespective of creeds, will play divers counties in England. The cricket caste is apparently paramount. An excellent tour is in course of preparation. They will meet both Universities and several first-class counties. Their object is to improve their game, and if there are any Ranji's among them they may give a little trouble. I hope Mr. Keir Hardie will be muzzled if they are not victorious.

The Cambridge cross-country runners came an awful cropper in their race at Wimbledon with Oxford. The Dark Blues team came home before a Light Blue arrived. The winners were a very evenly balanced team. Little more than a minute and a half separated the first and the last man in. The going at Wimbledon over the Thames Hare and Hounds Roehampton course was atrociously heavy.

On the swollen Ouse at Ely, "by Ely's stately fane," and so on, the Cambridge University trial eights were rowed on Saturday. The crew stroked by Arbuthnot were easy winners by three lengths. Swann rowed pluckily for the losing crew, but he was outgeneralled and outpaced at the finish. Heyland and Van Der Byl were seven and six in the winning crew. They are both over twelve stone, and they rowed admirably. They are Pembroke men, and perhaps they have at last killed the quaint conceit that prevails on the Cam that Pembroke men cannot stay the course. At the same time, Swann's crew did remarkably well. In Lloyd, Swann had a very light seven, under ten and a half stone, and a six who did not scale twelve stone. He and his crew did very well to hold Arbuthnot's crew as long as they did

The Green Committee at Mid-Surrey are in such a frantic hurry to alter their course that gangs of men work at night by artificial light. Really, the committee might water down their enthusiasm and conduct their affairs rationally. Steady employment during the winter months does a lot to help men who are dependent for the seasons on trade. In this way golf clubs can help to steady up employment. There is no excuse for Mid-Surrey. The club is chock full of economic notions. To encourage the sale of an English lager it once charged a penny a bottle more for German lager. And the members paid, and the club made money. Wonderful economists were those members of Mid-Surrey. They never made the foreigner pay. And now they are resolved to find night work as well as day work for the British labourer. "Bunkers built in a night" is the club's proud advertisement. Why sleep on the embankment when you can work by flashlight at the Old Deer Park? Night work means work for all at Mid-Surrey.

The chief interest in Rugby football last Saturday centred in the match between the English team and the South at Twickenham. The weather was vile, and the ground was bad. It was a very close game, the selected team winning by the margin of a try. The winners missed opportunities of scoring by getting offside. Both full-backs played a very fine game. Hall, the scrum half for England, was not a success. Pillman will have to improve in his tackling if he is to keep his place. With divers crack players away several matches were full of interest. In a game in which there was a lot of good football Blackheath just failed to beat Cardiff. The Old Alleynians scored a victory over the Harlequins, and the Old Merchant Taylors had all their work cut out to beat the Old Blues. The old Christ's Hospital boys will certainly be a team to be reckoned with before many years are out. Gloucester had a desperate fight with Newport, and lost by a goal. To prevent libel actions, I may say I use the word fight as meaning a strenuous, lawful struggle.

THE JUDGE.

No wig adorns his ample brow,
Clear as a marble bust,
No gown enwraps His Honour now,
Nor dallies in the dust.
No dewy-eyed appellants weep,
No plaintiff heart is broke,
He seldom seems to be asleep,
And never makes a joke,
Not much!

Of weariness he shows no trace,
However much he's tried,
He hears no counsel for the case
Put up by any side.
He asks no question out of sport,
He cares not who you are,
You never catch within his court
The moaning of the Bar,
Thank Heaven!

No jurymen around him throng
About the judgment spot,
To tell him if defendant's wrong,
Or whether he is not.
This much he has, an eager band
Of witnesses, who grudge
The slightest bit of bias; and
Who rarely like the judge,
Not half!

His court is on the grassy sward;
He makes no bid for fame,
He gives a Saturday award,
Only upon a game.
And had I half my youthful vim,
I vow I would not be Content to lead a life like him—
A Soccer referee,
Poor chap!

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

THE scheme put forward by the Derbyshire and North Staffordshire Automobile Club for consolidating the existing motoring organisations has naturally given rise to widespread comment, and it is satisfactory to note that while exception has been taken to this and that point of detail, there is general agreement as to the need of unification and as to the evils which must necessarily result from the continuance of the divided counsels and scattered efforts which have hitherto obtained. The real as distinguished from the nominal difficulty in coming to an understanding in cases of this kind is usually to be found in the amour propre of individual officials of the existing organisations, which, so far as motorists at large are concerned, is a matter of very little importance. What the ordinary motor owner wants to see at the present time is one powerful, thoroughly representative body capable of defending his interests when these are assailed, and whether the body in question is known as the A.A., the M.U., or the R.A.C., or is a combination of all three is a matter of absolutely minor importance. Such being the unquestionable desire of the rank and file, it is absurd that such difficulty should be experienced in giving effect to their wishes.

In this connection a sound point has been made by one of the motor papers in urging that in the event of any Joint Committee being formed representative of both the R.A.C. and the now consolidated Motor Union and Automobile Association no fresh set of paid officials shall be appointed capable of constituting in due course yet another element of rivalry and trouble. Happily, now that the Motor Union and the Automobile Association have joined forces it ought not to be beyond the wit of man to come to a practical understanding and working arrangement with the R.A.C. and the one or two other leading clubs and organisations. To this end a general conference, or as a preliminary step thereto a postcard poll whereby the opinions of the rank and file could find expression, would, perhaps, be useful.

The introduction of the Knight sliding valve has had the not unnatural effect of stimulating invention in various other directions in connection with this particular portion of the motor-car engine, and hardly a week passes without some more or less novel device being introduced for achieving the same purpose in a different way. It would almost seem sometimes as if, in engineering, designers could only give attention to one thing at a time. In automobilism at present the engine is getting all the attention, and it says much for the infinite possibilities of mechanics that there should still be room for so many novel developments.

For one of the most recent no less distinguished a designer than Mr. F. W. Lanchester accepts responsibility, a leading feature of the design being the abolition of the ordinary inlet valve. The cylinder takes the form of a sliding sleeve provided with holes at the top, which, when the sleeve is raised, are hidden behind the cylinder head, thereby closing the combustion chamber. This is the position of the sleeve when ignition takes place, but towards the end of the power stroke the sleeve is drawn down, uncovering the holes, and thereby permitting the exhaust gases to escape and the fresh charge to enter. More will probably be heard of this engine.

French designers have been working hard, too, of late at the same problem, and several interesting results have been shown at the current Salon, such as the engine shown by Mustada et Fils, the valves of which are formed by two half-sleeves operated by separate valve shafts, an engine having rotating pistons with grooves establishing communication between the combustion chamber and the ports. It may be concluded, therefore, that the last word has not yet been said on the subject of valves and valve systems, and something may be evolved at any moment to solve the present poppet v. sleeve controversy in the most final manner by relegating both to the limbo of the back number.

The anti-motorist on public bodies does not get much sympathy nowadays. Thus the gentleman at the Court of Common Council who urged that the speed limit in various streets in the City should be reduced to ten miles an hour took very little for his pains. The general feeling of the Council was hopelessly against him, while it was intimated further that the Commissioner of City Police was also adverse to the suggestion, which was accordingly negatived by a large majority. The City Fathers showed their good sense here. Motor accidents certainly take place from time to time in the City along with those due to other vehicles, but there is not the slightest reason for supposing that they would be diminished in any way by imposing an arbitrary speed limit of ten miles an hour. Such a limit would probably do more harm than good by increasing the existing congestion of traffic.

It is satisfactory to note that in the opinion of Mr. Henry Hicks, chairman of the London General

Omnibus Company, the final victory of the motor-'bus is now practically assured, thanks to the continual improvements which have been effected. The result of the second year's working of the company since the amalgamation has been that they have wiped out a loss of over £33,000, and have made a profit in addition of £61,000, with the happy result that the chairman is now able to talk hopefully of a dividend being paid once more on the ordinary shares before very long. Horse-drawn 'buses, Mr. Hicks added, could no longer be run at a profit in London. It is to be hoped, therefore, that it will not be long now before the last of these prehistoric vehicles disappears finally from the scene.

Meanwhile, in Dublin, it is amazing to read that the proposed introduction of the nimble taxi is still being violently opposed in the interests of the jaunting-cars, and, apparently, with success. A Dublin Anti-Taxi Cab Association has been formed, a deputation on the subject waited on the Lord-Lieutenant, and more remarkable still the latter informed the "Antis" that he would use all the influence he possessed to give effect to their wishes. The inhabitants of Dublin may be safely left to manage their own affairs, but such an unprogressive attitude on the subject is certainly calculated to surprise the average outsider.

An excellently got-up publication is the 1911 catalogue of the famous Wolseley firm, of which a copy is to hand. The book contains full-page photographic reproductions of all the company's seven different models, together with complete chassis specifications and equally complete information as to the fifteen different styles of standard bodies fitted. Full details are included also as to hoods, screens, and other accessories of all kinds, and generally the catalogue may be described as a model of clearness and comprehensiveness.

Messrs. Argyll, Limited, write that a useful new feature of all their cars is an auxiliary oil tank fixed on the dashboard. "This tank, which is cased in polished mahogany, is provided with a level gauge and tap, which when open allows the oil to gravitate to the crank chamber at the rate of about a drop per second. The well-known piston gauge, fitted to all Argyll cars for some years past, indicates to the driver when the crank chamber requires replenishment, and with the new supplementary tank at hand, the driver may go on replenishing all day long without leaving his seat."

WOMAN.

LETTERS TO MY MOTHER-IN-LAW.

DEAR Mrs. P.,—Your letter almost made me feel as though I were responsible for your having six unmarried daughters. You say that as my mother was so successful with me who had not a penny to bless myself with, why should your daughters who have passed all sorts of examinations and will some day be able to hold their own with any one, be so entirely overlooked. I don't want to make invidious comparisons, but you know at the time we did not look upon James as a particularly good match, and even now I sometimes have to point out to my mother how much better he has turned out than was expected. Of course, with your enormous new house and expensive furniture, it is hard that my father-in-law's position as leading townsman should force him to conceal social aspirations in order to retain a reputation for integrity. But you yourself do not make the most of such opportunities as National Service Leagues, Red Crosses—even elections, all of which are instituted as a sort of purgatory to the social Paradise in which you expect to find sons-in-law. All this week, instead of "keeping themselves to themselves" the girls should have been canvassing because the candidate was unmarried, just as James has been canvassing because the candidate was a solicitor.

James has just come in, and he says I'm throwing away good advice. What you really want is that I should have the girls up and present them so that "the Upper Ten"—I wouldn't use that expression in public—will be forced to invite them. Dear Mrs. P., I think you over-estimate the effect of presentation. Quite a lot of really nice people have never been presented, while vulgarians have achieved that eminence who have never got beyond League of Mercy collecting or subscribing heavily to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Peers. Besides, think how nice it would be yourself to present six daughters if my father-in-law gets knighted at the Coronation. If, however, you like to send Emily up after Christmas, I will see what I can do towards establishing her.

We were very much pleased to hear that Mrs. Humphry Ward had got in for Watford—at least I was. James says he can't get over her being a Unionist, but I don't think that matters when you think that she is the first woman to have a constituency. I feel sure that if Mrs. Ward continues to use the persuasiveness of "Letters to My Neighbours" she will silence even those anti-suffragists who believe that woman's place is the home.

I have been to no fewer than three Russian sales this week, and at each one, one was expected to buy Russian tumblers—the sort of aggravating toy that invites you to tip it over and then refuses to go—boxes that contain little boxes that contain littler boxes unto the seventh and eighth generation and cheap jewellery upon which "A Present from Caucasus" or "Souvenir" only passed muster because it was written in Russian characters. I am learning to look generous, and yet stand up against the importunities of amateur sellers, dressed in Russian costumes with hair abnormally lengthened by means of plaited ribbon. Mrs. Herschenheim told me that she always made a point of going to such things with a parcel done up rather badly with miscellaneous string, so that she could hold it up smiling as she said "No thank you" to everything. In a crowd such as that at Princess Dolgorouki's things are easier, especially if you keep to the middle of the room.

I saw Mme. Novikoff there, who, as I dare say you know, is not viewed favourably by the Russian patriot, who feels that she should be in Siberia instead of himself. He also suspects her of by no means furthering his interests at the Russian Court. She is very frank on some points. I remember meeting her at a friend's house on Sunday afternoon. She came in breathless, announcing in an aggrieved voice to my apologetic friend that she had already paid five calls and that everybody until then had had the grace to be out. If you want to buy any Russian embroidery tell me. It's quite nice if you are seeing it for the first time.

I arrived at South Kensington station too early the other day to go to M. Bouvier's lecture at Mrs. Eric Hambro's, and so went to the School of Art Needlework Exhibition, opened by Princess Christian. Being early there was not a soul about, and I felt all the steely eyes of all the sellers focussed upon me, and whenever I looked at anything someone always edged a little nearer. I had on my musquash coat, too, which has one disadvantage of making you look richer than you really are. I suppose it is the sort of unction about needlework exhibitions—it makes you think it must all have been done by women who are crowns to their husbands—that makes everything so expensive. As I only bought five shillings' worth—a little posy-book—I pulled myself together, and said, in a purposely loud voice that I could see nothing else I really liked.

M. Bouvier's lecture on Romain Rolland's "Jean Christophe" was the most interesting I have been to. He does not sit under shaded lamps, and there is the prospect of excellent tea to induce one to stay to the end. I never met any one professing to have read French novels who does not know M. Bouvier, and after the lecture there was a free fight to ask him to tea. Also people cough, such jujubes, blow their noses, and jingle chatelaines here less than with any one else I know.

I always wonder why I go again and again to the National Cat Club Show, unless it is in the vain hope that it will be less smelly than the last time. Also I like cats—even at the Crystal Palace. They are such whole-hearted snobs. I practise unblinking stares upon my own blue Persian. As James hates cats, I took mamma and nearly outstared her, although she was wearing her lorgnon and inquiring why I hadn't insisted on a car. She didn't quite like it until I explained. I find that the art of staring past people consists in looking between their eyes, not into them, which is merely rude. I still like blue Persians better than Chinchillas, which remind me that I've only got musquash, or Siamese, whose fawn coats and brown trimmings recall a German fräulein I used to hate.

Mme. Jeanne Raunay, who is over here as a concert singer, was at Covent Garden four or five years ago, where she distinguished herself in "Orpheus" less by her musical achievement than by the fact that she is one of the very few opera-singers with an admirable figure, and with hair that does not always look "dressed." Personally I liked her performance of Iphigenia, though I admit that I may have been biassed by the fact that she gave me two excellent seats for it at a time when my mother considered opera quite unnecessary for unmarried girls. Recently, Mme. Raunay, who is very tall, added one more adherent to the convention which invariably supplies such people with very small husbands. She speaks English in strict moderation.—Always your loving

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Thursday.—I attended the causerie at the Little Theatre, to fall a victim to the fascinations of Princess Bariatinsky. Her evolutions and convolutions of body and limbs are a complete lesson in the art of movement, and the strength of her tragic powers was as unquestionable in the first piece, "Rosamond," by clever John Pollock, as was the charm of her comedy in "The Career of Nablotsky," written by the Prince. She added to these attractions an airy trifle of a frock made of fine Limerick lace threaded with a broad emerald ribbon hemmed with grey opossum, a few folds of the emerald green being draped across the décolletage, while a long, loose coat of rose-coloured chiffon embroidered in silver was clasped about the knees with diamonds. This was altogether a delicious achievement in the world of dress, and much to be applauded and certainly to be copied, if possible.

During an interval I had tea with William, who was wearing a pink carnation and three Parma violets in his coat, giver unconfessed, three suspects. We met many distinguished members of social circles, while amongst the stars from the histrionic constellation were Mrs. Brown-Potter and Miss Fay Davis. The former had a wonderful French turban dragged round her head above two curtains of scarlet hair draped on a plateau of white brow, and the latter was in grey with much ermine and a black velvet hat with a white lace frill beneath, smiles and dimples rampant. And no wonder, when she looked upon the striking figure of her husband, Gerald Lawrence, who assisted the attractive Russian in exploiting the Prince's talent, further demonstrated personally by his simple, eloquent chat about Count Tolstoy. I met Gertrude Kingston in the vestibule well becoming a black crêpe de chine dress with the corsage trimmed with much silver embroidery, with a transparency of black spotted net reaching to the throat, encircled with a narrow band of velvet serving as the background to a lovely ornament of old paste.

After this William voted encore to the tea turn. He has his good qualities. Unlike the majority, he never reports "no change." And his habit of overpaying waiters produces a plenitude of footstools and cream cakes, while affording satisfactory evidence of his vast experience as lady's companion.

Saturday.—A telephone message from Joan, who has again deferred her travels, peremptorily ordered me to meet her at Jay's and help her to choose two afternoon frocks. I could gladly have selected six, there were such a number of good models of the sort of dress which we all find essential just now when bridge and afternoon parties are as common as Conservatives with Radical proclivities, and we are always meeting the same people, and have to avoid the same garments in the interests of our reputations.

Joan yielded—and wisely—to a satin dress of amethyst tone with a line of embroidery down either side of the front and across the corsage, the diaphanous bodice and sleeves of ninon being lined with a glistening tissue in a floral device, while the belt was of a soft mulberry hue, a specially happy notion. Besides this my procrastinating sister purchased a skirt of black velvet bordered with skunk, and a heart-shaped corselet of velvet with the top and sleeves of fine black lisse embroidered in black silk and mounted over écru lace; an ideal dress for wearing beneath a fur coat, for with the skirt unlined and the bodice thin the weight will be pleasantly limited

I wanted hard a long white ermine coat with a circular hem of musquash, and I conceived a considerable affection for a white cloth dress with a trimming of cut-out cloth worked with thick white cotton, and the top of net and chiffon with a few discreet touches of black velvet. There was a lovely lace dress, too, with broad panels of ermine, and I met many dainty specimens of brocaded evening dresses and diaphanous painted chiffons over pale satin slips perambulating the room as we went out.

My expressed generosity.

Like the heroine in the song, I shall return, I know I shall. Within such near distance of Christmas bells and Christmas bills liberality must be counted a virtue, even a duty. Do unto yourself as you are compelled to do to others is an excellent creed. Florence amiably suggests that I shall give her daughter an evening dress for a present. Did I mean to give her a present at all? I wonder—and I shall never know, and neither shall Florence—and I will buy a made-up frock of lace, border it with silken fringes, and permit pale blue ribbon to shimmer through on a net foundation, and go down to posterity labelled a generous aunt.

Monday. — Virginia having carefully put Nita to bed for three weeks is now again devoting herself to the selection of a country cottage. When I arrived this morning to inquire after the invalid, and lay my tribute of hyacinths at the altar of her isolation, I found her completely ignored, living at the top of the house, and only visited for three minutes daily, while the dining-table was strewn with catalogues and wall-papers; and tapestries and cretonnes were hanging inconveniently over every chair.

"First catch your cottage before you furnish it" was the admirable advice I delivered. Though experience has taught me that no one ever takes my counsel, this never detracts from the charm of giving it. To decide the suitablity of a sideboard or wardrobe without knowing in which position or in what room it is to stand is like eating oysters after the savoury. Virginia is an obstinate creature, but she will come to my way of thinking presently, and that way points definitely to second-hand furniture shops and sales; old oddments are so much more interesting than authorised, conventional suites. The glib recital of the words Sheraton, Chippendale, Hepplewhite, Empire, and Louis Seize irritates me from the mouth of the uninspired amateur who lacks all knowledge, and merely gabbles off these names without the least conception of what they might signify.

Virginia refused to be lectured on the laws of beauty, and failed to recognise that a cabriole leg was any prettier than a straight one, or that a cane and wood bedstead might have more elegance than a brazen image in tubes, and that the policy of delay could be of any value except to a statesman. I gave her up as a hopeless disciple; she'll never know Anne from Adam, so I urged her out to lunch by approving her selection of a glazed chintz bestrewn with violet rhododendrons to accompany the green carpet and mauve walls she projects for her spare bedroom. For this she actually demanded recognition as a pioneer, and when I scarcely know any one who does not possess a room with similar decorations!

Ultimately we closed the discussion just too late to do any shopping before eating, and just in time to preserve our friendly relations. On our way to the Savoy we passed a drapery establishment which, in the exuberance of its Christmas enthusiasm, had placarded a long length of Ninon "Every skin selected by an expert!"

All the women in the grill room were wearing musquash coats and extinguishing hats with a single white flower in them, the only notable exception to the rule being a damsel clad in a long coat and short skirt of dull black satin, and this was clearly a case of the survival of the fittest from last season.

I was persuaded to take a personal interest in "The Musical Mummers" performance of "Tom Jones" at the Court Theatre on December 20 and 21. I doubt not success will wait upon their efforts, their last year's "Merrie England" was so admirable; and the proceeds are to be devoted to the League of Mercy, Strand division, which owns Mr. and Mrs. Carl Hentschel as its energetic presidents.

Mrs. A's Letter-Box.

I have been persuaded to counsel through these columns all wise women who send me their dress difficulties to solve. But their inquiries must be clearly addressed to Mrs. A., "Truth" Office, Carteret Street, S.W.

Gaviston.—The International Fur Store has the largest stock of fine boas, and you can find sable there of the most sumptuous quality, making quite small ties. I know exactly what you want—one skin, and tightly fitting—and I have seen it lately at 163, Regent Street. Nothing is preferable to the chinchilla for the evening coat. Ask to see a long model there, with the skins joined to form a diagonally striped effect. I should say a lining of rose pink or pale blue—the latter for choice.

Mrs. Grundy.—Put on that hat a gold galon or beaded band fastened at one side with some gold ornament, not a green velvet rosette. You could get a mount such as I describe at Debenham and Freebody's, of Wigmore Street. If you forward them this answer they will know the sort of thing to send you. Tell them to choose the gold of a very dull surface, not bright at all.

Nancy F.—Black velvet bags, with narrow gold frames and tiny gold monograms set in a ring, are the most fashionable just now, and they hang from black silk cords and tassels. You can buy them at every good shop.

THE PROBLEM OF CHRISTMAS PRESENTS.

A man wondering what to give a woman, and a woman reviewing the probable tastes of a man in the matter of Christmas presents are pathetic figures. They are torn by uncertainty; especially the woman, because she knows that a man very seldom merely dislikes a thing—he usually scorns it if it does not please him. Of course, the shops do their best to help humanity in the arduous task of choosing presents, but their help is so lavish that it merges into embarrassment. In despair, one buys a photograph frame, of a pattern that would have dated from the Ark if it could, and goes home feeling dissatisfied.

I went with a Christmas shopper last week, a shopper of large, vague ideas, who examined all the merchandise of London, from a cabinet full of cut-glass costing two hundred and seventy pounds to a penny toy on a man's tray in the Strand. This may

COUNTRY LIFE. September 24th, 1910.

"The long Coats in Musquash are as fashionable as ever and the new models are most beautifully cut. The International Fur Store is always famous for its Cloaks and Coats for day and evening wear, and this year the choice seems more varied than ever. Besides the sumptuous garments in Sable, Ermine, and Chinchilla fit for Royal wear there are numbers of others in Velvet, Satin, Cloth, and all kinds of materials."

TRUTH. September 28th, 1910.

"We saw some gorgeous specimens of Sables. I never saw a finer collection—sumptuous is the only word, and they appeared in every fashionable form, from the smallest Tie fastening tightly round the neck to the Coat worth a large section of a small fortune! . . . Upstairs we wandered into looking-glass land and we could view ourselves under the influence of the latest edition of luxury, and realise, even as the heroine in 'The Case of Rebellious Susan,' that all women look well in furs."

THE CAR. October 5th, 1910.

"I must give some special words of praise anent the glorious models to be seen just now at the International Fur Store, Regent Street. Where to commence my eulogy I scarcely know, for here all is so good that the choice becomes exceedingly difficult. . . . All the Furs at the International Fur Store are so beautifully finished, which means so much to the total effect and even more as regards the wearing properties of every kind of Fur."

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS. October 15th, 1910.

"Absolutely foremost in the ranks of reliable Furriers stands the International Fur Store. This leading House has just issued the Winter Catalogue, showing all the latest fashions in Fur garments. The most superb Furs obtainable in the world can be inspected in these fine Showrooms, where, too, the buyer can rely upon obtaining the full and true value for money."

SPHERE. October 21st, 1910.

"Those of my readers who desire something quite exclusive must perforce wend their way to the regal Salons of the International Fur Store, where they can see such a magnificent display of model garments in all the fashionable Furs and in such charming and original designs as positively cannot be met with elsewhere."

sound unpractical, but she discovered some delightful things, and she wound up by rewarding me for my endurance with a bowl of Sainsbury's chocolate as we passed their shop in Regent Street. There is something very satisfactory about a thing so good that it has become a proverb; and although the chocolate is now only a sweet memory, the bowl remains—a miraculous blending of jewel-like colour, whose very signatures (of artist and potter) are artistic delights. Let me be a little bit Protectionist, and rejoice that at last Sainsbury's have succeeded in finding an English ware in which to house their sweets. Up till now France and Japan have supplied the bowls and boxes, and they still do so, only the Lancastrian lustre is there, too. It is rather like smoked soap-bubbles, with the fire reflected in them.

We did the shopping for the men first, "to get that off our hands," as Ibsen's hero says. It was with some awe that I found X. taking me to Sackville Street in search of cigars—and for her husband, too, with whom she presumably expects to go on living! However, she bought a box of Golofinas with perfect serenity, buoyed up, as it appeared, by the amazing circumstances that her father and her husband and three men in her husband's club had all said complimentary things about them—technical things, of which she could only reproduce fragments anent white ash and cool smoking, even burning, and so forth. After such an adventure the purchase of cigarettes seemed a mere nothing. Besides, we both know something of them. The difficulty with cigarettes is to be sure of suiting everybody's taste. One way out is a mixed cabinet. The State Express people have a very jolly one, prettily housed, and containing 150 cigarettes of four kinds—two Virginian sorts and two Turkish. It costs half-a-guinea, and solves the question of choice. Personally, I think their extra quality Turkish ought to be canonised, and the housewife's spirit is pleased at the knowledge that the Ardath Company keeps its works and methods thoroughly clean. The thought of carelessly handled cigarettes is particularly unpleasant.

While we were ransacking Gamage's—which, by the way, is one of the sights of London at this time of the year—in search of novelties or old familiar friends for juvenile nephews and nieces, we discovered a most practical and acceptable present for either a man or a woman. This is an electric torch of a new pattern, cleverly arranged to fix on the bedstead head and flash a light on the dial of a watch. The bulb hangs to the pillow, so that an invalid has not even to turn the head or reach a reluctant hand out from the warmth of the bedclothes.

China, whether old or new, is always a welcome present. A pretty example of it is a china pot of china flowers, and as they can be had from an inch high to a foot there is a pleasing breadth about the range of prices. There is a perfect flower garden of these articles at Goode's, in South Audley Street, where we went to buy a commemoration vase of King Edward—not the lugubrious present it sounds, but a fine piece of soft colouring. It is to be followed by a companion vase at Coronation time. I thought we should never get away from Goode's, where one meets some new and irresistible temptation at every turn. In subsequent rambles one or two bits of old china were added to our purchases. X. picked up a delicious old Mason sauceboat, with a Japanese gentleman in Turkish trousers smoking an Egyptian hookah on an Italian balcony—a gem of translucent porcelain, which came out of a second-hand bookshop and cost three shillings! That gave her more pleasure even than the beautiful dessert service with which her married daughter is to be rejoiced—a fine reproduction of Old Leeds blue peony, with pierced borders. This we found at Oetzmann's, whither we had journeyed in search of furniture. After much hesitation between fascinating articles of various orders of beauty, we at last came to a decision in favour of a fascinating Sheraton table with a cupboard under it. Oetzmann's is one of those places that always make me want to take a new house for the pleasure of furnishing it.

It seems dull to recommend people to give handkerchiefs as Christmas presents, and yet there are thousands of people who like a "web of lace-edged cambric," as the novelists say, with a liking quite disproportionate to the status of a handkerchief. There is always a charm about a necessity translated into terms of luxury. Fine embroidered handkerchiefs are usually considered more practical (having regard to the malignant dealings of the laundress) than lace, but some kinds of lace, though fine, are strong. There is a special sort of very fine Armenian lace which is unusually strong, and makes a delightful edging for a handkerchief. It is important to see that really good stuff is used in the handkerchief itself, or else lace edging and embroidery will not last long. For this reason handkerchiefs, like gloves, should be bought at a house which has made a name for them. Robinson and Cleaver's cannot be bettered in that respect. They are displaying a wonderful variety just now, together with innumerable other dainty and useful articles which will be received with thanks by every discerning woman.

A fountain pen is a close friend to many, and they get to love their own individually and cannot be detached from it. X. was buying a new Swan for one brother, and launched out into various others for friends. The ornamental ones ran up to fourteen guineas each, so lovely are some of the designs, but the pens can be had from half a guinea. I have fond recollections of the Swan. I came out top in an examination as soon as I had been given a fountain pen in my school days because it ran so easily and quickly that I had time to think of my grammar! Wherefore, like Lohengrin, I say, "Mein liebe Schwann!" ever since.

The rest of the things we bought were inkstands and penwipers and teacloths and embroidered sheets, and a motor-rug which turns into a motor-cloak, and a settle which turns into a dinner-wagon, and a couple of gross of small objects of every kind of which my weary brain would not keep count. And X. had enough to pay for the taxi home. Wonderful woman!

UPSTAIRS AND DOWNSTAIRS.

We have been told that Christmas cards are dying out; and yet year after year shop windows are devoted to them, our royalties order special cards, postmen labour under sacks of them, halfpenny stamps would go up in price if they were proprietary articles, and Raphael Tuck brings out new cards of every kind. This year there are some specially pleasing boxes of "Parchment" cards, whose rich tones of brown and red are artistically decorated with mottoes from the poets and corresponding portraits.

Some of the postcards enclosed in envelopes for the halfpenny post are charming. A lucky black cat on one of them (detachable) is a beguiling sight. The single cards vary from vellum and forget-me-nots to parchment, or white cardboard hand-painted with a deliciously pretty girl in blue. Calendars are to be had in great variety, from the sporting and poetical to the religious. A good idea is a blotting-book whose cover is a Christmas greeting and a calendar combined. An amusing slip in one box credits a quotation to "Ibid," the name of the author appearing beneath a quotation on another card. A Burns birthday book illustrated in colour is sure to be popular, and for the children, besides many cards, there are "Tuck's Christmas Annual" and a painting book of "Fairy Folk," with the paints all ready and available on every page.

Christmas is not Christmas without crackers; and judging by the eagerness with which adults array themselves in paper caps, they are not among the childish things to be put away with dolls and soldiers. Tom Smith has, as usual, delightful novelties this year. His catalogue brims with them. There is the signalling box, in which all necessaries (including a cardboard boy scout) for an absorbing game are included, as well as the crackers themselves. The sixpenny and shilling boxes are particularly good value, and the table-decoration crackers and ornamental baskets are especially pretty this year.

It is sometimes difficult to choose a present of a practical nature and a luxurious aspect. An "Ardent" stove fulfils these qualifications. These stoves are handsome in appearance, they do not smell, they give great heat, and have a rich ruby glow; they wear for a lifetime, are economical, give no trouble, and are so useful as to be invaluable. In sickness they keep the room at an even temperature all night, and avoid the movement and noise involved in making up a fire. They are perfectly healthy, and a jar of water kept on them will moisten the air enough for the most bronchitic. For ordinary purposes they are boons indeed to artists with studios and no attendance, for every room in the house, and particularly for halls and landings, which, especially in country houses, are frequently caves of ice. People come from warm bedrooms in their dinner-gowns adapted to warm sitting-rooms; and on the way they collect colds and coughs and pneumonia. All this the "Ardent" averts, and as for bachelor girls, as well as other bachelors, they do away with one of the biggest problems of domestic service. They can be had in many sizes, suitable for all sizes of room and purse. Sepulchre's Heating and Lighting Company will send full particulars from 1, Orchard Street, Westminster. These are almost the only oil stoves in which the heat does not rush straight to the ceiling and lose itself.

In looking for Christmas presents it is pleasant to go to a place where every purchase, besides procuring good value, furthers a good cause. There are many of these in London. For basket work and household utensils of some kinds there are the Barclay or West London Workshops for the Blind. The Disabled Soldiers' and Sailors' Help Society turns out good furniture, trays, toys (including a very good game of football for a billiard-table) inlaid woods and so forth, and they have an interesting jig-saw subscription library. Then there are the Duchess of Sutherland's cripples, who are very clever indeed, and the various handicrafts collected and shown by the Home Arts and Industries, a society which is doing good work. Enchanting furniture for dolls and also for children is made by the crippled boys and girls of the Arts and Crafts School at Chailey; and there are very many more depots in London at which every purchase is a good deed.

When it occurred to a certain firm of water-distillers to placard London with an enlargement of a drop of natural water showing a flourishing chamber of entomological horrors, the cause of teetotalism must have staggered. The most ardent zoologist cannot wish to swallow more little elephants and serpents and E. T. Reed beasts than he can help. Filters of every kind are on the market with the idea of taming this exuberance on the part of nature. The Berkefeld Company has recently submitted an improved pattern for experiment to a well-known bacteriologist, with the result that even Thames water was made absolutely pure—although, according to the report, it previously "showed a varied flora," having been collected from the Surrey side of Blackfriars Bridge. (N.B.—A field for writers on "The Flora of London," a new chapter on "The Meads of Blackfriars.") One very practical filter is for fixing on the service pipe over the sink, thus providing a constant service of pure water for drinking as well as the ordinary water for household use.

Some recipes for very dainty Christmas dishes are always useful just now, when so many people are anxious to give a touch of novelty to the menu—to do old dishes in a new way. Thus the following way of serving turkey is distinctly a pleasant change.

Turkey à la Duchesse.—Truss a small plump turkey for boiling, leaving the crop part open. Scrape and pound 6 ozs. of lean white veal, add 2 ozs. of butter, 2 ozs. of scraped fat bacon, 2 eggs, and salt and pepper to season. When thoroughly pounded rub the farce through a wire sieve, reserve a third part, and with the remainder mix a dessertspoonful of chopped truffles and a like quantity of chopped tongue. Use this farce to fill the crop part of the bird, in the centre of which place a small braised heart sweetbread. Sew the aperture, tie the breast over with well-buttered paper, and braise it for two hours with stock and vegetables, after which take the grease from the strained stock of the braise, reduce it, and with it make some creamy white sauce. Mould the farce which is in reserve into small quenelles, and after blanching them in white stock dish them round the turkey with alternate slices of red tongue, using a thin layer of mashed potato to keep them in place. Pour a little sauce over the breast of the turkey, which sprinkle with chopped and dried truffles, and send the remainder of the sauce in a boat.

With many people it is the pastry which prevents indulgence in the seasonable mince-pie, and for them—and others—the following recipe will be found a most toothsome means of using mincemeat:—

Timbale à la Noel.—Boil a piece of vanilla pod in a pint of milk, into which shower 2 ozs. of Carolina rice; stew it gently for two hours without stirring, remove the vanilla, mix in the yolks of two eggs, an ounce of butter, and an ounce of sugar. Butter a plain charlotte mould, sprinkle it with chopped and dried almonds, and line it with the prepared rice. Fill the middle of the mould with mincemeat, cover with rice, and bake it about three-quarters of an hour. Turn the timbale on to a dish, and pour the following sauce round:—Boil 4 ozs. of loaf sugar with a gill of water until a syrup forms, pour it on to the well-beaten yolks of two eggs, continue whisking, adding half a glass of brandy gradually.

The old-fashioned form of Christmas cake, with its load of fruit, does not appeal to everyone, but the following recipe will not be likely to find a single detractor:—

Christmas Cake.—Beat half a pound of butter with half a pound of sugar until creamy, beat in 4 eggs, each one separately, add the grated peel of a small lemon, 2 tablespoonfuls of brandy, and mix in 6 ozs. of sifted and warmed flour and 2 ozs. of ground almonds. Divide the cake mixture into two, round, buttered and papered, flat tins of equal size, and bake them very carefully for about three-quarters of an hour, then turn them on to a pastry rack to cool. Dissolve 2 ozs. of chocolate Menier, beat it with 2 ozs. of butter and 4 ozs. of icing sugar, using a wooden spoon, trim the cakes, and spread the chocolate icing between them. Mix 6 ozs. of ground almonds with 12 ozs. of icing sugar, the juice of half a lemon, and an egg, work it into a stiff paste—it may require another yolk. Reserve a portion of the paste, roll the remainder to the size of the cake and place it on the top; place the cake on a reversed plate, stir three-quarters of a pound of icing sugar, with a cupful of water and a teaspoonful of lemon juice in a small stewpan on the stove until just warm, and pour it carefully over the cake. Make the reserved piece of almond paste into tiny balls, roll them in icing sugar, and dry them in a cool oven. Cut leaves of green angelica, and with these and the almond berries make a pretty wreath at the top and around the sides of the cake. Pipe the top edge and the bottom of the cake with white icing, and place it on a fancy plate with a frill of tissue paper.

Another delicious Christmas novelty is this idealised form of the currant cake:—

Gateau à la Corinth.—Whisk four eggs with 8 ozs. of sugar in an egg-bowl over a saucepan of boiling water until light and frothy, take it from the fire, and whisk in gradually 8 ozs. of liquefied butter; mix in 8 ozs. of Hungarian flour. Bake on a greased and papered baking-sheet about half an hour. When done, turn it on to a sheet of paper and cut it into rounds with a large cutter, making one piece an inch larger than the others. Boil 6 ozs. of currants with a gill of water for half an hour, strain, and rub them through a wire sieve. Beat 4 ozs. of butter with 6 ozs. of icing sugar, add the purée of currants, half a glass of brandy, and a pinch of ground cinnamon; mix in an ounce of very finely chopped candied peel. Spread the slices of cake with the currant butter, replace them one on the other, with the large piece at the bottom. Cover the gateau entirely with white icing, make a border with piped leaves of icing and halves of glacé cherries, with a similar border at the top. Dish the cake on a fancy paper.

Mr. RANGER GULL'S New Romance.

HOUSE OF TORMENT.

By the Author of "The Serf."
In "House of Torment" the Author returns to the field of historical romance, a field in which he has few equals. He takes us back to the days of Philip and Mary, when the Holy Inquisition was vainly endeavouring to get a footing in this country. From the Court, with its Spanish intriguing, to the peaceful country lanes of Essex, where he gives a stirring account of the martyrdom of Dr. Rowland Taylor, of Hadleigh, thence to Seville itself and the dungeons and tortures of the Holy Office, we are taken with descriptive skill and accurate historical research.

By Dr. SVEN HEDIN, Author of "Trans-Himalaya: Discoveries and Adventures in Tibet." With 308 Illustrations from Photographs, Water-colour Sketches, and Drawings by the Author and 2 Maps. In 2 vols, 8vo, 30s. net.

This work is mainly devoted to Persia, in the crossing of which country the Author carefully avoided the routes used by other travellers.

THE OBSERVER.—"Never have the air, the colour, the life, the scents and sounds of the waste been brought home with such freshness and vividness. Sven Hedin is a master of the pen and no mean performer with the pencil. He illustrates his pages with some odd hundreds of sketches and photographs, and it is difficult to say whether the text or the illustrations are the more enchanting."

Indian Unrest.

Green Willow, & other Japanese Fairy Tales. By GRACE JAMES. With 40 Illustrations in Colour by WARWICK GOBLE. Crown 4to, 15s. net. Edition de Luxe, Demy 4to, 42s. net.

ILLUSTRATED LONDON NEWS.—"The forty exquisite illustrations in colour, by Mr. Warwick Goble, harmonise to perfection with their text, and are permeated through and through with the dainty spirit of Japanese art. Nothing more lovely in book illustration could well be imagined."

COMPLETE IN 1 VOL.

The Dynasts: an Epic-Drama of the War with Napoleon. By THOMAS HARDY. Three parts in 1 Vol. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

MR. W. L. COURTNEY in the DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"A most vivid and impressive composition, based on a vast amount of knowledge of the subject with which it deals, and reared into a fantastic structure, full of genius and insight. . . . One of the most magnificent contributions which Mr. Hardy has made to the literature of our time."

GUARDIAN.—"The epic poem of the Great War for which the world has waited for almost a century."

Interludes (Fifth Series). BEING THREE ESSAYS AND SOME VERSES. By HORACE SMITH. Globe 8vo, 5s.

The Magic City. By E. NESBIT. With Illustrations by H. R. MILLAR. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

A fairy story about a boy who possessed a wonderful faculty for building toy cities, which in the land of dreams, become real, with living inhabitants.

The Human Chord. By ALGERNON BLACKWOOD, Author of "Jimbo," "John Silence," etc. 6s.

GLOBE.—"'The Human Chord' is a singularly arresting book, in a sense defying description or analysis. To read it is to live in the mind of an author steeped in the mystic and believing in the unseen things of which he writes."

A Snail's Wooing. The Story of an Alpine Courtship. By E. M. SNEYD-KYNNERSLEY, Author of "H.M.I." 6s.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"Mr. Sneyd-Kynnersley's charming story of an Alpine courtship contains much valuable information for those who desire to climb the mountains that stand round about Zermatt; but no touch of the fatal guide-book manner dims the romance."

Tales of Men and Ghosts. By EDITH WHARTON. 6s.

PUNCH.—"'Tales of Men and Ghosts' are the sort of which, however late the hour, you must just read one more before you go to bed."

Jim Hands. By RICHARD C. CHILD. 6s.

RUNAWAYS AND CASTAWAYS. Edited with Introduction by E. V. LUCAS.

Besides profuse black and white illustrations, the frontispiece and title-page are daintily coloured.

"Mr. E. V. Lucas has deliberately set himself to capture hearts while young and tender. . . . . In twenty years he will have become such a power in the land as to be a national danger, and his new work, 'Runaways and Castaways,' is only another step towards this enviable destiny."—TIMES.

OLD-FASHIONED TALES OF LONG AGO. Edited with Introduction by E. V. LUCAS.

Besides numerous black and white illustrations, the frontispiece and title-page are beautifully printed in colours.

"A charming book. The one ambition of Mr. Lucas' authors is to be interesting, and they succeed very well."—DAILY TELEGRAPH.

"Beautifully printed, illustrated, and bound."—SCHOOLMASTER.

FORGOTTEN TALES OF LONG AGO. Edited with Introduction by E. V. LUCAS.

Besides numerous black and white illustrations, the frontispiece and title-page are in colours.

"Is Mr. E. V. Lucas going to provide us with one of the prettiest books of each Christmas season? For successive years we have been delighted with his clever selection from the child-fiction of our grand-parents, and we are left like Oliver Twist asking for more."—BOOKMAN.

ANOTHER BOOK OF VERSES FOR CHILDREN. Selected and Edited by E. V. LUCAS.

Profusely illustrated in black and white, with frontispiece and title-page beautifully printed in colour.

"We may briefly and emphatically describe it as the most charming anthology for children that we have seen, original in choice and arrangement, beautifully bound, and owing no little to Mr. F. D. Bedford's delightful and sympathetic illustrations."—GUARDIAN.

THE "ORIGINAL POEMS" AND OTHERS. By JANE and ANN TAYLOR and ADELAIDE O'KEEFE. Edited by E. V. LUCAS.

"The quality of the poetry of the Misses Taylor has been praised by such great judges that any praise from ourselves would be superfluous. No other writers of children's poetry have written of childish incident with all the child's simplicity."—SPECTATOR.

HAM YARD SOUP KITCHEN and HOSPICE

1846.

President: Rear Admiral Sir Adolphus FitzGeorge, K.C.V.O.

MANY MILLION MEALS

have been distributed since 1846 by this old-established Charity, the work of which is much wider than its title indicates. This is not a Soup Kitchen only, open during the winter months. The work goes on all the year round. The Hospice contains twenty beds for men in temporary distress—poor convalescents and others of good character who need assistance to regain employment. The great aim is to minister to the wants and woes of the deserving poor, among whom coal tickets, clothing and free meals are distributed.

1,017 SUBSTANTIAL CHRISTMAS DINNERS

Provided for poor families in 1909.

Your help is earnestly solicited. All gifts will be gratefully acknowledged.

THE

POOR CLERGY RELIEF CORPORATION,

38, Tavistock Place, Tavistock Square, London, W.C.

Established 1856. Incorporated by Royal Charter, 1867.

Patrons: The ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY.
The ARCHBISHOP of YORK.

President: The BISHOP of LONDON.

The only Society of the kind which gives Immediate Assistance to the Clergy, their Widows and Orphan Daughters in all parts of the Empire.

At each Fortnightly Meeting of the Committee some hundreds of pounds are distributed (besides valuable gifts of Clothing), and a large fund is required to meet the ever-increasing appeals for help.

The late ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY, at the 46th Annual General Meeting of Members of the Corporation, said:—"There is no other Society, so far as I am aware, which deals so immediately and with such care with cases of the kind."

DONATIONS and ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTIONS and GIFTS of CLOTHING of every description will be most gratefully received by MANDEVILLE B. PHILLIPS, Secretary.

The Society had aided, to May, 1910, over 29,000 cases of Clerical Distress.

SECRETARIES AND OFFICES.

British North Borneo Rubber Trust, Limited, 104, Winchester House, London, E.C.

This company has been formed with the objects mentioned in the Memorandum of Association, but primarily for the purpose of acquiring as from the 1st January, 1911, the following Para Rubber Plantations and Lands most favourably situated on the excellent Government Road in the Sembawang District, Singapore, Straits Settlements:—

|---|---|
| Sembawang Estate ..... | 5,383 acres. |
| Tempinis Estate ..... | 2,813 ,, |
| Approximate total area ..... | 8,196 ,, |

AREA PLANTED.

Of this total some 5,366 acres have been planted with about 1,100,000 Para Rubber (Hevea Braziliensis). Considerable further planting is in progress, and the present owners undertake extensions and contract to plant by the 31st March next further areas at their own expense, which will bring the gross acreage under Rubber to 6,427 acres, with a total of approximately 1,250,000 Para Trees. The nurseries are ample for the completion of the planting of the whole area of the Estates.

SITUATION.

The Sembawang Estate is situate in the Seletar and Sembawang Districts of Singapore, and has a road frontage of about nine miles; the Thomson and Seletar Roads practically bisect the property. The Tempinis Estate is approached either by the Serangoon and Tempinis Road or the Changi Road. The actual road frontage of the two Estates is about twenty miles. The roads are very fine and well metalled.

The statement in this Prospectus are mainly based upon the cabled Reports of Mr. Edward Bryce, Manager of Tebrau Rubber Estate, Limited, dated the 16th, 18th, and 21st November, 1910, who visited the Estates in the early part of that month at the request of Messrs. Sandilands, Buttery and Co., on instructions from London.

TENURE.

Out of the total area to be acquired by the Company, 940 acres are held under grants rent free in perpetuity, 5,337 acres are held in perpetuity on Government grants, and the remainder on leases, the first of which will not expire until 1956, the average annual rental on grants and leases being about $1\frac{3}{4}$ dollars per acre. As regards the 5,337 acres, a reduction of 900 dollars per annum will be allowed when the whole is planted with Rubber, but the Government have the right to revise the rent by not more than 50 per cent. in the year 1914 and every subsequent thirty years. Under the terms of the lease of a small portion of the property (133 acres) a Royalty of 5 per cent. on the produce will be payable from the commencement of the year 1912. Detailed particulars of the foregoing can be seen at the Offices of the Solicitors of the Company while the Subscription List remains open.

By reason of the favourable terms upon which the land is held and the almost unique position, the value of the Estates is considerably enhanced.

LABOUR.

It is difficult to lay too much stress on the very advantageous situation of these Estates in regard to labour. Being within a few miles of the Town and Port of Singapore, which has a population of some 200,000 souls, these Plantations readily attract all necessary labour.

Owing to the proximity of the Estates to Singapore, the facilities for transport will also be recognised.

BUILDINGS.

Coolie lines are adequate for the full labour force. There are also two bungalows, two factories, and two motor-cars.

WATER.

The water supply is reported to be excellent, and the locality very healthy.

SOIL AND CULTIVATION.

In addition to Para Rubber, the cultivation consists of Coconuts, Pineapples, and Citronella.

Mr. Bryce reports that the growth of the trees is good, the land suitable, labour cheap and plentiful, that the Estates have a fine road frontage and are free from disease. The trees are planted on the average fifteen by fifteen, the lining of some blocks being irregular.

PARA RUBBER.

The cultivated area and ages of the trees are approximately as follows:—

| Acres. | Age. | Approximate Number of Trees. |
|---|---|---|
| 12 | Over 6 years | 2,400 |
| 20 | „ 5 „ | 4,000 |
| 130 | „ 4 „ | 26,000 |
| 310 | „ 3 „ | 62,000 |
| 137 | „ 2 „ | 27,400 |
| 1,405 | „ 1 „ | 239,300 |
| 3,852 | Under 1 year | 770,400 |
| 561 | Now being planted and to be completed at cost of present owners by 31st March, 1911 | 112,200 |
| 6,427 | Total Para Trees | 1,243,700 |

Of the above, some 417 acres are interplanted with Coconuts, and in addition there are seventy-three acres Coconuts alone.

The present owners contract to deliver the 6,500 acres planted clean, free from lalang and weeds.

Mr. Bryce estimates the net profits from Coconuts as follows:—

|---|---|
| 1911 | £1,100 |
| 1912 | £1,700 |
| 1913 | £2,000 |
| 1914 | £2,100 |
| 1915 | £2,200 |
| 1916 | £2,200 |

and a total profit from Pines for the next three years of £11,550 and from Citronella for one year only of £1,200.

Mr. Bryce estimates the yield of Rubber for the six years from January next as follows:—

| 1st year. 1911 | 2nd year. 1912. | 3rd year. 1913. |
|---|---|---|
| 25,000 lbs. | 85,000 lbs. | 150,000 lbs. |
| 4th year. 1914. | 5th year. 1915. | 6th year. 1916. |
| 375,000 lbs. | 1,100,000 lbs. | 1,700,000 lbs. |

showing a production of Rubber for that period of 3,435,000 lbs.

VALUATION.

Mr. Bryce values the properties at £262,000, this sum being considerably in excess of the purchase price payable by this Company.

He has taken, as the basis for his valuation, a net profit of 4s.—3s.—2s. 6d.—2s.—1s. 6d.—1s. per lb. Rubber for the next six years respectively.

The present owners take the whole of their purchase consideration in fully-paid Shares of the Company.

WORKING CAPITAL.

After payment of the purchase consideration, the underwriting commissions and the preliminary expenses hereinafter mentioned, the sum of £79,000 will be available out of the proceeds of this issue as Working Capital and for the general purposes of the Company.

PURCHASE CONSIDERATION.

Under the Agreement (13) below referred to, the S. T. Plantations, Limited, of Pinners Hall, Austin Friars, London, E.C. (the Vendors to and Promoters of the Company) have agreed to sell to the Company the above-mentioned Estates for the sum of £224,000, payable as to £8,000 in cash and as to £216,000 by the allotment of 2,160,000 fully paid Shares of the Company.

Full Prospectuses (upon the terms of which Applications will alone be received) and Forms of Application for Shares can be obtained from the Company's Bankers, Brokers, Commercial Agents, and at the Offices of the Company.

The Vendors are willing to take £73,333 of the purchase price in Shares and Debentures, this being the largest amount permissible, under the Stock Exchange Regulations, for granting an official settlement and quotation.

No underwriting commissions. No calls or options granted to anyone except applicants for the present Debenture issue.

Directors take no fees or remuneration in any year unless Shareholders receive at least 15 per cent. dividend for that year.

After reserving out of profits £11,000 a year to pay off all Debentures within five years, the annual profits, based on the present returns, would allow of a 20 per cent. dividend being paid on the whole Share Capital now offered for subscription, or enough to pay the 7 per cent. Debenture Interest more than 11 times over.

This issue, if fully subscribed, will provide £78,000 cash available for sinking more wells and buying additional producing properties, including one definitely offered to the Vendors which should immediately enable the present profits to be increased by a further £30,000 a year; but these extra profits are not included in the above figures, although all the Capital for earning them is now allowed for.

The "Tsuschima" and other properties above referred to are surrounded by a large number of other proved oil-producing lands; they are not in some far-distant inaccessible part of the world, but only two days' easy journey from London, where British investors can keep a proper watch over their investments.

Applicants for Debentures are guaranteed priority in allotment of any Shares of this issue they may apply for before the list closes up to an equal amount of their Debentures, thus enabling them to participate in the Share profits, but those who apply for Shares without Debentures will only receive allotments pro rata to amount applied for if this Capital is over-subscribed.

They will also have the option on or before December 31st, 1912, to exchange their Debentures for an equal amount of fully-paid shares at par. Any Debentures not exchanged will be redeemed in five years at 5 per cent. premium, thus showing an actual return of 8 per cent.—with present earnings sufficient to pay Debenture Interest 11 times over.

A GOING CONCERN.—This Company has been formed for the objects specified in its Memorandum of Association, and in particular to purchase as a going concern and carry on the important and valuable Oil producing Estate known as "Tsuschima," situate in Tustanowice, Galicia, the best Oil-producing Province in Austria-Hungary. This Estate is held under lease for 25 years from the 9th December, 1905, on the usual terms, which include the payment of the customary royalty of 20 per cent. of the gross oil production and various small charges. The Leasehold Proprietors have entered into a contract with the Vendors for the transfer of their Leasehold rights to the Vendors, and the Vendors, under Contract No. 3 mentioned in the full prospectus, agree to transfer to the Company the benefit of that Contract, the Company taking the production as from the 1st January, 1911. The property will be held through the medium of an Austrian Company to comply with the Austrian law, and the whole interest in such Company will be vested in the English Company through its nominees.

TITLES PERFECT.—Dr I. J. Kreisberg, the Austrian Advocate instructed by the Vendors, has on their behalf investigated the "Tsuschima" title, and reports the same to be in perfect order, including the sale contract referred to in the full prospectus.

NO PRICE-CUTTING.—The Galician Oilfields are among the best oil-producing lands in the world, and the industry is encouraged and jealously guarded by the Austrian Government as an important source of revenue to the Empire. The Government has expended close on One Million pounds sterling in erecting refineries and oil storage reservoirs. Many of the locomotives on the State railways are now run by oil fuel, and the general use of this fuel is rapidly extending.

PRODUCTION ALL SOLD THROUGH UNION.—The whole Production of the "Tsuschima" Well is Sold on commission through the Crude Oil Producers' Union, which controls the Austrian oil market and supplies the Government Contracts for the State Railways. This Company is, therefore, practically Unaffected by the Standard Oil Company's Price-Cutting Tactics in the Far East and other remote parts of the world. It should also be borne in mind that price-cutting applies chiefly to refined oils, and this Company is not concerned in refined oils, but is only a producer of the Crude Oil—before it is sold to the refiners.

LONG LIFE.—The well-known authority, Peter R. von Miaczynski, who is one of the sworn oil experts for the Imperial Royal Court of Justice in Austria, certifies it as his opinion that the "Tsuschima" Estate has geological advantages unexcelled by any in the Province of Tustanowice, and occupies one of the finest positions in the petroliferous zone. Being a comparatively new producer, the "Tsuschima" may be assumed to have most of its productive life before it, and it is now yielding profits equivalent to an annual return of:—

PRESENT PROFITS.

7 per cent. on the £55,000 Convertible First Debentures,
20 per cent. on the £165,000 Share Capital now offered for Subscription, and this after setting aside £11,000 a year out of profits to pay off all the £55,000 Debentures within five years, and after also allowing in each year a good margin for London office and other expenses.

VENDORS TAKING 73,333 SHARES.—As an evidence of their faith in the undertaking the Vendors would be willing to take the whole of the purchase price in Shares, but as the London Stock Exchange stipulates that two-thirds of any issue shall have been applied for by and unconditionally allotted to the Public before an Official Quotation will be granted, the Vendors have agreed to take, as part of the purchase price, £73,333 in fully-paid Shares and Debentures or cash, or partly in either, at the option of the Directors, this being the largest amount permissible under the Stock Exchange Rule.

DIRECTORS PAID BY RESULTS.—The Directors' remuneration, including that of the Chairman and Managing Director, is entirely dependent upon results. They will take no fees or remuneration in any year unless the Shareholders receive for that year at least 15 per cent. dividends.

PRESENT PROFITS £55,249 PER ANNUM.—One of the principals in the firm of Messrs Clark, Battams, Lanham, and Co., Chartered Accountants, of St Mildred court, Bank, London, E.C., personally visited the Estate at the beginning of November, 1910, and a copy of their Certificate as to the production and profits of the "Tsuschima" property appears in the full prospectus showing present profits at the rate of £55,249 5s per annum.

One of the authorised Government engineers and sworn oil experts for the Imperial Royal Court of Justice, Austria (Peter R. Von Miaczynski), has reported upon and valued the property, and a copy of his report and valuation appears in the full prospectus, which report is confirmed by W. A. Wellesley-McKown, B.Sc., of London, petroleum expert, member of the Austrian Crude Oil Producers' Association, who was instructed to visit the property on different occasions and report thereon, whose report also appears in the full prospectus.

PROFITS ACCRUE BEFORE COMPLETION.—Under the agreements mentioned in the full prospectus, or one of them, the company will receive the whole of the net revenue from the production of the "Tsuschima" property from the 1st January, 1911, although the final payment for the completion of the purchase is not due until March 1st, 1911, and the company will be in a position of earning a substantial profit before the date fixed for completion.

Full prospectuses (upon the terms of which alone applications will be received) and forms of application may be obtained from the Bankers, Brokers, and Solicitors, and at the registered offices of the Company.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best Epigram, Conundrum, Lipogram, Bouts-Rimés, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this Journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the Truth Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a quarter to the same competitor.

7. All New Contributors are Required to Forward with their First Answers their Real Names and Addresses for Registration; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed twelve, and must under no circumstances consist of more than fourteen, letters.

9. Competitors must on no account change the noms-de-plume they have once assumed.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed:—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," Carteret Street, Queen Anne's Gate, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE, NO. 1,661.

The usual Prize of Two Guineas is offered this week to that competitor who shall succeed in supplying the best solution of the following complex problem:—

Supposing Mr. Lloyd George, Lord Kitchener, Mr. Bernard Shaw, Lord Lansdowne, Mr. F. E. Smith, Mr. Winston Churchill, Mr. Gilbert Chesterton, and Mr. J. Redmond should accept invitations to a Fancy Dress Ball, at which all the guests were expected to assume some Shakespearian character, which would be the most appropriate characters from the plays of the immortal bard for these gentlemen, respectively, to adopt?

I do not think any explanations are necessary. The character of the competition is sufficiently obvious.

I have only to point out that no competitor may submit more than one list of eight Shakespearian characters, and that all lists must reach Truth Office not later than by the first post on Monday, December 26.

The real name, with the address, of Georgina, also winner of one-fourth of above, is Mrs. Henry P. Shield, 33, Edith Grove, Fulham Road, S.W.

Scar.—A competitor who has won part of a prize is still eligible to win prize money to an amount not exceeding the difference between the share of prize money previously won and the full sum of two guineas. Thus, you, having won 6s., are still eligible to take prize money up to £1 16s. I hope this is clear.

Ballantrae.—You are debarred from taking another prize for a period of thirteen weeks from the date of the original appearance of the puzzle in which you succeeded—that is to say, in this particular case, from October 5 last.

Sapper.—Many thanks for your letter. I am always pleased to receive criticisms, especially when they are expressed in the courteous and friendly manner that marks yours. It is not, of course, essential that the rhymed endings in the parody should have exactly the same sound as those of the original. But in so far as those same sounds can be reproduced, the value of the parody is, cæteris paribus, enhanced. In this case, the ante-penultimate line of the original itself contains a redundant syllable, an irregularity not altogether unusual in sonnets. There were several points to be considered in adjudicating upon the parodies, and I selected those which, having regard to these several points, struck me as the best. You will, however, understand that judgments of this sort are necessarily a matter of opinion, and that it is not to be expected that the opinion of others shall always coincide with the opinion of the P.E.

ENTRE NOUS.

A DETAILED description of last week's Toy Show appears as a Special Illustrated Supplement to this issue. I think it was generally agreed by all visitors that the exhibition was one of the prettiest that have ever been held, and the attendance was considerably above the average. The meteorological arrangements were, as usual, very defective; but as it did not rain for more than half the time that the doors were open, and as the arena was pretty closely packed all the time that the rain held off, the Toy Show of 1910 may be pronounced a signal success.

It remains for me to tender the heartiest thanks to the large number of ladies and gentlemen whose exertions contributed to that satisfactory result. Their various performances are dealt with in detail elsewhere; but I must specially express my acknowledgments to the ladies whose taste and industry produced quite the finest collection of dolls ever assembled in the Albert Hall, or probably anywhere else; to those who assisted in arranging the exhibition and collecting money in the Hall; and to all the musicians, professional and amateur, who entertained the public during the time the Show was open. It is invidious to mention names, but I am under special obligations to Mr. H. C. Tonking, who travelled hundreds of miles to give the two organ recitals; to Miss Gwynne Kimpton, who got up the excellent orchestra performances each afternoon; to the members of the Strings Club, who played on Thursday afternoon at very short notice; to Messrs. Ascherberg, Hopwood and Crewe, and Mr. Jenkins and his party, who provided first rate concerts in the evening; and to the Radiaphone Syndicate, whose wonderful instrument filled up all the intervals with life-like vocal recitals

It may be of interest to mention that the contents of the collecting-boxes at the Toy Show amounted to just upon £59. This is some £30 or £40 less than has been paid at the doors for admission during the last few years, and the Toy Fund stands to lose by that amount. The result can hardly be said to justify the experiment of opening the Albert Hall free, the less so since the total attendance must have been several thousands in excess of what it has been in recent years. However, I still cherish the hope that a great many visitors forgot to take their cheque-books or purses with them, and that, moved by what they saw of the work done by others, they are now on the point of repairing this omission, if they have not already done so.

The whole of the dolls and toys, together with the 11,000 "Tress Barry" sixpences, are now on their way to the 30,000 children for whom a "Merry Christmas" is thus assured. I should have a better chance of a merry Christmas myself if I knew that the money to pay for them was now on its way to Truth Office; and I cannot help thinking that every reader of these lines would enjoy his or her Christmas dinner better for the consciousness of having done something to brighten the season within the sombre walls of workhouse schools or in the sad atmosphere of hospital wards. In plain figures, the state of the case at present is that the Toy Fund is £300 short of the expenditure incurred, and the "Tress Barry" Fund about £70. I suppose this is the result of the general election; but the election is now over, and I can only hope that during the next week or two the subscribers who have failed, for whatever reason, will come to the rescue.

---

Talking of elections, I was very much impressed by the fact that the week after I acknowledged a subscription from Captain Morrison Bell he was triumphantly returned for the Ashburton Division of Devonshire. If a few more Unionist candidates had followed his example, how different the result of the election might have been! I only wish Ashburton had polled a little earlier; it might have brought a shower of subscriptions from candidates on both sides. Even now I might suggest that members who have been returned would do well to make a thank-offering. There might be another general election before next Christmas. They come very suddenly in these days.

The following is a list of subscriptions which have come to hand during the past week:—

The King held a Diplomatic Court in the old Throne Room at Buckingham Palace on Friday, when the Chinese Minister presented his letters of recall, and the new Minister was received in audience and presented his letters of credence. Mr. Bryce kissed hands on his appointment as Ambassador at Washington. The members of the Household in Waiting and the Master of the Ceremonies were in attendance. Sir Edward Grey, who was present at the Court, had an audience of the King. Levee dress was worn. The ceremonial at Courts and Investitures is to be the same as during the last reign, which was in many details quite different from the procedure under Queen Victoria.

I hear that the King (after consultation with Queen Alexandra) has decided to hold the usual memorial service for Queen Victoria and Prince Albert on Sunday, January 22, but it may not be continued after next year. The service is to be held, as usual, in the Frogmore Mausoleum, and the Archbishop of Canterbury and the Dean of Windsor will officiate, the hymns and anthems being sung by the choir of St. George's Chapel. It is probable that in future there will be a memorial service at Windsor on May 6.

---

The Victoria and Albert is to be ready for service by the middle of January, as the King and Queen contemplate spending a few days at Portsmouth, from either Tuesday, the 17th, or Tuesday, the 24th. If their Majesties do go to Portsmouth, they will live on board the Victoria and Albert during their stay, and the yacht is to be moored in the harbour near the south railway jetty.

---

The Royal yacht Victoria and Albert has been taken into Portsmouth Dockyard for an extensive overhaul and refit, including some alterations in the arrangement of the Royal cabins. It is understood that the King will place the Victoria and Albert at the disposal of Queen Alexandra for a spring cruise in the Mediterranean.

---

There is no truth in the statement that Queen Alexandra contemplates going to Egypt next month to join the Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife. Queen Alexandra will probably go to the south of Europe early in February, but it is not likely that she will travel further to the east than Athens.

---

Brocket Hall, where the King and Queen were last week the guests of Lord and Lady Mount Stephen, is a large plain house, with some handsome rooms and a well-arranged interior. The garden and grounds are very attractive, and the Lea, which flows through the demesne, is expanded into a lake with a pretty cascade. Lord Melbourne, the Minister, died at Brocket, and so did his brother-in-law, Lord Palmerston. The large Melbourne estates in Herts and Derbyshire passed in 1853 to Lady Palmerston, and on her death they went to her grandson, the late Lord Cowper. The Melbourne property now belongs to Lord Walter Kerr, in right of his wife, the late Lady Amabel Kerr, who was a sister of Lord Cowper.

---

No tales about Royal shooting parties are too extravagantly absurd for some of the papers. An evening journal has astounded its readers with an account of the King's sport during his recent visit to Lord Iveagh at Elveden. According to this story, His Majesty "used 1,400 cartridges in one day, killing 1,700 birds." It is amazing that anyone could be found to print such obvious balderdash, which was, of course, evolved out of some fertile and ingenious imagination, and accepted as correct by somebody who can know no more about shooting than a Chinaman knows of foxhunting.

---

The King of Denmark has been on a private visit to his son-in-law, Prince Frederick of Schaumberg-Lippe, at the Château of Nachod, in Bohemia. Prince Frederick, who is one of the great territorial magnates of the Austrian Empire, is a grand-nephew of the late Queen of Denmark. He was married in May, 1896, to Princess Louise, eldest daughter of the present King and Queen of Denmark, who died in April, 1906, leaving a son and two daughters. Prince Frederick contracted a second marriage in May, 1909, with Princess Antoinette of Anhalt, daughter of the Duke of Anhalt-Dessau. One of his sisters is the Queen of Wurtemberg, and another is the Princess of Waldeck-Pyrmont, and another is Duchess of Saxe-Altenburg. Two of his brothers married the twin daughters of the Grand Duchess Vera Constantinovna (sister of the Queen of the Hellenes) and the late Duke Eugene of Wurtemberg. These two princesses are now heiresses to the immense fortune of their great-aunt, the late Queen Olga of Wurtemberg, daughter of the Emperor Nicholas I.

---

The King and Queen of Norway left England nearly a week before the day which was originally fixed for their departure. They left London last Wednesday for Cologne, on their way to Copenhagen, where they paid a short visit to the Queen of Denmark before going on to Christiania. Queen Maud wishes to return to England early in June, in order that she may be present at the Coronation, but nothing will be settled until late in the spring. If she comes she is to stay at Marlborough House with Queen Alexandra, and she will take her place in Westminster Abbey as a sister of the King.

---

A contemporary printed the other day some utter nonsense about the Duchess of Albany, stating that she will probably give up Claremont, which will be taken over by the King, in order that this place may later on become a country residence for the Heir-Apparent. This rubbish is based on absolute ignorance of the facts. The Duchess of Albany has no intention whatever of giving up Claremont, and if she did leave this place it would not come into the hands of the King, as the estate was the private property of Queen Victoria, and it is not a possession of the Crown and never has been one. King George has no more interest in Claremont than in Chatsworth. There will certainly be no necessity for some years to come for anyone to consider the question of a country residence for the Prince of Wales, inasmuch as he celebrated his sixteenth birthday only a few months ago.

---

Queen Amélie and King Manuel have taken Abercorn House, Richmond, for twelve months, and they will remove thither shortly after Christmas from Wood Norton, where they have been the guests of the Duc and Duchesse d'Orléans during the last two months. Queen Amélie and her son will probably spend several weeks in Italy early in the spring.

---

Prince Albert of Schleswig-Holstein has returned to England from Germany, and he is staying with Prince and Princess Christian at Cumberland Lodge.

Baron Akerhjelm, Secretary of the Swedish Legation at Christiania, has been appointed Councillor of the Legation in London, in the place of Baron Beck-Friis, who is to be transferred to Paris.

---

The selection of Lord Minto for the vacant Garter has given universal satisfaction, and the King and the Prime Minister may be congratulated on their choice. It is a most graceful compliment to the ex-Viceroy on the part of the Government. His Majesty personally invested Lord Minto with the ribbon and insignia at Buckingham Palace on Thursday. Several daily and weekly papers have been stating that the delay in giving away the late Lord Spencer's blue ribbon was due to the fact that it is not etiquette to fill up a vacant Garter while the Court is in mourning for a deceased Sovereign. Of course, this was all nonsense.

My Dublin correspondent writes:—

Lord Iveagh paid a flying visit to Dublin after the King's visit to Elveden. As a sound business man he has a life-long habit of seeing things for himself. Unlike many rich men in Ireland, Lord Iveagh is an Irishman of old Irish race. Lady Iveagh belongs to the same family, being also a born Guinness.

Lord Iveagh lent his house in St. Stephen's Green for the sale of Irish School of Art needlework on Thursday. It took place in the fine ballroom—a comparatively late addition to the house, and was presided over by Ladies Mayo, Albreda Bourke, Weldon, Fingall, and many others of social light and leading. The number of sales of all sorts and kinds, at which leaders of fashion are the saleswomen, makes it appear that fashionable women are almost as fond of selling as of buying. The mystery is—at least, in this distressful country—that purchasers always seem forthcoming, notwithstanding the infinite number of sales. For all that, many of us incline to think that sales, like Wordsworth's world, are "too much with us; late and soon, getting and spending."

Christmas does not promise many festivities in Dublin. Lady Lyttelton is giving a children's fancy dress ball at the Royal Hospital, which will be a pretty sight in the great oak-panelled hall. A fancy dress ball has the inestimable advantage in a dead time of having both a long and interesting prelude and sequel—so much to prepare and talk of before, and afterwards to compare and talk of. And then "dressing up" seems to be one of those tastes mysteriously inherent in humanity

Lord and Lady Granard have been spending some time at their residence in Longford, but leave before Christmas. Castle Forbes, like Floors Castle and many another lordly mansion in the United Kingdom, owes much to American dollars. It is notable that no complaints regarding the receipt of American dollars were made when American democracy bestowed them so largely on aristocracy. Only when democracy gave them to democracy did these same dollars turn into subsidies from a foreign Power.

In a country of open secrets, so many of which, curiously enough, never seem to cross the water, the late Viceregal indiscretion created little surprise. What did, however, attract attention over here was that Lord Aberdeen's political pronouncement of his views with regard to Home Rule came so closely on the announcement that the Viceroy, being so absolutely the representative of the King, could not hold the Castle season as usual on account of the Royal Court mourning. Viceroys are frequently dispensed by Sovereigns from the saving grace of not entertaining at Viceregal Courts during the long periods of Court mourning. No dispensation has ever been given, within the memory of the oldest inhabitant, to any Lord Lieutenants of Ireland to make any public pronouncement on State affairs other than what the King himself would with propriety make.

Yet another grumble against Dublin Castle. Last week, previous to the departure of Lord and Lady Aberdeen from Dublin for a short time, one of the aides-de-camp to the Viceroy, Mr. R. Keith, a Scotchman, as his name suggests, was appointed to the post of "Cork Herald" in the Irish Office of Heraldry, of which the English "Ulster" is the head. The Herald's Office in Ireland is not all finery, fanfares, and mediævalism. It deals with many things of much historic importance and especially Irish. Irishmen do not invariably know the history of their own country; it may be safely said that Britons know it and care for it still less. The anomaly of having "Ulster" and "Cork" respectively English and Scotch is perhaps characteristic of the things that are done in the over-dry wood at Dublin Castle and under the rule of a pronounced Home Rule Lord Lieutenant!

Sir Robert Dundas, of Arniston, who died rather suddenly last week, succeeded his father only about a year ago. He had not been in good health since his return from South Africa, where he distinguished himself during the war. He served in the Scots Guards, and afterwards in the Royal Scots for about twenty-seven years. He was an excellent man of business, having inherited the family talent for practical affairs, and he rendered valuable service to the county of Midlothian in many ways. He has only two daughters, and the baronetcy and the large and valuable Arniston estates pass to his brother, Captain Henry Dundas. Lord Melville, the friend and colleague of Mr. Pitt, was of the Arniston family.

The late Sir John Lawson, of Catterick, was one of the most popular country gentlemen in England. He was an admirable specimen of the ideal squire of the old school. He took an active part in the management of his estates, and he munificently supported all local charities. He hunted for many years with the Bedale and Zetland packs, and he was an excellent shot. Sir John was the head of an ancient Roman Catholic family. John Lawson, of Cramlington, was a leading merchant at Newcastle-on-Tyne during the reign of Henry VIII., and his grandson, Ralph Lawson, came into the possession of the Catterick estates in Yorkshire when he married the daughter and heiress of Roger Brough during the reign of James I. Brough Hall, the family seat, is an interesting old Elizabethan house, which contains some very fine pictures and numerous objets d'art. In the park is a handsome Roman Catholic church which was built by the late Sir William Lawson, in imitation of Archbishop Roger's chapel (now the Chapter Library) at York Minster.

---

The late Speaker will spend the Christmas holidays with his father, Mr. William Lowther, at Campsey Ash, near Woodbridge. Mrs. Lowther has gone to Ceylon for a few months for the benefit of her health. Mr. William Lowther, who is now in his ninetieth year, is the younger brother of the third Earl of Lonsdale, who died in 1876, and son of Colonel Henry Cecil Lowther, who was one of the Tory members for Westmorland from 1812 until 1868, when Mr. Lowther succeeded to the seat, which he held until 1892. Mr. William Lowther was in the diplomatic service for twenty-seven years, and he married one of the daughters of Lord Wensleydale, who brought him a large fortune. Mr. Lowther enjoyed the reputation for many years of being one of the finest amateur actors in Europe. He has always been a persona gratissima in society, both at home and abroad.

---

The Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch, who have been residing for more than two months at Drumlanrig Castle, will remove this week to Dalkeith Palace, where they are to stay until they come to town for the meeting of Parliament. It is expected that the King and Queen will reside at Dalkeith Palace when they pay their intended visit to Edinburgh next autumn. King Edward and Queen Alexandra stayed there during their State visit to Edinburgh in May, 1903, the place being lent to them by the Duke and Duchess of Buccleuch. Dalkeith Palace was the residence of George IV. when he visited Scotland in August, 1822, and of Queen Victoria and Prince Albert in 1842.

ELECTION ECHOES.

No. I.—From the Doctor's Standpoint—after Reading a recent Article in the Lancet.

Oh! a general election's hygienically bad
Both for Tory and for Rad.;
If you go to indoor meetings overcrowded—well, why then
There's a lack of oxygen;
But if to outdoor meetings, you are pretty sure to get Unduly cold and wet.
In brief, too little fresh air makes the audience feel ill,
While too much brings on a chill.

But worse—far worse—than either for a man's debilitation
Is "Election-Irritation";
It acts upon his system, through his temper, in a way
That makes the deuce to pay;
It impairs his body's functions to the verge of sheer fatality,
And lowers his vitality.
He can't endure himself; while if another comes about him,
He simply longs to clout him.

An election, then's, a danger to the public health, yes, so it is;
And statistic tables show it is;
Nay, I hear some angry persons vow the Lords they'll fairly smother,
If they force on us another.
But myself I hope their lordships, by the Veto Bill's rejection,
Will induce a fresh election.
Say I, "The more the merrier." I'm a doctor, and the fact is,
It reduplicates my practice.

A correspondent writes:—

From the time of his late Majesty's death until the break up of the Conference we enjoyed what was called a truce in political warfare. I should think there were few who did not enjoy it. Now that the elections are over and the great festival of Peace and Goodwill is at hand, might it not be well to repeat this agreeable experiment and have another truce until the new Parliament meets? I pray you to set the example in Truth, which I regard as one of the few papers which exercise a practical influence upon contemporary life.

I am much obliged for the compliment, and I should be glad to do anything in my power to promote general peace and goodwill at this season of the year. But a journalist is compelled to pay some attention to what is going on around him, whether it be peace or war.

What I do not clearly understand is why politics should be conducted in such an un-Christian spirit that it should be desirable to suspend them at Christmas time. Logically they ought, on that view of the matter, to be banished altogether from among us. It occurs to me that in place of honouring the season by suspending political discussions, men would be more appropriately occupied in leavening them with a little of the Christmas spirit, so that they might be sweetened permanently.

---

It is a well-known fact that every Radical loves a lord. Let him, then, celebrate Christmas by ceasing to dissemble his love. If, later on, a strict sense of duty to his country compels him to kick all the existing lords downstairs, let him perform the distasteful task with a grace and courtesy bespeaking the tenderness of his feelings. It was said of a sweet-mannered angler that he even put a worm on his hook as if he loved him. Some dentists have the same air when extracting a tooth. How much easier to relieve a peer of his veto with such tact and delicacy, such infinite consideration for his feelings, that when the thing is done he will only wish that he could enjoy the pleasure again!

---

There is equal room for the same spirit on both sides. I fear that a great many worthy people will be very unhappy this Christmas with the thought that flood-gates have been opened, that gangs of desperate ruffians hold the State in their grip, that nothing but a miraculous intervention of Providence can now save all our most cherished institutions and ideals, from the British Empire down to the Christmas pudding. My dear sir or madam, as the case may be, try and think more charitably of your Radical brother, and you will find that there's a sun still shining in the sky. Probably the British Constitution will be put in the hands of the workpeople for repairs in the course of next year. But what of that? You may not think it necessary, but very competent surveyors have long been of a different opinion. Necessary or not, you may still think kindly of the humble workman on his job. It's never pleasant, of course, to have the workpeople in the house, whether it be your own residence or the House of Lords. Their persons and clothing are dirty, their manners rough, their language occasionally shocking to a refined ear. But wait till you see the new coat of paint outside, and the beautiful new paper on your rooms, before you pass judgment on them.

---

If you would like another metaphor, think of the Radical workman as the dustman who comes to remove your domestic refuse. The State, like the private householder, accumulates year by year a considerable amount of waste matter, which will become extremely unpleasant and probably breed all sorts of noxious diseases if it is left to putrefy on the premises. The Radical dustman who has come to clear it away may be an unpleasant individual to look at, he may call at the most inconvenient time; but you really ought not to use bad language to him. It is better for you that the job should be done when the dustbin is full; and if you only saw the grimy operator when he has cleaned himself up and sat down to tea in the bosom of his family, you would find that there really is something of the human being about him—nothing perhaps that you can manage to love, but still nothing that you need positively hate.

---

For my part, I have never yet discovered that it made much difference to me which particular set of eminent statesmen sit to the right of the Speaker at Westminster and which to the left. If the left-hand side had gained a hundred votes at the elections and exchanged seats with the right hand, it would not have spoiled my Christmas dinner. I only wish I could persuade every reader of Truth to look at his turkey and mince pie in the same spirit.

ELECTION ECHOES.

No. II.—From the Man-in-the-Street's Standpoint.

(With the usual apologies to W. M. Praed.)

Good-bye to elections! They're over—
A merciful, blessed release!
Awhile now from Caithness to Dover,
Comes a sweet interregnum of peace.
Good-bye to the stream of orations
That seemed as 'twould never run dry;
Good-bye to the recriminations
That rivals at rivals let fly;
To the logic with fallacies latent
Intended electors to blind—
To the—well, inexactitudes blatant
Of the terminological kind.

Good-bye to elections! Like stories,
When told, they are finished and done.
Good-bye to the claims of the Tories
That a moral success they have won.
Good-bye to the wrath, hot and hearty,
Wherewith Radical stalwarts assail
All who hint that the Liberal Party
Is wagged by its Redmondite tail.
Good-bye to the figures they've cooked, too—
Both sides—their conclusions to fit,
Declaring they've done all they looked to
And aren't disappointed a bit.

Good-bye to elections! Their capers
Are over, their joys and their pains.
Now there's something to read in the papers
Besides party losses and gains.
Good-bye to the scribes who inform us,
When their side wins a seat, that they've struck
A stroke of importance enormous.
(When they lose, 'tis a stroke of—hard luck.)
I've long wished the whole thing at Siam.
Hence with heartfelt relief now I cry
(So will you, if you're fed up as I am)
Good-bye to elections, good-bye!

Here is a letter which looks as if it was meant for a poser:—

I notice in last week's issue of your paper that you consider the Sydney Bulletin "guilty of an impertinence in expressing any opinion at all about domestic affairs at home." If this is so as regards the press of one of our own colonies, do you not consider it a far greater impertinence for a portion of the press and inhabitants of the United States to organise a campaign in favour of—and to subsidise—a certain party in the British House of Commons?

If I accepted my correspondent's statement of his propositions I should reply that I know of no standard for measuring degrees of impertinence in matters of this kind. They all seem to me pretty much on a level. But my correspondent has cut short his quotation from Truth in such a way as to obscure the whole point of the words. I said that it was an impertinence to express an opinion "in such circumstances." The circumstances, stated in the previous sentence, were that the opinion expressed was necessarily founded on something cabled to Australia by a correspondent in London. The impertinence lies in expressing an opinion in complete ignorance of what was really going on in this country. This has no relation whatever to the circumstances in America which my correspondent cites as if they were something precisely analogous.

At the same time, the question implies a very distorted conception—though the current conception on the Unionist side—of the relations between the Nationalist party and the precious "American dollars," of which we have heard so much. After all, the bulk of these dollars are and always have been subscribed by Irishmen. I do not see that an Englishman in the United States, even if he had become a naturalised American, would be open to any reproach for subscribing to a Unionist association in England, nor that the association would be doing anything wrong in accepting his subscription.

As for Americans subscribing—and Canadians, like Sir Wilfrid Laurier—when they see thousands of Irish men around them giving their money freely year after year to the cause of their countrymen at home, it seems to me very natural that they should sympathise and show their sympathy in cash, and I do not see why an Englishman should take offence at it, though it may be a fair sort of subject to make party capital of at election times. If this country were swarming with Poles who objected to live under German or Russian government, and if they got up a fund to assist their countrymen at home to obtain Home Rule from Germany or Russia, a goodly number of Englishmen would add their names to the subscription list. I don't think I should, because I have a strong opinion that the people of one country should not interfere in the domestic concerns of another. But I am quite sure that prominent among the English subscribers would be many of those who are now most indignant that the Nationalist Party should be assisted by "American dollars."

---

Mr. Cyril Jackson's book on "Unemployment and Trade Unions" is a useful contribution to the literature on the subject; but some of his facts require verification. He states, for instance, that one-fourth of the industrial workers of the country are organised in unions. One-sixth would be nearer the mark. A German writer who has made a special study of the matter puts the number of male workers at close on 12,000,000, while I doubt if the whole body of trade unions could muster more than 2,000,000 bonâ-fide paying members.

---

Mr. Cyril Jackson is a trade union supporter; so am I. He believes in collective bargaining; so do I. He wants organised labour to assert its strength, and I want the same. But there can be no organisation without discipline, and no strength without law. Internecine disagreement has eaten into trade-union life, and we find followers revolting against leaders, "brothers" against one another. If Mr. Jackson could be charged with the reorganisation of trade unions on the well-understood principles of representative government and co-operative federation there would be some hope for the future of labour, but until this is done individual strength is frittered away and capital continues to hold the field.

---

The lock-out at the Hawarden Bridge Steel Works is an instance of the organising ineptitude of trade union officials. Some 10,000 men have been put out of work not because they have any dispute with their employers (Messrs. J. Summer and Sons), but owing to the officious interference of the Steel Smelters' Union (led by Mr. Hodge, M.P.), which has been poaching on the preserves of the Iron and Steel Workers' Association, with whom Messrs. Summer and Sons have hitherto made all wage arrangements. It seems that Mr. Hodge persuaded the firm to accept a new wage scheme which was so ignorantly drawn up as actually to cause a reduction of 25 per cent. on the rates of wages previously in force in the works. When the Iron and Steel Workers' Association discovered this they called their men out, whereupon Mr. Hodge promised the owners to carry on the work with blackleg labour. But the Steel Smelters' Union failed to supply efficient men, and the works had to be closed until Messrs. Summer and Sons went back to their old love and re-opened to the Iron and Steel Workers' Association on the former wage terms. The Steel Smelters' Union, however, being the stronger society, refused to let the rival union men come back, keeping them out of the works by the usual process of "peaceful picketing," and for the second time the owners have had to close down till a settlement can be arranged.

---

Internecine quarrels of this kind between rival unions destroy their usefulness for collective bargaining purposes, and the men are beginning to find this out. The weak spot in labour organisation is the multiplicity of minor unions which overlap one another, and are the cause of rival action antagonistic to co-operative effort. The keynote to reform is first of all amalgamation, and then federation under men of administrative ability. Too often the leaders are chosen for aptitude for platform speaking instead of for business capacity. Talk is all very well in Parliament, but it is of no use in the office, where the quiet, steady spade work of the trained organiser is a sine quâ non of success.

ELECTION ECHOES.

No. III.—From the Puzzled Cynic's Standpoint.

The strife is o'er, the conflict done,
And both of you declare you've won.
I'm glad of that—upon my oath!—
'Tis so much pleasanter for both.

When one is down and t'other up,
It poisoneth the former's cup;
The under-dog, who's lost the fight,
Against the top-dog must feel spite.

But here no reason is descried
For rankling spite on either side.
Such feelings ipso facto stop
When both the dogs are on the top.

A wondrous thing! Yet you've averred
'Tis so, and I accept your word;
You each have knocked the other down
And both assume the victor's crown.

But one hard problem still remains—
For when a victor victory gains,
A vanquished foe there needs must be
O'er whom he gained his victory.

Now victors twain I here espy,
Yet not one vanquished meets my eye!
Come, solve my problem, Mail and Star,
And tell me where the vanquished are!

I wonder how long the present absurd state of things with regard to the performance of stage plays in music halls will continue. A few weeks since, when writing on the subject, I said that I wished that some prominent manager would produce a play lasting over the stipulated time, namely, thirty minutes, as a prosecution might do something to force the situation. Well, my advice has been taken, and Mr. Oswald Stoll has been fined for allowing Mr. Seymour Hicks to play a potted version of "Richard III.," which lasted over forty minutes. Why ten minutes "overtime" of Richard III. should hurt any theatre manager I cannot imagine. It is not a play which managers are frequently producing. The only people who I should have thought might have suffered would be audiences, for it is not a very exhilarating entertainment.

However, law is on the side of the Theatrical Managers' Association, which is conducting these prosecutions, and more trouble is in store unless a modus vivendi is speedily arrived at. It is not, perhaps, very widely known that the theatrical and music hall managers some time since entered into an agreement by which the latter undertook that sketches should not play more than thirty minutes, and also that no stage play should be produced which had been staged at a theatre during the last fifteen years. Mr. Hicks has offended against the first of these undertakings, but imminent trouble is likely to be forthcoming under the other undertaking if all that I hear is true. Certainly the second part of the agreement is violated daily and with impunity, so where is the logic of the situation?

Mme. Sarah Bernhardt, for instance, at the Coliseum, plays an act of "L'Aiglon" or "La Tosca" as she pleases. This is a flagrant violation of the agreement. Then why no prosecution? Mrs. Langtry is appearing at the halls in a potted version of Mr. Sydney Grundy's play "The Degenerates." This also is open to prosecution, but no action is taken. On the other hand, a prominent actress who is announced to appear in a condensed version of another play is threatened with proceedings. The whole position is ridiculous in the extreme, and though I cannot sympathise particularly with Mr. Hicks, because I believe he promised to shorten his Richard "sketch," and then did nothing, I do agree with him when he says that "the best thing for music hall managers to do is to tear up their stupid agreement."

---

No satisfactory arrangement will ever be arrived at by conferences. The result must always be like the recent conference on the House of Lords question. The two parties are diametrically opposed, and the theatres will give no inch more than they can help. What is really wanted is, as Mr. Henry Arthur Jones urged a short time since, one simple licence for both music hall and theatres enabling either to produce whatever form of entertainment they please, and then let the best house win. The shrewdest theatrical managers know that this must come, and they also know that it would do them no harm.

AND THE GREATEST OF THESE IS—ART.

[Mr. George Bernard Shaw is reported to have said that "the cause of Art is more sacred than the cause of Charity."]

Let starving hordes parade the streets
And ask in vain for bread;
Heed not the beggar who entreats—
He were far better dead;
All charitable thoughts ignore,
Nor heed the wailing of the poor.

Let crippled children in the slums
Drag out their wretched lives,
Knowing that Death, whene'er he comes,
Of them no joy deprives;
Let fever and consumption rage,
While greater themes your thoughts engage.

Humanity is nought beside
The sacred cause of Art;
Compassion, therefore, quickly hide,
And atrophy your heart—
For Charity's not worth a straw
Compared with Art, says G. B. Shaw.

Mr. Herbert A. L. Fisher, Fellow of New College, is to be the first Chichele Lecturer in Foreign History at Oxford, and his subject is to be "Napoleonic Influence in Europe." This lectureship has been endowed with £100 a year by All Souls' College. Six lectures are to be delivered, and the lecturer is not eligible for re-election, which is a highly laudable provision. As a rule the holder of a post of this kind is re-elected year after year as a matter of course if he himself desires it.

The appointment of Canon Scott Holland to the Regius Chair of Divinity at Oxford is a complete surprise, but the Prime Minister's choice has been received with general approval. Canon Holland is a sound scholar, his powers as an eloquent and thoughtful preacher are well known, and he will do good work at Oxford among the younger men. He was at Balliol in the days of Dean Scott. In 1870 he was elected student of Christ Church, and he was a popular and successful tutor in "the House" for several years. Mr. Gladstone appointed him to a stall in St. Paul's Cathedral in 1884, where he succeeded Dr. Stubbs, who had been promoted to the see of Chester. Mr. Gladstone held a very high opinion of Dr. Holland, and it was understood in 1893 that he had the refusal of the see of Norwich.

---

The Regius Chair of Divinity is worth about £1,500 a year, a canonry of Christ Church being annexed to this professorship. Dr. Holland's transfer to Oxford places a stall in St. Paul's Cathedral at the disposal of the Prime Minister. The stipend is £1,000 a year, with an excellent house in Amen Court.

---

The late Mr. F. W. Walker was an extraordinarily successful headmaster, and I should have thought there could be no doubt that he was a really great one. A good many people, however, do not hold the latter view, and one of the most eminent gentlemen in the educational world to-day once told me that he regarded Walker's influence on English education as "most mischievous." The truth is that Mr. Walker was very unlike the average British schoolmaster. His ideas and methods were in many respects unconventional, while his personality and manners were of the kind which sometimes provokes antagonism. The public school man—especially if he is a master, and most of all if he is a headmaster—is not disposed to believe that any good thing can come out of a day school. But, nevertheless, Mr. Walker's work stands out and speaks for itself. He was a sort of second founder of St. Paul's. He made the school one of the most successful educational institutions in the country. He turned out in the thirty years of his high-mastership generation after generation of boys who have made and are making their mark; and, what is most significant, the men who were under him are the men who speak best of him and the first to acknowledge what they owe to him. No schoolmaster can have a higher testimonial than this.

Archdeacon Emery, who was in his eighty-sixth year at the time of his death, had been extremely infirm for the last few years, and was little seen of late outside his own house. But down to the time when he began to fail his life was most active and energetic. He will be principally remembered as the founder of both Church Congresses and Diocesan Conferences, and also of the choral festivals which are now so popular. He had a distinguished career at Cambridge, where he was well known for many years as a very able and most successful college tutor. He held nearly every college office at Corpus Christi, of which society he was elected fellow in 1847. He was prominent as a most active supporter of the Volunteer movement in the early sixties. Shortly after the death of Bishop Turton, in 1864, the Archdeaconry of Ely became vacant, and the appointment passed for that turn to the Crown. Lord Palmerston nominated Mr. Emery. Six years later he was collated by Bishop Harold Browne to a residentiary stall in Ely Cathedral, which he held till his death, but he resigned the archdeaconry about three years ago. He was much concerned in administrative work, not only in the diocese of Ely, but elsewhere, and his remarkable capacity for large affairs caused him to be greatly mixed up with the haute politique of the Church generally.

---

The Rev. Hereford B. George, of New College, whose death occurred last Thursday, was for many years a conspicuous figure in Oxford. He was a Winchester scholar, and after gaining a fellowship, which he held till his death, he was called to the Bar, but eventually returned to Oxford as a tutor of his college, which post he held till 1891. He specialised in history and geography, and was once or twice an examiner in the Modern History School. He was in those days a man of great energy and activity, a Volunteer, an enthusiastic mountaineer (he was the first editor of the Alpine Journal), an active Liberal, the author of several historical treatises, and prominent in many branches of University work. Those were the times when New College was enlarged and deprived of its exclusive character as an appanage of Winchester, and Mr. George was closely associated with the late Mr. Alfred Robinson, the present Warden, and others in the transformation which placed New College in the front rank of Oxford foundations.

---

Mr. George's multifarious activity was in a sense his undoing. He was a director of the Bath and West of England Bank, which failed in 1880, under circumstances which led to the prosecution of the directors. The trial, which was removed to the Central Criminal Court on account of local feeling, ended in the acquittal of all the accused; but the consequences to Mr. George were very disastrous, and he never seemed quite the same man afterwards. The story is a sad one, with a very obvious moral attached to it.

Canon Ottley, who died on Thursday, belonged to a well-known clerical family. He was curate to the Rev. Stephen Gladstone, at Hawarden, and to the Rev. John Reilly (afterwards Dean of Manchester) at Hoxton between 1876 and 1880, when he was appointed Principal of the Sarum Theological College. Three years later he succeeded the late Canon Holland (of Canterbury) as minister of Quebec Chapel, which was described by Dean Alford as "the best preaching place in London." He did good work there for twenty-four years, and became widely known as an earnest, eloquent, and interesting preacher. The Lord Chancellor appointed him to a stall in Rochester Cathedral in 1907, but ill-health caused him to resign this preferment a few months ago.

Though on the wrong side in politics Lieut.-General Sir Reginald Pole-Carew, the newly elected member for the Bodmin Division, will be a welcome addition to the House of Commons, being a favourite with all sorts and conditions of men. The General did well in South Africa, but better when "on his own" than in co-operation with colleagues. In the early days of the Army Council he fell a victim to the sordid intrigues which discredited Mr. Arnold Forster's régime, and when the notorious batch of outfitting promotions to the rank of lieutenant-general was made in 1906, Pole-Carew, though holding a major-general's command at the time, retired in disgust at being superseded by "back scratching" juniors.

Mr. Haldane has just appointed a Committee, with Sir Evelyn Wood as chairman, to see whether "any steps can be taken to reduce the present and future charges for pensions of warrant officers, non-commissioned officers, and men." It strikes me that this is putting the cart before the horse. What is wanted is reduction above, not below, and inquiry should first of all be made into the conditions of pay and pensions of Army Councillors, Generals Commanding-in-Chief, and other high military officials who, thanks to the disreputable gerrymandering which went on before Mr. Haldane's strong hand was interposed, are paid out of all proportion to the services which they render to the State.

A very excellent article appeared recently in the Morning Post of India denouncing the attitude of Anglo-Indians generally towards British soldiers. The text for the sermon was the complaint of a non-commissioned officer in the Royal Artillery that he had been refused a bottle of lemonade when he ordered it in the bar of the Victoria Hotel, Bombay. It is bad enough anywhere that the King's uniform should be treated, in the words once used by Lord Wolseley, as "the mark of the beast;" but it is particularly shameful in India, where the lives and fortunes of the whole white community depend upon the "common soldier." The blame rests in a great measure, however, upon the military authorities. If they chose to exert themselves they could easily make things uncomfortable for people like the Bombay publican who refuses to sell lemonade to a man in uniform.

Captain W. E. Goodenough, who will commission the armoured cruiser Cochrane on January 3, has for the past two years been in command of the Duncan, second flagship of the Mediterranean Fleet. This officer was specially promoted to captain on the retirement of Lord Walter Kerr from the post of First Sea Lord. In recognition of his great organising capacity he was appointed the first captain of the Dartmouth Naval College, and had charge of that establishment from the entry of the first term of cadets, in September, 1905, until it was filled up at the end of six terms.

---

The good service pension left at disposal by the death of Engineer-Captain J. H. Adams, has been awarded to Engineer-Captain J. J. Stuart. This officer, who has been serving on the staff of Rear-Admiral Arthur Farquhar, has a record of more than thirty-four years of continuous service.

---

Another naval pension, of £50 a year, rendered vacant by death, has just been bestowed upon Commander E. H. Currey, who retired in 1902, since when his chief field of activity has been as political secretary to the Scottish branch of the Primrose League. Commander Currey has also achieved considerable success as a writer upon naval matters, his latest book, "Sea Wolves of the Mediterranean," only recently published, having been very favourably reviewed.

---

In the annual report upon the health of the Navy, Staff-Surgeon Laurie speculates on the cause of the outbreak of beri-beri in H.M.S. Sphinx. The word "speculates" is not disrespectful but strictly appropriate, because he is frankly unable to determine the causes. A few weeks since something was said in Truth upon the prevalence of beri-beri on the East Indies station, when the Philomel and Proserpine received reliefs from England after being stricken with this highly contagious disease, and without being quarantined and disinfected. Might not Dr. Laurie have found here a suggestion to aid him in his conjectures? The Sphinx is in the same squadron, cruises in the same waters, and is employed on the same malarial errand of suppressing gun-running as the cruisers above named. It strikes me, as a mere layman, that infection might very well supply the desired explanation.

---

For some time past discontent has been more or less visibly simmering on board the battleship Mars. It has now been dealt with by the summary process of getting rid of her present crew. This ship only recommissioned on April 19 last. The trouble began when Admiral Sir George Neville, on inspecting the ship about two months ago, expressed the opinion that she was dirty. Captain Ryan stopped all leave until after the next monthly inspection. The petty officers, smarting under a sense of grievance, took the unprecedented course of submitting their complaints to a well-known Plymouth solicitor, who gave them the best possible advice in telling them that the Admiralty were not likely to recognise nor tolerate civil intervention in connection with matters of naval discipline. At one stage the mutinous symptoms in this ship grew so ominous that the officers carried loaded revolvers. Obviously it was time to disband these sons of Mars.

Without discussing the merits of this particular case, I would point out that much misconception exists in the Service upon the subject of leave. The men of the Mars believed they had a genuine grievance through the stoppage of their harbour leave. But if there was any grievance it was in the breach of a custom, not of the King's Regulations. Leave in the Navy is a privilege and not a right. It is true that the custom of the Service has established the principle of leave as a regular condition of naval life. But this does not alter the fact that Captain Ryan was acting perfectly within his powers in stopping leave in the Mars, although I am not going to say that a course which produced such ugly results was judicious.

The good people of Holyhead have been distressed on their way home from chapel on Sunday mornings by newspapers being offered them for sale in the streets. So the Town Council has appealed to the superintendent of police to put the Lord's Day Observance Act in force against the offenders. If the police take action I trust they will not confine it to the street newsvendors. As it happens there is a considerable sale of religious periodicals at the chapels on Sundays, and what is sauce for the irreligious goose should equally be sauce for the religious gander.

A curious situation has arisen at the Royal Victoria Infirmary, Newcastle-on-Tyne. The medical staff claim that as they give their services to the Infirmary free they ought to retain the right to decide what patients should be admitted. On the other hand, the Infirmary is largely supported by the systematic contributions of workmen, who, therefore, consider themselves entitled to the first call on the medical treatment there. The difference of opinion has recently become acute through the resignation of the medical staff en bloc. There is something to be said for the workmen's view, but much more for the doctors'. If the workmen want a private hospital there is nothing to prevent them having one, but in such case they would of necessity have to pay their medical men for their services. The medical trade union would see to that, even if medical men who had achieved the feat of living on air could be found.

---

Maidenhead has just been furnished with a striking example of municipal bungling. The construction of a new ward of the isolation hospital had been nearly completed when it was suddenly realised that the site, having been used as a dumping ground for all sorts of refuse, was utterly unsuitable, and it was thereupon resolved that the building should be pulled down and re-erected elsewhere. A committee of the council have reported that the officers concerned are deserving of severe censure. No doubt, but what about the responsibility of the committee?

Owing to an outbreak of typhus fever the Ennistymon (Co. Clare) guardians have had to obtain the services of nurses from the Mater Misericordiæ Hospital, Dublin. One of the nurses having contracted the disease and died, an application was made to the guardians for the payment of the funeral expenses. A guardian named M'Mahon objected. The master of the workhouse pointed out that the nurse had sacrificed her life in their service. "Was it not her duty to sacrifice her life, seeing that she was paid for her services?" remarked the grateful M'Mahon. Fortunately, the other guardians refused to accept the reproach sought to be put upon them by this parsimonious churl.

It is to be hoped that Mr. John Burns will give immediate attention to the state of things disclosed by the disturbances at the Belmont Workhouse, Sutton, which culminated last week in the arrest of eighty-six men. This institution is under the control of the Fulham Guardians, but is apparently used as a relief workhouse for male paupers from a number of unions in London, and, according to a statement made to the magistrates, a large proportion of the men sent there are of the worst class. Altogether there are 600 inmates at Belmont, and ten labour masters in charge of them. From what has happened it is evident that such a staff is quite inadequate, and if it is true that the Local Government Board objects to any increase it is obviously incurring a very serious responsibility.

The dismissal by the Holsworthy magistrates of the case against the J.P. who thrashed a workhouse boy for trespassing in search of chestnuts makes the Holsworthy guardians look foolish. As already pointed out in Truth, to demand an apology to themselves for an assault on a boy under their charge under threat of proceedings was a ludicrous misconception of their duty. It now stands condemned as an unwarrantable piece of impertinence.

---

When Parliament is asked to pass a Bill embodying the recommendations of the Departmental Committee on Coroners' Law and Inquests, it is to be hoped that the method of appointing deputy-coroners will not be overlooked. At present the coroner appoints his deputy, and usually he is guided by personal considerations. In London the most recently appointed coroner was deputy to his predecessor, and in his turn he has now selected his predecessor's son as his own deputy. This gentleman is already deputy to another coroner, and in the event of his two chiefs being ill or away at the same time he would have under his charge a combined area extending from Paddington to the City, and from Hampstead to Southwark, and furnishing an average of thirty-six inquests per week. I suppose such a charge is not likely, but probably it would be a wise step if the appointment of both coroners and their deputies were transferred from the County Councils to the Lord Chancellor.

---

The story of Mr. John Stuart Knill's experiences with moneylenders, as related by himself in the Bankruptcy Court, is instructive. In the course of nine months this young man obtained three loans from three different usurers. No. 1 lent him £275 and he paid back £475. To do this he borrowed £1,000 from No. 2 (paying a tout £125 for the introduction), on a promissory note for £1,600. He then went to No. 3, to whom he gave a promissory note for £800 in return for an advance of £500, of which, however, two touts took £355 for the introduction! The bankrupt's folly disentitles him to sympathy, but, on the other hand, it is rather pleasing to reflect that at any rate two out of the three usurers are lamenting the loss of their money.

---

Some queer charges are brought from time to time in the police-courts in connection with game and fish preservation, but that brought last week against a collier at Cockermouth seems to be unique. The man was charged with disturbing salmon on their spawning-beds by walking up and down the river banks. It was stated in evidence that the fish were so numerous that some of them had been driven right into the side to spawn, and that they ceased if anybody stood on the bank and looked at them. This sounds rather like a scientific fairy tale, but the magistrates believed it, and fined the collier 15s. for prying into the domestic affairs of the Salmonidæ. I take it that the magistrates imagined that his interest was not purely scientific, for it seems difficult to construe walking on the river banks as an offence under the Salmon Fishery Act.

---

It is not everybody who properly appreciates the sanctity of the pheasant, even in these days. There is a tenant of a small holding in Essex, for instance, who did not see why, if pheasants ate his produce, he should not eat a pheasant. So he killed one. For his sacrilege the Ongar magistrates fined him £5 and costs. He is a wiser man now. He probably realises that he might have half-killed his wife for half the sum. But I doubt if he is properly grateful to those who have taught him his duty towards the sacred bird. Even game preservers expect gratitude and recognition of the part they play in keeping up the country sometimes—especially when there are elections in the air.

---

Two or three correspondents have called attention to a case heard at the recent County of London Sessions, where a bicycle thief who pleaded guilty to three charges of stealing machines from outside shops was brought up for sentence before Mr. Wallace. The problem set the learned chairman was not an easy one. On the one hand the thefts had been numerous and audacious. After securing the bicycles the prisoner had interchanged parts and sold the altered machines by means of advertisements. On the other hand, many witnesses spoke to the thief's exemplary character. He was a teetotaler, a non-smoker, and an active worker in church work and the Band of Hope. His object seems to have been to provide himself with funds for paying off a mortgage on his house. Mr. Wallace bound him over to come up for judgment if called upon.

---

Perhaps Mr. Wallace was right, but if so I do not see how he can in future send any first offender to prison. The man was a cool, calculating, systematic thief, prompted by no necessity, and averting suspicion beneath a cloak of religion. His action was not due to a temporary aberration; for, rightly or wrongly, the police credited him with the theft of between forty and fifty bicycles which had been stolen in Plumstead during the past twelve months, and he admitted having stolen six. In face of such evidence the testimony as to good character becomes merely an admission that those who gave it have been hoodwinked. Really to let him off altogether makes hypocrisy appear a commendable virtue.

---

Magistrates rarely lay themselves open to criticism on the score of receiving police evidence with undue scepticism; the complaint is usually in the opposite direction. But I must say that Mr. Curtis-Bennett seems to me to have handled the police witnesses somewhat unfairly in the recent prosecution of the Globe Restaurant, in Coventry Street. Whether he was right or wrong in dismissing the case is a matter on which I, of course, express no opinion. But the reasoning by which he arrived at his conclusion certainly does not strike me as conclusive. He ventured once or twice to pronounce what the opinion of "men of the world" would be on certain evidence, or what weight a jury would give to it. A metropolitan magistrate should be a man of the world, and to that extent is entitled to speak for them. But, as another representative of the class, I cannot say that I agree with what Mr. Curtis-Bennett said in my name, nor, had I been a juryman, should I have taken the view which he thinks a juryman would.

Royal Society for Prevention of Cruelty To Animals.—6,550 convictions last year. Complaints marked "Private" absolutely confidential.—Secretary, 105, Jermyn Street, London.

The case reminds me of a letter I received a few weeks ago from a lady who had strayed into the same restaurant, in company with another lady from the country, for supper after the theatre. They ordered a lobster and a bottle of wine priced at 12s. 6d. on the list. The following bill was presented to them on concluding their repast:—

GLOBE RESTAURANT.
COVENTRY STREET, W.

| No. ..... | 19..... | | |
|---|---|---|---|
| Lobster ..... | 0 | 14 | 0 |
| 1—106 ..... | 0 | 15 | 0 |
| B. B. ..... | 0 | 0 | 6 |
| | £1 | 9 | 6 |

---

The ladies refused to pay, particularly objecting that the lobster, price 14s., was unfit to eat. The waiter asked them to pay for the wine only, and endeavoured to get the bill back from them. They refused to part with it, and sent it to me. Applying to the story, in the manner of Mr. Curtis-Bennett, my experience and judgment as a man of the world, I concluded at the time that no good purpose would be served by advertising the prices charged at this particular restaurant to ladies who drop in late in the evening unattended by gentlemen. But as the proprietor has now successfully vindicated the character of his hostelry and of his lady patrons generally, it may be as well that ladies who are strange to the West End and happen to be in want of supper after the theatre should know the scale of charges at this particular establishment before they give their orders.

In view of the magistrate's decision, an official inquiry will, I suppose, be held into the conduct of the policemen who gave their evidence. Such an inquiry will naturally include the whole circumstances under which the prosecution was initiated. The constables who gave their evidence presumably did not visit the house on their own initiative; some superior officer must have set them in motion, and his motives ought to be threshed out. The most satisfactory course would be that the constables should be put on their trial for perjury, so that we might really get the opinion of a jury on the case instead of the magistrate's opinion of the probable opinion of a jury. It is perhaps too much to expect that the proprietors of the restaurant, after the annoyance and expense of defending one prosecution, should initiate another on their own account; but is there no trade organisation which will take up a case of this kind? It is a deplorable state of things that a licensed victualler who does his best to carry on his premises in a respectable manner, and almost surrounds it by a sort of "tariff wall" in order to reserve it exclusively for the patronage of the wealthiest classes, should be made a target for "policemanism" in its worst shape.

The Barnsley Bench have long been noted for the curious magisterial inclination to look upon a wife as a household chattel to be knocked about according to the whim and fancy of the master. They now seem to have extended their definition of household property to other female relations of the lord of the household. Last week a man brutally assaulted his sister, amongst other ways by kicking her. The charge was reduced from one of aggravated assault to one of common assault, and a fine of 10s. and costs decreed to be sufficient punishment. The next thing we shall hear of will be the fining of some unfortunate woman because she happens to have a brute for a brother.

In a case in the Liverpool County Court last week Judge Shand expressed the opinion that a moneylender ought to be content with 60 per cent. So I should think, but the moneylender whom his Honour had before him, Simeon Alexander Cohen, of 20, Fern Grove, Liverpool (formerly trading as "David Walker"), claimed interest at the rate of 140 per cent. per annum from a publican who had previously paid off one loan on similar terms. Cohen, his counsel urged, was "a moneylender whom anybody could fairly recommend!" Anybody who does so will, however, require some courage after the publication of the facts of this harsh and unconscionable transaction, in which the judge cut down the interest by more than one-half.

A good many people must have been receiving the begging appeals of Mrs. Mizrachi, of Jerusalem, judging by the number sent on to TRUTH Office. As each Christmas comes round the good lady and her family find themselves in a state of nakedness, and with not even dry bread to eat. Nevertheless, she manages to find cash to get a begging letter lithographed and to pay for stamps to send out the lithographed letters to people in England, together with Christmas cards decorated with dried flowers from the holy places. Another peculiarity about Mrs. Mizrachi is that she is bi-sexual, for when she first appealed for assistance she was of the male sex.

The approach of Christmas has produced the "usual Christmas appeal for 2s. 6d." from G. W. Linnecar, of 79, St. James's Road, Brixton, London, S.W., and the Mansion House Mission, which is located in Camberwell, and has no connection with the Mansion House. Linnecar's appeals always make a great point of the relief given by the mission to the needy. The claim is hardly borne out by the balance-sheet, where out of £923 received £140 is the total amount shown as expended on relief, and of the balance Pastor G. W. Linnecar takes £315. Thus out of every 2s. 6d. sent to him the needy get 5d., Linnecar 10d., and the balance goes in expenses of one sort and another. To send him half-a-crown, therefore, is a most uneconomical method of distributing alms.

Since being furnished with the experience of a lady secretary in Mr. Ashley Larkins' chancellery at 12, Army and Navy Mansions, described in TRUTH last week, I have received some further particulars of what those who deal with the Chancellor get for their money. In this instance the applicant was of the male sex. He was invited to demonstrate his capacity for the post of the Chancellor's literary assistant by reviewing "England's Government of Her Dependencies." He purchased a copy of that monumental work and sent in his review. He then received an intimation on a postcard from "A. L. Hants" to the effect that the quality of his review entitled him to become a permanent contributor to the firm at a salary of £120 a year, and that the chancellery would draw up an agreement if he would remit 3s. 6d. for it. He remitted the cash, and a few days later received the agreement.

---

It is an astonishing document. For three years the contributor agrees to deliver quarterly a MS. suitable for publication in book form written on one of twelve subjects submitted to him at the beginning of the quarter, the said MS. to be published unless express objection is taken to it by a majority of a committee of twelve to whom it is to be submitted. "A. L. Hants" on his part agrees to pay the contributor £30 a quarter, less the cost of producing in book form the contribution which he has supplied. Translated into plain terms this means that the Chancellor's literary assistant is to supply the Chancellor, in the person of his alter ego Hants, with four books a year, and for this he is to receive as much of £120 as is left after the printing, binding, publishing, and advertising are paid for. And for this magnificent offer the Chancellor extracts a fee of 3s. 6d.

---

But this is not all. Larkins has always hopes. The last clause of the agreement sets out that for its execution and the preparation of two fair copies "the sum of one guinea be paid by either party to the agreement, the same being remitted to the Secretary for A. L. Hants, 109, Victoria Street, London, S.W." As Larkins and Hants and the secretary are a one and indivisible trinity it follows that there is no necessity for Larkins' guinea to have any material existence, and that it is the contributor's guinea upon which the wary Chancellor has his eye. One can almost hear him chuckling as he devised this ingenious dodge for getting a whole guinea at once

Just as TRUTH was going to press last week I received the following alarming communication from Brown, Saville and Brother, stock and share dealers, 83, New Oxford Street, W.C.:—

> Take notice that we have been in no manner associated with the hoax advertisement in the Daily Telegraph asking people to apply at 431, Mansion House Chambers. This slanderous statement, which has been put into circulation, is quite untrue, and if repeated in your columns will result in our taking the most serious course.

I have not the least idea what this is all about, never having heard of the hoax advertisement or the slanderous statement about Brown, Saville and Brother—in fact, I was ignorant even of the existence of the firm until they terrified me with this letter. My City Editor tells me that he is also unacquainted with Brown, Saville and Brother Still, he is always glad to extend his knowledge of the outside broking fraternity, and so he has made a note of this new name.

With reference to the article in TRUTH last week "An Anglo-Spanish Exhibition," I have been in communication with the managing director of the firm alluded to as "Messrs. B." in the article. This gentleman informs me that my account of the negotiations is incorrect in material particulars. Time does not permit at the moment of going further into the question, but he has promised after the holidays to supply me with full details which will show that his firm took full precautions to safeguard their interests. I am pleased to hear it, and trust after the holidays are over to be in a position to deal more fully with the matter.

THE SHORT DAYS.

(By Jones minimus.)

Dad says the days just now are short,
Yet I've an inkling strong,
He's "getting at" a chap, in sport.
I find them beastly long.

Short days? Oh, rot! If he were me,
He'd sing another song,
And with my reckoning would agree,
That finds the days so long.

'Tis so. The calendar be d.'d!
The blessed thing's all wrong;
These days that Christmas Day precede
Are always far too long.

SCRUTATOR.

A BATCH OF MUZZLING ORDERS.

MESSRS. J. J. EDWARDS and CO., solicitors, of 28, Sackville Street, W., have addressed the following letter in triplicate to the proprietors, printers, and publisher of TRUTH, and in reply they have been informed that Messrs. Lewis and Lewis will accept service of the writs referred to:—

> By the instructions of Mr. Charles Harrison we have this day issued a writ against you [TRUTH Publishing Co., Limited], the St. Clements Press, Limited, and Mr. H. Labouchere, claiming damages for libel appearing in the issues of TRUTH under date the 30th ultimo and 14th instant, and an injunction.
> We are also instructed to warn you against any publication of the libellous matter whilst the action is sub judice.
> We shall be glad if you will kindly favour us with the name and address of your solicitors who will accept service on your behalf.

In addition to these three communications Messrs. Edwards have addressed a fourth letter to the Editor of TRUTH in which, after stating that they have issued the writ against the proprietors, the printers, and the publisher, they add:—

> We are instructed to give you notice of this fact, and at the same time to give you notice that any publication of the libellous statements whilst the matter is sub judice will be treated as contempt of court.

In the course of a somewhat lengthy experience of journalism and law this is the first occasion which I can recall in which the particular kind of threat contained in these last lines has been addressed by solicitors to a newspaper. I take the earliest opportunity of protesting against it. I trust I know what respect is due to the High Court of Justice and to his Majesty's Judges without any reminder on the subject from a firm of solicitors. Such a reminder appears to me therefore either a gratuitous impertinence or an attempt to intimidate me from pursuing comments upon matters of public interest in which Messrs. Edwards and Co.'s client is concerned. In continuing those comments I shall use my own discretion, and it will be quite time enough for Messrs. Edwards and Co. to invoke on their client's behalf the protection of the Court when they are advised that they have definite ground for doing so. One of the most serious objections to the law of libel as it now stands is that the issue of a writ operates as a bar to further criticism of matters in which the plaintiff is concerned, although plain speaking on this subject may be emphatically a matter of public interest; and it has frequently happened—I might say frequently within my own experience—that writs for libel are issued, as the result has shown, for no other purpose than to silence criticism which was in point of fact unanswerable. I am not suggesting that the present is one of those cases; but I do say most emphatically that by issuing their warning regarding contempt of court concurrently with their writ Messrs. Edwards and Co. convey a somewhat unfortunate impression regarding the object of their proceedings; and should they hereafter find it necessary on their client's behalf to carry out this threat, I cannot help thinking that they will find their attempt to do so very much prejudiced by the course which they have now taken. They will find an instructive judgment bearing upon this point reported in the papers of February 10 last, when the Court declined to entertain an application to commit for contempt on the ground, as I understand the judgment, that the plaintiffs had used beforehand threats as to the proceedings which they would take in the event of comments upon them being repeated. It appears to me that this new fashion of threatening people in advance with the terrors attached to contempt of court is something very closely approaching to contempt of court itself; and the whole question is of so very much consequence to the press generally, and to TRUTH in particular, that, so far from being dismayed by Messrs. Edwards and Co.'s threats, I should rather welcome the opportunity of meeting them and their client in the High Court under the circumstances which they themselves have now created.

Should I ever have that pleasure, another point which I should seek to bring to the notice of the Court is that, although this threat applies to "any publication of the libellous statements while the matter is sub judice," I am at present absolutely in the dark as to what are the libellous statements complained of. Messrs. Edwards and Co.'s client has been referred to in the course of two articles in the "Mammon" section of TRUTH dealing with an issue of debentures of the French Palace Development Syndicate, Limited. Mr. Harrison is one of the directors of this syndicate. As at present advised, I certainly cannot admit that the fact of Mr. Harrison issuing a writ for libel on his own account, without attempting to explain what statements he complains of, renders me liable to the penalties of contempt of court should I continue my observations upon this syndicate and its debentures, and I shall be very greatly surprised if this view is not upheld by his Majesty's Judges. Indeed, I find it impossible to believe that the Court would ever hold that a contempt had been committed by the repetition of a libel before the plaintiff has attempted to define what the libel is that he complains of. This would be to give to the mere issue of a writ an effect hitherto unknown to the law, and at once unjust to the defendants and prejudicial to the public interest. Messrs. Edwards and Co. seem to me altogether too much in a hurry. They not only hold contempt of court in terrorem over me before they have the slightest reason to suppose that any contempt is going to be committed, but they do this to prevent the repetition of a libel before they have formulated their case or given any intimation what the libel is they complain of. This, again, can hardly be to the advantage of their client, I venture to think, should they ever carry their threat into execution. When Messrs. Edwards and Co. have, by issuing a statement of claim, given me some information as to the grounds of their client's complaint, and the issue which will be presented to the Court should the action come to trial, I shall, following my invariable practice, be careful to say nothing in TRUTH which is in any way calculated to prejudice that trial. But that event is still a long way off. In the meantime, the issue of the French Palace Development Syndicate's debentures is a matter of immediate public interest, and I have received a number of communications on the subject, including one from Mr. Crispe, K.C., the chairman of the company, with whom I have also had the pleasure of a personal interview. These are all matters on which I claim the right to speak freely, and in speaking I shall certainly not be deterred by threats of the character described above.

I will now explain the facts leading up to the above letters and the one which Mr. Crispe, K.C., has asked me to publish. The first of the articles in TRUTH referred to by Messrs. Edwards and Co. alluded to a prospectus of the French Palace Development Syndicate, Limited, offering £80,000 mortgage debentures. The article mentioned inter alia that the list of directors contained the name of "Charles Harrison, Hollyside, Victoria Road, Kensington, gentleman." Among the contracts specified in the prospectus was one to which the said Charles Harrison was a party, and, in consequence of information I had previously received, I sent a representative to inspect these documents at the offices of Messrs. Edwards and Co., who are the solicitors to the company. Mr. Harrison was described in the contract as a stockbroker, of 49, London Wall. That is the address of a bucket-shop carried on in the name of Duncan Forbes and Co., which has been the subject of many criticisms and exposures in TRUTH, and the question—a very pertinent one, as it seems to me—was asked in the article whether Mr. Charles Harrison was associated with that business. Mr. Harrison has now instructed his solicitors to issue writs and write threatening letters, but so far as I am aware he has not denied his connection with Duncan Forbes and Co., though one would imagine that he would hasten to do so if he regards the suggestion as damaging to his reputation, and if it can be denied.

The second article referred to by Messrs. Edwards and Co., published last week, dealt at more length with the prospectus of the French Palace Development Syndicate. It gave the names of Mr. Harrison's colleagues on the board of this company, of which Mr. T. E. Crispe, K.C., is chairman, and in regard to one director—Mr. John Thomas Lever, of Witham—it was incidentally mentioned that in August last Duncan Forbes and Co. gave "J. T. Lever, of Witham," as a reference in connection with their 1 per cent. cover "deals." Concerning the Syndicate's invitation to the public to subscribe for £80,000 mortgage debentures, the article showed that these debentures would apparently possess in the first place only the shadowy and remote security of a building lease which the London County Council will grant only upon the exercise of an option requiring, inter alia, a payment of £50,000. A cardinal point for consideration when a company seeks to borrow money on debentures is the amount of its subscribed share capital. In this case the nominal capital is £100,000, but on sending to Somerset House I found that though the syndicate was incorporated in April last no return of any allotment of shares had been filed. In quest of information, my representative also visited the office of the company to inspect the register of shareholders. He was asked why he wanted to see it, and he replied "Because you are obliged to produce it." The law, of course, requires every company to keep a register of shareholders, and to produce it for the inspection of any person paying a fee of one shilling. It was evident that the individual who spoke for this company was either unacquainted with the law or else disapproved of it, and eventually my representative was told that there was no register there, that all the company's documents were with the solicitors, Messrs. Edwards and Co., and that he had better go to them and say that Mr. Harrison had sent him. At the solicitors' office reference was made to my representative's previous call, and it was suggested that on that occasion he had passed himself off as a debenture-holder or an applicant for debentures when the contracts were shown to him, with the result that there was something like "a breach of confidence." In answer to this, my representative denied that he passed himself off as a debenture-holder, and pointed out that it was unnecessary that he should do so, anyone being entitled to inspect the contracts within the period fixed by the prospectus—a statement of the position which Messrs. Edwards then frankly accepted as correct. As to the register of shareholders, Messrs. Edwards said that they had nothing to do with it, and that it ought, of course, to be at the company's office. However, its non-production is not a matter of much importance, for I am informed that the company has not made any issue of shares for cash. Its share capital is, in fact, purely nominal.

The prospectus of this remarkable debenture issue was distributed through the post with a circular from the directors strongly recommending the investment, and stating that Sir Thomas Barclay, of 13, Old Square, Lincoln's Inn, and Mr. R. D. Yelverton, of 3, Pump Court, Temple, had consented to act as trustees for the debenture-holders. Mr. Yelverton, as I mentioned last week, informed me that the use of his name and Sir Thomas Barclay's was entirely unauthorised, and a letter published in the Financial Times and the Financial News on Saturday last requests people who subscribed to the issue on the strength of the circular to communicate at once with these gentlemen. We now come to the letter which I received on Monday from Mr. T. E. Crispe, K.C., the chairman of the company:—

THE FRENCH PALACE DEBENTURES.

DEAR SIR,—In regard to your article in TRUTH of the 14th instant, in which my name appears, I prefer the use of my own quill to that of my solicitors. First let me clear the ground by stating that I am neither personally interested in the promotion of the scheme to the extent of a gratuitous share, a single penny, nor any other gratification. My only desire was to be associated with a scheme which, fulfilled, would provide London with a lasting ornament and cement the friendship existing between two sister nations.

To this desire I am sure you would offer no objection; in fact, the scheme, however Utopian, has had the approval generally of the French and English press. Permit me, further, to state the circumstances under which I became a director of the "French Palace Development Syndicate." I was invited to join the board of directors, and knowing the solicitors of the company to be a firm of high standing, I consented.

I was introduced to the Vicomte de Lapré as an influential Parisian, manager of Le Gil Blas, and to Monsieur Parent as a French financier who would provide foreign capital both for the syndicate and the ultimate company, and primarily to Mr. Harrison as a Dutch gentleman and capitalist who took great interest in, and would provide the funds for the scheme. I was absolutely ignorant that Mr. Harrison was connected with the firm you stigmatise, and I can only say that the statement made to me as to his finding all necessary moneys has been borne out by a personal outlay of a sum of over £12,000, which I am assured he has made. I can trace a large part of this, including £2,500 quite recently paid by him to the London County Council for an extension of time.

I need not deal with the question as to whether the proposed issue of debentures was expedient or not. On that point you are quite entitled to comment. As to the question of a register of shareholders not being kept at the office there seems some misapprehension.

I regret very much to see the names of Sir Thomas Barclay and Mr. Yelverton introduced into the controversy. Both these gentlemen consented in writing to act as trustees, and by resolution were duly appointed, and it would seem strange if such consent did not carry with it the right to announce their names without which their consent would have been objectless. Mr. Yelverton attended a board meeting when the issue was discussed, and he was instructed to prepare the necessary draft trust deed, and prepared it accordingly. I have yet to learn—and you suggest I ought to know—that the execution of a trust deed is requisite prior to the ascertainment as to whether it will be necessary, which it would not be in the event of no allotment.

In regard to your reference to the application moneys, they have been placed to the credit of a trust deposit account, and are being, and will be, preserved intact.—Yours faithfully,

THOMAS E. CRISPE.

Not the least interesting passage in Mr. Crispe's letter is the disclosure that Mr. Charles Harrison, who has thus been employing his capital in an enterprise to cement the Anglo-French entente cordiale, and who instructs the company's solicitors to write the letters referred to at the outset of this article, is a Dutchman. Mr. Harrison's connection with Duncan Forbes and Co. was, it will be noted, unknown to Mr. Crispe when the latter became chairman of the French Palace Development Syndicate. With regard to the introduction of the names of Sir Thomas Barclay and Mr. Yelverton, misunderstandings certainly seem to have occurred. Mr. Crispe says that they gave a consent to act as trustees which, he suggests, carried the right to announce their names; but, as I understand, Sir Thomas and Mr. Yelverton contend that this consent was dependent upon a condition in regard to the constitution of the directorate which was not fulfilled, and, as already explained, they have protested that the use of their names in the circular was entirely unauthorised.

Such are the circumstances under which proceedings have been commenced against TRUTH—not on behalf of the French Palace Development Syndicate, not on behalf of the chairman or of the board of directors, but at the instance of one member of the board, Mr. Charles Harrison. In what way this gentleman considers himself aggrieved by my remarks I have no means of knowing. But if he objects to the incidental disclosure of his connection with Duncan Forbes and Co., I take the liberty of saying that he would have done better in his own interest to deny that connection if he can, instead of contenting himself with instructing his solicitors to issue writs and write threatening letters which, by themselves, prove nothing—unless it is his desire to deter TRUTH from further observations on his financial doings.

THE "BASIC PRINCIPLE" OF IMPERIAL DEFENCE.

I have received a temperate but wrongly inspired letter from Colonel V. M. Stockley, of the Indian Army, in favour of a compulsory service citizen army for home defence. I do not publish the colonel's letter, because it does no more than reproduce all the stale stock arguments which are dished up day after day by the spokesmen of the National Service League, to whose appeals the British public continues, and will always continue, to turn a deaf ear. Colonel Stockley's arguments, like those of other advocates of compulsory militia service, are based on the supreme fallacy that the Navy is our first line of defence, and the Army our second. What Sir Ian Hamilton, backed up by Mr. Haldane, says in his book, and what I have always said in Truth, is that the Navy supplies all our lines of strategical defence—first, second, and third—while the Army is not meant for defence at all, but for the purpose of offensive attack oversea. This is the "basic principle" of our defensive system, and it is because Colonel Stockley and those who think with him have not as yet accepted it as such that they go on beating the air in the delusive hope of converting a business-minded public to adopt the same fallacious views which are leading them off the path of sound strategy and Imperial policy. The strategical teaching upon which the National Service League bases its demand for compulsory military service is in direct opposition to the strategical teaching of history. During the Napoleonic wars the greatest soldier of modern times at the head of an army of 200,000 men, who afterwards conquered Europe, refused to cross the silver streak of twenty-one miles' breadth till he had obtained, not a temporary, but absolute command of the sea; and it was because this first postulate of success was denied to him that the great master of war abandoned his projected invasion.

"Why," asks Colonel Stockley, with his eyes persistently blinded to the truth of "basic" principles, "do we cripple both the Army and Navy for offensive and Imperial duties because we will not maintain a sufficient Home Defence Force to allow of their absence?" The answer, of course, is that no Home Defence Force, however strong, would be sufficient to allow of the absence of the Fleet, which must be powerful enough not only to defend the shores of Great Britain from invasion, but also to keep the seaways throughout the Empire open for supplies of food to come into England, and for reinforcements of men to go out. What it is important to note—Mr. Haldane gives a clear assurance on this point in his preface to Sir Ian Hamilton's book—is that the Admiralty have satisfied the Committee of Imperial Defence that the present strength of the Navy is sufficient for the purpose indicated above, and it only remains to take care that the maritime strength of the Empire—our "all in all"—is not weakened by putting even the smallest trust in the false measures of defence proposed by the National Service League. This is the crux of the whole question of Imperial defence. Given command of the sea, invasion is out of the question. Lose that command, and a million, or ten millions, of militiamen in England will not save the nation from starvation or the Empire from disruption.

THE ELECTION LUNATIC.

By a Constitutional Mugwump.

In the occasional political upheavals which occur in this country there burst into the light, fortunately for but a brief period, a number of the most oddly constituted of men. They are allowed free licence on the platform. They monopolise the press. They render clubs uninhabitable, and give dinner-parties all the thrill of an Anarchist meeting at which any of your neighbours may heedlessly hurl a bomb. They are the enthusiasts, the partisans. Most of them, if they got their deserts, would spend election time in strait-jackets, and one expects to see them, even in liberty, with their hair full of the long straws which invariably decorate the lunatic in humorous or political art. They gibber for weeks on end, it may be about "dollars" or "your food will cost you more"; they may be Liberal or Conservative, for they are heard in all political camps. The effect they produce is very similar to that of the practical joker who, having poured cold water down your back once, wants to do it three times a day for ever after. They end by annoying you. They infect large masses of an otherwise sane population, and the press feeds their fever by tactics which reveal to what depths of idiocy the British people can fall on the occasions when they are called upon to display their intelligence for once. That "the flowing tide is with us" is announced with a complete unconcern for facts by all the party organs. To read the Daily Telegraph one might imagine that there were only a few Liberals left in Great Britain, and that those few were but ignorant savages, lurking in uncivilised and chilly recesses of the frozen North; while from the Radical papers one might glean the idea that England's peers, barricaded in their palaces in Berkeley Square behind barrels of whisky and beer, were too insanely stupid to see even the march of the triumphant, intelligent, hard-working, abstemious, beautiful and well-washed cohorts of the people, against a system of corruption and decay unequalled since the fall of the Roman Empire.

The astute gentlemen who issue the war-cries of the rival parties are probably the most cynical pessimists in the land. Their duty is to generate steam throughout the country. They know that the best way to do that is to let loose a flood of what Americans, with their genius for the phrase, call "hot air." This they do most certainly by appealing, crudely and boldly, to the lunatics on their own side. Elections are not an exercise for the intellect. They are an emotional maelstrom into which even the sanest among us get drawn to some extent. We throng Trafalgar Square, or we crowd round the tapes at the club, feverish to know whether Snooks, of whom we have never hitherto heard, has increased or decreased his majority, and then proceed to make deductions which, on the return of sanity, we recognise as the height of ignorant presumption. We state defiantly, "We shall win Wrigglesworth," though the very election agents themselves would give a lot to be able to form an opinion half so confident as ours. We become great wind-blown bores to our wives, clubs, friends, and business circle. We explain to our wives—though, Heaven knows, they don't care—what "exactly" are conditional guarantees. It would never do not to know "exactly." In the course of argument we are all in His Majesty's confidence. But little short of the exact words which passed between the Premier and the King at their interview has been revealed to us. Our discussions resemble the speculations of youth on the subject of eternity. They always end where they began. Indeed, argument counts for but little with the true enthusiast. A poster, a cartoon, or an egg, those are indeed posers.

The heckler is an enthusiast in blinkers. He puts questions of the irritating "catch" description which lead nowhere, and the heckled, by his intense desire to gain a victory over his enemy, betrays the value attached to a cheaply scored laugh; and laughter is nothing but the result of tickling the emotions. Heckler and heckled remind one of nothing more closely than of that ridiculous institution of British humour—the "back-talk" music-hall turn. For Heaven's sake, let us have one-day elections!

LES NEIGES D'ANTAN.

Yes, where are the snows of yester-year? That famous unanswered question is the only real Christmas ghost left to us. We are haunted by the snowy, crisp, sparkling Christmas of a bygone time. Nature is surely affected by our moods. She has a strong sense of drama. When stage coaches ran she was careful to put snow-drifts in their road for the benefit of Messrs. Raphael Tuck and the Christmas supplements. Where are the slides down which Mr. Pickwick slid, his coat-tails flying? Where is the ice through which he fell when he skated? Why, even roller-skating is on the decline, and as for blade-skating, Nature declined it. Another Thaw case! So says the wanly jolly ghost who looks over my shoulder and reminds me that good food and bad jokes were the staple support of Christmas in the olden days. (I do not know why Christmas should have a special version of the word "old" all to itself, but the responsibility is the ghost's.)

The rain is pouring discontentedly on the big north window, and a grey and sulky sky looks impertinently in. All over the country schoolboys are going home, not with cracking of whips and tootling of horns and rosy drivers and genial guards; by no means. In damp little overcoats they are getting into dank railway-carriages with steamy windows. Christmas shopping is going on; people are splosh-sploshing about with sodden parcels, trying not to lose their tempers when their umbrellas intertwine with the fervour and suppleness of anacondas. And there comes a ghost, dressed like an absurd old gentleman in a red coat and holly and a sack on his back, and asks for shelter, because all his friends have left town! "Alas, poor ghost!"

Christmas went out when cheap railway fares came in. Facilities for travel destroyed the Dickens and Washington Irving tradition. They have made it so easy for relations to meet during the year that by Christmas-time we are only too ready to go to the south of France or the north of Africa. We say we have gone to find sunshine. We mean that we have gone to lose our relations. In the old days—olden, I mean—families gathered together at Christmas-time. Postage was heavy and roads were heavier, and there was, consequently, a year's news to hear and discuss. In a large family there were probably several new babies to see and compare, and very likely several unknown husbands or wives to be inspected. The men had a year's politics and the women a year's puddings to talk over. Consequently, Christmas flourished. Now we know by telegraph an hour after his arrival from the Never-Never Land that Charles is a fine boy, and a week later we have seen a snapshot of him taken by his father which effectually prevents us from wanting to see him at Christmas or any other time—except, perhaps, Lent. The women know by penny post exactly what nuisances each other's servants are; the men know exactly what scoundrels the other party are by halfpenny press. We have stayed with our relations in the summer, and they have come up to spend a week with us in the autumn. December, in consequence, finds us furtively sneaking off to Charing Cross, trying to look as though we had packed by accident and hailed the taxi by mistake.

Nature adapts herself immediately to this change in us. If she sends us a cold Christmas, it is a Christmas of bitter, black winds, that snarl through iron-grey streets below a sky of smoky steel. If she sends us snow, it is composed of rain and hail, which melt at once into liquid black loam. Why, says Nature, should you have the snows of yesterday, when you have not learned your parts? You do not feel Christmassy, so why should I look it? Perhaps I will in June, but we'll see. Anyhow, I'm too busy now providing mud for electors to throw.

Hotels and restaurants used to be absolutely empty on Christmas day. Now they are full. We go to them in shoals, because it's something to do with uncle—it'll amuse the old boy. Our revelling is done for us in public, and we don't mind, so long as it includes a good dinner. Anyhow, mummers are just as good digestives as the orchestra. We eat stolidly, with an eye on uncle, to see if he likes it. And in our hearts? At the pudding-stage there rises up an immaculate, monocled young man, and says: "Confound it, aw—waiter, there's nothing in this beastly pudding but—aw—food! Not even a button!" Not that he cares, he is punctual to explain to his party, only, confound it, if you've paid for Christmas revels you do expect something in your pudding!

And this is odd, because in our public revels there are no children. Can it be possible that, but for the family party, we should like Christmas? Perhaps a faint glow still remains in the embers of the logs that burned at other Yule-tides. Perhaps one day we shall again impose on Nature the necessity to be snowy and crisp and covered with French frost at a penny a packet. But in the meanwhile we grumble if we burn our fingers at snapdragon, we complain to the company if the lights burn blue, and we depend for a ghost on that transparent spirit who chants in weak and sighful antiphony, "Merry Christmas!" "Où sont les neiges d'antan?"

NOTES FROM PARIS.

A CAUCUS OF BARRISTERS.

WHAT is the exact standing of "M. le Doyen Plum-Kett" at the Dublin Bar? Is he the Father of that Bar? He headed the delegation sent from the Four Courts to attend last week the centennial of the Order of Advocates. The name must be Plunkett, though it is not thus given in any of the French papers so far as I have seen. This legal luminary was spoken of as being in his ninety-fifth year, but might have passed for being ten years younger. If the face is an index to the mind, he had survived every capability for passionate interests and reached the phase of pure reason and detachment from most things that we value in our prime, though he showed annoyance at being late in the Salle des Conférences for the oratorical joust held there. He found the company seated round the "grand table" a very antique piece of furniture, for the palace of the King became the Palais de Justice in the last year of the reign of Philippe le Bel—that is to say, in 1313. Philippe owed a deal to the jurists of his time, or légistes as they were called. They proved him to be, within the limits of his kingdom, the heir to the Roman Emperors, and superior to the Pope in all but purely religious affairs, and only answerable to God in temporal affairs. They approved of his coup de force against the Templars, and undermined feudalism for the benefit of royalty by losing no opportunity to revive the Civil Law in practice. The least he could do for them was to lodge them in his palace, and authorise them to invoke in a body the Saint Esprit at the opening of Michaelmas term in la Sainte Chapelle. The judges of the Grande Chambre, or Parliament, were to lead off in their red, furred robes. Le Parlement was primarily composed of feudatories of the Crown. But as they were muddle-headed and had plenty to do in fighting their neighbours and in crusading, advocates, acting as their deputies, took their place, and kept it. That body was broken up in the Revolution, and the bits were pieced into a Court of Cassation and a Court of Appeal. Members of both continue to wear scarlet robes. They are announced thus as they enter a chamber where they hear cases and give judgments: "Messieurs la Cour!" Judges of tribunals, who wear black robes, are merely announced in two words: "Le Tribunal."

The "Conferences" at the grand table are delivered annually, the Bâtonnier leading off. The present one, M. Busson-Billault, was re-elected this year because of the delicate and amiable courtesy of his manners and his charming style as a speaker. His diction is remarkable for its clear and musical elegance. It is enough to watch the play of his lips to understand what he says. M. Busson-Billault is grandson of the most meritorious of Napoleon III.'s Ministers, "the Breton Billault" as he used to be called, though he was known to be a nephew of the First Napoleon. His descendant has regular features of the Napoleonic type, but with a captivating graciousness of expression and a smile that plays as much in the eyes as round a mouth perfect in form. The subject of his discourse, "The Origin of the Order of Advocates," had the merit of actuality. Those delegates who understood French seemed charmed, and well they might be. One of them, representing the Bar of Montreal, afterwards declared he did not lose a single word. This Canadian jurist wore a three-cornered Louis XV. hat—a survival of the time of Montcalm.

Then came two discourses from the retiring secretaries for the year. They had the merit of not being too long. All present had, with the judges of courts and tribunals and the members of the parquet, or prosecuting board, been invited by the Bâtonnier to an entertainment which foreigners unfamiliar with French could, he hoped, understand—a fête-ballet-comédie. Next day came a banquet, at which the highly esteemed and popular President of the Republic would be heard both as chief magistrate and as a barrister. If he no longer pleaded before law courts, he had not in his present situation allowed his oratorical talents to grow rusty or to lose their fine point. There is no more savoury, pleasing, or finished speaker than M. Fallières. But it so fell out that he was not in best form at the Palais Banquet.

This feast, prepared for fifteen hundred persons, took place in that great hall known as the Salle des Pas-Perdus, which advocates on the look-out for clients pace up and down. The guests first assembled in the Library. The foreign ones did what they could to lend themselves to a spectacular effect. Commander Lapaccioli, Bâtonnier of the Roman Bar, had on a gold embroidered—the gold sparingly applied—velvet toque, or cap, and a Venetian mantle of black silk, with shoulder knots ending in tassels of gold cord; M. Bisaillon, of Montreal, the three-cornered eighteenth century hat; the gentlemen from Lincoln's Inn and the Temple, their court dress, and the Bâtonnier of the most youthful of any, that of Constantinople, came in the long skimp coat or cassock and red fez, such as the ex-Sultan wears or used to wear in giving audiences.

The public had access to the wide corridor leading from the Library to the Banqueting Hall. As age is honourable, the Father, as I take him to be, of the Dublin Bar headed all the advocates from abroad. We thought, as we looked on those British advocates in their professional wigs and gowns, with moustachioed upper lips and bearded cheeks and chins, they were too dreadful. No doubt a matutinal shave is a great trial on a raw London morning. But il faut souffrir pour être beau, just as il faut souffrir pour être belle. Besides, a barrister who has a good mouth for oratory loses a great advantage in muffling it up with a moustache and beard. Were there ever forum orators equal to the Romans? Did they ever mount the rostrum with a hirsute appendage muffling round the mouth? Never. They always did so with a clean-shaved face, though they were victorious generals as well as public speakers. Their mouths held the eyes equally with the ears of those who came to hear them. They could say much by means of a facial muscular play that gave endless meaning to their words, and that left no trace in the public annals. Besides, the barrister's wig came in as the eighteenth century neared middle age. The hairdressers, great artists in their business, adapted it to suit clean-shaved faces. The latter best went with light, gay, touch-and-go conversation.

A very Parisian incident took place as the guests bidden to the banquet marched, in solemn state, to the Salle des Pas-Perdus. The members of the Council of the Order looked graver than festivity warranted; the young advocates vastly amused. It turned out that the spectators on each side of the corridor, in pushing forward to see the personages of mark, drove Mlle. Gaby Deslys against—"Lord," as some called him, "Sir" as others named him, and "M. le Doyen Plum-kett" as others qualified him. She had been hearing the suit pleaded that she brought before the Civil Tribunal against her chauffeur. Her furs were a sight, and her muff might have become a trapper's bride in the wastes of the Hudson Bay territory. She was undeniably tout à fait en beauté, and as much amused as any young briefless barrister present. The Father of the Dublin Bar preserved a marmorean severity of countenance during his propinquity with the lovely being whose smiles so recently helped to bring down a constitutional throne.

The muff, of the size and flatness required for motor driving, had, to cover the fond, or stuffed part, the entire skins of three arctic foxes. But one did not see the tails, which would have been brought back to the other side. The stole, reaching to the ground, had a fringe of foxes' tails of this species for a finish. The actresses of the minor theatre—and some actresses on the major one—who wish to assert victorious power in their toilettes have a mania for rich furs. The supply grows scarcer and the demand rapidly rises. The skin of the Andes rat now costs, first hand, 90 francs. It is this little animal that gives us the beautiful Chili fur, now so prized for motor wraps, stoles, muffs, and garnitures. A further rise is expected, the Bolivian Government having forbidden the export of pelts of the Andes rats. Furriers here have fallen back on the skin of the opossum, which costs but eight francs. They dress them so cleverly that no one but an expert could suspect they cost but eight francs apiece.

The late Duc de Chartres died in the country, where the services of an embalmer could not be at once secured. His remains were kept in his room until Saturday, the 17th. The only persons allowed into it were sisters of charity, employed to watch and pray, whose relays relieved each other one at a time. This mortuary chamber had been arranged as a chapelle ardente, with black hangings and tapers, but to the exclusion of flowers. Just before the removal of the body to a special funeral train bound for Dreux, a requiem Mass was celebrated over the way in the parish church of Saint Firmin. No invitations had been sent out. The great delay of the obsequies was due to the absence of the Duc de Guise. Floods kept him and the Duchess at Larische, which is thirty-six hours on camel's back from Tangier. They had bought near Larische a territory, where they hope to have a great horse farm. The messenger who brought them the telegram from St. Firmin had to swim dangerously swollen watercourses and valleys that had become lakes. He had no better luck on his return journey with the Duc de Guise's answer—to be wired from Tangier. It was brief and not very clear, and gave no instructions nor desires on the subject of the funeral. The remains will be kept in the Dreux crypt until the return of the new Duc de Chartres. An empty coffin will probably be placed on the catafalque for the ceremonial obsequies.

The weather is the all-important subject. We look anxiously at the black clouds that return after the rain. The idlers and the unemployed go to watch at the bridges the water marks of the Seine, which again rises. 1910 goes out as it came in and continued through its course —in floods and general disasters. Still, we remain susceptible of following fashions that spring up like mushrooms and of being amused with trifles. A gilded West End public has crowded out the real students from the lecture-room of Professor Bergson, who fills the chair of Political Economy at the College of France. The professor has been pronouncing against trade unions and syndicates, and what M. Briand until he had well ensconced himself in office used to speak of as "le droit de grève," though the grève, or strike, were universal. M. Bergson takes the conservative view. One of his fervent admirers is the Princess Murata, who has a fortune of some seven or eight million pounds. She is the adopted daughter of the late Mme. Furtado Heine. Rows are threatened by the studious youths of the Latin Quarter, who protest against their exclusion by snobs and idlers. The words "snob" and "snobbism" are now French, and the American duchesses are sometimes spoken of as snobinettes by the very families which they have married into.

The trifle of most interest has been whether or not Dranem ought to wear a beard in playing the part of Sganarelle at the Odéon. He has solved the question negatively, preferring what he expects to be a roaring success to tradition. There is something in his broad platter face that tickles to irrepressible laughter the instant he comes on the stage. It is the face of a full moon agog for fun and doing its best to keep serious. Antoine fished Dranem up in a music hall, to which he hopes to return at the close of his season in "Le Médecin malgré lui." A vista has been opened to him of an Eldorado in North and South America.

THE NEW PEPYS.

(Extracts from his Diary for 1910.)

December 13: This morning, while shaving, I catcht a sight of the sun, which is, I think, for the first time since November 29, and did so startle me by the novelty of it, that I did let the razor slip and gasht my left cheek about an inch below the ear, a vile deep gash which gave blood consumedly.

With my wife to Norfolk House for the sale in aid of the Sisters of Charity, who are a Catholick body and I a Protestant, yet was always well disposed towards the older Church, which do number among its members many of the best families in England, and soe impart thereto a distinctive air such as cannot but be pleasing to one of social nicety.

My wife ravisht with the lace which Her Grace of Norfolk is wearing and compute it to be worth £1 1s. an inch; so nice an eye have women for aught that is to do with cloathes and I do verily believe that all their souls are enwrapt therein; that is to say, an they do possess souls; in respect of which—after fifteen years of wedded life—I am fain to confess myself more than something of a Turk.

I am wearing this day, for the first time, my new striped trousers and willow spats; which harmonize passing well, and the hang of the trousers is a sartorial dream and please me mightily.

Gave my wife 5s. to spend and myself laid out £1 10s. So home, and drank tea with my wife's she cousin, Rhoda, for company; who is a saucy wench and well-favoured, and we must see more of her.

December 14: Up betimes and took Pinch for his morning run in St. James's Park, where I met General Wigg, who is likewise giving exercise to his Aberdeen terrier, Whiskers. Anon our two tykes fall to fighting; and the General essayed to sever them. A great business he had and many narrow shaves of a bitten hand; for Lord! these terriers, when possessed by the lust of conflict, are mighty indiscriminate, and do never pause to consider what they are snapping at. The General's hat fell off, through the violence of his efforts, and I pickt it up and held it for him till all was over, yet never a word of thanks he gave me for that friendly office, which methought strangely uncivil.

To the Albert Hall to see Truth's yearly Show of Dolls and Toys, and a mighty fine exhibition, so that I do never remember to have seen its like before. All the dolls drest by lady readers of that journal, whose politicks I cannot but deprecate, yet in other respects there is a breezy frankness about it that liketh me well, and in this work especially on behalf of the poor children in workhouses and hospitals do merit the warm support of all parties and creeds indifferently. For consider what happiness a man may bring into these little lives at the cost to himself of a few superfluous shillings! And if I could, would send a large check to the fund. But in these ill times, with the Radicals returned to power, I cannot afford it; so did drop £1 in a collecting box with my benison. Will prevail on my wife also to send another £1, and, the better to enable her, will forgo the present of cigars which she do always make me at Christmas.

To the club, where I met Admiral Topper, and took occasion to mention my resolve. Who is fired by so good an example and vow he too will prevail on his lady to do the same; moreover, he have other friends whom he think he can influence to a like act of self-abnegation.

The Admiral mightily concerned by the way these elections have gone, and prophesy the speedy ruin of the country, being most of all bitter against LLoyd George and Churchill, whom he will not characterise, for he can find no words bad enough. Which do remind me of what once befell when I was at Magdalene College, in Cambridge. In which city was a rude fellow, a carter by calling, who was famous among all men for his large fluency. And we, being ware of this, did never miss an occasion of provoking him so that we might enjoy the exercise of his wondrous gift. But one day, as I walkt with a friend in the outskirts of the city, we saw the fellow carting a load of fine sand. So we did steal close behind and circumspectly lowered the tailboard of the cart. Whereat—for the road lay up a gentle incline—the sand did begin to dribble out at the back, and so continued till the cart was three parts empty, leaving a thin silvery trail behind as far as the eye could see. But the carter, plodding stolidly along at his horse's head, knew nothing thereof. At length, near the brow of the incline, he chanced to turn his head; and we stopt, hugging ourselves in an ecstasy of anticipation on the lookt for treat. But, alack! we had over-reached ourselves by the very excess of the provocation; for he, having paused to grasp the full extent of the disaster, did but shake his head in sorrowful impotence, saying, "Langwidge ain't no use here. 'Tis beyond it."

December 15: With my wife to the Church of the Holy Trinity in Sloane Street for the marriage of Captain Byng Stephens with Mistress Olive Dawnay, she making a mighty fair and seemly bride. My wife engrossed with her dress, I with her features, since what should a man care for vain fripperies and furbelows; which are things beneath his notice, being rational? The bride was given away by her brother Nigel, and his appearance pleased me, in particular his manner of ordering his neckkerchief, which methought as neat as I did ever behold.

Anon to the reception at No. 38, in Belgrave Square, which have been lent for this purpose by my old friend Cosmo Bonsor, sometime member for Wimbledon, and a free spender of his money he always was, and mighty popular with his constituents. Chatting awhile with my Lady Valentia, who wear amazing well, and lookt not a day older than when I did last encounter her several years ago; which was at my Lord his pleasant seat of Bletchington Park, by Oxford, where I was then passing a few days to aid him with his canvass for the representation of that ancient city. Which do recall to me the case of a low, illiterate fellow in St. Ebbe's, whom I then solicited for his vote and interest on behalf of my Lord; he promising with alacrity. But presently, as I am returning, I see him in converse with a canvasser of the other side, and hear him promise his vote and interest to the Whig candidate with no less alacrity than he had promised them to my Lord. I mightily incensed and rated him for his duplicity. But the shameless lout, in no wise disconcerted, merely grin at me, and quoth he: "You Tories promises and does nowt for I; and them Whigs promises and does nowt for I; so I just takes a leaf out of your book. I promises you both and votes for neither on you."

December 16: Into Edgware Road, where are the cheaper shops, to buy a Christmas gift for my wife. And I chuse a Japanese screen, which methinks is what she will best like. For our drawing-room at the flat is curst drafty and such a wind at whiles in the corner where I sit as do well-nigh cut my ears off.

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

LORD ROSEBERY, dear Lady Betty, is a leader without a party, and the Tory-Unionists are a party without a leader. To the latter:—

"Now Balfour's operatic pas,
Now Charlie's hornpipe seems entrapping:
Now Lansdowne's graceful entrechats,
Now Joseph's skilful 'cellar-flapping.'"

. . . . .

Meanwhile, groaning "Alas! my country!" the Tory rich are hurrying to Socialist France—to console themselves during the holidays with the many attractions provided there under a system which "would render England intolerable."

. . . . .

Mr. Joseph Chamberlain may now repeat the sentiments attributed to the sailor in "The Yarn of the 'Nancy Bell'":—

"Oh, I am cook and captain bold,
And the mate of the Nancy brig,
And a bo'sun tight, and a midshipmite,
And the crew of the captain's gig."

All the Unionist newspapers represent Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, and no policy which has not his approval is accepted by the party. The difficulties with which Mr. Arthur Balfour has to contend in the circumstances are enormous, and all who admire his ability, eloquence, patience, and ingenuity must hope that no attempt to remove him from the leadership will succeed.

. . . . .

It was indiscreet to address the following letter to the present writer:—

"Sir,—Having been assured by a leading member of the Opposition that the Unionists would be returned to power with a majority of not less than forty, and that a protective tariff would be imposed upon foreign wheat at no remote date, I withdrew much of my capital from English industries and reinvested it in agricultural undertakings in Canada. Several capitalists were misled as I was, and this prospect of making a handsome profit through the taxing of foreign wheat accounts for the removal of a substantial sum from the country. We all now wish we had been wiser.

"It is not obvious, moreover, that capital has deserted France in consequence of the Socialist principles which have been adopted in that country. It astonishes me, therefore, that I should have believed that the least liberal development would drive capital out of England. At the elections I voted for the Unionists; I now sign myself, A Radical."

. . . . .

It is said of a West-End man that his motor-car having broken down in a suburb of London he asked the way home in French, imagining he must be abroad. The ignorance of the hereditary rich in this country of the mental capacity of the artisan and labourer, and of the reasonable requirements of the working class, is not even equalled by that of the man stranded in the suburb. Education, the Press, competition, and cheap transit have created a new working man. Tory canvassers, of course, attribute it to unintelligence that their arguments do not convert the obscure elector, but as a labourer explained to a proselytising Unionist, "You teach before you have learnt; we are all experts here—in hardships."—Believe me to be, very truly yours,

ROUND THE MARKETS.

Recovery in Stocks—Consols Nearly 80 Again—Money Easy—Business Checked by Holiday Considerations—The Yankee Slump Checked.

FOR two days last week the Stock Exchange enjoyed an incipient boom. Politics were relegated to a back seat, and the House revelled in the enjoyment of cheap money and the prospects of a fillip being given to investment securities by the distribution of the heavy new year dividends. The supply of credit in Lombard Street has been greatly augmented by the funds accumulated for the repayment on January 2 of £10,000,000 Mexican Government 5 per cent. bonds, of which a large proportion are held here The Bank Rate has not been further lowered, but the present 4½ per cent. level is unlikely to last many weeks longer. Consols at one time got within ⅛ of 80 again. I said the incipient boom lasted two days. After that it was left pretty well to take care of itself, members being suddenly reminded by the appearance of Mr. "Salvation" Smith, on his annual collecting tour of markets, that the holidays are just at hand and that, according to precedent, the calls of charity and festivity must for a few days oust considerations of ordinary business. The closing of speculative positions made markets dull, but there has been no evidence of weakness. In the Home Railway section moderate support has again been forthcoming, while the final settlement of the boilermakers' dispute by an overwhelming vote assisted the northern lines. The Scottish stocks were also affected by the order for a new Dreadnought given to Clyde shipbuilders.

Yankees after a fresh spell of weakness induced by threats of a strike on the western railroads, made a mild recovery, though there was not enough support to send prices up very far. The demand of the engineers in the West for a 15 per cent. advance in wages has been met by the offer of an increase of 9 per cent., and on the strength of the offered compromise the railroads are claiming their right to have the dispute arbitrated upon. Considerable attention was paid to the report of the Southern Pacific Company. The figures look excellent enough, but how are they going to help the campaign for higher freight rates? The market appears just now to want things both ways. First it declares the railroads are so poor that without an increase in freight rates they will be unable to borrow money to provide for necessary extensions of their systems, and now Wall Street is pointing to the wonderful prosperity of the railroads, as exemplified the other day by the report of the Union Pacific, and last week by the report of the Southern Pacific Company, which showed earnings of 13 per cent., as compared with about 10 per cent. in the previous year and 6 per cent. distributed in both. Results such as these are hardly good arguments for the railroads to put forward when they go as suppliants before the Inter-State Commerce Commission for power to raise their carrying charges to the trading community—and obviously anything that tends towards a decision being given against the railroads is not a "bull" point.

RAILWAYS.

Grand Trunk Revival—Talk of 2 per cent. on the "Thirds"—Is it Justified?—Canadian Pacifics—Where the Company's Securities are Located—The Rosario and Western Fiasco.

After many weeks of inanition Grand Trunks came back to life last week. The primary cause of the buying was an article in a financial contemporary predicting that in respect of the year just ending the company would distribute 2 per cent. upon the Third Preference stock and earn 3 per cent. The writer based his estimate upon the fact that whereas the Grand Trunk in the second half of 1909 made provision out of revenue for writing down suspense account to the extent of £259,500, there remained at June 30 only £75,600 to provide in order to extinguish the suspense account altogether. There is thus on paper a net gain on suspense account of £183,900, which, or the bulk of which, it is assumed will be available for dividends. The estimate strikes me as a very liberal one. If anything like the full difference between the amount set aside for suspense account in the second half of 1909 and the sum required this half is to be secured for distribution it surely ought to have begun to show itself by now, because the company does not wait until the end of the half-year before making such appropriation, but charges off a portion each month. True, the amount charged off in the month of December, 1909, was heavier than in the other five months—a net gain of £11,500 on the main line for the period July 1 to November 30 being converted into a net decrease of £80,600 for the full half-year. But already four monthly statements have been published in the current period, and the result is a net decrease on the main line of £4,700, or of £26,000 including the Canada Atlantic and Detroit Grand Haven subsidiaries.

After making allowance for the fact that the Second Preference dividend has been paid for the first half of 1910 out of the revenues of that period, whereas in 1909 the revenue of the December half had to bear the full annual charge, all that was shown as available for Trunk Thirds up to October 31 was a sum equal to ½ per cent. Therefore if 2 per cent. is to be forthcoming on account of the present year, net revenue for the last two months must increase by over £100,000. With expenses on the Trunk system still ruling high owing partly to the recent advance in wages, and with gross traffics only moderately good, this seems too much to expect. Evidently the chairman of the company does not regard the rise in the company's expense ratio as a purely temporary matter or he would hardly have suggested at the last meeting that the company might before long have to petition the Dominion Government for power to raise freight rates. Again, with regard to the matter of suspense account, which has caused the wide divergence of opinion as to Trunk dividend prospects, I may recall the warning of the chairman made last April. Mr. Smithers laid stress on the fact that owing to the rapid growth in the company's system it would have to continue making liberal provision out of revenue for new locomotives and rolling stock. Whether it made this provision by the opening of another suspense account or included it in ordinary working expenses the money would have to be found, and the shareholders therefore must not run away with the idea that when the old suspense account was extinguished the amount apparently saved would be available for increasing dividends.

Some interesting figures were given in a recent number of the Monetary Times of Toronto as to the distribution of holdings in Canadian Pacific Railway stock. Sir Thomas Shaughnessy estimates the total number of shareholders at about 24,000, the number of Canadian holders being 2,500. Nearly all the 4 per cent. perpetual debenture stock and the 4 per cent. preference stock is held in Great Britain. The common stock holders in Great Britain have approximately 65 per cent., 15 per cent. being held on the Continent, while the remaining 20 per cent. is divided evenly between Canada and the United States.

As regards the Rosario and Western Railway, the directors have announced their intention of returning all moneys subscribed towards the new debenture issue. As I suggested last week, upon learning that the Argentine National Government had refused to recognise the validity of the concession granted by the Provincial Government of Santa Fe, the directors had no other course open to them. The board severely criticises the attitude taken up by the national authorities, though knowing how friendly the latter have hitherto been towards the foreign railway capitalist I should not care to endorse the company's strictures without knowing all the facts of the case. Quite apart from the relations between the company and the Government, however, I am not sorry that the issue has proved abortive, because the terms of the promotion contracts and the terms that were offered to the public made the debentures look a distinctly unsatisfactory investment.

RUBBER.

Holiday Markets—P.P.K. and Tea—Big Interim Distributions—Some Cheap Shares—The Trust Companies.

Quietly firm is perhaps the best description which can be applied to the Rubber share market, and little activity is looked for until after the Christmas festivities are over. Even in holiday markets, however, the launching of a meritorious issue is by no means difficult, and the success that attended the Bukit Sembawang flotation, to which I called attention last week, bears tangible testimony to the attraction which Rubber still has for the investing public. With a position dominated by political complications at home and trade uncertainty in America it would be too much to expect a repetition of the riotous activity with which the current year opened, but the number of prospectuses of forthcoming issues which are now being circulated in the market for underwriting purposes leads one to expect that January will be a month of considerable activity. Upon the whole impending flotations are of a sound and promising description. Underwriting is taken readily enough, and no feature is more notable than the steady confidence with which insiders regard the future outlook.

For the moment Mincing Lane is having a minor boom in tea, which has enabled dealers to mark up prices. The movement, however, has done more to arouse the curiosity of the investor than to stimulate any real enthusiasm, and public support has been forthcoming rather for tea-cum-rubbers than for the "teetotallers" as the companies devoted wholly to rubber are called. The principal honours have been with P.P.K., which at just under 3 seems likely to go better, and in the small-priced section Duckwari and Beverley have been actively dealt in at somewhat higher prices.

Very little impression has been made on quotations by the 50 per cent. interim dividends announced recently by Cicely and Linggi, and the further 75 per cent. now being distributed by Selangor and Vallambrosa have had no better effect than to keep prices steady. Such dividends are regarded as matters of course, and the absence of speculative movements on the announcement of bumper distributions says much for the ability of the market to forecast results. The market in medium descriptions has been dull. Malacca, for no apparent reason, has shed a portion of last week's rise. Batu Tiga, slightly lower at 4⅜, is worth attention; Tremelbye, one of the best of the smaller producers, is cheap at its present price; and Kapar Para, a good share with a somewhat higher acreage valuation, should be worth buying on any further fall. Readers who wish to take advantage of dull markets to pick up low-priced shares will find in Strathmore, Glen Bervie, Alor Pongsu, Jeram, Lumut, Lankat Rubber, and Gula-Kalumpong purchases which should yield profit-taking opportunities before 1911 is far advanced.

The Rubber Trust 7½ per cent. interim dividend received a somewhat chilly reception by the market, and it remains to be seen whether the distribution has been made wholly out of current earnings or partly out of last year's substantial carry-forward. So far the big trusts have rendered very little service to the market, and it is doubtful whether their promotions are handled with more skill than those which belonged to the days when respectable promoting houses carried their own burdens and looked no further for support than to the public to whom they appealed, or, in the event of necessity, to their own friends. One hears at times uncomfortable rumours of the less important trusts being overladen with shares which the public has refused to touch, and it is argued with some reason that if an issue fails to please the public the chances are that it is not a desirable holding for a trust. In the hands of experienced and well-qualified directors the larger trusts are, it would seem, better taken care of; but no one who has closely followed recent events in the rubber market can fail to have observed a regrettable tendency for one big trust to play into the hands of another. Unnecessary underwriting fees and over-riding commissions are paid by this trust to that trust in connection with issues of new capital and subsidiary flotations which shareholders themselves would gladly have taken up. Favours are interchanged for no better reason than that trust company dividends may be swollen, and thus the battledoor and shuttlecock arrangement goes on, watering capital, if not, indeed, plundering shareholders of their rights. The Scottish groups have been remarkably free from this practice, and the absence of underwriting commissions in connection with the recent Strathmore new issue should not be lost sight of by investors who pay due regard to sound and economical methods of management.

The MOST COMPLETE List of Rubber and Oil Share Quotations will be found in every Saturday's issue of "The Financial Times," 1d. daily. On sale everywhere.

Bandar Sumatra—Sekong—Lumut.

Extension work on Bandar Sumatra has increased the acreage under Para rubber to 1,019 acres, and according to the report now to hand a further 380 acres are being opened. Although the promise contained in the prospectus that the company would earn a dividend from the start has not been fulfilled, considerable progress has been made on the estate, which is now quite clean and in good condition. The labour force has increased satisfactorily, and it is estimated that a crop of 16,800 lbs. of rubber will be secured for the current year. Bandar was acquired at a reasonable price, and the estate is so moderately capitalised that little difference will be made in its position by the decision of the directors to cut out the younger Rambong trees and to replace them with Para. Experts who write prospectus valuations are fond of telling us that Rambong does well in Java and Sumatra. If Rambong does well it may be taken for granted that Para will do better, and there appears to be little sense in paying even the "moderate" price of £10 or £20 per acre for Rambong if it is to be cut out as soon as the estate comes under English management. Older Rambong trees, it may be noted, are seldom removed, not because they give satisfactory results, but chiefly for the reason that their removal is an extremely difficult matter.

Labour difficulties and abnormally wet weather account for the failure of the Sekong directors to carry out the extension programme foreshadowed in the previous year's report. The actual area felled was 376 acres, but of this only 60 acres were planted, and, according to the report for the year ended July 31 last, the total planted area of 352 acres has cost the company about £133 per acre. The crop returns are still small in comparison with the age of the trees, but outputs are steadily increasing, and the manager hopes during the current year to harvest 55,420 lbs. Sekong rubber always fetches very satisfactory prices at the sales, and the average net price of 7s. 9⅝d. realised is highly creditable to the management. Of the total profit made on the year's working less than one-half is absorbed by the 6 per cent. dividend, and the directors propose to place £2,500 to reserve and to carry forward the sum of £2,571. Confident as the directors are that the whole of the area which has been felled will be cleared and planted during the current year, the future of Sekong must depend largely on its ability to attract labour, and although in view of next year's dividend prospects the shares are a good lock-up at ⅜ premium, no great results can be expected until the labour supply has been put on a better footing.

Much encouragement for Lumut shareholders is contained in the report of the directors for the year ended September 30 last. Possessing 3,300 odd acres of planted land (2,266 acres of which are over three years old), standing in the company's books at about £37 per acre, the company should within a year or two be turning out a substantial crop. Already some 15,000 trees are being lightly tapped, and the prospectus estimate of 7,500 lbs. for the current year is likely to be considerably exceeded. Here, again, the scarcity of labour is giving some trouble, but the force has recently been augmented, and additional coolies are reported to be steadily coming in. Lumut has frequently been mentioned in this column. At ¾ premium it carries a lower market valuation than many Malayan properties which are no further advanced in point of development, and the shares belong to the class which, if my views are correct, should mark a substantial rise during the coming year.

MINES.

Quiet but Hopeful—More Light on the Tanganyika Position—Van Ryn and Rand Labour—The Mexico El Oro Affair—Kalgurlis and the Bullfinch Group.

In the mining markets the professionals have had things pretty much to themselves during the past week, and as they have not shown any great desire to increase commitments prices as a rule have not materially changed either for the better or the worse. Paris has been a buyer of some of its favourites in the Kaffir market, and there has been a little "investment" demand from the home public induced by the dividend declarations, which considering the labour difficulties that have been experienced the results so far announced make on the whole a fairly satisfactory showing. From now onwards the labour supply is expected by the authorities to improve, and some further recovery in Kaffir prices in the near future seems not improbable. Rhodesians have been irregular, as also have Australian descriptions, but brighter business conditions generally are anticipated after the Christmas holidays, and it probably only needs a good mining development or two to start the ball rolling.

The Tanganyika issues remained a depressed market the greater part of the week, but revived a little after the meeting on what was apparently "bear" repurchasing. Mr. Robert Williams, as usual, gave an interesting review of the company's position and prospects at the annual gathering of the proprietors, and he made matters look more cheerful than did the cold print of the report. The financial arrangements that have been made are expected to be quite sufficient until the Tanganyika arrives at the much to be desired stage of obtaining big returns from copper. Mr. Williams thus summed up the position as regards the company's capital and debenture debt:—

> Your issued capital is £808,581; your reserve shares amount to £191,419; you have authorised an issue of First Debentures, including interest, amounting to £2,530,000; of these there have been converted into shares £341,000, leaving a balance of £2,189,000; you have Mr. Leyland's old debt, about £120,000, and owe the Zambesi Company £261,000. Your total debt amounts to £2,570,000. Now, if the shares set aside for conversion are used for that purpose, it will clear off £1,448,000; in this event the issued capital at the end of next year will be £1,000,000, with a Debenture debt of £1,122,000. If your Debentures are not converted at the end of next year you will have a total issued capital of £860,500, and a total Debenture debt of £2,409,000. You will then have 139,500 reserve shares, which can either be used to redeem your Debentures or for other purposes.

It is stated that the guarantees to the Rhodesia-Katanga Railway amounting to £39,700 per annum are not likely to be wanted after April next, as the line is expected to pay its own interest, and it is thought the Benguella Railway next year will be earning something towards its own debenture interest, so that the Tanganyika's guarantee of £40,000 per annum in that connection is not likely, according to Mr. Williams, to be called upon for any length of time. As regards copper production, it is anticipated that smelting will be in full swing in April at the Star of the Congo mine, and a second plant will be started as soon as possible after the first furnace is in full working order. When these two plants are at work the output of copper, it is foreshadowed, will be 2,500 tons a month or 30,000 tons per annum, and this production will be further increased as the railway is extended to Kambove. A monthly profit of from £20,000 to £30,000 for the Union Minière Company, in which the Tanganyika owns 45 per cent., is looked for from the start of the first furnace. Not much was said at the meeting regarding the diamond discoveries beyond that "a big area of ground containing 4,300 claims similar to the Kimberley diamond pipes" has been proved, but this is another string to the Tanganyika's bow which may prove valuable, and at any rate meanwhile lends additional speculative interest to the shares. Altogether the picture is not so depressing as market men made it out to be from the report, but the proprietors still need a stock of patience, especially those who paid a substantially higher premium than that now ruling.

In my article last week on the Van Ryn I was uncertain whether the dividends are likely to be increased when the whole of the work in connection with the reconstruction of the plant is completed, and I suggested that some information on this point might be given at the meeting. The chairman did not go so far as to definitely predict an increase in the dividend rate, but he made the following interesting statement:—

> The greater portion of the capital expenditure incurred during the past year or two has been paid for out of profits, and the company is in the position of having practically completed the renovation of its plant and the additions thereto, which will enable it to materially increase its output capacity without encroaching upon dividends. The benefit of this will be felt in due course, and, with such a record in the past and preparedness for contingencies in the future, there is no reason which one can foresee why the company should not continue to pay the same satisfactory, or even increased, dividends for many years to come.

At the same meeting Mr. Leopold Albu made a reassuring statement regarding the Rand labour outlook. He said that an old-established concern like the Van Ryn, with enormous developments well ahead of milling requirements and a large number of available stoping faces, was not likely to be affected to any appreciable extent by a temporary shortage of labour, and dealing with the question in its broader aspect he observed that he was distinctly sanguine as to the prospects of a permanent amelioration in the whole native labour position.

The outcome of the Mexico Mines of El Oro affair, regarding which I had something to say last week, was that Mr. Bayliss, the chairman, two of his colleagues on the board, Messrs. Shaw and Breitmeyer, and the secretary, Mr. Pillans, all tendered their resignations at the meeting held on Friday. The report of the proceedings, which runs to half a dozen columns of the principal financial dailies, makes interesting reading. As Sir Julius Wernher remarked in the course of a letter to Mr. Bayliss, which was read at the meeting, "it is, I believe, a novel experience to ask for the resignation of a director because he expresses honestly his opinions."

Like Ivanhoes, Kalgurlis have come down in price in consequence of the prospect of some reduction in the dividend rate. For some time the Kalgurli has been making quarterly distributions of 6s. 3d. per share, but in neither of the last two financial years were the net earnings of the period as large as the amount distributed. Assuming, however, that the quarterly rate is reduced to 5s. per share, the yield on the shares at the present price of 6⅞ (which includes the dividend payable in a month's time) will still be nearly 16 per cent. per annum. At the annual meeting last week the chairman did not discuss the dividend outlook, but he said that after providing for the dividend payable in January the company would have cash in hand and investments amounting to £76,700, an increase of £9,180 compared with the position twelve months ago.

The latest Bullfinch strike is one of miners, not of rich ore. Apparently the extraordinary value of the material they have been opening up tempted the men on the mine to demand increased wages; at any rate, they did ask for more, and struck work because the management did not comply with the request. It has been suggested that the strikers may find their places filled with men from other parts of Australia, but whether that suggestion is really anything more than a case of the wish being father to the thought remains to be seen. Meanwhile it is interesting to note that the speculative enthusiasm over Bullfinch and other members of that aviary seems to have considerably slackened in the colony, and share values at present are well below the boom records recently touched. Bullfinches, which rose to nearly 3½, are now 2⅝, and Bull Ants, following the lead of East Bullfinches, have dropped to a discount.

Rand Results Reviewed—Wolhuter's Progress—Increase in Dividend Rate Foreshadowed.

The £4 shares of the Wolhuter Gold Mines, which were recommended to my readers more than a year ago when they stood at a discount, are now quoted £4¼ ex the dividend of 8s. per share which has just been paid in respect of the financial year ended October 31 last, and they still appear a promising holding. The company has been making steady progress, and according to recent cable advices from Johannesburg the chairman at the annual meeting foreshadowed an advance in the rate of dividend. In addition, he stated that the directors were considering the question of splitting the shares into the more usual—and more popular—denomination of £1. The annual report is not likely to be in the hands of shareholders on this side for about another month, but from the quarterly statements that have been published I have compiled a table of the returns for the past financial year, and appended also are the figures for the preceding period for purposes of comparison:—

| 1909-10. | Ore milled. Tons. | Revenue. | | Expenses. | | Profit. | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| | | Am'nt. | Per ton. | Am'nt. | Per ton. | Am'nt. | Per ton. |
| | | £ | s. d. | £ | s. d. | £ | s. d. |
| January quarter .. | 69,000 | 87,083 | 25 3 | 61,051 | 17 8 | 26,032 | 7 7 |
| April ,, .. | 74,400 | 92,931 | 25 0 | 66,469 | 17 11 | 26,462 | 7 1 |
| July ,, .. | 78,960 | 99,826 | 25 3 | 67,903 | 17 2 | 31,923 | 8 1 |
| October ,, .. | 82,000 | 108,238 | 26 4 | 70,105 | 17 1 | 38,134 | 9 5 |
| Totals and averages | 304,360 | 388,078 | 25 5 | 265,528 | 17 5 | 122,550 | 8 0 |
| 1908-9..... | 280,120 | 350,749 | 25 0 | 246,488 | 17 7 | 104,261 | 7 5 |

The dividend of 10 per cent. (8s. per share) for 1909-10 absorbed a sum of £86,000. Assuming that there is no further increase in earnings, but that results can be maintained at the rate of those for the October quarter, the annual working profit will be over £140,000, or say £130,000, allowing for profits tax, but not for capital expenditure. A 12½ per cent. dividend requires £107,500, and a 15 per cent. distribution £129,000. So that even if no further expansion in output is likely—as to which question we must await the full report of the chairman's speech—the company may be able to raise its dividend rate by 2½ per cent. to 12½ per cent. for the current financial year, while in the event of a further increase in earnings being officially anticipated it would seem that the dividend rate may eventually be advanced to 15 per cent.

INDUSTRIALS.

Cements and the New Chairman—Allsopps and a Proposed Amalgamation — More Argentine Land Results — Agricultural Bank of Egypt.

Interest in the industrial market in the past week has again centred around one or two leading speculative favourites. Cements have been active, though the official confirmation of the rumour that Lord St. Davids had been appointed to the chairmanship of the company was followed by profit-taking. Lord St. Davids is well known in the City, his work on the board of the Buenos Ayres and Pacific Railway and a number of trust companies entitling him to be regarded with great respect. He will certainly be an acquisition to the Cement Company, but no harm will be done if the Stock Exchange gives his lordship a little time to grapple with the new problems that await him; lately the ordinary shares of the Cement Company have been pushed up too fast, and the inevitable reaction has set in. A reaction has also taken place in Anglo A, and there was some selling of London General Omnibus stock on the feeling that now the report is out there is nothing more to "go for." Among breweries, Barclay Perkins announce that they must defer the payment of the preference interest due on January 1 until the end of the financial year at March 31, owing to increased taxation. A scheme of reconstruction is to be brought forward early in 1911. Another brewery announcement of importance is that made by Allsopps to the effect that negotiations are proceeding for an amalgamation. In consequence the next meeting will be only formal, and will be adjourned until later, when the accounts will be presented. As yet no official hint has been dropped as to which company it is proposed to amalgamate with, though rumour has been busy supplying names.

Within the last few weeks I have commented upon the results of two Argentine land companies owning estates in the north of the Republic—the Santa Fé and Cordova Great Southern Land Company and the Santa Fé Land Company. In both cases, it will be remembered, the results achieved were excellent. The first-named concern, indeed, showed a degree of prosperity which not many similar concerns of its kind can equal, and those closely in touch with Argentina tell me that the company's land is about the richest in the Republic, and is only surpassed in fertility anywhere in the world by the soil in the Nile Valley. There have since been published the reports of one or two land companies owning property in the south of Argentina, and in these cases the effect of last year's serious drought is plainly reflected in revenues. The Argentine Southern's net profits fell off from £20,500 to £8,900, and the dividend has had to be reduced from 10 to 5 per cent., after taking from the dividend equalisation fund the remaining balance of £4,900. The Rio Negro Land Company's net earnings shrunk from £6,100 to the very lean total of £3,700. The board has decided to pay a first dividend of 5 per cent., which takes £12,500, and it has accordingly reduced the carry forward from £16,500 to £7,700. This course, adopted in respect of so bad a year, tends to colour the opinions officially expressed that prospects are now brighter. The Port Madryn Company is also paying a first dividend of 5 per cent., and its subsidiary, the Central Railway of Chubut, has made an initial distribution of 10 per cent. The Argentine Land and Investment Company practically marked time in 1909-10. Net profits were £29,600, compared with £30,100 in the corresponding period, and the dividend was maintained at 5 per cent.

Among Egyptian financial institutions the Agricultural Bank of Egypt takes high rank, and in view of the essentially safe character of its business in lending to the native farmers in small individual amounts on the security of land I have several times in the past recommended its shares. Of late these shares have been a dull market, and the reason is that, in spite of the recent excellent cotton crop, the cash arrears due to the bank from the fellaheen—many of whom fell behind with their payments as a result of the poor harvest of 1909—have been coming in very slowly. It appears that under the Egyptian law as it stands difficulty is experienced in enforcing payments of the kind until a considerable time has elapsed. However, there are still six weeks to go before the bank's financial year closes, and these are usually the best weeks for repayments, the fellaheen having now commenced to feel the benefits arising from the late bountiful harvest. It is, too, good news for the bank's shareholders that a movement is being made to so alter the law that the bank will be able to put pressure more effectually upon the debtors who require it. The Khedivial Mail Steamship Company in the year ending June 30 enjoyed a substantial recovery in its earnings, the net profit of £16,300 comparing against a deficit of £5,500 for the previous twelve months. Interest on the preference shares has been paid for three half-years, which leaves arrears outstanding as from December 31 last. The current year ought to see the recovery go further.

AN EMPYREAN FINANCIER.

Mr. Campbell Everden is a financier—if one may apply that description to an undischarged bankrupt—whose activities present a striking picture of the joint stock system on its shadier side. With another undischarged bankrupt named Jenkins, Everden constitutes the Kappa Syndicate, Limited. Its issued capital is seven shares of 1s. each, and all its assets have been charged by a debenture in favour of the Empyrean Trading Corporation, Limited. Everden alone is practically the corporation. Nominally its capital is £10,000 in £1 shares, but 9,993 of these shares were issued to Everden as fully paid, and were transferred by him as a security to the London Banking Corporation, Limited. He did this in his personal capacity, while in the character of the Empyrean Corporation he charged all its assets by a debenture in favour of the Bank of Morocco. Many other companies besides the Kappa and the Empyrean nestle in Everden's offices at Suffolk House, Cannon Street, but these two figured most prominently in a series of transactions which Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady has just unravelled after a trial lasting several days. The story is too long to relate in detail, but in effect the case turned upon an agreement for the promotion by the Kappa Syndicate of a company to take over the business of Mr. W. S. Cuff, a woollen warehouseman, at Banbury. Mr. Cuff was introduced to Jenkins, who introduced him to Everden for the purpose of raising a loan of £600. In the result, instead of getting a loan, Mr. Cuff handed over cash for the formation of a company styled Stutterd and Pearce, Limited, which acquired his business and book debts for shares, but which contrary to his stipulation neither took over the liabilities of the business nor provided any working capital. The Kappa Syndicate obtained £2,000 in shares in the new company, and the directors of the latter, who did whatever Everden told them to do, simply adopting at board meetings the minutes which were prepared beforehand, also gave the syndicate a cheque for £200 for preliminary expenses, and appointed the Empyrean Corporation as trustees at an annual fee of £50 for non-existent debenture-holders, dummy debentures being created as a device for obtaining the fee. The action was brought by Mr. Cuff and decided in his favour by Mr. Justice Swinfen Eady, who made some scathing observations on these proceedings of Everden, and ordered the cancellation of the debentures, of the shares taken by the Kappa Syndicate, and of the cheque for £200 of which the London Banking Corporation had claimed to be holders in due course. It may be hoped that this case will serve as an object-lesson to business men. Even if the position and prospects of a business justify the belief that it can be successfully converted into a limited liability company, the need of inquiries into the resources and standing of parties who offer to form the company should surely be obvious.

By the way, Mr. Campbell Everden is, I presume, the gentleman of the same name and address who played a part in the remarkable affair of the "Free State of Counani," which was the subject of articles in Truth in 1905 and 1906.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

E. Donnithorne and Co., Limited.

It was mentioned in Truth some time ago that E. Donnithorne and Co., 36, Gracechurch Street, E.C., was the latest nom de guerre of Lewis Douglas Sutherland, a bucket-shop keeper who formerly traded as Milne, Son, and Hamilton, and became bankrupt, with liabilities estimated at £10,000 and no assets. Recently I have heard from customers of E. Donnithorne and Co. whose experiences with that firm have been anything but satisfactory. Nominally, the business belonged at first—at any rate, for the purpose of legal proceedings—to a lady named Sutherland, presumably a relative of the actual manager, but about the end of October E. Donnithorne and Co. was registered as a private company, and circulars issued since then have solicited the opening of an account with the modest sum of 20s. for a call option to "test our bona fides." My advice to my readers is to leave the making of such tests to other people.

Metropolitan and Counties Investors, Limited.

Someone sent me the other day a copy of a publication called the Financial Outlook, in which there was a reference to an exposure in a previous issue of "the methods of the bucket shop fraternity." I did not see this exposure, but I should think it must have been very instructive. The Financial Outlook can speak from inside knowledge of the methods of bucket-shops. It is itself the organ of an establishment of this class, formerly carried on under the name of Redway, Furness and Co., Limited, but now known as the Metropolitan and Counties Investors, Limited, C. P. Redway being the managing director. There are several provincial branches, one being at Brighton, and a communication just to hand from a lady shows that if circulars do not succeed in attracting a likely customer a personal canvass is tried. One of the firm's representatives pestered this lady with visits until she was persuaded to buy twenty Canadian Pacifics on a 2 per cent. cover. She complains that although she wrote saying that she would take up the shares at the next settlement (giving references as to her ability to do so) the transaction was, nevertheless, promptly closed with the loss of her money when the quotation fell two points. No doubt Redway acted strictly in accordance with his rules in regard to such transactions, but this is not a matter of any importance. The really interesting feature of the incident is the manner in which the lady was lured into this gamble, and in my judgment such methods of touting for a business of this description are most reprehensible.

Two New Contemporaries.

Through my correspondence I am constantly hearing of financial journals whose existence is quite unsuspected in the newspaper world. Usually the proprietors of these publications show their philanthropy by distributing free copies through the post, and then I get inquiries as to the soundness of the advice they give away and the desirability of doing business with them, for it is, of course, a common feature of sheets of this class to act as outside brokers. Recently I have had two or three letters respecting a paper called The Investor's Weekly, 10, Camomile Street, E.C. It runs what it styles an "Investment Department," and its editor is so solicitous for the welfare of strangers that he sends them not only circulars but reply-paid telegrams exhorting them to buy shares which he is generously willing to sell, though he is confident that they will immediately have a sharp rise. In one case alone this enterprising editor must have expended between four and five shillings on telegrams and postages in his efforts to benefit an unresponsive correspondent. Presumably he finds that this sort of persistence pays, though I should have thought myself that the public would have the gumption to perceive that it is a business having no affinity with legitimate journalism.

Another publication just brought to my notice is The Imperial Financier, 199, Piccadilly; editor and manager, Joseph Morris. A subscriber tells me that this Financier was merely British when it started in October, but in the course of a few weeks it assumed the Imperial title. Mr. Morris is also a circulariser as well as an editor, and early in November he intimated that he had important information respecting the Amistad Rubber Plantations and Estates, Limited, which, when generally known, would increase the price of the shares. He stated that he was in a position to secure a limited number at 2s. 6d. each, and the subscriber from whom I have heard remitted £5 for forty. He now complains that, although a month has elapsed, he has received no contract and no transfer, no replies to two letters asking for an explanation, and no copy of The Imperial Financier (for which he had paid a twelve months' subscription), since November 25. No doubt Mr. Morris will attend to his requirements in due course, but, so far as the shares are concerned, he will not lose anything by waiting for them. There is, I am assured, no market whatever for Amistads.

A Bucket-Shop Recruit from the Turf.

Mr. Thomas Henry Dey, 40, Old Bond Street, W., who has hitherto been known as a bookmaker, has now blossomed forth as a bucket-shop keeper. It is an easy and natural transformation, the main difference between these two professions being that whereas the bookmaker bets on the results of races the bucket-shop keeper bets on the movements in the "tape quotations" of stocks and shares. The latter has, however, one advantage which Mr. Dey will doubtless appreciate after his little collision a year ago with the law in the form of the Betting Act. Unlike the bookmaker, the bucket-shop keeper is allowed to work on the deposit or ready-money system without incurring any penalty. Mr. Dey states at the end of his booklet that under no circumstances whatever will he undertake "blind pools or the class of business usually done by bucket-shops." Perhaps this is a piece of unconscious humour due to his imperfect acquaintance with his new vocation. It is true that his programme does not include blind pools, but it contains the customary claptrap about the advantages of the "limited liability method" in the form of those gambles on a cover of 1 per cent. or upwards which are the hall-mark of the common bucket-shop.

A Christmas Offer.

Christmas comes even into the literature of the bucket-shops. For instance, the Equitable Exchange has been making what it styles an "extraordinary special Christmas offer," whereby "we grant the control of the American market, consisting of thirty different securities, for a period of seven days, on an outlay of sums of £2 10s., £5," etc. The order form shows that the dupe caught by this twaddle is really staking his money against "any one stock" having a rise of five points during the week—a bet which, in the recent state of the markets, nobody with a glimmering of knowledge would dream of making.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of Truth.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered. Correspondents should state whether or not they are holders of the securities upon which an opinion is desired.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Railways.

Cloverdale.—The preferred 23 and the deferred 11¾. There might be better opportunities of realising next year.

J. A. C.—You might as well realise.

Mines.

Cromdale.—1 and 2. On a purchase at the present price you should get a satisfactory yield, even when the prior charge is wholly paid off. 3. Seventy-five per cent. has been paid, and a further 12½ per cent. is payable on the 29th inst.

Hopeful.—1. You could make a much better selection. 2. Naraquas appear a hopeful lock-up. 3. I am not greatly attracted by them in the present state of the market. Hunter's Quay.—Sorry, but I cannot trace the concern named.

J. M.—I see no reason to expect much early advance, but think you might keep your shares for eventual improvement. A dividend of 1s per share has just been declared.

Longshanks.—I think there is a fair chance of your being able to realise the shares named to better advantage during the next six months. Losanna.—1. Labour shortage has caused a sharp drop in profits and the outlook is not very hopeful. 2 and 3. I should prefer the shares of a Rand proposition, such as Van Ryns or Wolhuters. 4. Hopeful from a lock-up point of view. 5. I do not think much of the concern.

Vulcan.—1. Immediate outlook for the market uncertain on account of labour, but I do not expect much decline in the share named. 2. Eventually they should yield you a profit, and I would not sell now. 3. I cannot say when dividends will be commenced, but the shares should have some improvement when the market becomes active again. With regard to your second letter, Wit Deep appear a pretty good holding for dividends.

Mixed Securities.

Ansia.—1. The shares should be all right to put away as a speculative investment. 2. Hold for an eventual recovery. 3. These may also be expected to revive some day. Alphus.—I would suggest Great Indian Peninsula Railway 4 per cent. debenture stock, Great Central Railway 4½ per cent. debenture stock, and Buenos Ayres Great Southern Railway 4 per cent. debenture stock. Aliquin.—1. Prospects good The two companies are physically connected, and the personnel is in several instances similar. But the finances of each are quite distinct. 2. The debentures are a specific first mortgage on the Kafr Zayat oil and soap works and on certain freehold land.

Bol.—You have compiled a good list. As Nos. 3, 10, and 13 are so closely related the last two might be omitted, and in their places British Insulated and Helsby Cables 5 per cent. debenture stock and Metropolitan Electric Tramways 5 per cent. debenture stock might be put. In place of 16, which at present has no great margin behind it, I would suggest New York Telephone 4½ per cent. bonds.

Country.—1. An excellent investment, but I know of no reason to look for any material rise in the shares. 2. A further purchase would probably turn out well in time. Carnation.—1. Union Pacific Railroad 4 per cent. first lien and refunding bonds. 2. Yes, most of them; but remember that drawings are at par. 3. A sound industrial, but it seems fairly valued.

Dunelin.—1. New York Telephone 4½ per cent. bonds. 2. Quite good.

Executor.—The following would probably suit, but they yield less than 4 per cent.:—India Government 3 per cent., Newcastle 2¾ per cent., and West Ham 3 per cent. stocks.

G. L. (Londonderry).—I do not care for either. George.—1. You could make a better selection. 2. A hopeful speculation from a lock-up point of view. 3. A purchase for investment would be all right, but I cannot predict a further rise.

Hullabaloo.—1. I would hardly advise selling. The company is well managed, and the large amount of capital spent in recent years should mean a growth in revenues as the years go on. 2. I am not enamoured of them. Better realise. 3. Not a bond I recommend. Humbra Rosia.—If you will be satisfied with a little over 4 per cent. you could hardly have anything safer than Kansas City Terminals 4 per cent. bonds. I dealt with the position a few weeks ago.

Mixed (Westminster).—1. A hopeful speculative lock-up. 2. I do not regard them as very attractive; the guarantor is for the present carrying a heavy load of debt, and for the present the margin over its own fixed charges is none too large. 3. As you suggest, the shares are a fair speculative investment. If they have such a rise as you mention you might secure your profit.

Newton.—All sound securities, which should give you no cause for anxiety.

Park.—1. You might for the present confine yourself to the Centrals. 2. Presumably they saw a good profit, which in the case of a mining share it is always as well to secure.

Pukow.—1. A perfectly free market. 2. Yes.

Sandbanks.—1. I do not advise a purchase of these shares. 2. A good holding for dividends. See Note in last week's issue. 3 Appear fully valued.

W. R. T.—1. No dividend has been paid, nor is one likely to be in the near future. Holding must be considered a speculation on the chance of a revival in the market. 2 and 3. Both well secured. W. T. W.—1. The shares ought to be worth holding. 2. Yes. 3. Outlook uncertain. For investment I should prefer Central Argentine ordinary. W. S.—The Bahia Blanca and Japanese bonds are the best secured. The others, while sound of their kind, are more liable to fluctuate. I cannot now deal with each—you have, by the way, disregarded Rule 2—but you will find opinions about most of them in recent issues of Truth.

Yam.—1. Merchants' Trust 4 per cent. debenture stock, City of Copenhagen 4 per cent. 1908 bonds, and Chatham and Dover Railway 4 per cent. 1883 debenture stock. 2. Metropolitan Electric Trams 5 per cent. debenture stock, Royal Mail Shipping 5 per cent. debenture stock, and British Insulated and Helsby Cables 5 per cent. debenture stock. As regards your second letter, the first preference is a promising 6 per cent. investment, but, of course, it is of the semi-speculative type.

Rubber.

Accounts.—A sound holding, rather better for present dividends than with a view to capital appreciation. Tremelbye is not so far advanced, but its future prospects are greater. Abu.—Ayer Panas. Capital authorised, $750,000; issued, $600,000; under option, $150,000. Total acreage, 3,500; planted, 1,545 acres; 236,848 trees, of which 32,893 are 3 to 4, 100,005 2 to 3½, and 103,950 under 2 years. Akron.—1. A fair proposition. Worth locking up at par. Write to the secretary at 45, Leadenhall Street, E.C. 2. Avoid this. Taiping should suit you better. Arthur.—1. Worth buying at present discount. 2. A cheap Ceylon share, likely to turn out well. Anxious (Limerick).—Both good. Anxious (Glasgow).—A good speculative holding. Likely to improve. See my Notes last week. Albion.—Buy Strathmore.

Big Floriner.—Sell half of Nos. 1, 2, and 3, as you suggest, and buy Tremelbye, Kapar Para, and Ledbury. Bedder.—1. There have, I believe, been labour troubles on the estate. 2. Taiping. B. A.—Yes; Duckwari is a good purchase. Beechcroft. Taiping and Pelepah Valley. Beeswing.—Very speculative. The Malayan shares will in the end give better results.

Crichton.—Nothing would be gained by fixing selling limits when markets are stagnant. In any return of market activity I may be able to help you. The shares you hold are sound, and good for steady appreciation. Cot.—1. Bradwall is sound, and likely to appreciate in value. Capital, £90,000; planted, 685 acres, to be increased to 2,700 acres. 2. A good holding. No reason why you should exchange. Dividend due end January. 3. A reasonable holding. Yes. Cats.—A good speculative purchase. See reply to "Crichton." Date of meeting not yet fixed. Comet.—1. Hold for some recovery. The cost of production appears to be high, and an exchange may be advisable later. 2. Speculative, but the estate should develop well next year. 3. Is developing slowly. The price is now very low, but on any recovery exchange for a Malayan share. 4. Well worth holding. Chinese.—1. Dividends are now being paid quarterly. 2. Quite sound. Likely to appreciate in value. 3. Cannot estimate. 4. Good speculative possibilities, but the price is high enough at present.

Dunham.—Nos. 1 and 2 should turn out well. No. 3 is more speculative, but worth holding for a profit. Dunelm.—A very fair speculative holding. May perhaps earn a dividend in 1911. Dick.—It involves too long a wait. Strathmore would make a better purchase. Dumas.—It has failed to realise the prospectus estimate, and I do not recommend a purchase. Drake.—Hold Rubber Trusts For present purchase I prefer shares in plantation companies.

Elephant.—1. The acreage valuation is somewhat high. Sell at a favourable opportunity. 2. Worth holding as an investment. 3. A good purchase. Edgar.—1. The prospectus estimate was much too optimistic. 2. For capital appreciation I prefer cheaper shares. Strathmore.

Fips.—Strathmore is quoted daily in the Financier. Forfarshire.—1 and 2. You would probably do better in the end by making an exchange. 3. Buy Strathmore at present price.

Grant.—1. Cheap at present price, but for permanent investment I should prefer a Malayan share. 2. The output varies according to season, and will recover, but the cost of production is high. 3. You would probably do better by exchanging for Strathmore. Glendon.—Strathmore, Tremelbye, and Glen Bervie.

Harrow.—1. A good speculative purchase. 2. Hold. See my Notes next week. Hart.—1. Speculative, but worth holding. Promises to make substantial improvement early next year. 2. Good as a speculative holding. Hugo.—1. The company has some good business in hand, and in any revival the shares should recover to your figure. 2. See third reply to "Comet." 3. Hold for substantial recovery.

Jinkee.—A very sound list. All good for steady appreciation. Juggins.—Quite sound. Likely to appreciate in value. J. A. C.—1. Singapore Para is quite sound. 2. Bukit Lintang. Jack.—Lumut and Lankat Rubber are both good purchases.

Lanka.—1. Not first-class, but likely to benefit by the improvement in tea. Take a profit when available. 2. Sound and well managed. 3, 4, 5, and 6. All sound. Leslie.—Lumut and Jeram. Your list is a good one. Ladrum.—1. A cheap share worth picking up at present price. 2. Strathmore and Glen Bervie.

Mixed.—1. Very fair. Worth holding for a profit. 2. Avoid. 3. Strathmore, Jeram, Taiping. Moonshine.—1. The argument used by the directors is sound enough. 2. A good lock-up, but it means a long wait for dividends, and the market in the shares is limited. Mary.—You hold too many highly speculative shares. Sell No. 1 and re-invest in Strathmore. Hold No. 2 for recovery. Take a profit on No. 3 when available. Modicum Quid.—1. See my Notes next week. 2. A good tea-cum-rubber. Likely to benefit by the "silent boom," and a good purchase. 3. Quite good.

Nestor.—1. It provides in itself a rough method of judging the future prospects of a company. Other things equal, the lower the capitalisation the greater the future dividends. 2. Quite the right view. 3. Both shares are very cheap in view of future prospects.

Pedetemptim.—1. Worth buying as a promising lock-up. 2. I have a good opinion of Sempah. Cheap at present price.

Spes.—Both sound, and well worth holding. Spontine.—1. Hold by all means. 2. The market outlook has changed. A very sound share as a dividend-payer, but the cheaper shares are more promising. 3. A good holding. Likely to benefit by the rise in tea. Surbiton.—Hold No. 3. Exchange the others for Tremelbye and Strathmore. Savona.—Your broker misunderstands the position. Madagascar Preference are entitled to a distribution out of profits of £1 per share, after which they rank in perpetuity as 20 per cent. preference shares, and are entitled to a further share of any profits the company may make. Sandgrounder. A good purchase. Silly Girl.—Hold Crudes. You would probably do better in the end by selling the others at a loss and re-investing in Strathmore. Seyin.—It is a purely local company, and I regret that I have not sufficient information to enable me to reply to your query.

Tabloid.—1. Yes. Average. 2. There is a reasonable probability of their doing so if markets are active. 3. No. The figure is, I understand, much lower. 4. Extracting machines are not required, but the washing machine is being used.

Up-a-tree.—1. Hold by all means. The debentures are convertible into shares at 10, that is, 10 shares for the £100 debenture. The right is a valuable one which in time should be exercised. I do not expect a dividend until after the books are closed for the year.

Washings.—1. See my Notes next week. 2. Hold the shares. Instead of averaging buy Taiping, which are less speculative. Walhalla.—1. Strathmore. 2. The "Rubber Share Handbook" published by the Financier. W. T. Watson.—1. The official estimates for the later years are too low. 2. Yes. A better investment, but the price is higher. 3. A good holding.

Miscellaneous.

A. B. C. (Leeds).—1. Rubber inquiries should be made separately; see my rules. 2. Lever Brothers "A." Preference. 3. Repeat inquiry for answer under "Insurance," stating age and sex of the proposed annuitant. A. W. F.—The paper is run by the bucket-shop concern which it recommends. They are not philanthropists, and if they deal free of brokerage they make their profit on the price charged for the shares; also by unloading such rubbish as those they advised you to add to your list. A. E. W.—The lottery probably is, but the ticket touts may be otherwise, and if you are cheated you will have no means of redress. A. E. D.—I do not recommend it, and you ought not to put your savings into such shares. Seek advice at the local savings bank; I believe you have an excellent one. Agnes (Brighton).—It would probably be useless to sue. I will notice the matter.

Beechwood.—Better sell.

C. E. W.—They are three sound industrials, though I should be inclined to realise No. 1 on a moderate rise.

Dovra.—I have heard nothing recently about the company. Dalkey.—Both sound of their kind, and should be held.

Eastbourne.—They charge prices vastly in excess of the market value of the bonds. You could recover by suing them in Paris, but it might not be worth while for so small an amount.

Fiesole.—It is reported that arrears due to the company have not been coming in as fast as was expected, and it is proposed to amend the law to enable greater pressure to be put upon dilatory payers. Unless, however, you are in need of the money I see no reason why the shares should be sold. The concern is one of the soundest financial institutions in the world. Fitzjohn.—No recent information has been published, but the company is understood to possess a promising property.

Gil Blas.—The Anglo-Adriatic Syndicate has already been strongly criticised in Truth. Have nothing to do with it or with the people who have been puffing the shares. G. W. M.—Thanks; I will refer to it.

Hopeful.—I have seen no prospectus, and, therefore, am unable to offer an opinion upon the bonds. But there has been good reason to shun the majority of Yankee industrials that have been offered on this side in the last few years. The Americans usually keep the good things at home. As regards your client's position, I do not see how he can get his subscription back if he has already contracted to take the bonds when and if publicly offered. Halifax.—An outside broking concern which you should avoid. Do your business through a member of the Stock Exchange.

Isle of Wight.—1. The prospectus was issued in October, but I have heard nothing of the concern since. 2. You have doubtless already read my allusion to the company a week ago. India.—I would not buy either.

Joan.—Put it in the Post Office Savings Bank. 2. When the company is expropriated by the Government the shares will doubtless be exchanged for Government securities. J. R.—I shall be glad to see the reply. It looks fishy so far. Jack.—1. Messrs. N. Keizer and Co., 31, Threadneedle Street, E.C. 2. The best are. 3. I do not recommend them myself. J. J. S.—Thanks; if space permits I will deal with it.

Korah.—Having applied and received an allotment you must take the shares. Ask for delivery of the certificate. Kensington.—It is an outside broking concern which I think you will do well to avoid. Do your business through a member of the Stock Exchange.

Morocco.—I do not see that there is any reason why you should part with so sound an investment. Monocle.—It has been going rapidly downhill for some years. Better realise. Mrs. Thrush.—It is just possible your solicitor might screw something out of them.

Oakbank.—The company has a record to be proud of; I regard its shares as an excellent investment.

Rowley Green.—The circularisers in question are certainly not philanthropists, and in spite of the statement that you will incur no liability you had better keep clear of their scheme.

Sleepy.—There is such a company, and I am afraid it would be useless to attempt to recover the money paid for the shares. Insist upon delivery of the certificate.

Tomas.—There is a good deal of the speculative element about the shares, but I know of no particular reason at present why £100 YEARLY { For your Wife should she survive you. For your own old age.

For particulars write the SUN LIFE OF CANADA, Norfolk St., Strand.

they should be sold. T. K.—It is obviously impossible for me to say in the absence of definite particulars. You do not even state whether the shares are fully paid. In any event, however, it is hardly likely that they would attempt to enforce such a liability here. Tilak.—It is a perfectly respectable concern, but the shares have not, nor are they likely to have, any sort of free market here, and I should therefore advise you not to invest in them.

VIGILANT.

INSURANCE.

Law Car and General—Questions of Winding-up—Comparison with Law Guarantee and Trust.

A FEW weeks ago some of the shareholders of the Law Car and General had a meeting, and appointed a committee; this committee interviewed the directors, and presumably made some investigations into the position of the company. A further meeting of shareholders was held last week, at which a resolution was passed for the voluntary winding-up of the Law Car and General Insurance Corporation. A petition for the winding-up of the company has been presented to the High Court, and was down for hearing yesterday, but at the time of writing I am not aware of the result of this petition.

It is much to be desired that the whole pitiable record of the mismanagement of the affairs of the Law Car and General should come out in full detail; it cannot do any harm to the shareholders whose money has been lost; it cannot hurt the interests of sound insurance companies, and it would be a distinctly beneficial result if it could be demonstrated that good intentions on the part of a board of directors are not all that is required of them. They are paid fees for looking after the interests of the shareholders, and for controlling and directing the business of the company. If they allow statements to be made over their signatures which are untrue in fact, though not to their knowledge; if they pay dividends which they think were earned, and which in fact were not earned; and if on the strength of these erroneous statements they persuade people to pay 30s. for £1 shares, it seems to me that their folly and incompetence ought to be brought home to them in a fashion so effective as to deter other well-meaning but incompetent directors from doing likewise.

It is difficult to write with patience and restraint about such conduct as that of the Law Car and General. The directors have lost the money of their shareholders; they have assigned securities to some policyholders, to the jeopardy of others; and their actions have tended to bring the name of insurance into disrepute. Of course, for people who know it is easy enough to discriminate between the normal first-class thoroughly sound companies conducted on high lines, and inferior concerns, which deviate from sound principles, and flounder along from one muddle to another. To the ordinary public, however, the first-class offices and these inferior affairs are all "insurance offices." The confidence which the public normally feels, and is well entitled to feel in real insurance offices, is apt to be shaken. Thus directors like those of the Law Car do harm to an even greater extent than appears on the surface; they not only lose the money of their own shareholders, and permit reprehensible commercial practices, but so far as in them lies they destroy the confidence of the public in sound insurance companies, which is perhaps the worst mischief of all.

I am continually getting evidence of the harm that is being done by inferior companies. Correspondents write to me to know if such offices as the Alliance, the Prudential, and the Scottish Widows' Fund are safe. Of course, it is much better that people should make inquiries of this kind, if they have the smallest doubt on the subject; but the standing of offices, such as those I have just mentioned, is so beyond question that it ought to be recognised as clearly as a man recognises his own existence, and it would be recognised but for the existence of concerns such as the Law Car, which are a mere travesty and caricature of insurance companies properly so called.

To avoid any misunderstanding let me once more make it clear that the Law Car and General has no connection whatever with the Car and General, which was established previously, and whose name was closely copied by the company which has now failed so ignominiously and disastrously.

This failure of the Law Car and General follows closely upon the failure of a much bigger company, namely the Law Guarantee and Trust. In certain respects the failure of the relatively small Law Car is the more serious of the two. At meetings of the Institute of Actuaries the address given by the President is regarded as exempt from criticism. A journalist, however, is free from this restriction, and I am therefore at liberty to disagree with certain remarks made about the failure of the Law Guarantee in the very fine presidential address to the Institute by Mr. G. H. Ryan; he regarded the failure of the Law Guarantee and Trust as being due to the absence of a scrutinising judgment as to the individual and aggregate limits within which the guarantees of mortgages ought to be kept. Doubtless extreme carelessness in the selection of properties guaranteed did occur with this particular society, but I greatly doubt if Mr. Ryan was correct when he said, "There seems nothing inherently unsound in the general principle of mortgage-guarantee insurance." On the contrary, I believe there is, for reasons which I explained at the time of the failure of the Law Guarantee and Trust. If a mortgage or a debenture is so well secured that loss is almost impossible, it is scarcely worth while to pay the premium for a guarantee policy; consequently there is a tendency for mortgage guarantee to be applied to properties of doubtful value. This being so, the fundamental security becomes that of the guaranteeing society itself. So long as the society is regarded as unquestionably sound, people are well enough satisfied with the security, but, if doubts arise about the stability of the guaranteeing society, policyholders will take the earliest possible opportunity of calling in their mortgages, which, if the property mortgaged cannot be realised for a sufficient amount to pay off the loan, involves a strain upon the resources of the guaranteeing society. This state of things has a cumulative effect. It increases the doubts about the safety of the guaranteeing society, thus producing further demands for repayment of mortgages, followed in due course by yet more doubts, and yet more demands for repayment.

With life, fire, or accident offices nothing of the kind can occur. If the security of a life office is doubted a man does not commit suicide in order that his executors may present an early claim. If a policyholder doubts the security of a fire office he does not burn his goods in order to put his claim in ahead of others; he simply transfers his fire insurance to a sounder company. Mortgage guarantee business, on the other hand, is a contract of long duration that cannot be transferred to another office, and which directly conduces to the rapid increase of claims the moment it becomes recognised or even thought that the company may be unable to meet such claims.

The Law Guarantee exhibited both unsound practice and unsound principles, and I believe it was the unsoundness of the principles even more than the unsoundness of the practice, that brought about its downfall.

Companies like the Law Car and General, of which there are far too many in existence, conduct business of the same character that is carried on by sound insurance offices. They fail through malpractices and incompetent management, and consequently their failure, even though on a small scale, is in some sense more serious than that of the Law Guarantee and Trust. This guarantee company succeeded so far as it worked in accordance with established insurance principles, and failed solely in connection with a class of business which other insurance companies avoid, and which, strictly speaking, was not insurance at all.

Answers to Correspondents.

[Inquiries on the subject of insurance are answered in this column every week. Every letter containing an inquiry must be accompanied by a coupon cut from the third page of the coloured cover of Truth.]

Capyarde.—National Mutual of Australasia or Marine and General. Lake.—The company is good for fire, but quite inferior for life. It is, of course, respectable and sound. Austral.—I do not advise the transaction you contemplate. You have been reading an advertisement, not an opinion of mine. Lonely.—Confederation Life, Legal and General, Yorkshire, or Century. Sao-Loong.—(1) The policy is one of the best non-profit contracts there is. 2. It is non-forfeitable in the way that you mention. 3. You can obtain from the Ocean Accident Corporation a policy that provides for the payment of life assurance premiums in the event of incapacity from accident or illness. 4. I am quite sure the policy to which you refer under this heading gives you much better value for money than the non-profit contract mentioned under (1). Sold.—The company can only pay if you get the decision of a Law Court to presume his death. The company might be disposed to pay the bonuses falling due last October if adequate security were given for their repayment in the event of necessity. The company cannot, in justice to its other policy-holders, dispense with the necessary legal formalities. Galway.—The financial stability of the company is beyond question, and you can do business with it quite satisfactorily in every way. Oxeye.—Two or three sound offices give very slightly better terms, but on the whole you cannot do better than the society you mention. Nappy.—(A.) National Mutual of Australasia, English and Scottish Law Life, or Mutual of New York. (B.) General Accident of Perth. Drayton.—Royal Exchange Assurance or Ocean Accident. Apply to Naval and Military Assurance Association, Aldershot. Cam.—Both offices are thoroughly good, but it is a mistake to suppose you would be likely to gain by changing. You should continue your policy in Office A. Yam.—Canada Life, Confederation Life, Clergy Mutual, or Yorkshire. Jason.—I cannot recommend the policy of which you send particulars. Take with-profit assurance in the United Kingdom Temperance Institution or the Scottish Amicable. Prospector.—Since you are a civil servant you cannot do so well as in the North British and Mercantile. Omega.—The company is entirely sound, and you should certainly keep your policy in force.

COMPANY MEETINGS.

BRITISH COLUMBIA ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY, LIMITED.

The fourteenth ordinary general meeting of the shareholders in the British Columbia Electric Railway Company, Limited, was held on the 19th inst. at the Liverpool Street Hotel, E.C., under the presidency of Mr. R. M. Horne-Payne, chairman of the company.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said :—Ladies and Gentlemen,—Once again we have the good fortune to be able to present to you a report containing accounts of satisfactory progress and expansion of business and of good future prospects. The year under review, and the current year up to the present time, has been essentially a period of expansion and continuous reorganisation, but I am glad to say that we seem now to have reached a period of more gradual development—a period of settling down to steady regular conditions of prosperous commercial life in the cities and districts which we serve. This period of development of our territory has put a great strain on your directors and managers, firstly, owing to our anxiety to act prudently and not to involve the company in any capital expenditure which is not needed and justified by permanent developments; and, secondly, in continuous efforts to keep our organisation apace with the increase of business. The demands on your general manager, assistant general managers, and other senior officials have been very great, and we all owe them a debt of deep gratitude for their devoted and loyal services. The strain of making provision for the efficient organisation of a business which in three years has considerably more than doubled in all departments, and of at the same time designing and making careful arrangements for new construction involving the most difficult engineering problems and the expenditure of hundreds of thousands of pounds, can well be imagined. From the shareholder's point of view, nothing could be more satisfactory than the development which has taken place and is taking place. It is true that it has involved large capital expenditure, and will involve I hope large, although less rapid, capital expenditure for some years to come. I say I hope because I should be very sorry to have my money invested in any enterprise in a new country which did not justify continuous extension. I am glad to say that these extensions of ours are justified on present sound, permanent, conditions, and are not entirely based on the future. Take our new line from Westminster to Chilliwack, a distance of sixty-five miles, which the Prime Minister of British Columbia did us the honour of opening on October 3 last. Three years ago, when we decided to build that line, we did so to meet the urgent demand of the settlers and knowing the country through which it would run to be of a marvellously fertile nature, but, nevertheless, when we decided to build it we fully believed that the line would not do more than pay working expenses for some years after it was opened, and we faced the fact that in order to acquire a very valuable business at the end of nine or ten years our old lines would have to carry the new one as a burden in the interval. Our fears in this respect have proved groundless. After a few weeks' working our management are able to report that almost from the outset we shall be able to earn 5 per cent. on the £400,000 which the line and its equipment has cost. This money has been earning nothing during construction, which is also the case with large sums of money spent on the construction of other extensions in the neighbourhood of Vancouver and New Westminster, and on the hydro electric power installations near Victoria and Vancouver. The major portion of these works have either been recently completed or will be completed during the next three months and will increase our revenue in the future. You must not think from what I have said that the new lines are suddenly going to earn profits at the same rate that the old ones have done in the past; their earning power must naturally be much lower for some years to come, and they will necessarily increase the expense ratio of the whole system, but if they only earn the barest interest on their cost at present the shareholders should be well satisfied, as they are beyond all question building up a splendid business for the future. The new line to Chilliwack practically bisects the territory which your company's lines serve on the main lands of British Columbia, a territory which I believe to be, perhaps, more prolific in advantages to the home seeker and settler, who has a small capital to start with, than any country in the world. It consists of a triangle of country about a quarter the size of England, shut off on two sides by great mountain ranges, with its base on the Pacific Ocean and watered by the mighty Fraser and numerous other rivers and rivulets. It is richly timbered, but has a large area of valley and meadow land and a soil which has been described by an expert of world-wide experience as among the richest in the world. It certainly produces magnificent corn, fruit, and vegetables and good grass. Its climate is moderate, not unlike our own, but fortunately with less rain and more sunshine. Within this territory are the cities of Vancouver and New Westminster, and apparently we are to have in the near future a third great industrial centre on the south bank of the Fraser, where several large manufactories are locating. It is, therefore, not surprising that the territory is settling up quickly. A farmer finds good land and good climate, exquisite scenery, and the markets of two large cities for his dairy and garden produce protected for him by Nature's defences, the massive mountain ranges. For fourteen years at this meeting I have been in the habit of telling you of the progress of Canada and of the opportunities that it offers for investment from Atlantic to Pacific. I shall not now detain you with this subject, not that it is any less attractive than it always has been, but in these days so much space is given to Canada by our daily papers that you know as much about it as I do myself. In conclusion, allow me on behalf of my colleagues and myself to wish you all the compliments of the season. (Applause.)

Mr. E. M Harvey seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously, and dividends making a total for the year of 6 per cent. on the preferred ordinary stock and 8 per cent. on the deferred ordinary stock were declared.

On the motion of Mr. Harold Brown the following resolution was unanimously agreed to :—"That the capital of the company be increased to £3,200,000 by the creation of 700,000 new shares of £1 each."

A hearty vote of thanks was passed in appreciation of the very valuable services rendered by the general manager and staff in British Columbia, and a similar compliment to the chairman and directors concluded the proceedings.

MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY OF WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

The ordinary general meeting was held on the 15th inst. at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C., Mr. W. Capel Slaughter presiding.

The Chairman, after tendering to Mr. G. A. Touche, M.P. (one of the directors), the congratulations of the board, and of the shareholders, on his return as member for North Islington, moved the adoption of the report. He said that the gross receipts of the railway had exceeded, during the period under review, those of the previous year by over £17,000. Unfortunately, the net receipts were affected by an increase of £8,899 in the working expenses, of which £5,000 at least was due to the unfortunate coal strike at Newcastle in New South Wales. He though they should regard as encouraging the net receipts of £51,000 odd, to which had to be added £10,500, which they had received as interest. Of the credit balance available, £23,283 would be required to pay the interest on the 5 per cent. cumulative income debenture stock from June 30, 1907, to January 31, 1911, and to clear off all arrears on that stock and pay the current interest as well right up to that date, when the stock in question was to be redeemed at 105. He referred to the proposal to extend the Goomalling line, and said that it might operate prejudicially to their undertaking. The board and the company's representatives in Australia would, however, take all legitimate means to safeguard the company's interests, and for the present they must wait and see whether the Government actually decided to press forward this competitive project. Referring to the company's lands, he said that the number of acres sold during the year was 140,450, or 26,000 less than in the sales

THE THIRTY-FIRST "TRUTH" DOLL AND TOY SHOW.

MOST of us, I suppose—and I am not confining myself to any particular sex—remember a time when we looked forward to the arrival of an aunt or uncle whatsoever as the most dependable method of satisfying some long pent-up ambition to possess. Sometimes the relation upon whom so much hung would confine him or herself to a small coin, which was all very well as long as one was not required to deposit it in a money-box; sometimes one was taken to a shop and there told to choose the doll, boat, soldiers, gardening tools, that so long had perforce been resistable. The next few days were pure joy—and then—well, then one had found another want equally pressing, or perhaps one's older possessions through sheer neglect had again become dear to fancy. The moral of which is that aunts and uncles supply a real and continuous want, and need never deem themselves superfluous whether in their capacity for supplying the "extras"—always so much more fascinating than necessities which should come of themselves—or in supplying a standard by which to revive appreciation of possessions already in hand.

It is now thirty-one years since TRUTH took upon herself the adoption of a number of nephews and nieces, whose avuncular relations, from the point of view of "extras," were non-existent. Most of these nephews and nieces were confined to their beds in hospital wards, and had therefore the more time to reflect upon what they had not got. In thirty-one years the family has increased to something like thirty thousand; TRUTH has become a great-great-great aunt, with legions of deputy aunts to help her see to it that the thirty thousand nephews and nieces in hospitals and poor-law institutions are not disappointed of thirty thousand presents, ranging from dolls to crackers or new sixpences. Numerically the dolls form about one-seventh of the whole number of presents, but as the oldest inhabitants, as the most powerful vehicle for individual taste and care, and, finally, as contributing so large a share to the brightness and colour of the whole exhibition at the Albert Hall, they must take the "pas" of a variety of other things also dear to fancy.

Some idea of the size of the doll exhibition may be gained by those unable to be present when they realise that a thick bank of dolls edged the whole of the parterre like a flower-bed, that in the centre two large stands and four tall pyramids teemed with dolls. Through a series of triumphal arches you could see the case of 11,000 new sixpences of the Tress Barry Fund, and thence to a bank of big beasts, lifeboats, doll's houses that reached almost up to the great organ. Fluttering pennons, a big legend explaining the show, and the red baize petticoats of the stands made great-great-great-aunt TRUTH regret that all the nephews and nieces could not see the whole before becoming possessors of the parts.

You might think at first glance, that, allowing for differences of size, for blond or brunette, for natural or artificial, all dolls were very much alike. A doll would probably tell you that human beings struck her in the same light, the more so that their masculine element is so much more pronounced, and all men really are alike of course, except perhaps soldiers and sailors and postmen, whose pretty clothes distinguish them. But the difference in dolls only begin with their clothes. Nor does the fact that among dolls, in-between-coloured hair is discouraged, and, as might human beings, nearly all the dolls conform to the fashionable maize colour or rich brown, preferably flowing over the shoulder and starting in such a tangle that combing is not only unnecessary but inadvisible. You can tell, for instance, from a doll's demeanour whether she is a new comer, or whether her family has for years held a good position at the show. Thus "Yoko" this year heads the list with regard to numbers. Here were no fewer than five hundred dolls; they were dressed in batches, some being in brown or pale blue, others in dark blue, crimson, yellow; others, again, wear white decorated with tricolour fittings or with plain blue. Your tiro might make out a case for not being able to distinguish individuals among the blues or the browns—the old stager, however, saw clearly that the only common feature among these five hundred dolls was their uniformly proud bearing, which meant that they "came over" with the first TRUTH doll show, and that they were the latest descendants of thirty generations, which is more than most of us can boast of. The "Yoko" dolls have always been made for use, in spite of their gay colours essentially calculated to attract children. All had six garments which took off and put on with every prospect of lasting at least as long as the dolls themselves. All of them had caps, some prettily feather-stitched, provocative, I fear, of some pride and jealousy. With the five hundred dolls were sent twelve knitted soft balls, knitted as only a lady of eighty-four (Mrs. Rawson) knows how to knit. "Yoko" has sometimes fitted out even more dolls than this year, but five hundred is something like an average to maintain when one considers that she began with fifty.

THE LARGE ENGLISH FAMILY.

Mrs. Combe struck a modern note emphatically with four hundred dolls—by which I am not referring to the largeness of the family but to the fact that boys and girls met here on a pretty even footing—some of the boys, indeed, having the lightness and colour attaching in the ordinary way only to "principal boys." Very jaunty caps, however, sufficed to turn them all into young Romeos, while their corresponding Juliets might be described in the court news as "favouring" flowered muslins in blue, mauve and green. Many of them were the happy possessors of necklaces, which no doubt they will soon have to share with the fascinated little owner into whose hands they come. Their straw hats were chiefly noticeable for the elegance of their French flowers and their general Riviera suggestion.

Four hundred more dolls owed, if not their being, at least their clothing to Mrs. B. Skinner, who chose for them a particularly suitable colour scheme. Cerise, blue, green, white, ultramarine, they formed one of the gayest pyramids, and their uniform blue bead necklaces were one of those small attractions which is really a very big one. Some of the skirts were elegantly trimmed, and you could turn them up to find really nice underclothing that took on and off. Their caps and hair-ribbons, among so many little girls, were remarkably bright and varied.

Bright brown-yellow sharply contrasted with black formed the keynote of Mrs. Stern's colour scheme, spread over two hundred and fifty dolls. Mrs. Stern's dolls, both boys and girls, evidently had a penchant for the theatre, or at least for domino balls. Some were wearing folly hats, while about two dozen of them formed a smart if sober public in silks, feathers, and velvets. Mrs. E. Oakeley was evidently of the blue-water school, for among her one hundred and fifty dolls she had a number of gallant sailor boys with smart straw hats, who might appear with advantage at a Southend demonstration. The girls were dressed in useful stuffs, and were wearing both toques and hats, some trimmed with smart quills. Among the most interesting of the larger groups Mrs. F. Green's hundred dolls took a high place for variety and imagination. Boy scouts once more proved their ubiquity; geishas hob-nobbed with Newhaven fishwives, Irish colleens, Dutch fisher boys and girls in very life-like sabots, black caps and pipes; the Territorial might, an he would, find pleasure in the society of a nurse and a baby; while a French courtier found a Brittany woman with whom to speak his own language. Most ingenious were a number of dolls representing the fashions over about a hundred years, 1809 being rather like a pretty country girl. A beautiful crinoline wakened memories of Leech and his friends, while a bride of 1839 wearing pearls, no doubt the gift of the bridegroom, seemed to cling closely to the custom of something blue among the other things she had to wear.

Mrs. Comyns, of Watford, is a very old friend, and I always take pleasure in examining her dolls because, before thinking of their clothes, she attends thoroughly to their physical well-being. And to attend surgically to the legs, arms, and heads of 240 dolls is an undertaking that can only be described as colossal. These were all comfortable dolls; they felt nice to hold, and their garments all took off. Woolly dolls, boys in well-made tunics, others in excellently knitted sweaters, and the girls in coquettish bonnets rang the changes upon doll possibilities. Mrs. Comyns is also showing a pretty pink doll dressed by an inmate of the Cripple Girls' Flower Mission, and a beautiful doll dressed by some girls who owed a country holiday to her. The two big dolls, also clothed by her, were on the same comfortable sensible scheme in dark and light blue golf coats and caps; one carried a Teddy bear, the other one of the baby natural dolls.

One hundred and forty-four dolls, dressed in bright colours by the Misses Woods, make one wonder how it is possible to procure so many different stuffs. Of this group the boys' red sweaters struck perhaps the most decided note. Lady Fry's hundred dolls were gay in pink and blue silk, with elegant tuckers at neck and sleeves; others disported themselves in flowered muslins and a few more in wool. These last certainly had no intention of adopting the present-day lack of petticoat. Miss A. Norah Carpenter's seventy-two dolls struck a consistently rich note of colour in the hall. All of them were different; most of them grown-up with fashionable big fur muffs, wraps, or caps; the others wore gay crocheted toques. Their underthings were as varied as those that met the eye. Mrs. Appleby liked her boys almost better than her girls in her family of twenty-four. One boy was a chorister; others had nice knitted jerseys and smart tammies. Mrs. Barry's thirty-six white-clad girls were a pleasing reminder that the wash-tub is as possible with dolls as with their mistresses, and they were dressed in a homely fashion beloved in the nursery. Mrs. Auerbach's brightly-clad fifty dolls had the additional charm of bearing in their hands Christmas cards conveying good wishes to prospective owners. Forty-eight dolls dressed by Mrs. Byrne showed the very height of millinery fashions, while the Girls' Club, Stratford-on-Avon, was responsible for twenty-four dolls in caps, hats, or bonnets, and bearing evidence both of taste and of fine work. One more group of dressers was the Dulwich Girls' Friendly Candidates, who sent twenty dolls very nicely fitted out, while the Misses Barnes dressed fifty boys and girls all with most ingenious differences. Miss J. F. Walker sent twenty-five small boys, and one was dressed by Miss Audrey Erickson, aged 15.

The Woolly Doll.

The woolly doll at its worst is very lovable; at its best it is pure joy. And Mrs. D. L. Thompson's two dozen or so dolls showed the woolly doll at its very best. So warm and comfortable indeed were these pink and white crocheted darlings that you felt an inclination to hug and wear them equally. Mrs. Thompson must have exhausted a whole crochet book in the different stitches for dresses, capes, hats, petticoats, trousers, shoes—and even cradles with bedclothes and valances. One big doll had also a beautiful jacket, another a large muff. These were charming dolls. Other woollies par excellence were Mrs. Hellmuth's fascinating "Heavenly Twins" in red wool caps and jerseys; Mrs. Bentley Rudd's pink dolls with their bead necklaces; Miss Ryland's "Peter," a delightful baby in white and blue wool, with the much-condemned "comforter" and gloves of one finger; and Mrs. G. A. Buckler's three knitted dolls. Another was found among the fourteen dolls excellently dressed by "The Friends of Dr. Bristowe." Here also was a long-robed baby with most correct flannels, and a little Dutch maid. Miss J. E. Harrison was responsible for six differently dressed dolls, Miss Hartley for six, one holding a knitted bag, another a Teddy bear; Miss Rivington for twelve smart white dolls with swansdown boas; Miss Fostach Agus for three; of which one wore a fashionable picture hat; Miss D. M. Morley for a nice sailor boy and girl; Miss A. M. Scott for a suffragette in chains and an effigy of "Truth"; Miss Harvey for five dolls with very nice underthings; Miss Willey for four little girls; Mrs. Shilcock for four, amongst which was one baby; Miss Cormell for twelve, all different and with very smart hats; Mrs. Macdonald for six, amongst which was a most natural-looking Norfolk suit; Miss Thompson for a dozen; Mrs. Carson for two little dolls; Mrs. Springsgath for six, including a Red Riding Hood, a young lady, and a baby.

Babies.

A number of natural dolls made this year for compulsory babies. Bald, with elephant legs and large feet, you had somewhat to readjust your notions of doll anatomy. Dressed, the babies were so real as to make little boys say "horrid little thing" and little girls "little dears." The babies were this year the clou—of several clous I would add—of the exhibition. Some of the prettiest were Miss Forbes's half-dozen in woolly jackets, caps, and shoes; while very charming were the Misses Travers's four wee dolls in mauve wool. Mrs. Mallard gave her baby a beautiful cloak, flannels, woolly boots, and short coats; while Mrs. Shaw's infant, who had a particularly intelligent expression, had in addition to a gorgeous hand-made robe a bottle and a rattle. Mrs. G. Dudley's babies were short-coated and dressed to play amicably upon the nursery floor, while Miss MacDonald's had a beautiful robe and a white satin cloak. I was sorry to see that Miss Vickery allowed her baby a "comforter," although with its woollies and its nice cloak trimmed with swansdown it seemed to thrive. Charming twins were Miss Travers's boy and girl, and Mrs. Appleby's twelve baby dolls will make twelve little people very happy indeed. Two infants, who had names, were "Margaret," dressed in a nice serge cloak by Miss B. Bevan, and "Jemima Brown," by Miss Mollie Giles. Triplets in pink and blue owed their comforts to Mrs. Warsack, while Miss Cramer decorated with elaborate pink feather-stitch the nicely made robe of her baby doll.

Pleasures of the Imagination.

A barrel-organ, even in the poorest parts of London, is usually the signal for a crowd of little dancers, whose apologies for boots would hardly lead one to suspect the knowledge of steps and grace of movement that is theirs. When you consider, however, how many hundred children go to the making of every large pantomime it is the less surprising, for if the child has not been in a pantomime herself she is almost certain to have had a friend who had a friend who achieved such glory. The familiarity, therefore, of the London child with such characters as Mary, Mary Quite Contrary, or the Queen who was in the Parlour, would alone have justified Mrs. and Miss Tenison in their pretty, nursery rhyme doll-dressing. Among them you could also see Dick Whittington with his bundle and his cat, Baby, Baby Bunting in a little rabbit skin, and a really splendid Robinson Crusoe who showed you how he could do so in a real skin costume and with a Polly on his shoulder. Miss Jacomb Hood, as usual, showed her great skill in costume design, with a pretty Puritan, a Jap, and dolls representing various historical periods, while Miss G. Mackenzie appealed to the childish imagination with the services of the realm, soldiers, sailors, postmen. Among her twenty-four dolls Miss G. Murray included a Jap and some Follies, and Mrs. Weinemann provided a dozen sturdy Tyrolers of both sexes. Miss G. Williams must, I think, have enjoyed dressing her Pickwickian characters, the lady in elegant grey satin frills, the gentleman in a smart blue coat with seals, and one of the neatest top hats, as must also Mrs. H. Shelley her six pretty costume dolls, and Miss Florence Huntley her Folly and her Irish colleen. Two dozen of the prettiest and most comfortable dolls were dressed by Miss C. Cann, who made a special point of warm and suitable underclothing; beautifully made, too, were the sweaters, caps, tunics, and underwear of Miss Bradshaw's family of twenty-one. Nearly half a hundred more owed their nice straw hats and generally clean appetising appearance to Mrs. A. Boulton, while the Misses Delgado contrived to give their twenty-four dolls—including a bride, a little boy, and a tailor-made young woman—a particularly shapely appearance. Dressers of dozens were Miss C. Dunstan, one gentleman of the party being provided with a watch; Mrs. Whitehead, who gave a great variety of material; Miss Tangye, all very warm and woolly. Mrs. Verschoyle, all in good washing prints and sateens; Mrs. Neilson Potter, herself an American, confesses to disapproval of Truth's attitude towards Americans generally, but heaped coals of fire by sending a dozen excellently dressed all the way from France. Half-dozens owed pretty brown dresses, white bows, and fashionable hats to Miss S. Ravenscourt, and some excellent boy costumes to Miss M. Collingwood, and six more to Mrs. Webb, who, I hope, was able to come and see them herself, and yet another six to two little girls who had been in the West London Hospital, and sent them through Miss F. Gibbon, and two more sets to Miss Alice Lincoln, these last very nice, and to Mrs. Parker's village girls' class. Mrs. Evans dressed a boy and girl in pink silk, while Miss S. F. Jones, care of Miss Douglas, was responsible for one trio, carefully dressed in pink and blue, and Mrs. W. Collins for another in fashionable tunics and squirrel muffs. Ten pretty dolls were given by Miss B. Hardy, one having a nice red serge coat and skirt, and by Miss J. Snell, aged sixteen.

SET PIECES.

Fairyland by Night and Day.

Common sense in doll-dressing is so valuable an asset that it is sometimes apt to leave room for no other asset. Yet while it is quite true that good needlework is a good example to the youthful mind, that sensibly dressed dolls certainly last longer and give greater encouragement to the better development of the maternal instinct we hear so much about, the queer imaginativeness of so many children after all leaves scope for a good many qualities besides common sense.

I once knew a family of dolls, for instance, in which the most sensibly dressed doll was invariably selected to stand in the corner or to take nasty medicine; she was even compelled to lend some of her many nice garments to those who had fewer. The favourite of the family, on the other hand, was a harlequin, whose sprightly ways quite outbalanced the virtues of the sensible doll. It all depends how you look at things, and for this reason the phantasy of the set pieces is certain to find as resounding an echo in some childish heart as do those dolls dressed on principles of hygiene and common sense.

As long as there are children there will be fairies, and children, luckily, are confined to no particular age. And an unusually fine crop of fairies on strictly fairy conventions is one of the features of this year's doll show. In her "Home of the Will-o'-the-Wisps" Miss Alice M. Sandbrook evidently modelled herself upon the beautiful "Midsummer Night's Dream" of a few years ago. The difficulties of arrangement were not slight. For Will-o'-the-Wisps—sixty of them—being of the "genus masculinum," had none of the advantages pertaining to sparkling robes and flowing hair. But Miss Sandbrook was wonderfully successful not only in clothing her little people, but in cutting their little-boy tunics to give them almost more shapeliness than is usually claimed by Will-o'-the-Wisps out of their own home. Against a deep blue background, lighted by a silver floor, sparkling little figures, bearing little lanterns, and wearing all the night shades of purple, blue, red, or green, disported themselves, together with ducks and frogs, among banks of moss and arches of laurel leaves. Both in design and in colour-scheme nothing could have been more charming.

In "Fairyland" some very staunch friends—the Misses B. and F. Glave—combined both the fairy and the Christmas suggestion. Fairyland was indeed a very superior kind of transformation scene, in which rainbow colours flashed up over the snowy whiteness, according to your point of view. The white frosted setting, glittering with icicles, and its northern lights were most ingeniously contrived by reflections thrown up from different colour foils below. Fifty fairies, clad in white and silver, and with silvery wings, flitted about among the bare tree branches, centring, however, round a gorgeously clad snow-queen. In fairyland not even falling snow is cold, of course, and thus the fifty lightly clad fairies and silver butterflies regaled themselves and their visitors with every appearance of comfort.

There need be no more question about a visit of Chantecler to this country. Chantecler came, dressed by Miss Pearson, with scenery by Miss Gresley, and to make assurance doubly sure he brought his audience with him—some forty souls in all. Mme. Le Bargy as the hen-pheasant was a model of ingenuity, while a real cock must, I fear, have come to an untimely end to provide Chantecler himself with raiment. Of the dog and the blackbird I do not know which was the more lifelike, but of the realism of the audience seated on the red seats there could be no doubt.

The natural dolls offered to Miss Adelaide Webb an opportunity for a children's hospital ward, which she seized to great advantage. The babies in their pretty pink and blue cots looked particularly real, except perhaps for the ruddiness of their complexion, from which no amount of nursing could detract. The nurse in her clean print gown and some very smart visitors completed the dramatis personæ; but not the least attraction of the scene was a lavish supply of toilet accessories, soap to get in baby eyes, combs for hair that only maternal eyes could discover. Miss Webb was also responsible for "A Tempting Bait," wherein some children and a dog were playing on impressionist grass, and a little boy was offering an apple to ar enthusiastic horse.

Town and Country.

Rank and fashion in town could be found at Miss Grace Scholefield's "Cosy Corner Tea Rooms," which in its general tone, its subdued luxury and the elegance of its frequenters—nineteen all told—offered a model to those who think to find salvation in tea-room keeping. The "Cosy Corner" was, I imagine, in Bond Street, for its flirtatious corners bear a remarkable resemblance to some other corners in the same locality. The waitresses affected a demure grey and white costume and looked as though butter would not melt in their mouths. Not a single man but wore or carried a top-hat of the most correct form; the women's costumes defied description, but even more notable were the millinery effects, and I particularly noted an enormous confection trimmed with geranium. One mamma brought her little boy, whose stony stare was directed more at the tea-things—with their promise of a better time to come—than at the Chippendale chairs, upon which alone presumably your real man or woman of fashion condescends to sit.

How rank and fashion endure the country could be deducted from Miss F. Brendon's picnic, twenty-four strong. This was none of your grass-and-spiders picnics. While it is true that the conventional kettle was being boiled in the conventional gipsy fashion, and while the company—or at least part of it—sought to preserve the illusion of rural pleasures by seating itself heroically upon the grass, there was yet a nice white cloth to ward off the attentions of anything that crept or crawled or flew or ran. Silver forks and spoons invited the company to partake in a civilised fashion of salmon, ham, lobster—to say nothing of delicious-looking creams. Champagne was freely served, and you distinguished it from the mineral waters by looking for the napkin that effected the difference. The women were no rustic maidens with too evident complexions and a giggle, but people who took their pleasures seriously without a smile. One of them actually wore a veil, while the tweeds of the men had a veritable air of having been procured especially for the occasion.

Nursery Rhymes.

The pithiness of the average nursery rhyme makes it a good basis for a set piece, and Miss Bayley brought Jack Spratt and his wife quite up to date. In fact, everything that a modern Jack Spratt could require was here in evidence, except the fat and lean, which by a law of nature were incompatible with a "platter clean." Jack Spratt's house was, I should think, furnished by one of the big companies. The table was laid with every detail, from napkins to cruets. On the sideboard you could get another clean platter should you so desire. Particularly in evidence were the bottles, and they proved that one of the advantages of the set piece as opposed to real life is that proportions don't really matter. Mrs. Hartley Foulger made a study of "I" who was going to St. Ives. The seven wives were so openly displayed as to suggest a shameless disregard for polygamy. Each wife had seven sacks, each sack had seven cats, and, presumably, within the seven sacks were the—let me see—forty-nine kits; but at this point Mrs. Foulger realised the value of leaving something to the imagination.

The topical note was struck by Miss Dorothy Leaver with "The Lady of Fashion and the Suffragette." Derived from a cartoon in one of the women's papers, the lady of fashion was represented as a nicely dressed but callous person who wouldn't look at a Suffragette offering her "Votes for Women." In the background were other fashionable ladies, who presumably had also neglected their opportunities. Mrs. D. Buckler's "Sport of Fools, Old Clothes" represented a jester marrying a couple, and was a scene taken from "Gentleman of France."

Henry VIII. and his Wives.

The set pieces, with their suggestion of a story, evoked great enthusiasm on the part of many little folk who braved the elements to come and look at them. One little boy, whose paternal instinct was evidently very well developed, kept on declaring in a loud, high voice that he wanted to buy a Will o' the Wisp to take home, and no amount of adult reasoning about the poor little children for whom the toys were designed could remove from his mind a strong sense of injustice. Nor was he alone in his grievance, for an old man who had a little niece expressed much the same wish in rather different terms. The fairies on the whole made the most whole-hearted appeal, and the "Ohs" and "Ahs" and "Look, Nannys" were encouraging premonitions of other "Ohs" and "Ahs" from future owners to whom "Nannys" are unknown.

Big Dolls.

The big doll—and the Truth big dolls reach about to the waist of an average person—has much the same scope in life as the big wig. To begin with, she has a large public, and her presence in a ward is noted by all the occupants of the ward, who now and again have the honour of being personally introduced to her. Sometimes, by the way, the big doll is not feminine, but I use the feminine pronoun just as one speaks of a dog as "he" and a cat as "she." She is not meant for everyday use, except now and again, and she exists on the principle that more people know Tom Fool than Tom Fool knows. Further, she allows much greater scope for dressing than do her smaller friends. Every doll-dresser has encountered the difficulty of achieving correct proportions with stuffs proportionately much too thick to look anything but stiff and hard. Everybody knows that whereas kid shoes on a big doll look almost natural, on a little one it is difficult to find kid thin enough to get any shape at all. Thus, while little dolls really need Lilliputian stuffs, big dolls are able to share with advantage the stuffs that their dressers would procure for themselves. Finally, doll-anatomy is such a great and wondrous thing in that it provides Chinese feet for the majority of dolls, arms half the usual length, and heads of hair that cannot be vied with even with hair-advertisements; but in the case of the big doll it is easier to correct "nature." Legs can be shortened, padded, bodies stuffed, without the ensuing clumsiness that obtains in the case of the little doll. Thus, while the little doll certainly has the pull from the point of view of affection of the individual, the big doll, like the big wig, has wonder, admiration, perhaps even a little envy from the many.

Dolls and History.

It is, I suppose, true that Henry VIII. had something to do with the Reformation, that he suppressed monasteries, that he was written about by one William Shakespeare—or another, and that he is at present occupying the attention of one of our leading actors. But the fact that really does stand out in one's mind concerning Henry VIII. is that he had six wives, and that though his beard was not blue he stands for a traditional figure of our youthful days. Even among our educational authorities the naming of Henry VIII.'s wives in proper order receives due recognition—indeed, I am quite positive that no one is properly acquainted with the history of his own country who cannot remember the chant of Katharine of Arragon, Anne Boleyn—ending up safely with the two other Katharines.

Mrs. K. C. Wallace's gorgeous "Henry VIII. and Wives" was, therefore, bound from the first to be immensely popular, and the elaborate method in which the piece was carried out met with approbation even from those who had recently seen the play. Clad in sumptuous green and purple velvet trimmed with sable and lined with ermine, Henry himself had the true Bourchier straddle, his fat white legs being padded for the purpose. His cap with the ostrich feather, his slashed sleeves, and white shirt, even a budding beard and moustache—fair, not blue—and his garters were the very personification of Tudor royalty. That he stood out a central figure amid all his wives at once—a contingency of which we have no historic record—says much for Miss Wallace's ideas of values. Of the wives, Anne of Cleeves in crimson and gold, her velvet shoes sewn with pearls, her ruby cross, lace undersleeves and dog-collar, was so beautiful as to make incredible Henry's rejection of her as not coming up to the standard of Holbein's portrait. Poor Anne Boleyn, little recking of her fate, wore a pink velvet and white petticoat, her head-dress richly adorned with jewels such as she might have worn on one of Henry's visits to Hever; Katharine Howard, too, as though in anticipation of a like fate, wore old rose satin over a white petticoat, trimmed with pearls and head-dress to match. The most distinctive note was rightly struck by Katharine of Arragon, sumptuously arrayed in royal blue velvet, the long sleeves trimmed with sable over a criss-cross petticoat, the pentagonal head-dress framing her face, which had not quite the requisite aloofness. The mother of Edward VI., Jane Seymour, was considered worthy of nothing less than cloth of gold with pearl and miniver trimmings. In view of the recent outcry about calling furs by their proper names, I should not like to vouch for its being ermine, or for the black spots being the regulation lamb's skin sewn in. But the effect was the same—or almost—and struck a very regal note, together with Jane's mauve velvet petticoat, and her amethyst and pearl ornaments. Katharine Parr's determined looking red-brocade over a white and gold petticoat, with shoes to match, gave her an appearance of having every intention of outliving Henry, and there seems to have been no doubt of her success in urging him to take a proper view of the toilette of a queen of England—even though she were but one-sixth of Henry's whole queendom. All the ladies wore the long black veils attached to their head-dress, and their underclothing was of an essentially modern and useful character.

Little Girls.

In contrast to the weight of history were a number of very pretty little girl dolls, dressed in the fashions that make English children the models for foreigners all the world over. Lady Fry, for instance, sent a charming child in spotted muslin over blue—toilette table fashion. The insertion was all handsewn, and the bonnet, also white and blue, most prettily made. Bells and a comforter, which she might well have outgrown, completed this effective toilette. A little girl in pink and white hardly needed a label "Family Cares," for her struggles with a wee doll in green, a pet dog under the other arm, and two terriers on a leash was a good deal for one little person to manage. Miss M. Harvey must have put a vast amount of work into the pretty white frock threaded with blue ribbons of her doll, to which the tucks and insertion, the silk socks, the very ingenious kid shoes all bore additional evidence. On similar lines, too, was the doll dressed by Miss P. Taylor, the petticoats and knickers also being worked in blue. White and blue is always popular, but this year it seemed to be the height of juvenile fashion: Mrs. Kitty Harrop gave to her doll a party frock of white lace flounces with blue ribbon tied at the side. Blue shoes and socks pointed the moral of the dress, and a particularly nice flannel petticoat showed a prudence that does not always go with party frocks even at that tender age. Another smart frock by Mrs. Evans was of pink silk, and the wearer was also the fortunate possessor of a white cloak comfortably trimmed with white fur, and a nice woolly bonnet to match, and beautiful underthings. The fashion for veiling everything appeared in Mrs. H. Aston's doll, who looked very French in pink muslin under black net gold-spangled. Pink bows everywhere heightened the effect, and were extended even to the nice underclothing. Miss C. Cann's party frocks were of blue silk, also kilted in a rather French manner, and lightened with a lace yoke and sleeves and checked pink silk respectively. "Rosalind" and "Barbara" were dressed respectively by Miss M. Howe in a blue voile frock and a white pinafore, and a white frock with pink ribbons. Both had shoes to match, and particularly nice underclothing. Quite one of the prettiest of this group was a little girl, dressed by Mrs. Bayliss in pretty lacy clothes and beautiful little embroidered jacket and a Dutch cap with pink ribbons; while Miss E. Salmon sent a charming baby in a beautiful pink and white cot.

The Costume Doll.

The costume doll has the double advantage of being interesting to the dresser as well as to the recipient. National costumes are a very happy hunting ground for quite a number of dressers, and Truth always expects a proportion of Tyrolese, French peasant women, and Irish colleens. Mrs. Auerbach leads off with no fewer than six big dolls, five of which are in some national or provincial costume. Of these the "Le Puy Lacemaker" was perhaps the most original in her dress of some curious stuff that suggests upholstery, and was, I should think, warranted to appeal to a frugal French mind by wearing for ever. A white cap, apron, front and collar, and last, but not least, a real little lace-cushion completed this effective costume. A girl and a boy from Appenzell complimented each other very nicely, he in white breeches with black bows at the knees, black velvet coat with silver buttons and red braid, and a handsome watch tucked into his black sash; she in a red velvet bodice, also silver-buttoned, a crimson petticoat, and a gorgeous blue satin apron. Two Gretchen plaits added greatly to the charm of her appearance. To another doll Mrs. Auerbach gave a party frock, white lace over blue, and with very lacy underclothing. Another kind of "entente cordiale" was suggested by the Misses J. Travers with "Britannia" and "Germania." Britannia, with her usual emblems, the shield and trident, was ruling the waves in white satin painted with aeroplanes and "Dreadnoughts;" "Germania"—and let England beware—appeared to be doing very much the same thing in red, white, and black instead of red, white, and blue, and her individuality was the more emphasised by the addition of a Zeppelin—though I don't know which one—upon her satin dress.

Miss Weinemann, herself a native of Switzerland, sent, in addition to her two dozen small dolls, two large ones, also clad in Swiss costume. Both wore black lace caps, and one had a black velvet skirt; the other a very smart red one, upon which a blue satin apron produces a wonderful colour effect. Miss Wolfe also sent a peasant from Appenzell with the silver chains and black-winged cap, and a very interesting Norman lady of 1830. This last is a fashion that might well be revived, and some of us would be seen to great advantage in an old rose striped figured muslin with black velvet edges, and a rose silk apron with quite delightful pockets, patent shoes and flashing buckles. An Oberammergau boy, dressed by Mrs. Bullock, completed the list of national dresses with his wonderful embroidered trousers, braces, tie, and shirt, to say nothing of his felt hat with its well-known tail feather.

Red Riding Hood.

Red Riding Hood is every whit as popular as Henry VIII.—possibly because tragedy entered into both their lives, probably because nothing tones in with the popular conception of Christmas, snow and holly berries, as does the world-famous red cloak. And Red Riding Hood is at her best this year. Mrs. R. H. Shaw, for instance, provided her Red Riding Hood, in addition to the famous hood, with a charming short white embroidered frock and a really big basket heavy with real honey, real little cakes and real Quaker oats, which did duty for pottage. Miss Sandford's exemplar went to the length of a white silk frock, beautifully smocked in green; the underclothes, too, were all hand-made, the flannel petticoat being nicely scalloped. Miss E. Walker clothed Red Riding Hood in serviceable washing stuffs, and gave her, in addition, a nice little pair of tan shoes, while Mrs. Compton's, with her pale blue dress, her muslin pinny and her basket, was probably the most faithful adherent of Red Riding Hood conventions. Mrs. Compton also sent two other large dolls in white embroidery, one prettily tied up with pink, the other with blue.

Marriage a la Mode.

Though marriage and giving in marriage is not everywhere looked upon as essential, the mute admission of its necessity usually finds its way into the Truth Doll Show. And to compensate for there being only two brides this year, Miss M. Powell sent a whole wedding party—at least, all the interesting part of it; bride, who looked lovely in white satin and court train, white veil and orange blossom, and who wore pearls; bridesmaids in white embroidered muslin dresses and white caps, relieved by yellow ribbons and yellow baskets with yellow contents; and two page-boys clad in pale blue satin, whose legs had evidently undergone some severe operation of curtailment in the cause of vanity. Another bride, by Mrs. Kemp, appeared in such elaborately embroidered satin with a fashionable tunic and tassels as to need no supporters.

A Doll's Wedding.

The Modern Child.

Two of the most typical, the most natural, and the most comfortable-looking of the large dolls were Mrs. Bennett's "Twins." The twins might have been about to spend Christmas in a Swiss hotel; their woolly jerseys, gaiters, trouserettes, gloves, and caps suggested all the joys of winter sport. Seated they emphasised each other, staring at you in a perfectly friendly way, and suggesting that if you had not found life enjoyable they had. All the "Twins'" garments would really fit a small child, and might some day perhaps serve to that end. Another very comfortable and elegant doll was dressed by Miss Wright in a pretty long pale blue cloth coat trimmed with white fur and lined with white silk, a warm white dress with blue embroidery and very nice underclothing. Attention to detail was here carried even to the point of buttons prettily embroidered in pale blue and mauve. Lady Auckland's doll also wore blue cashmere, nicely tucked and smocked, the whole costume prettily finished off with nice little stockings and blue shoes. Miss W. Poole gave her doll a white, high-waisted frock with nice underclothing, Mrs. G. Caulfeild was responsible for a pretty embroidered costume threaded with blue ribbons, and Mrs. Crompton for a pretty blue muslin and extremely well-made underclothing. Grown-upness in juvenile life finds an echo in doll-dressing, and some of the very smartly dressed dolls could hardly have arrived at years of discretion. Thus Miss E. Chamberlain's doll wore an elaborate pink silk trimmed with buttons and a sash. From under the short skirt you could see very nice undergarments, into which the pink suggestion was also carried; Miss Lincoln's doll, again, was dressed in old rose silk, as though to sit frequently in the drawing-room. The French juvenile waist, which is somewhere in the region of the knees, could be seen in Mrs. G. Watney's pale blue accordion-pleated doll, who also wore a mass of lace frills of the most modern suggestion. Mrs. Parker sent no fewer than three little girls, one in a nice white-striped frock, another in mauve muslin with a pretty sun-hat, and a third in a muslin kimono frock with an elaborate hat trimmed with pink roses. Most shapely, perhaps, of all was Miss J. Thompson's Jane Austen young woman in pale blue satin with a tunic, fan, purse, and masterly coiffure.

Fancy Dress.

Fancy dress always finds a devotee in Miss Jacomb Hood, and her bright green Puck, with his bullrush, was a model both of dressing and of proportions; "Gretel" and "Viola" were almost equally real. Miss Jacomb-Hood's was one of the prettiest groups. The "Grotesques," in green, appeared under the ægis of Miss D. G. Watson; while Miss Pearson sent a pretty gleaner, all in poppies and cornflowers, and Miss M. Page a little choir boy with so angelic an expression as to raise grave doubts as to his moral character. Miss Mitchell Molyneux's witch showed traces of serious study, for besides her high hat and her besom she also had frogs, snakes, spiders, and owls galore of various sizes. Of her "Esmeralda," dressed in gipsy red and yellow, "Queen of the Roses," in rose pink, and the "Fortune-Teller," the last was certainly the most effective of Miss Molyneux's group, with her green dress, red shawl, and cards as decorations.

The most humorous scene, and worthy of Max Beerbohm, was Miss G. M. Wood's "1860-1910." Here you had the Victorian lady in a full-blown crinoline of flounced pink silk surmounted by a short black silk jacket. A pink bonnet and an absurd pink parasol completed her costume. Shaking hands with her, and clad in what looked like one mauve trouser-leg, with green stockings, shoes with Cuban heels, real gloves, and an enormous hat, was the present-day Georgian woman. Both were saying together, "How ridiculous you look, my dear!"

Mrs. Campbell sent a large doll, dressed in a useful blue cotton frock, with nice knitted socks and tan shoes; while a novelty appeared in the shape of a hospital nurse, dressed by Mr. Gordon Crabbe. The machine sewing was irreproachable, and the hand work imitated the machine with complete success. Mrs. Bentheim dressed a doll in a blue dress with a low-waisted skirt, Miss G. Davis gave a pretty evening effect with yellow lampshade silk on a yellow foundation, and Miss H. A. Walker surmounted exceedingly nice under-things with a dew-drop net top over a silk foundation. A very nice cot and baby was sent by Miss A. R. Price, an old Bond Street nurse, seventy-eight years of age, for "the good of the hospital."

One characteristic of the large dolls was their almost uniformly excellent underclothing, and how greatly this adds to the beauty of the doll and to its enjoyment by the future recipients can perhaps only be realised by the recipients themselves.

Toys.

It is one of the poses of grown-ups nowadays to consider the psychological effect not only of morals and manners and such things as come rightly within their province, but also to intrude their theories into the realm of toys. Thus on the one side you have the adult who believes in the expensive mechanical toy and enlarges upon the education to the child of the motor that carries reality to the point of being continually "en panne;" on the other you have the purist who holds that a box of bricks or a bit of stuff wrapped in another bit of stuff produces more palaces and more people in the childish imagination than does any amount of modern realism. Not being a psychologist myself, I can only say that most children like most toys—with adaptations to needs which grown-ups mostly don't realise. And whatever the toy, you will generally find some child who really loves it, or supposing it does not meet with instant approval, who will adapt it to suit his own particular fancy.

On the whole, children have a strong predilection for the minute and the imitative. Something that runs about is also much appreciated, and the loss of a wheel or so, which sooner or later is most inevitable, offers as much scope for engineering imagination as does any thought-out educative scheme.

The Dolls' House.

This love of minuteness was thoroughly realised by Mr. George Duncan in his beautiful dolls' house, made entirely by himself. Fitted with every modern convenience, the house presented an imposing exterior, something resembling the modern Swiss hotel. The tower contained a real clock, which was considerate enough not to disturb the inhabitants by striking. Carefully laid on, in the roof, was an electric battery, the use of which flooded the house with electric light, and the fact that the hall reached up to the ceiling, the upstairs being available by means of stairs and a gallery, resulted in great economy in the electric lighting bill. The house was on such a scale as to admit of a billiard-room, with cues, billiard table and pockets, markers, and even the sort of sporting picture that usually ornaments such a room. The drawing-room was notified by the presence of a grand piano and photographs of King Edward and Queen Victoria on the table. Downstairs was a lavatory, nicely fitted with basins to wash your hands and towels to dry them with, and a larder opening correctly to the air—with all sorts of good things inside, by the way. You could go upstairs either on foot or by a lift, of which some kind person below turned an handle to wind you up. The bathroom was fitted up on the same scale as the lavatory. Quite apart from such details, the house was sound architecturally, the chimneys being where chimneys would be, the doors opening easily and by means of real handles, the front door having a most imposing knocker. The upper bow windows, hung with muslin curtains, gave the house a picturesque appearance, to which a weather-vane added the last realistic touch. This was one of the best dolls' houses I have ever seen.

Both.—"How ridiculous you look, my dear!!"

Picture-Books.

Picture-books have the great advantage of lasting a very long time—I mean they take considerable time to look through and help to pass long hours pleasantly. For many years Miss M. I. Thomas has sent scrap-books—home-made—to the toy-show, and they have always been most welcome. This year's batch are particularly bright and pretty, and have the attraction of the unexpected; thus you may find dogs, horses, children, what not, in juxta-position, and brightly coloured. Miss Connell also sent twelve very attractive scrap-books, which will, no doubt, get the share of thumbing that is usually the lot of this kind of entertainment, while Miss Brocklehurst was so very kind as to send eight more. The scrap-book has also the additional advantage of providing children, who are neither poor nor sick with a delightfully sticky occupation, and I received with a dear little letter, from Miss Doris Born, who confesses to seven, a scrap-book made of pictures she saved during the last year for the purpose, and no fewer than twelve more from Lucy, Harold, and Violet all very nicely made and well selected.

Home-made Toys.

Mr. John Richardson told me a few days ago that he had the pleasure again of sending me twelve of his home-made hardwood engines—made, I believe, from disused sleepers. If his pleasure was in any way equal to mine as proxy for ultimate possessors of these delightful toys, it must have been very great indeed, for these engines are not only admirable from the point of view of workmanship, but they are, I should imagine, absolutely unbreakable. Every salient feature of the engine is there, without the details that make for destruction; they are of such a size as to tempt a small foot to practise something like roller skating upon them, and the wheels are so stoutly fixed that it could do this with absolute impunity. Mr. Richardson would almost do well to take out a patent for these beautiful toys.

A very clever piece of mechanism was also sent by Mr. Ronald Maclachlan, and received quite safely by Truth—a wooden golfer in a red coat, who mechanically drove the ball with much greater certainty than many a more seasoned golfer. Unfortunately it got mislaid for the exhibition, but I hope that Mr. Maclachlan will forgive the omission in consideration of the fact that thirty thousand toys and dolls are a good deal to account for in the few days that are at our disposal. "An Indian and his Wigwam" was the work of Mr. J. E. Needham during a stay in the country, and the chamois leather tent with its neat fittings and the canoe of birch bark were very realistic.

Miscellanea.

Among the other toys, beasts, on a big scale, perhaps took the first place, and small visitors immensely enjoyed the zoo that was set out before them. There was a most life-like donkey, upon which somebody—probably a good many somebodies—would ride; a crocodile that would have struck terror into many a small heart before it realised that crocodiles mostly preferred alarum clocks; a Sheer Khan tiger, bears, both wild and dancing—this last with a pole—the stripiest zebra you ever saw, and a goat with a positively Satanic expression were but a few of the menagerie.

All of us, I suppose, have had in our time a weakness for Indians, though it took Mr. Barrie to express this feeling officially. Two smart Indian wigwams, therefore, were certain of approval; a see-saw, upon which balanced precariously a sort of Tweedledum and Tweedledee, took a central place between them, while a motor-car—I can vouch for its works up to the steering-wheel—and a lifeboat balanced each other on either side. A Punch and Judy show, several dolls' houses, and last, but not least, Father Christmas surmounting the whole, were the principal among a number of other entertaining toys.

I must not forget to mention the 11,000 new sixpences which for so many years have been a feature of the Truth Doll Show. Most people will remember how for many years £275 worth of new sixpences were sent by a "Friend," whose identity was not disclosed until his death. Since then an effort has been made to continue the gift of the sixpences as a memorial to the kind-hearted Sir Francis Tress Barry, who realised the joy that a small silver coin of one's own could evoke in the hearts of those to whom a sixpence was so great a rarity.

Another generous gift, and one that also has become a tradition, was the twenty thousand crackers sent by Messrs. Tom Smith, Ltd. I do not know why Christmas should be connected with crackers, unless Mr. Tom Smith made it so, but the fact remains that even grown-up people refuse to eat a Christmas dinner without this variation of the feux de joie, and a table that is not strewn with coloured paper, trinkets, scraps, and mottoes is hardly considered eligible for turkey, plum-pudding and other Christmas delicacies. There was a time when we were contented with very simple crackers indeed, but when you remember how real trinkets, Japanese flowers, conjuring tricks, and mechanical devices find their way into crackers you will not find it surprising that the gift of Messrs. Tom Smith is not only very seasonable, but also very pretty indeed.

The Visitors.

The Truth Doll Exhibition began its career on a very small scale, and for many years anyone was allowed to go and see it free of charge. By the time it had so increased in dimensions as to necessitate its removal to the biggest hall in London it was thought that some of the money necessary for its continuance might be collected by imposing an entrance fee of one shilling. This year the former state of things was reverted to, and both entrance and programmes were free on presentation of a visiting card. Unfortunately, grown-ups feel the necessity in going to such a show at least of finding an excuse in the shape of a small child whatsoever, and the small child is naturally somewhat dependent upon the weather. The heavy rain of Wednesday therefore resulted in there being a smaller increase in the attendance than was hoped. Every year, however, Truth invites a certain number of children from the London charity schools, workhouses, and receiving homes—a few from each—to come and see the show of which they will receive a part, and it pays their fares to the Albert Hall and provides responsible persons to bring them and take them safely back. Over a hundred of these children visited the show on the Wednesday morning—some of those invited being detained by measles or what not at their particular institution. Poor little trim, demure figures—there were also 30,920 who did not come—they gave way for once to whole-hearted enthusiasm, and a chorus of praise and wonder went up such as is not often heard even at the Albert Hall. Other little visitors in mackintoshes and rubber top-boots looked at them with a certain curiosity, but in their enthusiasm both "state" children and individual children met for once on common ground—I am not sure, indeed, whether the sight of the toys did not suggest to the other children that, after all, there might be advantages in being a "state" child; the little boy I have already mentioned certainly thought so. On the Thursday the better weather resulted in a crowd running into several thousands. In relieves Parents of the responsibility of finding for their Sons and Daughters permanent and lucrative appointments in His Majesty's Civil Service or in Business Houses.

Training that Pays

Ensuring Permanent Appointments at Good Salaries.

No wise parent, nowadays, fails to realise the necessity of giving his boys and girls a training such as will produce an income for them sufficient to ensure independence and prosperity in after life.

In many respects no other careers can compare with those open to well-trained youths and young ladies in His Majesty's Civil Service and in business.

CLARK'S COLLEGE is the Largest and most Successful Centre training for these Posts.

It holds practically a monopoly of all Civil Service appointments offered to girls; it secures the highest positions in the Civil Service open to boys, whilst in the Business World the best appointments are given to its students.

The great feature about Clark's College training is that it is "Training for Appointments." Every student on the business side is placed out into a good post as soon as proficient, whilst in the Civil Service department every earnest student secures an appointment after a short course of training.

Day and Evening Classes, also Tuition by Post Direct to the Home.

the evening particularly many people took advantage of the opportunities both of sight and sound that were offered them and came—some with children, some merely because they were still unashamed to have a weakness for dolls.

The Concerts.

Mr. H. C. Tonking has given his services to the Truth doll show ever since it came to the Albert Hall, and each morning he gave a splendid recital on the great organ. On the Wednesday he began with a new march composed by him specially for the doll show.

Both afternoons were filled by Miss Gwynne Kimpton, on Wednesday with her own orchestra and on Thursday with a band composed of members of the Strings Club. Strictly speaking, Miss Gwynne Kimpton confines herself chiefly to classical music, but she very kindly adapted herself to the gaiety of the occasion, and besides such well-known selections as the Peer Gynt Suite, the Henry VIII. Dances, and the "Contes d'Hoffmann," this last being encored again and again, gave a number of waltzes, which were very much appreciated. A ladies' orchestra does not often achieve the tone and volume of sound as that conducted by Miss Gwynne Kimpton.

On Wednesday evening an instrumental concert was arranged very kindly by Messrs. Ascherberg, Hopwood, and Crew, Ltd., with Mr. W. A. Volk and Mr. Reginald Somerville at the piano. Songs, violin solos, and recitations—some humorous—were listened to between much applause, Mr. Jamieson Dodds, Mr. Lyell Johnson, Mr. C. A. Wright, Miss Elizabeth Newbold, Mr. Robert Königsberg, Mr. F. Clive Hammant, Miss Christine Roy, and Mr. Wilfrid Platt being among those who kindly volunteered their services.

Mr. Jenkins's Mandoline Band, which gave a concert on Thursday evening, had an audience suitable to its popularity, and some of the items had to be repeated again and again. Mr. Jenkins is another old friend who has supported the "Truth Doll Show" through many experiences, and the lightness and sparkle of the mandolines were particularly suited for an occasion when everyone who did not feel gay at least had a feeling that it was his bounden duty to become so. Between selections by the band, Miss Bessie Lang, Mr. J. Andrew Clark, and Miss May Doubleday most kindly lent their services.

In spite of so large a musical capacity to draw upon throughout the day, there were intervals which were filled most successfully by the Radiaphone, kindly lent for the occasion by the Radiaphone Syndicate, of 57, Moorgate Street. The Radiaphone is, as its name indicates, a development of the gramophone, only instead of shooting the sound at you, it has a funnel-shaped radiator standing perpendicular, and sending out the sound in all directions. When the size of the Albert Hall is remembered, some idea can be gained of its power, for it filled the whole place. Voices come out better perhaps than instrumental music, and Madame Clara Butt's "Abide with Me" evoked a burst of applause. Caruso also could for once be heard for nothing in "Pagliacci," and the instrument lent itself wonderfully to the peculiar quality of his voice. The 'Miserere" from "Il Trovatore," sung by Amelia Talexis, Luigi Longobardi, and the Scala chorus, was also one of the successes of the Radiaphone, the faithful accuracy of tone and expression being a revelation to those who had not previously heard it.

The "Truth Doll Show," as has been amply shown, is entirely dependent on voluntary work. In the first place, subscriptions are necessary—and this necessity, I would note, does not end with the exhibition; in the second, an incredible amount of time and trouble is spent over dressing and arrangement; thirdly, the musical co-operation of so many musical friends makes all the difference to the success of the show, and fourthly, the show would lose its value but for the interest of those who come to see it to be reminded of its purpose.

EMPLOYMENT AFTER EDUCATION.

The Views of the Duchess of Marlborough, the King's Solicitor-General, & Sir Albert Rollit

(ex-President of the London Chamber of Commerce).

Perhaps the most pressing national problem of the day is the unemployment that exists among all classes of society—among the educated and refined, as well as among labourers and artisans. But while the case of the latter is ever before the public mind, the pressing need of the former is often overlooked.

The opinions of such men as Sir Samuel Evans and Sir Albert Rollit cannot fail to be of interest to all concerned in the welfare of the rising generation, while the views of such a striking personality as the Duchess of Marlborough must also carry great weight with parents and guardians.

History.

The Solicitor-General, from the chair at the recent twenty-first anniversary of Kensington College, said :—

"The history of the College is the history of a progressive institution, which is really required in our educational system. Constantly men in public life have brought to their attention young people, some from the schools, some from the colleges—yes, indeed, some from the Universities —who say they have attained their degrees or achieved success in their colleges and schools, and who yet do not know how to perform the actual work of life. That part of the educational system of this country which is deficient in many respects from the public point of view appears to me to be admirably done by this College. The College is certainly filling a most excellent place in our educational system."

Sir Albert Rollit, on the same occasion, stated that, in his opinion, "the College had solved one of the greatest, the most complex, and the most difficult of all educational problems—that of securing Employment after Education."

The Duchess of Marlborough referred to the great pleasure it had been to her to come into personal contact with the students of the College. She had watched them at their work with the keenest interest, and commended especially the practical nature of the instruction given. She said :—

"It is this practical aspect which especially appeals to me, for we all know that many young men and women who have received the highest education are unable, from want of knowledge of technical and secretarial work to obtain posts worthy of their acceptance. The education which they receive at Kensington College does away with this difficulty, and completes their training, making it efficient and business-like. They are not only fitted to fill posts, but they are also guaranteed a good position to start with."

Her Grace went on to wish all the students—and in particular the young women — the greatest success in their careers, and stated she considered much credit was due to the Director, Mr. J. Munford, for the splendid results achieved by the graduates of Kensington College.

Mr. James Munford was able to state in the course of his speech that on this the twenty-first anniversary of the foundation of the College there was not a single qualified student seeking an appointment, and that during the past twenty-one years the applications for the services of the College graduates had exceeded the number of students available.

The College had also succeeded in capturing the blue riband of the London Chamber of Commerce for proficiency in modern languages, and had obtained a long list of successes at the various examinations.

Aim.

The aim of Kensington College is to provide for every boy and girl a definite and practical training, followed by the absolute guarantee of a remunerative career as soon as the student be qualified to perform the duties thereof.

Motto.

The motto adopted by the College is one suggested by the Right Hon. the Earl of Lytton, when speaking from the chair at a recent distribution. Having in mind Dante's dread warning over the gates of the Inferno, he thought it would be appropriate to inscribe over the portals of Kensington College the following variation thereof: "Have every hope all ye who enter here."

Training.

The students are trained as private secretaries, English and foreign correspondents, accountants, and book-keepers, and for other vocations of a responsible and remunerative nature.

Kensington College Diploma.

When they have given sufficient practical proof of their ability to discharge their duties in a thoroughly efficient manner, they are granted the Kensington College Diploma, more valuable than the diploma of any other institution in the world, seeing that the holder possesses the right of introduction to a dignified and remunerative career.

Guaranteed Appointments and Salaries.

Improbable as it may seem to the unitiated, the trouble at Kensington College is not to secure appointments for the candidates, but to prepare quickly enough properly qualified candidates to fill the ever-increasing number of vacancies placed in the hands of the Director.

The opinion which the late Lord Nunburnholme held of Kensington College is evidenced by his taking the chair at a recent distribution of prizes by her Grace the Dowager Duchess of Roxburghe, and by his lordship having applied to the College for the services of secretaries at salaries of £130 Resident (for a lady), £250 and £800 per annum.

The Rev. Canon Barker said on this occasion :—

"Kensington College differs from any other I have ever heard of, inasmuch as it not only educates the students, but provides positions for them in the world afterwards."

Alma Mater.

The increasing demand from peers, members of Parliament, authors, doctors, solicitors, architects and other professional men, often enables the College to materially improve the position of ex-students.

Prospectus and Souvenir.

A card addressed to Miss Verity D. Munford, Secretary, Kensington College, will bring full particulars of the Guaranteed Appointment System, as well as a dainty Souvenir similar to that graciously accepted by her Royal Highness Princess Louise, Duchess of Argyll, and a Prospectus, for which the Director has received the thanks of Her Majesty Queen Alexandra.

New Premises.

The New Premises at 34, Gloucester Gardens, were recently opened by Her Grace Katherine Duchess of Westminster. It is a wholly detached building, eminently suited to its purpose, and very pleasantly situated, every window looking on trees and gardens. Two minutes west of Paddington Station, close to the Tube and District Railway, it is one of the most accessible, as well as the most pleasant, of the educational establishments of London.

Spring Term opens on 12th January next, for which the vacancies are few and inquiries many, and in a few days it will be impossible to enrol any more new pupils.

Consultations.

The Director invites applications from the readers of Truth for advice on the subject of a suitable career for a boy or girl, of the previous twelve months, while the cash was smaller by £10,236, although the average realised per acre, 14s. 5d., was 1d. in excess of that realised in the previous year. The board had discussed with Mr. James Gardiner, their land agent, the whole subject of the company's land policy. An important feature of their proposals was that, instead of making the actual volume of the land sold the primary consideration, they should concentrate their efforts on attracting settlers of a high class and with such an amount of capital as would ensure the land being turned to the very best advantage. Dwelling-houses, sheds, and all necessary outbuildings were to be erected by the company on these farms, of about 300 acres each, the water to be laid on, and one-third of the land to be cleared, thus bringing it into a condition ready for immediate cultivation.

The report was adopted unanimously.

On the proposition of Mr. Beckwith Smith, seconded by Sir John Purcell, and supported by other shareholders, a resolution was passed, with one dissentient, authorising the payment to the directors of a sum equivalent to two years' remuneration, in view of the very large amount of work involved in the preparation and carrying through of the scheme of arrangement.

DUNLOP PNEUMATIC TYRE COMPANY, LIMITED.

The annual general meeting of the shareholders in the Dunlop Pneumatic Tyre Company, Limited, was held on the 16th inst. at the offices, 14, Regent Street, London, Mr. Harvey du Cros (the chairman) presiding.

The secretary (Mr. A. Cunningham) having read the notice convening the meeting and the report of the auditors,

The Chairman said that he had only congratulations to offer on the appearance of the balance-sheet. Appearances were said to be deceptive, but he did not think that that held good in that instance. It was, in fact, the healthiest balance-sheet ever presented to them under the existing organisation. They would notice that the period covered was only eleven months instead of twelve. The idea had been to make the period ten months, but the difficulties of comparison would have been so great that the board had finally determined on eleven months, and so had made the financial year synchronise with that of the Dunlop Rubber Company, in which they were so largely interested. If they compared the eleven months with the previous twelve they would find from the report that the profits were rather better than for the previous year. The report also pointed out that the constitution of the profits differed, though practically the broad result was that it made no difference in the dispositions of the company for the year. They were getting the same dividend and were making the same provisions.

The difference in the constitution of the company was based upon the credit note which the report stated was to be handed to them by the Dunlop Rubber Company. The circumstances in which that note was proposed had never arisen before, and they devoutly hoped would never occur again—he thought, indeed, that he might venture to say that they never could recur to the same extent or at all in relation to their effect on the profits. The question of that credit note had been brought before the Dunlop Rubber Company's shareholders at the earlier meeting that day, and had been passed without dissent of any kind—he thought, indeed, in a complimentary and congratulatory sense. The Rubber Company, he thought, had recognised their sportsmanlike conduct in maintaining the full volume of the business, although they were threatened with a loss on that business for the time being. Also he thought that the rubber company had recognised particularly how sportsmanlike and wise it had been of them to maintain the quality of the tyres, although that action was leading to loss. Their company could, of course, when it found itself threatened with a loss, have declined orders instead of maintaining the full flow of business, or could have requested the rubber company to make inferior goods at a lower price. The directors of both companies were largely the same, although on each board there were independent directors who had to fight the corners of their respective companies. It was, however, necessary that the directors should be largely the same, because the community of interests was so great that it would be impossible to separate them if there were different boards, and one or other of the companies would be bound to suffer unduly. As it was, the aim of the directors was to maintain the interests of both companies, and by the passing of that credit note their interests had been maintained through a very difficult time—in fact, through a crisis—and they had been enabled to pursue the even tenour of their way. They had, he thought, managed in that matter much better than their friends in Paris. They had suffered the loss and inconvenience of a flood not only last year, but in the current year, whereas they, though the rise in rubber prices had swamped their company for the time being, were not likely to suffer in the same respect again.

What the directors proposed to do was to remove the company from the effects of the speculative nature of the raw material. That would always fluctuate in price, but the arrangement proposed would to some extent restrict the speculative possibilities for the company. At the present the more business they did the more they might lose, whereas in future the more business they did the more profit they would make. As to the future, the business prospects of the company were larger and wider than at any previous time in its existence. The difficulty would be to produce sufficient goods to meet requirements. As a result of their action in the difficult times of last year the company was in possession of orders that would tax its resources and those of the rubber company. In other words, the volume of business was enormous, the development for the three and a-half months that had elapsed of the current year being astounding. They intended to go on with the business and not incur the charge of being among the "idle rich." He thought that in view of the expansion of the business, which was very great, the balance-sheet of next year would be free from the unusual item of the credit note, and that they would show good results. There was an item in the balance-sheet—viz., the sale of investments—which did not look healthy, but it was really quite a wholesome proceeding, as it had been sold to the rubber company at a profit to this company, and they held a 78 per cent. interest in that company, which, moreover, could deal more advantageously with that particular investment than this company could. The proceeds would thus come back to them in the form of dividends on their holding in the rubber company. With regard to the rubber market, there was no need for him to dwell on that subject beyond saying that for the future it was proposed that this company should be independent of the rubber market, which he thought was a very good thing, having regard to the influences which were at work there and which they could not control. In conclusion, the chairman moved the adoption of the report and accounts.

Mr. Bosanquet seconded the motion, which was carried unanimously; the usual formal business was transacted, and a vote of thanks to the chairman for presiding terminated the proceedings.

GENERAL MOTOR CAB COMPANY, LIMITED.

The fourth ordinary general meeting was held on the 13th inst. at Salisbury House, London Wall, E.C., Mr. Davison Dalziel, M.P., presiding.

The Chairman, in the course of his remarks, said :—Though the results, so far as they relate to the profit and loss account, show a small diminution over the balance of the profits carried to the balance-sheet last year, yet on making the comparison of the figures there will be noticed certain features which make this year's figures compare very favourably with those of last year. The gross profit shown is £231,011 3s. 7d., to which must be added various other items of receipts, bringing the total up to £233,142 16s. 5d. On the other hand, it will be noticed that standing expenses, which are charged against this total gross profit (to which must be added this year the debenture trustee fees and the discount on the 5 per cent. debenture issue which are being written off over a period of six years) are generally less than those of last year. Turning to the balance-sheet, it will be noticed that our reserves are still further increased by the additions which have been made this year. The directors have pleasure in recommending the payment of a dividend of 3½ per cent. on the preferred ordinary shares, making, with the previous dividend paid on January 31, the usual dividend of 7 per cent. on the preferred ordinary shares. Of the £92,735 13s. 5d. brought forward from the profit and loss account for the previous year £83,382 19s. 11d. is reserved for distribution in equal parts among the holders of deferred shares and preferred ordinary shares. Speaking generally, in view of the trading of the past financial year, I may say that the company has now settled down into a condition of normal trading. We have had to face competition from new companies with new cabs, but this was not unforeseen, and, judging by the results this year, it cannot be said that we have suffered very much from it. Indeed, there is plenty of room in this big metropolis for other companies, and we need not fear for the future if we keep to the policy which the boards is doing its best to advance; that is, efficiency and economy in the management and care in the direction of the finances of the company. The future is reassuring, and I hope I may not be deemed too optimistic if I say that we expect the present year's trading to be a satisfactory one. The Coronation will bring a very large number of people to the metropolis, and we look forward to a demand for locomotion which will strain our cab resources to the utmost, as well as prove extremely remunerative. I think I should mention that negotiations between ourselves and the next important all-English cab enterprise in London—the W. and G.—are in progress. These negotiations will, if carried through, prove of the utmost importance to the permanent welfare of both interests, and will, I can safely say in advance, meet with the heartiest and immediate approval of our shareholders.

After some discussion the motion was adopted unanimously.

VAN RYN GOLD MINES ESTATE, LIMITED.

The fifteenth annual ordinary general meeting was held on the 14th inst. at Winchester House, Old Broad Street, E.C., Mr. F. A. Gillam (chairman of the company) presiding.

The Chairman, in the course of his speech, said : Such of you as were present on this occasion last year may perhaps remember that the managing director, Mr. George Albu, who was in this country at the time, and whom we had the pleasure of hearing, concluded his remarks with the statement that the potentialities of the Van Ryn had by no means reached their limit. I think you will agree with me that his optimism has been well justified by the results now before you of the past year's work. These may be summarised in the brief statement that we have treated a larger tonnage of ore, produced a larger quantity of gold, made a larger profit, and completed the financial year with a larger reserve of developed ore in the mine than at any previous period of the company's career, and have witnessed a reduction in working costs by more than 9½d. per ton over the record in this direction already established last year. It is important to note that these results have been obtained with only 145 out of the 180 stamps representing the full milling equipment of the mine. The yield of 28s. 6½d. per ton of ore treated is, you will admit, highly satisfactory. The ore reserves have been increased in quantity by 171,281 tons to the highly respectable total of 1,590,711 tons of fully-developed, and a further 202,811 tons of partially-developed ore, the combined value of which gives an average of, approximately, the same value as last year's reserves. It was pointed out last year that the cost of developing the ore reserves had been paid for entirely out of past profits. You will see from the directors' report before you that the same satisfactory position has been maintained, and even improved upon, and it has been further pointed out that they represent on the basis of present mining conditions a profit in sight of over a million pounds sterling. The balance of profit has been appropriated by charging out the usual items of mine equipment, taxes, etc., and providing for the interim and final dividends of 22½ per cent. each, or a total of 45 per cent. for the year, and a balance of £18,170 13s. 1d. has been carried forward to the current financial year. The company's successful operations have been continued, and I am happy to be able to convey to you, gentlemen, that at a meeting of the board of directors held this morning an interim dividend of 22½ per cent., free of income-tax, similar to last year, was declared. It would be interesting to recall the rapid progress which has been made by your company during the past few years. In 1905 it first entered the circle of regular dividend-paying mines, and from that time it has climbed to a leading place in the list of successful mining undertakings. During the existence of the company gold to the value of £4,085,000 has been produced, of which £2,875,000 was the result of the last six years' operations. The dividends paid to date amount to £1,007,000, which includes £32,000 paid in 1896, the balance of £975,000 representing the result of operations for the past six years, the regular distributions for the past three years having been at the rate of £225,000 per annum, or 45 per cent. on the capital, free of income-tax.

The report was unanimously adopted.

ASHANTI GOLDFIELDS CORPORATION.

The thirteenth annual general meeting of the Ashanti Goldfields Corporation, Limited, was held on the 15th inst. at Holborn Restaurant, the Earl of Bessborough presiding.

The Chairman, in moving the adoption of the report, said it would be within the recollection of many present that, at their annual meeting two years ago, the affairs of the Corporation had begun to assume a much more definitely encouraging aspect than had been the case for some considerable time before. At the meeting in December of last year they were able to report an almost phenomenal improvement in the position by reason of very excellent developments in the mines. This year, whilst there was nothing of a sensational character to record in this connection, the directors ventured to think that the condition of the Corporation's affairs as disclosed in the report could not fail to be pleasing to the shareholders. Last year they paid a 25 per cent. dividend; to-day they could point to a total of 75 per cent. that would have been paid before the close of this calendar year. The year under review had been an exceptionally busy one in regard to construction work; on plant, machinery, buildings and other equipment they had spent £91,583. In the previous year they spent on construction and equipment £26,974. These two amounts, together with the cash used for repayment of some of the debentures, had more than absorbed the new capital issue made two years ago, which produced £114,300, and was created for these purposes. Turning to the profit and loss account, the total receipts for the financial year were £309,592; this was the largest revenue earned by the Corporation in any one year. The expenditure in West Africa, in London, and for Government royalty was £142,134; the amounts written off for depreciation and transferred to the reserve for mines development redemption and other items absorbed £43,580, leaving a net profit of £118,878. This profit, added to the balance brought forward from last year, gave them an available balance of £168,523. Out of this amount, during the financial year, they paid two dividends of 25 per cent. each—reducing the balance to £69,068 0s. 4d., and in August last they paid a further 25 per cent., leaving them with a credit balance of £18,843 to carry forward towards the next dividend. The delay in attaining full programme output did not appreciably affect the matter of profits to be won from the mines, although it had somewhat postponed the increased rate of profit-earning. They were advised that the effects of the floods were now to a very large extent overcome, and that there was every likelihood that for January, at latest, the full output of £40,000 would be reached. (Hear, hear.) It was anticipated that the programme which had been recommended by the consulting engineer would yield a divisible profit during the coming calendar year of close on a quarter of a million sterling, permitting of a distribution in dividends in excess of the 75 per cent. divided in the current calendar year. (Applause.)

The report was adopted.

MEXICO MINES OF EL ORO, LIMITED.

An extraordinary general meeting of the shareholders in the Mexico Mines of El Oro, Limited, was held on the 16th inst. at the Cannon Street Hotel, London, in accordance with a requisition signed by French and other shareholders holding between them 27,790 shares in the company. The business of the meeting was to consider and, if thought fit, pass the following resolutions:—(1) That the best interests of the company will be secured by the resignation of Mr. R. T. Bayliss, the chairman. (2) That Mr. R. T. Bayliss be and he is hereby removed from his office of director of the company. (3) That it is desirable that the business of the company be carried on in offices other than 11, Cornhill. (4) That Mr. J. H. M. Shaw be and he is hereby removed from his office as director of the company. (5) That the board be authorised and directed to remove the business and registered office of the company from No. 11, Cornhill. Mr. R. T. Bayliss (the chairman) presided.

The Chairman said that it did not rest with him to make any introductory remarks. He would simply call upon those at whose instance the meeting had been convened to submit their proposals, reserving until afterwards what he himself would have to say

Mr. Stuart-Smith, K.C., said he was the holder of only a small interest in the company, but had been asked by the French requisitionists to present their case. The French shareholders were an important section of the total shareholders of the company. Out of £180,000 there were 85,000 shares represented by warrants to bearer, which were mostly in the hands of holders scattered throughout France. There were besides 28,000 shares registered in the names of some 800 French holders. The complaint of the French shareholders was that the chairman, for some reason which they were unable to understand, had adopted an attitude which they believed prejudicial to their interests. Last January there were on the share register of the company a large number of French shareholders, and it was desired to procure a quotation for the company's shares upon the Paris Bourse for the purpose of facilitating transactions in shares in France. For a long time the chairman had opposed the making of an application, and it was only when told that unless application was made an extraordinary meeting of the company would be convened that he had given way. That was in May last. A quotation was obtained, and Mr. Higgins was invited to join the board as representing the French shareholders. The balance-sheet and report of the company presented to the general meeting last September showed brilliant results, and Mr. Higgins was not prepared for anything but a favourable speech from the chairman. When he attended the board meeting immediately before the general meeting no intimation was given to him that the speech of the chairman was going to be of anything but an encouraging character. In the opinion of the French shareholders that speech was remarkable, not so much for what it said as for what it left unsaid. It gave little hope for the future. The French shareholders decided their representative director was not being treated with the confidence to which a director was entitled. As a result, the requisition which was the foundation of this meeting was signed and presented to the company's office. A very extraordinary course was then adopted; the directors immediately called upon Mr. Higgins to resign. Needless to say, Mr. Higgins did not resign. The French shareholders had come to the conclusion that Mr. Bayliss was not particularly mindful of their interests. The value of the shares was constantly fluctuating instead of retaining a permanent high level. In conclusion, Mr. Stuart-Smith moved the first resolution upon the paper.

Mr. Higgins seconded the motion.

The Chairman said he wished to recognise the very temperate manner in which Mr. Stuart-Smith had moved the resolution. He hoped to be equally moderate. Before dealing with the specific charges which now came before him for the first time he would give a few facts with regard to the incident which had led up to this rather unnecessary meeting. He protested against the discourtesy of the requisitionists. If the French shareholders felt they had any reason for complaint it was open to them to submit their grievances to the board, where he was sure they would have received the most earnest consideration. Moreover, if the shareholders in France had deputed Mr. Higgins to point out to the board that they held a large majority of the shares of the company, and that therefore they thought the company should be domiciled in France and managed by Frenchmen, it would have simplified matters. The English directors would have resigned. The French shareholders, however, did not do this. They left the requisition at the office of the company, as if it had been a demand for taxes; it was not accompanied by any covering letter, or even placed in an envelope. They had not previously intimated in any manner what it was they were proposing to do. He was convinced the whole trouble arose from Lord Cowdray's unfamiliarity with the operation and management of mining properties and from his excessive optimism. As to Mr. Higgins' complaint that he was not informed of what the chairman was going to say at the meeting of shareholders on September 20, it was not the chairman's habit to tell his colleagues what he was going to say at public meetings. And the directors had heard him express those opinions over and over again at board meetings, Mr. Higgins amongst them. Continuing, the Chairman read some correspondence with Messrs. S. Pearson and Sons, and stated that he had instituted an action for slander on account of the charges which some of the letters contained.

After some discussion, in the course of which Mr. Shaw warmly defended the action of the chairman, Mr. Bayliss announced his intention to resign. Mr. Shaw, Mr. Breightmeyer, and the secretary (Mr. T. Dundas Pillans) also resigned. The resolutions were consequently not put to the meeting.

The proceedings then terminated.

CHAMPION REEF GOLD MINING COMPANY OF INDIA, LIMITED.

The annual general meeting of the shareholders was held on the 15th inst. at the Cannon Street Hotel, London, Mr. John Taylor, M.Inst.C.E., the chairman, presiding.

The Chairman said it was with the greatest satisfaction that he met them that day under pleasanter conditions than had been the case for some years. They had been able to pay a somewhat larger dividend—the harbinger, they might fairly hope, of still larger ones to come—and they had, at the same time, bettered the financial position of the company by many thousand pounds. During the year under review the total return of bar gold was 115,764 ounces, equal to 104,281 ounces of fine gold. The average fineness of the gold recovered was appreciably higher than in the previous twelve months. The sales of gold amounted to £441,255. The royalty payable to the Mysore Government amounted to £22,117. Deducting that sum from the £441,255, and adding the amounts received for interest, rent, etc., the total income was shown to be £423,884. The working costs were £293,844, so that the balance of income over expenditure was £130,040. That was £11,218 more than last year. A much larger tonnage was handled, the quantity milled representing 8½ per cent. increase on that of the previous twelve months, and, at the same time, development to the extent of 37½ per cent. more had been done underground. He therefore thought that the shareholders would agree with him that the saving had been substantial and satisfactory, and it was more apparent when the cost per ton was worked out. It meant on the return for the twelve months of 186,680 tons a saving to the company of over £30,000. (Applause.) The directors recommended the payment of a final dividend for the year of 3d. a share. The total dividends for the year would thus be 7d. a share, representing 23½ per cent. The mine was looking well, and they were undoubtedly justified in taking a hopeful view of the prospects in the near future. The period under review had been without any startling development, but it had been one of steady progress and improvement. (Applause.)

Mr. Edgar Taylor addressed the meeting with regard to the operations at the mine, remarking that, as things stood at present, they had a record of a very material advance towards a better position in the underground workings.

The report was unanimously adopted.

RAILWAYS AND THE HOLIDAYS.

The enterprise of the railway companies makes the Christmas exodus from London larger and larger every year—indeed town would be emptier than at any other season if the same enterprise did not replace the departures with endless arrivals of country cousins. Not only is there a fuller list of cheap excursions, but, thanks to the increased service of corridor restaurant car expresses, long journeys can now be made with a degree of comfort unattainable a few years ago. Such restaurant-car expresses, many of them available at cheap week-end and third-class fares, are the special feature of the programme wherewith the London and South-Western Railway tempts the public away from the metropolis to spend Christmas in the warmth and sunshine of winter resorts in Devon and Cornwall. For those who desire to go further afield the same company offers excursions to Paris, to Havre for Normandy, and to St. Malo for Brittany, as well as to the Channel Islands.

Beginning on the 23rd inst., the Brighton and South Coast Railway will run many supplemental expresses (for which cheap return tickets will be obtainable) to Brighton, Eastbourne, Bexhill, Worthing, Hastings, the Isle of Wight, and other favourite resorts on the company's system. Due provision is made for the convenience of men who have to return to town on Boxing Day or on the following day, which this year will also be a Bank Holiday. The Brighton Company likewise announce fourteen-day excursions and issues of week-end tickets to Dieppe and Paris.

The South-Eastern and Chatham Railway has arranged to run extra trains to Margate, Ramsgate, Hastings, Deal, Folkestone, Dover, Tunbridge Wells, Canterbury, and many other places and week-end tickets available from the 23rd to the 28th inst., will be issued. The company is also running cheap excursions to Paris, Brussels, and Boulogne and offering cheap return tickets to Cannes, Nice, Monte Carlo, Mentone, and other stations on the French Riviera.

More than 500 stations are embodied in the list of Christmas excursions published by the Great Northern Railway, chief among them being those to Scotland on the 23rd inst. and to Nottingham, Sheffield, Leeds, Bradford, Newcastle, Hull, Manchester, etc., on the 24th. Week-end tickets issued by this company on Friday, the 23rd inst., will be valid for return until the following Wednesday. Full particulars of the excursions can be obtained from the Chief Passenger Agent, G.N.R., King's Cross.

QUEER STORY.

THE GULF BETWEEN.

I SCARCELY know how I first became aware of her. From the moment of the Beauty's birth she just was, not constantly, but intermittently and always near him. I leave it to psychists and their kind to explain why it seemed natural to me that she should be at all.

For weeks after the Beauty's birth I was unspeakably ill; day shouldered night, and night shouldered day in a hideous feverlit jumble; and out of it all the touch of her pale mittened hand on my forehead, the cool gleam of her green cotton frock with its bunches of tiny pink rosebuds, the yearning sympathy of her eyes alone brought relief.

They—the doctors and Martin—judged her to be merely the creation of delirium; but I knew better. When convalescence set in they told me very kindly and patiently, but quite firmly, that she was an hallucination, which would disappear as I grew stronger.

"An hallucination!" I laughed. Would an hallucination have stolen to my side when chance left me alone with the Beauty? Would an hallucination have taken him from me and hushed him to dreamless repose in its arms, or soothed him to a chuckling thumb-in-the-mouth satisfaction? Yet this often happened.

She was not really beautiful, and she had once been grievously disappointed—that I saw in her face. But her mouth had an infinite capacity for tenderness, and her eyes were so exceeding blue that novelists would have called them purple. She was without one single vestige of colour, and the dark brown hair which was parted and gathered into a large knot at the back of her head had a silver streak on one side running from the demure parting to the coil. It looked peculiar until one was used to it, and then one grew to like it. The waist of her apple-green cotton frock was high, and her hands were mittened—always mittened. She was not young, but she was not old, and I called her "Kate." Why I did so is not clear to me. She never told me her name, because she never spoke. She only smiled with those great unfulfilled purple eyes, and sympathised and understood — oh! understood immeasurably — and adored, always adored the Beauty.

How did I first realise that he was safer with her than with me, I wonder? It was, I think, when his nurse had let him crawl from the edge of his rug one summer morning to the bank of a swiftly flowing little river which divided our old-world garden from the meadow beyond.

It happened on this wise. The nurse fell asleep, and lay huddled up and snoring without a qualm, and as my husband and I stepped suddenly from the yew avenue together we saw the whole awful thing—only we saw it differently.

"God!" said Martin, when those five aching minutes had come and gone, "the stream just lifted him back to the bank again! He isn't a pin the worse; it was a miracle; the most wonderful thing I ever saw in my life."

"Nonsense!" I cried—cried it loudly and emphatically, with the sodden Beauty gathered to my heart; "it was Kate! I saw her stoop and pick him out before you could reach him. Her dress was dripping—I saw it, I say!"

Martin's utter relief merged into a sudden anxiety; he laid his hand on my hair and looked at me.

He judged that the shock had unhinged my mind, and that the hallucination was back again. I knew he thought so, and I pursued the subject no further. We dismissed the nurse on the spot, and shortly afterwards he took me to see an eminent specialist. The eminent specialist looked deep into my eyes, asked me a hundred questions. He spoke very gently about "Kate," and begged me to describe her in detail. I told him of the dark, dark, hungry eyes which always sought and never found; of the apple-green print dress with its short waist and bunches of wee pink roses; of the pale face and the one streak of silver running on the left side from brow to ear.

He listened with wonderful patience, occasionally murmuring a word to himself and shaking his head. Then he took my hand—he was very fatherly—and made me promise not to talk about Kate, but to spend as much time as I possibly could resting in the open air, and take regularly a tonic which he would prescribe for me. I smiled, but did all of it conscientiously, and it was Kate who amused the Beauty whilst I carried out the eminent specialist's prescription under a mulberry tree on the lawn.

Months flitted along. I grew fat and rosy. My invalid habits one by one disappeared, but Kate did not disappear with them. I would not engage another nurse. We were not rich in those days, and Martin, though at first he argued, at length gave way. He soon found I was better and brighter and less anxious without one. Of course I was. There was no registry office in the world that could have provided Kate's equal. I did not tell Martin this; it would have worried him. Only just lately, indeed, did I find courage to confess that many a morning I went through my household work with a light heart, and the Beauty lay in Kate's apple-green lap beyond the yew avenue by the edge of the very stream from which she had rescued him, and played with the bunches of tiny pink rosebuds on her gown, and chuckled and laughed and slept.

And when that sudden whirlwind of horror—diphtheria—swept the village from end to end, and the sad little valley churchyard threw up mound after mound, it was Martin who was distracted and anxious, and I who remained calm. Kate inspired confidence. No harm could come to the Beauty, I felt. Before we could escape, he caught the scourge. I nursed him—at least so people said. They insisted that I clutched him back from the very jaws of death. But I know that over and over again, when he would turn his heavy curly head from me and thrust away with a petulant hand the spoon of nourishment I offered him, she would reach over for it with one of her noiseless movements, and with wordless gentleness and that rare smile of hers which no child could resist, would coax its contents down. And when he was near to choking so that the doctor, as a last resort, put one of those terrible tubes into the soft little throat and the tube became clogged, they called me a heroine! I was too weak to contradict them. Beside, what did it matter? What mattered anything? For the Beauty recovered. Kate wanted no thanks of mine then.

* * * * * *

When the Beauty was eighteen months old, fortune did more than smile on his father—she positively rippled with laughter. The little, low unhygienic many-passaged house with its quaint oak panelling, the funny old-world garden would no longer be in keeping with our more flourishing state, and very very reluctantly we had to bid it all farewell. As soon as the grand pack-up began, Kate looked disturbed and frightened, as if some stupendous realisation was being forced upon her, the nature of which she was fearful to grasp. But it wasn't till the night before we left that I understood we were leaving her, too.

The realisation came to me in some intangible way—I know not how. As she sat rocking the Beauty's cradle, the white streak in her hair looked wider; the yearning in her eyes was tragic, and for the first time since she had belonged to us I felt a strange feeling of fear. Then I knew this was a farewell as surely as if she had shouted it with her sweet sad lips—my hardest farewell of all. In a sort of desperation I went nearer to her than I had ever gone before, stretching out both my hands. "Kate," I said, "I do not know who you are, or why you are; but no woman has ever had a better friend. God thank you—God reward you, Kate!"

She raised her head, and for a moment her yearning eyes met mine—for a moment her lips parted as if she struggled to answer me, but no sound came. She dropped her head over the Beauty, seeming to kiss him over and over; and then without appearing to go she was gone. Martin had heard my words. He came in quickly and took me in his arms.

"The old trouble, little woman," he said, trying that his tone should not be anxious; "you've been overstrained of late; a change will be good for you, eh?"

I said: "Yes, I suppose so." It was useless to say more.

"You must never talk about this to the boy, dear," he went on, as if playfully, when he had smoothed my cheek and tried to read my expression. "I should like——" he stopped.

"You wouldn't like your son to think that his mother had ever been a little—only a little crazy, Martin."

Martin looked vexed. "It's not quite that," he answered, uneasily, and I laughed and kissed him. "It is quite that," I said, "and I promise that the boy shall never know through me."

And I never saw Kate again.

* * * * * *

For twenty-five years I kept my promise, and never spoke of her. I believe I broke it in the end, but then extenuating circumstances arose.

We planned for the Beauty, as he grew bigger, every practicable and impracticable profession. He settled matters by disdaining them all, and selecting for himself when he was little more than twelve. He wished to be an artist. We could afford to let him follow his bent, and authorities told us that his talent was undoubted.

So he studied in Italian studios for years, paying us flying golden visits, and transporting us with his enthusiasms. And at last the day came when Fame singled him out with that exceedingly coy finger of hers, and Martin and I wrestled with a bigger crowd than usual in the first room at Burlington House.

The catalogue called his picture—the picture of the year—"The Gulf Between," a strange title, so it struck me, for a young man's first triumph.

He had painted it in Naples, and neither his father nor I had a notion in what it consisted. I think there must have been something about us that showed we had a more than common interest, for the crowd made way for us. Then as we stood consciously exchanging the glances which we tried hard to keep from being too fond and proud—all at once the crowd seemed to melt away, and the picture to stand and live and fill all the room.

I found myself clutching at Martin's arm—I felt my face growing pale. I think I screamed—if I didn't it was a mere miracle. Our boy had painted an old-fashioned garden—more Italian than English, for there were orange trees with mature fruit, marble terraces and fountains, and clumps of purple bougainvillea in the distance. All this was beautiful, but it meant nothing to me; it was the central figure which meant everything. It was the central figure which clutched at my heart and brought a feeling of suffocation to my throat.

Standing quite forlornly in the middle of the grass plot was a woman in apple-green print, and on the apple-green print was a pattern of wee pink rosebuds. Her mittened hands were loosely clasped in front of her, and her deep blue eyes held illimitable longing and unfathomable sorrow. From the parting to the coil of her dark hair on the left side ran a single streak of silver. (Oh! how controversial art papers were about this!) Her face was pale as alabaster, and she was neither old nor young. She was watching the gambols of a proud placid cat and a couple of absurd balls of kittens.

We understood now.

The gulf between was the gulf which divides motherhood from those who have never borne a child—you could tell it in an instant—it was in that pale, pale yearning face.

"Kate," I whispered, hoarsely, pointing towards her; "Oh! Martin—it's Kate." And then I fell a-crying.

What the people round us thought I do not know. And Martin soothed me, let me look my fill, and then took me quietly away.

* * * * * *

The Beauty (I'm afraid we called him that sometimes still just to ourselves) told us that the idea for

"The Gulf Between" had been knocking at his brain for years. No model—and he saw several—exactly answered to his conception, so he evolved it from his inner consciousness and painted without one. "She came," he said, simply, "I do not know how."

Then Martin absolved me from my promise, and I told him the history of Kate so far as it was known to me, and the Beauty was immensely interested and made me go through it again and again. He took me to the offices of some clever society in London, where I retold it to three men with singularly high foreheads.

The clever society sent two of its members to the quaint little old-world house where the Beauty had been born. They investigated minutely, and they sent us the result of their investigations. Up to the time of our taking the house it had been empty for an immense number of years—that was why we got it so cheaply. Previously to that a childless couple named Thorrold had lived there. The promise of a little one came to Mrs. Thorrold for the first time when she was just past forty. She never lived to realise the promise. That was all, except a long treatise, which accompanied the discovery, on subjective and objective appearances, subliminal and sub-conscious selves, and a request that they might print the whole thing in the annals of the society. Martin refused this. It did not seem quite loyal to Kate, to tell her story in any way but the way I have told it here.

IN reading Mr. S. M. Ellis's "William Harrison Ainsworth and His Friends" (1) I recalled Schopenhauer's classification of writers into meteors, planets, and fixed stars—writers for the day, for their generation, and for all time. It is a mere matter of opportuneness—the meteors being nearer us than the planets and the planets than the fixed stars they seem for the moment larger and brighter. These writers catch the mood of the moment and reflect its passing expression, and are therefore as much more interesting to "the general" as her own photograph would be more interesting than an old master to a vain girl. How truly Harrison Ainsworth's picturesque novels hit the mood of the moment and caught its passing expression may be judged not only from the number of dramatised versions of his "Jack Sheppard" and "Dick Turpin," etc., but also from the well nigh incredible fact that the music of that most disreputable thieves' song from "Jack Sheppard," "Nix my dolly, pals, fake away," was clanged at midday from the steeple of Edinburgh cathedral! Harrison Ainsworth, to be sure, rose to higher—though not to more popular—heights than he attained in these Newgate novels, since he followed in the wake of Scott as an historical novelist, nor was he classed by him with those imitators whom he gibbets in his preface, I think, to "Ivanhoe." "I was as a traveller who discovered a spring in the desert from which every one who drank 'blessed his stars and thought it luxury;' but when camel after camel and caravan after caravan had poached it into mud and foulness, all turned in disgust from what they had at first drunk with rapture." On the contrary, Scott was so struck by Ainsworth's earliest novel, written in imitation of the Waverleys, that he had the precocious youth introduced to him. But, indeed, Mr. Ellis quotes weightier testimony to Ainsworth's merits as an historical novelist. "When," says Macaulay, "I devour the pregnant pages of Ainsworth I am lost in amazement that his wonderful historical novels have not an abiding place in every house. His close adherence to established facts, woven together in such attractive form, renders his series of romances indispensable. He always charms, but never misleads." Yet how has Ainsworth "fallen into the portion of weeds and outworn faces!" He even survived himself—as a popular novelist—by a quarter of a century or more! When one remembers that Forster, the biographer of Dickens, was one of Ainsworth's nearest and dearest friends in the heyday of the novelist's popularity, the following reminiscence of Mr. Percy Fitzgerald has a ring as cynical as it is sad: "I recall a dinner at Teddington in the sixties given by Frederic Chapman, the publisher, at which were Forster and Browning. Browning said humorously, "a sad, forlorn-looking being stopped me to-day, and reminded me of old times. He presently resolved himself into—whom do you think?—Harrison Ainsworth!" "Good heavens!" cried Forster, "is he still alive?" One needs to be a Londoner, and a London clubman at that, to see the humour of a rencontre which so tickled the novelist's two old friends. "Dans l'adversité de nos meilleurs amis, nous trouvons souvent quelque chose qui ne nous déplaît pas." But in his early days in London Ainsworth was fortunate in such friendships as are "made in wine," since he was the most hospitable and convivial of men, and it is to this good fortune that Mr. Ellis's two volumes owe their chief and deep interest. You meet in them, and in undress, Dickens and Thackeray, Forster and Lockhart, Maclise, Cruikshank and "Phiz." Disraeli, too, "extravagantly dressed and loaded with jewellery like his neighbour at Ainsworth's table, Bulwer-Lytton," Lever and Lover also, and Barham of "The Ingoldsby Legends," and "bright, broken Maginn," or "Father Prout." How they feasted together in those convivial days, and quarrelled with each other and with their publishers and with their illustrators, and made up their quarrels or patched them up and struggled on still together with a broken-winged friendship! There were giants in those early Victorian days, though to be sure, Queen Victoria herself had little to do with them or with their encouragement. She in those days was much more interested (according to the unimpeachable authority of Miss Mitford) in Van Amburgh's lions than in those of literature. "Our Queen," writes Miss Mitford in explaining the decline of the legitimate drama in those days, "delights in strong, not to say worse, emotions, and her chief pleasure is to see Van Amburgh's lions fed." Besides his dinners Ainsworth had his many magazines to keep him in constant touch with all the literary lions of the day, and it was he, indeed, who "discovered" Mrs. Henry Wood and "Ouida." Mr. Ellis's two volumes are an extraordinarily interesting record of an extraordinarily interesting day and group and man.

"True Thomas," as Carlyle was usually called in my youth, was, as an artist, sufficiently unscrupulous. In his "French Revolution" he says of a brilliant novel he could not have read by a man whose amazing career he could not have followed that it was "a wretched cloaca of a book; without depth even as a cloaca." This of Louvet's "Faublas," which, as Mr. Rivers says in his enthralling life of that "Revolutionist and Romance Writer" (2), is morality itself compared with Carlyle's ideal novel, "Wilhelm Meister," and is purity itself compared with Carlyle's ideal hero Mirabeau's abominable letters to Sophie from his Vincennes cell. Not one of Carlyle's revolutionary heroes was more heroic than Louvet in the courage with which he faced danger, and in the fortitude with which he endured suffering, or more heroic, according to the novelist's ideal of a hero, in the number and poignancy of the dangers and sufferings which befell him. And the novelist's love interest is so far from lacking that it is supremely in evidence throughout, making this biography of Louvet as sympathetic and exciting as the most thrilling adventure story ever written.

women" (3) one might almost say that the fascinating ladies are not French and the French ladies are not fascinating. Certainly the first of Mrs. Bearne's heroines, Mme. de Souza, was rather the hunter than the hunted, so far as our sex was concerned; while the other French lady, Claire de Kersaint, Duchesse de Duras, distinguished herself chiefly by her absurd infatuation for that sublime egotist Chateaubriand. Of her other two heroines, the Duchesse de Berry made such a silly, selfish, and even criminal use of her fascination in her obstinate stirring-up of an obviously hopeless rebellion that only such a Royalist as Mrs. Bearne could make a heroine of her; while the most interesting of the quartette, Princess Mathilde Bonaparte, was so far from being a Frenchwoman that she was born in Austria, reared in Italy, had a Corsican for her father, a German for her mother, and a Russian for her husband. Mrs. Bearne, however, has certainly made the most of her interesting material, if she fails in her chivalrous attempt to make heroes and heroines of such poor creatures as Charles X. and the Duchesse de Berry.

"The Reminiscences of Admiral Montagu" (4) will interest most those who love sport and worship royalty. King Edward plays a kindly part in these reminiscences, and not less kindly are the genial admiral's experiences of the German Emperor. His devotion in Fenian days to the party of law and order was shown in a thoroughly British fashion by allowing his middies to raid and wreck a newspaper office and fling its printing presses into the harbour because of his disapproval of a disloyal article which had issued from it! The story in the volume which amused me most was that of the admiral's gardener who provoked his father by reading the Bible at meals: "Can't you drop that 'ere book for one meal? You don't suppose the Lord wants to be worrited every day and all day long by the likes of you!"

"You skunk!" cried Christopher Gnatt on the desert "Island of Test" (5) to the hero, and skunk-like throughout seems to the reader the spirit and practice of that young Oxonian. But the story of the relations of these two with the half-caste woman, through whose charms they revert to savage passions and conditions, is told with a power which grips you from the first day to the last of their sojourn on the desert island.

Mrs. Edith Wharton's "Tales of Men and Ghosts" (6) are incomparably the best short stories I have read for a long time. They are nearly all in a sense ghostly—i.e., subtle, spiritual, having to do with fine and even superfine issues. But the ghost stories proper are the most fascinating, and fascinating most of all in their quintessential ghostliness. Indeed, the ordinary ghost story seems gross and carnal by comparison.

It is primarily in response to a widely expressed desire by Catholics that a new and cheaper edition of Mr. Douglas Sladen's book, "The Secrets of the Vatican," has been published (Hurst and Blackett, 7s. 6d. net). As Mr. Sladen is a Protestant the approval his work has won from Catholics is all the more noteworthy, but there must be many people not of their Church who will also be glad to have the opportunity of procuring in a less expensive form this singularly interesting history of the Vatican (both the Palace and the hierarchy) and description of its treasures of art and antiquity. The volume contains the full letterpress and the same illustrations as the original edition.

Nearly all the reviewers appear to have accepted literally the statement on the title-page that Major Molesworth Sykes's book, "The Glory of the Shia World" (Macmillan), was translated and edited from a Persian manuscript. By doing this they have paid an unconscious tribute to the cleverness of the author's simulation of an Oriental form and style of narrative, the truth being that in the guise of an imaginary autobiography of a Persian noble Major Sykes has really drawn his own picture of the life and character of the people among whom he has so long resided. It may be remembered that Sir James Morier in the first instance described his immortal "Haji Baba" as a translation from the Persian, and Major Sykes has therefore an excellent precedent for the course taken in the case of his own remarkably attractive book.

Messrs. Smith, Elder and Co. will publish next month a volume by Mr. Geoffrey Drage, entitled "The Imperial Organisation of Trade," which deals with trade and industrial questions from the point of view of Imperial politics, with a special reference to the Imperial Conference of 1911. The work embodies the results of official statistics up to October last, together with the latest contributions to the subject by English and foreign writers. In regard to the fiscal controversy, it is understood that Mr. Drage takes up an independent position, holding that the materials for a final decision from an Imperial point of view are actually not in existence.

Both the illustrations and the letterpress of the colour book on Malta, which Messrs. Black have lately added (price 7s. 6d. net) to their well-known series, are calculated to surprise readers accustomed to think of that island mainly as a military station. Signor Vittorio Boron has painted twenty delightful pictures of Malta, admirably reproduced in colours, and in the accompanying text Mr. Frederick W. Ryan gives a most interesting historical and descriptive sketch of the island. Its pleasant climate and gay social life appear to make Malta an eminently desirable place in which to winter, and Mr. Ryan testifies that the English visitor can obtain in Valetta "good apartments and the best living, perhaps in a palace of some long-forgotten knight, at little more than the expense of a Bloomsbury boarding house."

A handsome new edition of Dickens's "Christmas Carol" (published, price 5s. net, at the office of the Daily Chronicle, Fleet Street, E.C.) has for its special feature a number of charming drawings in colour by Miss Ethel F. Everett. Well printed in large type on fine thick paper, and tastefully bound, this edition of the "Christmas Carol" should be in high favour as a gift-book.

A new volume of Mr. W. K. Haselden's clever cartoons has just been published under the title of "Daily Mirror Reflections" (Pictorial Newspaper Company, 1s. net). Mr. Haselden's contributions to the Daily Mirror amuse a host of readers, and this collection of his pictorial jests on all sorts of topics provides a rich fund of humorous entertainment.

"Peter the Cruel," or "The Life of the Notorious Don Pedro of Castile" (Lane, 10s. 6d. net), is not pleasant reading, and is none the pleasanter when we remember that the Black Prince was responsible for replacing this monster on his throne. But, after all, there are two extenuating considerations to be urged on behalf of Peter—his demoralising training, and the ferocity of his time and country. Don Pedro's burning alive or boiling to death the leaders of an insurrection against the Jews was rather national and mediæval than to the personal discredit of that remorseless prince. It was, says Zurita, the editor of "Ayala," a usual form of punishment in that time and country, so usual as to be employed by King Fernando the Saint. To be sure, no one enjoyed an Auto da Fè bonfire in those days more than the saints. At any rate, you follow Mr. Edward Storer's life of Don Pedro with a fascination of horror until its fratricidal close.

No doubt an incidental result of the rubber boom has been to interest a great many people in the Federated Malay States, and what is virtually an official handbook regarding those British possessions will consequently attract more attention than it would have done a year or two ago. The title of the book is "An Illustrated Guide to the Federated Malay States," it has been edited by Mr. C. W. Harrison, of the Malay Civil Service, and it is illustrated—several of the plates being in colour—from the drawings of Mrs. H. C. Barnard. It is published (price 2s. 6d. net) by the Malay States Development Agency.

MUSIC.

THE STRAUSS PROBLEM AGAIN.

THE production of "Salome" has given rise to the usual discussion of Strauss and his methods, which discussion is none the less amusing because we have had it all before. We have it, in fact, every time we become acquainted with a new work from his most provocative pen; and the point at issue is nearly always the same, namely, whether the man is really a genuine genius or an immensely clever poseur—though there is, of course, a third alternative. He may be a real genius and have a dash of the humbug about him as well; or to put it in another way, he may be half genius and half humbug.

Certainly it is difficult not to question the sincerity of some of the things done in "Salome," as in "Elektra" and so many of his other works. In the case of "Salome," the wrangling of the Jews affords as good an instance as any. It is quite impossible to take it seriously. The thing is sheer burlesque, regarded either as music or as drama. The unreal character of Strauss's operas on their dramatic side is indeed one of their weakest features. He sets out to supply a new and revised kind of opera, swift, direct, and realistic, with all the old conventions done away with, but the result is just as stagey, far-fetched, and unconvincing as anything to be found in Verdi or Donizetti. What could be more fantastic than the story of "Feuersnot," with its incident of the basket?—though this, it may be said, is a fairy tale, and intended to be taken as such. But then "Salome" and "Elektra" are hardly better. In "Elektra" the whole action bristles with absurdities, from the slanging match of Elektra and her mother to the manner in which Orestes is allowed to walk into the palace without let or hindrance and kill both the queen and her paramour.

So, too, in "Salome" the whole action from beginning to end is thoroughly unreal, and it is made all the more so by Strauss's eccentric music. As to the latter Strauss concentrates on matters of detail so much that he is apt to overlook the essentials. He is so concerned in finding musical equivalents for every twist and turn of the text that he ignores the broader requirements of the case altogether and occasionally goes absolutely counter to them. Everyone has pointed out the incongruity between the spirit of Salome's music at the end of the opera and the dramatic requirements of the situation. She is gloating over a horrible act of revenge, whereas the music put in her mouth is in the vein of the loftiest ecstasy and exaltation. It has been rather neatly suggested, indeed, that the simplest way in which to amend the work for presentation at Covent Garden would be by re-writing the book so as to make it agree with the music. Thus:—

> Let Salome after her first attempts at seduction succumb not to the Prophet's physical charms, but to his spiritual power. Let her dance not for his head, but in the hope of saving it. Let her fail to overcome the Tetrarch's thirst for blood, and then when the Prophet is slain let her cast herself in the spirit of a virgin martyr into the cistern after him. It is the Censor's opportunity at last. We shall all applaud his play, and he need not change a note of Dr. Strauss's score.

That is really the most pointed criticism which I have seen so far on "Salome."

Another writer has been trying to account for what he calls "the popularity of Richard Strauss as an opera composer," and the curious conclusion he comes to is that it is due to the wealth of taking melody in his music:—

> With all his wonderful musicianship Richard Strauss is a composer of the people. His melody is as easily grasped as a popular waltz. Some of the little melodies which appear and disappear in the complex textures of his scores are almost banal in character. Austere critics look on this as a weakness of Strauss's style, but it is really an element of his strength.

This is very far-fetched—if only for the simple reason that Strauss's alleged popularity as an opera composer is really non-existent. Opera-goers flocked to hear "Elektra" when it was first produced because of its sensational qualities. It will probably be just the same in the case of "Salome." Because people rush to hear works of this kind once it is absurd to talk of them as being popular. It is no reflection on Strauss to say it, but the truth of the matter is that so far from his music making any special appeal to the multitude, it is absolutely incomprehensible to the vast majority. Even his earliest and simplest concert-room works have not attained anything like general popularity so far. Cultivated musicians like them well enough, but the multitude has still to take them to its heart.

The fact suggests, indeed, yet another difficulty in considering the case of Strauss. If, as some declare, he is merely a clever musician on the make, why does he put such insurmountable obstacles in the way of his own popularity? We shall see what is the fate of "Salome" at Covent Garden, but I shall certainly be surprised if it holds its place permanently—as it might have done if it had been written with rather more consideration for the needs of the average opera-goer; and to "Elektra" just the same applies. In the case of these works, therefore, Strauss may be said to have deliberately written operas which could hardly hope to become permanent box-office successes. Who, therefore, shall question his sincerity? But perhaps in "Der Rosenkavalier," now on the eve of production, he will show that he, too, can be popular when he chooses.

The most interesting event at Covent Garden lately, apart from the various repetitions of "Salome," has been the revival of "Pelléas et Mélisande," which was produced with Miss Maggie Teyte as Mélisande on Monday. The part is one in which she has already appeared with great success in Paris, and this is in no way surprising, for it is one which suits her to perfection. That grave, wistful tenderness which might be defined as her predominant characteristic, on the stage, if not off it, coincides exactly with the nature of Maeterlinck's unhappy heroine, so here is a case in which artist and role seemed made for one another. The music suits her voice admirably, too, and as she sings it with the utmost taste and intelligence it is difficult to suggest a single respect in which her performances could be bettered.

Very genuine regret has been caused in musical circles by the wholly unexpected death of Mr. Hugh Thomson, the well-known musical critic of the Queen. A man of the kindliest disposition and most genial temperament, Mr. Thomson was a universal favourite who will be sadly missed throughout a very wide circle of friends and acquaintances. Though always a most cheerful and entertaining companion, famous for his reminiscences and good stories, Mr. Thomson had suffered from bad health for many years past. Since the retirement of Mr. Joseph Bennett, he had been the doyen of the London musical critics.

Miss Gwynne Kimpton has arranged to give a series of orchestral concerts for young people after Christmas, which ought to find ready support. The concerts will take place at the Steinway Hall, and the performers will consist of members of the Strings Club reinforced by members of the Queen's Hall Orchestra. From the sketch programmes which have been issued Miss Kimpton clearly believes in giving her young auditors fare of good quality. Thus the programme of the first concert will include Beethoven's "Prometheus" overture, Mendelssohn's G minor piano concerto, and Haydn's symphony, that of the second a Mozart piano concerto and Brahms's "Academic" overture, that of the third Wagner's Siegfried Idyll, and so on. Further particulars may be obtained from the Concert Secretary, 9, Northstead Road, Tulse Hill Park, S.W.

THE THEATRES.

"The Princess Clementina," at the Garrick.

MESSRS. GEORGE PLEYDELL and A. E. W. Mason's version of the latter's novel Clementina is the piece with which Mr. H. B. Irving has opened his new season at the Queen's Theatre, and I fancy that the easiest way to give an idea of the character of this latest historical romance is to give a condensed version of the main incidents as I remember them. The characters are many, but very few count for much, so I will only enumerate the few.

Dramatis Personæ.

James Stuart, the Pretender (Mr. Eille Norwood).—A gentleman who is waiting at Bologna for his promised bride, the Princess Clementina Sobieska, to come to him from Austria.

Charles Wogan (Mr. H. B. Irving).—A sort of Irish D'Artagnan with three (Irish) Musketeer companions.

The Princess Clementina (Miss Stella Patrick Campbell).—A beautiful Princess, who inspires the deepest devotion in everyone but her affianced husband.

The Princess-Mother (Miss Helen Rous).—A singularly foolish old person, totally unfit to have a daughter.

Conspirators, Innkeepers, Gentlemen, etc.

Act I.

James Stuart's Audience Chamber at Bologna. The Pretender sitting at a table surrounded by his Court. Enter a pale and excited gentleman.

P. and E. G. : I have lost her. The Princess Clementina has been arrested at Innspruck. Pardon, your Highness, but what the devil could I do?

James Stuart : Perdition! Now I cannot contract a Continental alliance, which would have advanced my fortunes. This is exceedingly annoying. Leave me. I feel moody.

Wogan : Your Majesty, let me rescue the Princess!

James Stuart : It is impossible. All Austria is guarding her. Besides, if I am not energetic enough to bother about her, why should you?

Wogan : Ah, sire, I feel the blood of Tristan burning in my veins, and the Princess Clementina will be another Isolde, whom I feel I am going to love.

James Stuart : I am not supposed to know anything about that, but I do know that one man cannot rescue her from thousands.

Wogan : I have my three faithful Musketeers here, sire. Together we are a match for the world. Anyone of us can take on single-handed six ordinary men. Have you never seen a play like this before?

James Stuart : So be it. I see you insist on bringing this lady to me, but I can't for the life of me understand why you are so keen about it. As far as I am concerned, she can stop in prison at Innspruck.

Wogan : Sire, you are a man who inspires undying devotion in your followers. Heaven knows why, but you do.

James Stuart : So they tell me. I don't know why either.

Wogan : But I must have a letter from you.

James Stuart : Why?

Wogan : We shall be beset and waylaid on the road by conspirators. I must have papers for them to try and steal. Heroes always have valuable papers in romantic drama.

James Stuart : True. I was forgetting the rules of the game. (Writes.) Here is your letter. And now I am bored with all this, and will leave you. (Exit.)

Wogan, to Athos, Porthos, and Aramis : Let us away! But ah! we have to bring the lady from Austria to Italy over the Brenner Pass. She must have a chaperon.

Aramis : A chaperon! Do heroes who rescue maidens take chaperons?

Wogan : Not usually; but this is an original play. Who keeps a chaperon?

Athos : My wife is in a delicate state of health, and I am sure if I have a son he would wish to serve his King, so let him begin early.

All : We could not have a better chaperon than Mrs. Athos. She will have to run awful risks, but if she dies it will be for her King.

Act II.

The Green Cross Inn on the Road to Innspruck.

Wogan (entering very tired) : Have I my papers? (Looks in wallet and examines them.) Sure, it is high time the conspirators tried to steal them. I have chosen this cut-throat den to stay in because it looks like a conspirators' haunt. Landlord! A bottle of wine and a ham—I famish!

1st Conspirator (entering) : It's a fine night.

2nd Conspirator (entering) : It's a fine night.

3rd Conspirator (entering) : It's a fine night.

4th Conspirator (entering) : It's ——

Wogan : Yes, it's a fine night. (Aside) : I was afraid they weren't coming. Four to one. Of course, I could defeat them all, but I will be cunning. (Lights his pipe with James Stuart's letter.)

Conspirators (tapping their sword-hilts significantly) : You carry papers. Give them to us.

Wogan : Fools, I have burnt them. (Shows ashes.)

Conspirators : Perdition! (Rush at him.)

Wogan : Ha! (Escapes through door.)

1st Conspirator (sticking sword through door after him) : Got him!

(Enter distinguished local gentleman.)

D. L. G. : What's all this noise about? Open that door!

(Wogan reels in sorely wounded and bleeding.)

D. L. G. : This man is under my protection. He reminds me of someone I met in similar circumstances forty years ago. Never mind your wound, my dear sir. This is only a play, so you will not bleed to death. Lie there and bleed for a while, because I want to be reminiscent at some length. After the curtain falls we will send for a doctor. (He reminisces at very great length.)

Act III.

The Villa at Innspruck where the Princess and her mother are imprisoned.

Princess : I shall be rescued to-night at half-past nine. See what a wild night it is! Was ever such a snowstorm? The sentries are certain to leave their posts to go and get a whisky and soda, and my lover, James Stuart, will come.

Mother : Oh, my child, are you suitably dressed for a long journey over the Brenner Pass into Italy? See the snow is thick on the ground, and that is a very décolletée evening gown!

Princess : I will take this piece of tulle as a wrap. Do you forget, mamma, that this is my first appearance in the play, and I must be beautifully gowned?

Mother : Oh, my child, how right you are! What is that in your hand?

Princess : That is a little bundle tied up in a black handkerchief. It contains all I need to keep me looking immaculately coiffed and attired, even though I travel incessantly for days and nights without stopping.

(Enter Wogan through window.)

Princess : You are not the Pretender!

Wogan : No, he wouldn't bother to come; but, like the gallant gentleman he is, he let me persuade him to take his place.

Mother : My child, you cannot go. How do we know who this gentleman is?

Wogan : I will prove it to you. I have brought as chaperon a lady in a delicate state of health. Is not that proof?

Princess : It is, indeed.

Mother : It is, indeed. Go, my child. One moment, though. Where is this chaperon?

Wogan : For obvious reasons she cannot come into the play.

Mother : I understand. Besides, there are too many of us in the play as it is.

Princess : Let us hang about for a while, though, and write letters and talk about unnecessary things, because our custodian calls at ten to make sure I have not escaped, and if we delay starting until his approach is imminent the audience get anxious.

Wogan : True! We must keep up the tension. That is drama!

(They accordingly keep up the tension until the custodian is heard approaching, and they cannot start.)

Mother : We are undone!

Wogan : No. See, I have brought a wild Irish girl, who will take the Princess's place, and you must let the custodian see her groaning in bed, and say that it is your daughter who is ill. The Princess must go out in the wild Irish girl's cloak, and no one will recognise her. (Exit Princess, in W. I. G.s cloak, while Wogan conceals himself behind curtain.)

(Enter Custodian.)

Custodian : Madam, I am sorry, but where is your daughter?

Mother : This is an outrage!

Custodian : I know it is; but where is she?

Mother : Ill in bed, and groaning. Can't you hear her? (Groans are heard.)

Custodian (going to bedroom door) : Yes, that is your daughter. I am satisfied. But, ha! Why is that window open behind the curtain? Let me shut it!

Mother : I will shut it. (Goes to window. Wogan has jumped out. She draws curtain. There is no one there.)

Custodian : If I had any intelligence I should think it very odd for these people—one of whom is an invalid—to have a huge window wide open during a terrible snowstorm; but the authors made me without any intelligence, so I will go away quite satisfied. (Does so.)

Act IV.

The Pilgrim Hut at Bologna. The darkness before the dawn. The Princess is here alone. Athos, Porthos, and Aramis are fighting a rear-guard action. Wogan is momentarily expected. The chaperon has apparently been mislaid and so has the bundle; but the Princess has acquired from somewhere an exquisite evening cloak.

Princess : I wonder where I got this cloak from? No matter, it is very becoming, and I look ravishing, despite my wild flight over the mountain passes. I wonder how that chaperon is getting on! I have never seen her any more than the audience; but she would certainly spoil this scene if she were here, as she ought to be.

(Enter Wogan.)

Princess : Where is my chaperon?

Wogan : Great Scott! I believe we've lost her. Does it matter?

Princess : No. I think I'm glad.

Wogan : Ah, do not tempt me. At all costs my honour bids me to keep it from you that I am desperately in love with you.

Princess : If you lie down and go to sleep I will kiss you while you sleep to show you what I think of you.

Wogan : And yet we ought not to be here alone. I wonder what we have done with the others and that chaperon?

Princess : Forget them. This is our scene. Let us make it a beautiful one. How soon will it be dawn?

Wogan : Very soon.

Princess : Then close the shutters and shut out what little light there is. We have not much time.

Wogan : Why do you want the shutters closed?

Princess : You shouldn't ask. Will it really be dawn so soon?

Wogan : So very soon.

Princess (in an ecstasy, addressing the gallery) : If you insist on taking me to that ridiculous Pretender, of course you must; but can you not see that I am quite ready to go with you, dear, anywhere you please?

Wogan : I could not love thee, dear, so much loved I not honour more.

Princess : I cannot keep up this strain much longer.

Wogan : Nor I.

Princess : Will it soon be dawn?

Wogan (flinging open the shutters and letting in daylight) : It is dawn, and duty lies clear before me. Come—to the King. I don't think he is at all anxious to have you, but come. We have both come out of this scene very well, I think.

Princess : I think we have, but it was a strain. You know the part is a little beyond me.

Act IV.

Scene I.—Bologna. An Inn.

Wogan (to Princess) : I'm awfully sorry, but after having taken all this trouble to bring you from Austria that silly Pretender isn't here to meet you.

Princess : He certainly ought to have been. I don't think it's nice of him.

Wogan : He's gone to Cadiz, and Heaven knows when he's coming back.

Princess : Perhaps he doesn't want to marry me after all.

Wogan : Yes, he does; but he wants me to marry you by proxy for him.

Princess : As you love me, won't you find that rather trying?

Wogan : Frightfully. But it makes me much more of a hero, so I don't mind it so much.

Scene II.—The Altar of St. Joseph.

Wogan (to Princess, after they are married by proxy) : This is a frightfully unsatisfactory finish, isn't it?

Princess : Yes, awfully!

Wogan : But in an historical drama one has to follow history, you see.

Princess : I wish it weren't necessary. I have seen lots of plays where no one thought of being accurate.

Wogan : I wonder why they've all gone and left us two alone?

Princess : I think it must be because they don't like this ending.

Wogan : Then we'd better go also. Good-bye.

Princess : Good-bye.

(Exit Princess, while Wogan is left in the Cathedral, wondering why he has taken so much trouble to get the very charming girl, whom he loves devotedly, married to a man whom in his heart of hearts he must know is a hopeless rotter.)

Curtain.

SPORT.

RACING NOTES.

I REFERRED last week to the proposal that the Stewards of the Jockey Club should impose a fee of £50 or £100 on every American yearling which is imported into England for sale. This has been strongly supported by the sporting press, and one paper complacently announces that if Parliament will not go in for Tariff Reform the Stewards of the Jockey Club are going to set them a good example. The English breeders have a real grievance, and I do not wonder at their protests, but the suggested reform is chimerical and impracticable, for reasons which I mentioned last week. I have since received a letter from a correspondent, who is in a position to write with authority, and he informs me that in the event of the Jockey Club taking this step a protest will at once be addressed to the Foreign Office on behalf of the United States Government. In that case it is absolutely certain that the Jockey Club will be obliged at once to withdraw their order. It may be hoped that the Stewards will deal prudently with the matter, as the process of thus eating dirt would be most disastrous to the Jockey Club, and such a blow to its prestige would have far-reaching consequences. When the Stewards contemplate coming into collision with Parliament or the Government they had better bear in mind the fate of the earthen vessel which opposed the brazen pot.

I read a few days ago some dunderhead drivel about the "huge sums" which can be won on the Turf in stakes, apropos of the ridiculously misleading list of winning owners which is published every winter. A doodle writing in a non-sporting paper has discoursed, with infantile ingenuousness, on the folly of any owner "going in for betting" now that so much money can be won "without any gambling" if he only possesses horses good enough to win some of the numerous rich stakes which are offered. This is a tremendous "if." As a matter of fact, however, the rich stakes, about which there is so much mendacious or ignorant trumpeting, are principally made up with money subscribed by the owners who patronise them. Ascot is the only meeting in England at which entrances, forfeits to the fund, and other ingenious devices for the fleecing of owners are unheard of. It is preposterous folly to attach the very slightest importance to the amount of an owner's gross winnings. I put aside altogether the money sunk in the stud (which is irretrievably lost if the horses prove failures) and the training and racing expenses. The item of forfeits alone runs into many thousands of pounds if a man has a large stud and his horses are extensively engaged. This is a source of expense of which many writers who comment on the list of winning owners have apparently never heard. Mr. J. B. Joel is credited with having won £8,648. There is no owner whose horses are more heavily engaged, and they are lavishly entered for all kinds of races. When Mr. Joel's account at Weatherby's has been settled very little of the £8,648 will be left to defray other expenses. It is the same thing with Mr. Whitney, who figures as the winner of £13,959. Borrow did best for him, and how that animal managed to win the Middle Park Plate is an inscrutable mystery. His horses are entered as generously as those of Mr. J. B. Joel, and his forfeits must have amounted to many thousands of pounds. Lord Derby has done best among the members of the Jockey Club, his nominal winnings being £23,685, and then comes Lord Rosebery with £13,182, while Mr. L. de Rothschild is credited with the same sum. Lord Derby's colours ought to be to the fore in many valuable races next year, as he will have three highly promising three-year-olds, and some of his yearlings are very racinglike. Lord Rosebery would have stood much higher on the list if all had gone well with Neil Gow, and some of his two-year-olds proved failures, notably Sallust, who was expected to win some important races, but he is still a maiden, although he started six times last season. Black Potts is expected to train into a smart three-year-old, and there was a good excuse for her defeat at the Manchester November meeting. It may be hoped that Neil Gow will stand training again, and it is understood that the Two Thousand winner has undergone a long course of veterinary treatment. The Duke of Portland, who was credited last year with over £15,000, has only £4,266 to his name, a sum which will not go far in paying the expenses of his stud. Several of the Duke's animals which were expected to do well proved failures, and it is to be feared that the best has already been seen of Wrinkler, who was said in the summer to be the smartest of the Kingsclere two-year-olds. During King Edward's long run of bad seasons the profits from the Wolferton stud farm (principally derived from Persimmon's fees) paid for the losses over the racehorses, and so the Duke of Portland has a handsome sum coming in from William the Third. Lord Durham has £6,224 to his name, but in the spring it was expected that he would do much better. Rochester proved a disappointment, as he went wrong in the spring, shortly after he had won a good race. This horse is quite likely to distinguish himself next season if he is judiciously placed, and so will Charlemont, who is a good stayer, but deficient in speed. Brancepeth is a very nice colt, and in looks he is worthy of his fine pedigree (by Gallinule out of Hackler's Pride), but he has a temper. He may win some races next year over short distances. Sir Robert Jardine is a desperately unfortunate owner. He has laid out huge sums in buying horses which are extensively engaged, but they have grievously disappointed him season after season. This year he is credited with £2,014, but he paid over £5,000 for a yearling which died a few months afterwards.

Some of the sporting papers are printing the sums nominally won in stakes by the leading owners during the last five years. King Edward is credited with having won £20,141 in 1909. The fact is that his late Majesty's winnings in stakes last year really amounted to only £12,299. Half the winnings of Minoru went to his breeder, Mr. Hall Walker, who also took half the value of a small stake which was won by Oakmere, another of the animals leased by him to King Edward. These facts are perfectly well known, but, nevertheless, one finds that several of the sporting papers continue to publish the inaccurate figures with the most slovenly unconcern.

There is an immense entry for the Grand Prix de Paris of 1912, no fewer than 585 yearlings having been engaged. This is both the richest and the cheapest race in Europe. There is £12,000 of added money, and the sweepstake also goes to the winner, £1,920 being deducted for second and third horses. The feature in the conditions which most attracts owners is the minor forfeit, which is only £4, and it is not declared until about seven weeks before the race is run. The largest subscriber is M. Edmond Blanc, with twenty-one entries; and next comes Baron Edouard de Rothschild, with nineteen. One of M. E. Blanc's lot is Permanent, half brother, by Flying Fox, to his Derby colt, Lord Burgoyne. Eight of his yearlings are by Flying Fox, and nine are by Ajax.

Mr. H. P. Whitney has entered twenty-three American mares for the Imperial Produce Plate of £3,000 at Kempton Park, to run in 1913. He is by far the largest subscriber, and next comes Mr. H. Cholmondeley with twelve of the Sledmere mares; Mr. J. B. Joel has ten entries, and Lord Derby has nine.

It is expected that Christmas Daisy will run for the £2,000 hurdle race at Nice on January 8. This is a weight-for-age race with penalties and allowances, the distance being one mile and seven furlongs. The Nice programme is certainly more attractive to owners than the miserable and beggarly races of the class which are usually advertised in England during the winter. There is a steeplechase of £4,000, also weight-for-age, distance two miles and three-quarters, to run on January 15. There are also a handicap hurdle race of £800 on January 19, and a handicap steeplechase of £1,200 on January 22. Whether Christmas Daisy wins or loses at Nice, it may be hoped that the puzzlepated handicappers will not again throw him in for the Cambridgeshire or any other race of that class. Horses ought to be weighted according to their best winning form.

THE VARSITY RUGBY MATCH—SWIMMING AND ROWING.

When the late Lord Chief Justice of England, Lord Russell of Killowen, was Sir Charles Russell, Q.C., he spoke before the Parnell Commission. He replied on the Irish case. Sir James Hannen (the President), afterwards Lord Hannen, sent him a note when he had finished, saying it was a great speech, worthy of a great occasion, and the present Lord Chief Justice of England, then Sir Richard Webster, Attorney-General, concurred. There in the heat of political strife one found that bedrock regard for great qualities which makes for esteem and goodwill. Not otherwise may one regard the University Rugby football match played at Queen's Club last week. There was great play worthy of a great occasion. When Poulton scored the winning try "the callow youth of Oxford stood on their chairs and cheered." This sounds like an old Granta description of a socker match when Gosling and George Cotterel pulled the game out of the fire and "Tis" alias R. C. L. poured forth his soul in heroics in that paper. Naturally they cheered. Oxford were hot favourites, and they had just won with fifteen men to fourteen. Seven minutes after the whistle sounded no side, and there was a dead silence on the ground. There were no cheers for either side. The losers were almost greater in defeat than in victory, and the winners realised that but for accidents they might not have won. All the air a solemn stillness held, and the stillness was the silence of mutual respect. The favourites may fail at Queen's. But Oxford had not failed. They played a great game from start to finish, except for a few minutes in the second half, when Lewis had put Cambridge ahead. Then they looked like going to peices. And if Lewis had not been knocked out—well, other things might have happened.

Oxford were playing a great game and Cambridge found form that they seem to have retained, judging by their win over Newport. I cannot help thinking that a pretty piece of passing and a run by Lewis in the first five minutes really gave them confidence. True the ball was called back, but Oxford had defended and Cambridge showed they could attack. Then Oxford, getting the ball in the scrimmage, scored twice, and they kept on getting the ball, and the attack was very hot. Scholfield at three-quarter was simply superb in defence. At last the Cambridge forwards got an attacking position, and twice in quick succession two tries were scored, Scholfield drawing the opposition well. A third try was added before half-time, and Lockhart took the place kicks beautifully. Cambridge were leading by two points at half-time. The forwards and halves had not given their three-quarters more than half a dozen chances, and the outsides had made the most of them. On the re-start the Cambridge forwards started getting the ball, Lewis scoring again. Soon after, with a hot attack and Oxford getting flustered, it looked as though Cambridge might do anything. Then Lewis was hurt. The Cambridge seven forwards played brilliantly, Lockhart kicked well into touch, and the outsides did not hesitate to go in for quite good passing movements. But Oxford were too strong. Poulton made two fine swerving runs. One ought to have been checked if Cambridge had not momentarily forgotten to go for the man with the ball. From these runs tries were scored and goals followed, and so ended the game in a victory for Oxford by a goal, and so finished a match that will be remembered as one of the prettiest and cleanest displays of modern Rugby football that it has ever been a veteran player's privilege to see.

So far as individual players are concerned it may safely be said that those who had reputations did nothing to spoil them and others who were not known before made them. After the first twenty minutes Lockhart fed his three-quarters cleanly, and Cumberlege was better and quicker than he had been. Cheeseman, the Oxford half, got the ball away very quickly, and Knott was perhaps a bit mechanical. All the Oxford threequarters were good. Allan was outpaced by little Lewis. The Fetter pair of Cambridge freshmen three-quarters will be dangerous when they are older. And Scholfield struck one as being the soundest three-quarter on the ground. There was no dashing brilliancy in his play, but he was so thoroughly sound and untiring. He never made a mistake. In defence he always filled the gap at the weakest spot. He tackled surely, and got in his kicks. In attack he drew the opposite side and gave his pass at the proper time. He ought to be an international. Both backs were sound. Last season I referred to Pinkham, the Old Leysian. He gave up Rugby for Association football on going up to Cambridge, and he got his blue as goal-keeper. He now has his Rugby blue at full-back. He fields the ball well, and he saved several nasty rushes cleverly. The striking feature of the play on both sides was that neither hesitated to attack. At one time it looked as though Cambridge might upset the Oxford defence, but Oxford never hesitated to attack. Neither did Cambridge after losing Lewis fail to open up the game. That early bogus try gave Cambridge confidence. I am bound to confess that I think Oxford would have pulled the game out of the fire Lewis or no Lewis. But what a pity Lewis is not a stone bigger.

If the selectors of the English team to meet Wales had desired their matches to be played under circumstances which might prevail on the Cardiff ground they could not have wanted any other weather than prevailed at Leeds and Twickenham when the trial games against the North and South were played. It was vile. On each occasion the team selected to play for England pulled the match out of the fire, though England played a man short, Lagden, the forward, being hurt before half-time. Chapman, at three-quarter, ran and took his passes well; his place kicking was excellent. As to some of the players, Williams and Bell, the full-backs, are said to be qualified in reality for Wales and Scotland, and Geen got his place in the Oxford team because of the reputation he gained at Newport. The Northern forwards were good in the loose. The feature of the play on both sides was the excellent passing in heavy rain.

* * * * * *

What the sporting press refers to as miscellaneous matters were dealt with at the monthly meeting of the executive committee of the Southern Counties Amateur Swimming Association. And yet among the items were some showing that the executive is engaged in matters of real public interest and importance. Their representatives are engaged in promoting the provision of public swimming baths by local bodies. It was reported that good progress was being made in the Hendon district. One bath is to be erected in the Finchley district, and as the matter is under the control of the Public Health Committee members of the association were appointed to assist the committee if required. It has been decided to build a bath at Han-well, and it was resolved to ask the Council to receive a deputation. Then further information was sent that an enclosed and open-air bath was to be erected at Reading. In addition efforts are being made to get a bath in Stoke Newington and Finsbury.

Now, one can only hope that the local authorities will invite the assistance of the Amateur Swimming Association whenever they decide on erecting swimming baths. If the baths are to become popular swimming clubs must be encouraged. In that way swimming as an exercise is stimulated. The leaders of the A.S.A. know from practical experience what should be the length, breadth, and depth of a bath. If these dimensions are of a certain standard then the place is suitable for championship races and for water polo. Furthermore, in the original design it is possible to arrange for the convenience of players and spectators. Properly worked baths should be little, if any, charge on the rates. But to this end it is absolutely necessary to secure the co-operation of swimming enthusiasts. These men simply abound in the swimming world. They are the missionaries of the most useful exercise there is. The A.S.A. may almost be said to organise and develop clubs in any district when baths are started. The Association provides lecturers to arouse local interest to get baths built. It does not stop there. It will lend men who will do their best to organise clubs and get matches for schools and institutions. I confess I never understand how the colonial swimmer can come over here and spend a summer swimming and winning championships. This sort of person is an extremely fortunate young fellow. But I have refrained from any criticism for some time because the presence of these swimmers does so much to arouse interest in the sport, and the A.S.A. does so much good work in promoting the teaching of swimming that really it would be ungracious to quiz some of the methods which one may not entirely approve.

The Amateur Rowing Association presents the balance of genuine amateurism. Mr. Gridley, who retired after nine years' work as honorary secretary, presented the accounts. Receipts, £37 odd; expenditure, £12 odd; balance in hand, £25 3s. 8d. What splendid work the Association does on a minimum of money. Well, it is going to approach the railways to try to get racing boats taken at reduced rates. Mr. Hammond, of Hereford, wants fours with coxswains to row at Henley. He had better approach the Henley stewards. The Skiff Club will want a race in from Fawley for their pairs, which always have coxswains, mostly females.

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

THE Royal Automobile Club has not received very graciously the well-meant efforts of its associate body, the Derbyshire and North Staffordshire Automobile Club, to promote the consolidation of the existing motoring organisations. The provincial club has been peremptorily asked what it means by having the audacity to launch a scheme without first obtaining the consent of its lords and masters in Piccadilly. The offending provincials have resigned, and all the fat is in the fire. It is a little rift which may conceivably have larger consequences. Perhaps the local club committed an error of judgment in launching its scheme quite so precipitately. It might have acted more diplomatically and made its representations privately in the first place. But this is merely a matter of procedure. It is more to the point that the club's suggestion was an exceedingly good one, and it is not very encouraging to find that it has been met in such an eminently unsympathetic manner by the mandarins of Piccadilly.

The French motoring industry seems to have extraordinary difficulty in settling its motor show policy. At first it held exhibitions regularly every year. Then it dropped them. Then it proposed holding them alternately with ours at Olympia. This notion not finding favour over here, it has resumed them again this year. Now, however, yet another change of policy is announced, and we are told that there will only be a show every alternate year in future. The cause? Because when a show is impending people postpone buying their cars and trade is disorganised. This, however, would rather be a reason for abandoning the show altogether than for holding it every two years. The truth of the matter is, I suppose, that the Salon exhibitions, attractive as they are to the public, are from the business point of view somewhat unremunerative—unlike those at Olympia, which suffer only by their excessive prosperity. Perhaps it is just as well, on the whole, that we have no Grand Palais over here to tempt to extravagance and to run away with all the profits.

I am not surprised to read a protest against the action of the police in forbidding windscreens on taxis on the score of their danger—that is to say, screens coming in front of the face, for half screens are, of course, already fitted to many cabs. Even officialism can hardly be unaware that screens are fitted nowadays and used in perfect safety on about ninety cars out of a hundred. I suppose, however, the argument would be that though unobjectionable generally, they are not desirable in the case of vehicles running all day in the thick of the traffic. But, then, private cars have to negotiate the traffic, too. In short, the decision is incomprehensible.

Judging by the scientific tests which have been made by Mr. R. W. Brewer, A.M.I.C.E., etc. (the report of which has been published in the Autocar), solidified petrol seems to possess very solid advantages. In regard to the exact relative efficiencies of the solid and the liquid spirit, the former seems to have scored undeniably, the figures indicating a saving of from 21 to 22 per cent. in the matter of consumption. It is pointed out, further, that even if the results were equal in this respect, the solid fuel would still have the advantage—by not needing the special cans which are required for the liquid spirit and which add greatly to its cost, by being more readily and cheaply transferred by rail as well as by sea, and in various other ways. There seems to be a great future for the, so-to-speak, petrified article.

It is not too easy to gather from the report of the inquest on the recent remarkable motor-'bus accident in Regent Street precisely what happened. All that seems certain is that for some reason or other the driver lost control temporarily of the steering wheel, and that the 'bus thereupon mounted the pavement. Mr. Charles Jarrott has expressed the opinion that raked steering pillars and larger steering wheels are imperatively required on motor-'buses, and has referred to the existing "upright steering pillar, cramped driving position, and ridiculously small steering wheel" as a source of danger needing instant attention. I hardly fancy, however, that most motorists will agree with him here. I am not aware that it has ever been suggested before that the existing steering arrangements are in any way inadequate. The contrary would appear to be proved by the remarkably small number of accidents which occur. The drivers look quite comfortable, and they seem to have their vehicles under perfect control. Why, therefore, clamour for alterations?

Hearty congratulations to Mr. Frank Shorland—the first British representative of the motor industry, unless I am mistaken, to receive the Legion of Honour. No one will be disposed, however, to gainsay his right to the distinction. Though he only entered the motor trade a year or so ago, Mr. Shorland, as manager of the Talbot firm, has already made his mark as one of the leaders of the industry. His services in connection with the Clément-Bayard airship were also, doubtless, remembered by the French Government when they decided to confer upon him the signal distinction referred to—a distinction which though it has been humorously described as one which few escape, is one, none the less, which many are always coveting.

In connection with the Prince Henry tour, which is to be a notable feature of the motoring season of 1911, the point has been raised as to how the selection is to be made of the owners and cars who are to represent the R.A.C., and the hope has been expressed that those responsible will take care to get together as representative a team as possible, and not one containing too many examples of one particular make. It is easy to understand, however, that some little difficulty may be experienced in arriving at this result, unless the competitors are deliberately chosen by reference to their cars. Assuming that there is an excess of applicants, the most obvious way of making the selection would be by ballot, and in this case the cars used would clearly depend on the particular members chosen. But then, how if a member who happens to win a place is the possessor of a poor car not likely to give a good account of itself? Would the committee reserve the right to veto the entry of such a candidate? Undoubtedly the most satisfactory arrangement would be, as has been suggested, to have all the leading cars represented. But how is this to be managed?

WOMAN.

LETTERS TO MY MOTHER-IN-LAW.

DEAR Mrs. P.,—I really think it would be better for Emily to come to us as I proposed, instead of Caroline. Being younger, and having less pronounced opinions on the new Encyclopædia Britannica, which in London is not a current topic in sitting-out corners, she is more likely to—well, to achieve the red label, in picture shows so inducive of other sales that it is sometimes adopted a little previously. I hope you did not imagine that my invitation to her was in the least influenced by your hint of a really nice Christmas present—I don't really want anything. It is so difficult to choose things for people. I am sending small presents of money to people whose wants I don't know.

Three sets of carol-singers last week reminded me prematurely that so far I have nothing for mamma, who makes a specialty of being neglected. The worst of cockney carol-singers is that they all sing with an unction born of a belief that they are collecting for some worthy object—in most cases singers and object being synonyms. Also the "Hark, the Herald Angels!" is divested of all its spontaneity by their studied insertion of the "h's." It drove me to the Stores, however, where you can wait in comfort longer than at any other place I know. Thence to the Chow-Chow and Pekingese Club Show, where I should have liked to spend more time; but one is rather apt to look on the Horticultural Hall merely as an annexe to one's shopping centre.

I always thought the Chow-Chows showed their teeth to everyone but their owner to prove the blackness of their tongues and gums. It seems, however, that the long habit of being eaten by the Celestials has induced them to retaliate in kind, so to speak. I like Chow-Chows better than Pekingese, even though their strenuousness marks the difference between their social position and that of their lackadaisical and aristocratic rivals. The difference between eating and being eaten seems pretty much the same wherever you look.

One of my cousins, who was coming to us from Paris on Saturday morning, wired the night before from Boulogne to say the sea was mountains high and the boats not going. It seems that even in the harbour they were bobbing up and down many feet. I once suffered in the same way myself from the lack of connection between the boat and the Paris authorities, being allowed to arrive at Dieppe—as I was sick either way, mamma always insisted on my coming the cheapest—only to spend twelve hours in a stuffy and over-crowded hotel. My cousin got fined going over for carrying decent matches, and was made to pay a franc for each match in the box. I sent him a patent lighter to obviate the sulphurous fumes of French matches, and that got confiscated, although, as a French deputy remarked, lighters are really necessary to light the matches provided by the French Government. It is not only the dearness of French matches that matters, but they seem made not to light but to fumigate. A painter I met at dinner the other night told me, however, that that was no doubt a wise provision on the part of the French Government, for when he lived in lodgings in the Latin Quarter he always struck two or three between the sheets before going to bed, thus ensuring himself an uninterrupted night.

Have you, by the way, had any applications for funds to build women's lodging-houses? It seems they are badly wanted, since the workhouse authorities, instead of making women earn their beds beforehand, keep them so long the next day that they have no chance of getting work. So far, however, well-meaning committees seem to get stuck over such questions as to whether the lodgers shall all wash together or have cubicles which harbour dirt as well as decency. As many of them haven't made up their minds about washing at all, the question doesn't seem to me to be vital; the rest admit cheerfully that they prefer company when "cleaning" themselves, it being apparently bad form to attend to more than your hands and face. I don't know how far sleeping and washing are inseparable, but it seems to me that while the one is indispensable, the other is regarded by a large class as a regrettable fad on the part of the small one.

I went to M. Bouvier's last lecture on Romain Rolland at Mrs. Eric Hambro's last week, and enjoyed it quite apart from the sense of virtue at going to a lecture at all. James wouldn't go, saying he must be in Chambers to see if anything had come from the solicitor he canvassed for unsuccessfully. I found, however, that he had taken the porter's little girl to the Show instead. As it happened, there was no brief; but it would have been just the same. I have really ceased to take any interest in a party which gets defeats when it's in a minority and "moral defeats" whenever it's in power.

I sometimes feel, indeed, that it would be amusing to see tariff reform and Mr. Balfour in power together. It would lead to situations such as happened in Persia some time ago. When corn went up dangerously in the capital the late Shah sent for all the leading corn merchants, protesting that such rises were provocative of revolution, and what did they mean by it. The merchants shrugged their shoulders, intimating that the law of supply and demand was responsible, and that they meant nothing personal. The Shah informed them that unless the law of supply and demand assumed another complexion before morning he would have their ears nailed to the counter, whereupon the price of corn fell magically, and several merchants hesitated before putting their sons into the corn trade. Mr. Balfour would, I am sure, enjoy nailing down to their promises and prognostications those of his flock who are responsible for making him wear the prophet's second-hand mantles.—Always your loving

VERITY.

LADIES, LACE, AND LEARNING.

"WOMAN: The female of Man. See HOMO."

O admirable wisdom of our forefathers! That was how they dismissed the riddle of the living Sphinx. Glancing hastily at her, they said with relief—"See Homo," and got on firm ground again. The first edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" came out in 1786, and its article on woman consisted of an inimitable half-dozen of words. Into this small compass went with perfect ease the long hair of Lilith, the fruitarian zeal of Eve, Xanthippe's left-handed immortality, the loveliness of Helen, and the petulant splendour of Cleopatra; the sex was boiled down like an ox in a tea cup, and told its status once for all. We are the female of Man. Let us now immediately, whole-heartedly, and contentedly "see Homo."

The placid masculine attitude of 1786 has suffered alarming changes since then. Last week a dinner was given celebrating the part women have taken in preparing the eleventh edition of the Encyclopædia. The room was filled with distinguished men and women, learned in all the "arts and sciences and a thousand appliances," as Thoreau puts it. I heard two masculine comments during the evening which seemed to me significant. One was: "Learning seems to run to lace!" and the other: "Intelligence has had a glorious effect on women's looks." They were both true. A stranger coming in would probably have thought: "What a fine set of faces." There were, of course, many present who were not beautiful; but there was scarcely any face which was not marked out from the commonplace by some look of keenness or thoughtfulness, and this look gave a curious family likeness to the faces, otherwise as different as age, temperament, mind, colouring, feature, and occupation could make them. It was some time before I discovered exactly wherein this look consisted; but after a time, during the speeches, it became so marked that anyone could read it.

It was the outward look of people who are interested in people or things lying outside the immediate sphere of their own feelings. It gave the charm of impersonality to strong personalities—a potent conjunction. It is not exactly a look of attention, because it is too closely connected with mental processes of criticism and arrangement for that; but it is the look which means that its wearer considers life interesting apart from the fact that he or she is alive.

As for lace, the remark of the male spectator was significant, too. All round the room one saw simple, quiet gowns, of fine line, trimmed with the marvellous webs of Venice and Alençon and Mechlin. I have never seen so much really exquisite old lace in a casual assembly before. Jewels were comparatively rare; apparently they do not appeal to the minds which delve into the past and dwell in thoughtful ways. One can, no doubt, be vulgar in lace; but it is not so easy as in diamonds.

Another thing which must have struck any observer of this gathering of working women was the complete absence of that peevish and discontented expression which one may study in Hyde Park any afternoon, during the evening, or, indeed, in the greater number of wealthy-looking carriages anywhere. Taking wealth as a sign of idleness, one can only come to the conclusion that women who work find it a means of happiness. They certainly look happier, on the whole.

If ever those two types of horror, the "literary lady" and "the new woman," might have been expected to appear, it was at such a function as this, where fifty or sixty females of Man (see Homo) were being fêted for their good work on the Encyclopædia, and every woman of note had been invited. And yet the adjective which comes first to mind to describe the guests is old-fashioned, almost disused in this connection, and redolent of everything that is most feminine. These were gracious women. They looked well, moved well, spoke well; they were there because they had done well; and if ever that greatest of boons, work, got a good advertisement it was supplied by the singular charm of this company.

LOVE'S CANDIDATURE.

I came to thee with naught save love;
I bear no victor's trophy;
I only ask thee not to shove
Thy Harold from his Sophie
Though battered by the hustings' hum,
Denied by Fate's decree
To sit in Parliament, I come,
A candidate for thee.

"Bid me despair and I'll despair,"
And go into hysterics,
Or any mortal thing I'll dare
In any line of Herrick's.
Bid me become thy Unionist,
And I'll not say thee nay;
To Liberal vows thou'lt surely list
On my selection day.

To thee I'll yield my heart and soul,
And everything thou wantest,
If I but head fair Hymen's poll—
In no three-cornered contest.
I need no other vow than this,
A simple Yes or No;
The first will crown my life with bliss,
The second drown in woe.

This, then, thy candidate's address:
I crave thy hand in token,
That I may put it through the press
In case thy pledge is broken.
But most of all to ease my task
While here I only burn,
I print my primal kiss and ask
An unopposed return.

A LITTLE LETTER FROM LIVERPOOL.

Dear "Truth,"—In spite of the sound and fury of elections, we have been rather gay of recent days here, and we progress towards Christmas merrily enough. The Consuls' banquet for the Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress was one of the delightful occasions when ladies appear in all the loveliness of dress and jewels, and the dining-room at the Adelphi became like a garden of roses and lilies, orchids and hyacinths, and all the flowers of an untimely spring. Methinks the "seven veils" is no legend, but the meaning of fashion to-day, when veiling, and again veiling, and always veiling, compose the most poetic gowns.

It is difficult to say who was the most beautiful in so brilliant a gathering. Mme. Massot, wife of the Argentine Consul, who received, wore a gown of palest pink satin sown with pearl and gold and opal, quite in accord with her fresh beauty. The Lady Mayoress of Liverpool, Mrs. Mason Hutchinson, was charmingly dressed in grey satin veiled in chiffon, and wore many diamonds. Countess Dall' Aste Brandoline wore pearls with her delicate white gown. Mrs. V. H. Williams, the ex-Lady Mayoress, was wonderfully pretty in her gown of grey charmeuse and ninon. Mme. Pinto's lovely gown was of satin veiled in aluminium, elaborately jewelled. An exquisite frock of rose-leaf satin and chiffon was worn by Mme Aguilar Pelaez, and Miss de Montemayer was in green, the overdress of white chiffon. Next came pretty receptions by Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Willmer, the Mayor and Mayoress of Birkenhead, Mrs. Willmer, who is a most elegant woman, wearing a gown of shot green silk, the peplum of Oriental embroidery.

The Royal Rock Beagle Hunt ball at Birkenhead Town Hall was charming, as the Hundred of Wirral was greatly represented. Mr. Todd (the Master of the Hunt) and Mrs. Todd did the honours of the reception, Mrs. Todd looking extremely pretty in a pink satin gown, the tunic sparkling with silver. Mrs. Gair was in grey moire, with lovely old lace, and Miss King was in green satin veiled in gold powdered net.

Quite the smartest ball of the season, so far, was the Ladies' Charity Ball, at which there were bouquets and posies of fair young girls like roses, and débutantes in plenty. The Lord Mayor and Lady Mayoress and Mrs. Holford Harrison were receiving, and Mrs. Holford Harrison's gown of emerald green chiffon with white scarves of old lace was much admired. Mrs. Albert Melly wore black chiffon, the corsage composed of beautiful Eastern embroidery. The Misses Hampson —two fair and pretty girls—wore delicate gowns veiled in ninon. Miss Mason Hutchinson was dressed in grey charmeuse, draped with chiffon to accord. Mrs. Edgar Hornby, a tall and beautiful woman, wore a gown in very dark blue, the peplum sparkling with silver. Mrs. Arthur Cook and Mrs. Percy Rimmer escorted charming young daughters, and among other pretty people were Mrs. Clayton, in blue velvet; Mrs. Andrew MacIver, in grey gauze over blue; Miss Flynn Whittle, whose white frock was touched with green; and Miss Bright, in prettiest blue over white satin.—Yours ever,

WINIFRED.

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Tuesday.—Joan personally conducted me to an afternoon party at Madame K.'s, where I met two entirely beautiful women, one the wife of a politician of considerable promise, a valuable quality in his kind, the other an American, eloquent on the faults of England, and not entirely reticent on the virtues of the States. However I might cavil at the latter's converse, her costume left the critic, even as Othello, with her occupation gone. She wore a frock, just reaching to the ground, of dark china blue crêpe de chine, lightly covered with a conventional pattern in steel beads, while her vest of ivory-hued lace was mounted over a lace of steel threads, and the draped sleeves disclosed lace under-sleeves lined with the steel again. Her hat was broad-brimmed of blue velvet, and drawn well over the left eye, its flat, round crown encircled by a band of steel with a clematis expressed in steel at one side. A very narrow ermine tie of superior birth beset with tails was round her throat, while she carried a monster muff of ermine, and, doubtless, had dropped some heavy fur-lined coat into the arms of one of the gold trimmed footmen in the hall. The other truly admirable exponent of the art of dress wore a black miroir velvet skirt hemmed with skunk, and a bodice made in vandykes of black chiffon joined with white Venetian lace. Her hat of black velvet had a black velvet lily at one side, and her loose wide-sleeved velvet mantle, bordered with skunk, slipped now and again from her shoulders, faithfully revealing the elegance it was ordained to cover and discover.

It was a nice party, there was no music, and the hostess triumphantly introduced her latest jewelled throat brooch—an oblong tablet of diamonds of pendant make, and flexible disposition, centred with an emerald, and of just sufficient width to hide the seam of the collarband.

Jewellery is a revived prodigality of ours; it is the god of the fashionable hour, and the plaque is its prophet. "No, night too dark for some star to shine," and no day too dull for some glittering gewgaw to twinkle upon the chest of woman. Larger and larger grow the medallions, while their stones increase in size, and the latest method is to clasp them with jewels to a flat braid of pearls long enough to allow them to repose half-way towards the waist. These little braid chains of pearls are also worn in the evenings tightly round the neck, with tassels of diamonds and little bosses of pearls and diamonds. They induce some suspicion of truth in the dictum, "woman is an acquisitive creature." And these generous moments find all the world and the other man's wife marching through Bond Street on a plaque pilgrimage.

Wednesday.—A valued friend whom I collected three weeks ago, telephoned to-night that he was dull and craved some entertainment. Out of the fulness of my heart, and the vacancy of a second stall in my possession, I took him to H. B. Irving's production of "Princess Clementina" at the Queen's Theatre. Never was there a more gorgeous vision than Miss Stella Patrick-Campbell in her tight-fitting bodice and ample draperies of rose-pink embroidered in gold, with pearls entwined in her dark hair. She was a veritable princess, a queen indeed of youth and beauty. Mr. Irving looked as if he had stepped out of any one of several old pictures with his full waved wig, long waistcoat, and his black cloak lined with red, which he managed with complete grace while he sought and found our sympathy for the romantic hero who vowed that love should be well lost for the world.

I sat in front of Mrs. George Alexander, who was wearing a lovely cloak of mulberry velvet embroidered all over with tiny silver roses, with a mulberry feather ruffle round her neck and a wondrous jewelled ribbon in her hair. Princess Victoria of Schleswig-Holstein was in a box wearing black lace and a fine string of pearls, and Lady St. Helier was with her also, of course in black, and above them sat Viscountess Middleton with a grey ostrich boa twisted becomingly round her white throat. There was a delightful dress in the stalls, wearer unknown, but much envied, of pearl grey chiffon embroidered in pear-shaped pearls and amethysts. Lady Hare was looking proudly conscious of the real name of the part-author of the play, and Mrs. Mackenna well became a charming cloak of Chinese embroidery, while Lady Angela Forbes, flagrant transgressor of the law "thou shalt not arrive late," gave convincing evidence of the success of "The Broken Commandment," and H. G. Wells, by the excellent quality of his astrachan collar and cuffs, afforded some further proof of the advantages of a literary career.

The black and gold brocaded gauze.

Thursday.—Virginia and I spent the afternoon at the Truth Toy Show, marvelling and ever marvelling at the ingenuity of the many contributors to this world of dolls, who express the very mould and fashion of the time under various attractive aspects. Masculine puppets were greatly in evidence, a testimony doubtless to the advance of the suffrage movement. "Won't you come and play with me?" even as Anna Held might have sung, was the eloquent appeal written on the wonderful toys, and others rattled in the money boxes and bags held by alluring damsels who paraded the hall.

It was a goodly show of a goodly work, and we vowed that next year should not see us mere idlers by the way of admiration, but zealous dressers of dolls. In the meantime we impressed upon each other it's never too late to send to the financial fund. "Act, act, in the living present," I quoted, bravely. "The living Christmas present," interjected Virginia, remembering the new Siamese cat she had promised Nita, and reminding me of my troubles.

What to buy for everybody, and why? are questions inscribed upon the tablets of my perplexed mind. Blessings would fall upon the pioneer who would start a really friendly society on a mutual basis with an insurance against the unwanted gift, every subscriber to supply a list of needs. The multitude is sighing and groaning at the thought of the much it would give and the little it has. "Beggars can't be choosers," I sigh hourly, thinking of the reproach of my banker and the approach of my bills as the post brings me catalogues and ever more catalogues of beautiful things whose possession I would so gladly allot to my dear friends. Commendable generosity might well be shown in the transference of other liabilities to Easter, and such a definite expression of goodwill from our creditors would just now be as grateful, as comforting, and thoroughly seasonable.

Saturday.—I have heard "Salome" in the company of Robert. The terrific realism of Madame Ackté flooded my emotional being even as the Thames the banks at Reading. She pulsated with passion from her tossing head to her quivering toes, and the strong wild utterance and voice of her, and the scene, and the circumstance obsessed me completely. I supped full of terrors and joys, and even resented Robert's flippant suggestion of oysters as more nourishing food. Seldom has music interested me more; the harsh intention of its discords even as its fine, grand harmonies, its sound and its fury signifying everything. Yet I remained my normal self sufficiently to note in the too-quickly darkened auditorium a gracious dame in a gorgeous tiara of diamond wheat ears, and I caught glimpses of Mrs. Humphry Ward, and of Mrs. W. K. Clifford, and of beautiful Margaret Halstan, and I approved of a tall fair woman wearing an attractive dress of black and gold brocaded gauze mounted over gold tissue in old tunic style, with a draped bodice edged with sable each side of a vest of thick gold trellis.

Mrs. A's Letter-Box.

Choisi.—The very latest bags are of huge satchel shape, made of gold-threaded tapestry brocade and trimmed with gold galon and tassels. They are used in the day and the evening time, and you can get them under gorgeous aspect at Jay's Regent Circus. I should say one would be an ideal present, because so new here.

Snow.—If you want a dress that you might make use of afterwards I would suggest you appear as an Eastern Princess in a gown cut in one piece, tightly fitting without stays, and made of soft gold tissue. This should reach to the ground at the front and back and have very little sleeve. To wear with it you should borrow breastplates, necklaces, and armlets of coloured jewels, emeralds, rubies and pearls. Below the waist have a flat gold girdle with jewelled ends. From your dark hair, you should float a long veil made of white chiffon, gold-spangled and embroidered, and across the front of your head a band of jewels with two large bosses over the ears with hanging ornaments of emeralds and rubies and pearls. These ornaments you could borrow of Simmons, in King Street, Covent Garden, or Nathan, in Coventry Street. After the fancy dress ball you could take the gold foundation, make it fit you tightly, and cover it with white or black lace, bordered with gold passementerie. For patterns of the gold tissue send to Messrs. Debenham and Freebody, Wigmore Street, and if necessary to line it, use nun's veiling for the hem of the skirt, so that it hangs softly.

UPSTAIRS AND DOWNSTAIRS.

A distracted lady who has opened her house for Christmas to her family in its broadest sense, has just discovered a way out of the wet weather difficulty, so far as the youngsters are concerned. There are to be over half a dozen of them between ten and seventeen, and as December dragged its sopping weeks along the prospective hostess felt her heart sink. Bridge, billiards, and private theatricals would occupy the grown-ups; but those dear, dreadful schoolboys! She has now smoothed the crease from her brow, and goes about with the smile of conscious genius. By the aid of the village carpenter she has turned an attic into a photographic studio, has laid in a stock of five shilling cameras and printing and developing outfits (these to be her Christmas gifts to the youngsters), and is going to offer prizes for the best indoor and outdoor photographs submitted by a recipient during the stay at her house, and another prize for the outfit in the best condition (including the adjacent portions of the attic) at the end of the time. She counts confidently on

The man or woman who lacks a fountain pen is confessedly behind the times. To be dependent on an inkpot is to be completely out of date. There are so many kinds of fountain pens that the only difficulty is that of choice. The Waterman Ideal Pen, of which Messrs. Hardtmuth, Koh-i-Noor House, Kingsway, are the sole representatives in this country, is of so ingenious yet simple make that there is actually nothing to get out of order. It is filled in a moment, and it never leaks. Consequently it deserves the superlative adjective by which it is known—the Ideal Pen. It is got up in several attractive styles, many of them elaborately ornamental, consequently well adapted for presents. Encased in filigree work in 14-carat gold and enclosed in a neat case, one of these makes a very acceptable gift. Others are in filigree silver, and, in fact, they are to be had in all prices. The "Secretary" has a slender barrel, preferred by some to the wider grip, and quite as strong and durable. The Koh-i-Noor pencils are too well known to need eulogium. Those who know them seldom care to use any other, and a set of these forms the handiest present to send a friend. They can be slipped into an envelope and sent off without the trouble of making them into a parcel.

A problem which worries the housewife who has filled her house with relatives and has but a small domestic staff is that of the early morning tea and the breakfast coffee for so many people. Coffee takes time to make, and even early tea is not made in a moment. Vacuum flasks, however, are now to be had at such low prices that there ought to be no difficulty in making the tea the night before, and, pouring it off the leaves into the flask, it will be piping hot next morning.

The coffee difficulty is a real one in small households, where the cook has to prepare the breakfast single-handed. She cannot be making an omelette and pouring water on the coffee at the same moment. Good coffee takes twenty minutes to make. Various coffee-machines are on the market, and a little care in choosing will overcome this difficulty. I only have personal experience of one make, but it is quite admirable; compact, durable, and needing only to have the coffee and water put in and then to be left to itself on the fire for a quarter of an hour. This averts the danger of boiling, and turns out coffee much better than that made by the ordinary English servant.

The whole question of breakfast is sometimes left in the hands of the guests when the hostess does not care to submit them to the rigours of a fixed hour, and yet cannot disorganise the work of the whole house by serving desultory breakfasts up to ten o'clock. There is so much dainty table cooking apparatus that it is no trouble for late-comers to poach their own eggs, toast their own bacon, and altogether look after themselves.

The breakfasters in bed are also rendered less troublesome by special trays, bed-tables, etc. The trays with little depressions to hold the various articles are the best. The little infusing spoons allow each guest to make tea according to personal fancy. Some special trays have hot-water cavities below the cup and the plate for bacon, to keep these things hot.

On the whole, it is considerably more pleasant to be a guest than a hostess at Christmas, however hospitable one may be. The menu is another pre-occupation. Here are a few contributions towards it:—

Chestnuts are very useful, and make a delicious trifle.

Chestnut Trifle.—Cut the ends from twenty chestnuts, blanch them to remove the shells, then finish boiling them to the consistency of a mealy potato, and strain. Cut a small round sponge cake into slices across, spread the slices with apricot jam, and replace them, one on the other, into their original shape. Soak the cake for some hours with sherry, adding two tablespoonfuls of brandy. Place the cake on a glass dish; cover it entirely with whipped cream that is flavoured with vanilla. Place a wire sieve over the dish and rub the chestnuts through, so that they fall lightly on the cream, sprinkle with chopped pistachios, and pour a small quantity of custard round the base.

Children will be delighted with the dramatic surprise and delicious taste of this chestnut cake:—

Gateau en Surprise.—Take the interior from a small plain sponge cake, working from the top, and leaving a nice wall of the cake. Peel three or four seedless oranges, cut them in their natural sections, and sprinkle them with sugar and maraschino. Boil twenty chestnuts, remove the shells, and rub them through a wire sieve, having care to keep them in their vermicelli-like form. Whisk a gill of cream with sugar and maraschino. Arrange the oranges, cream, and chestnuts in layers in the cake, replace the top piece, turn the cake over, and pipe it with white icing; decorate with split pistachio nuts, and dish on a pretty paper.

Something novel for a bridge supper is always welcome, and these petit pains exactly meet the necessities of the case:—

Petit Pains à la Pont d'Iéna.—Put 3 ozs. of butter into half a pint of milk; when boiling take from the fire, stir in 4 ozs. of flour, work it quite smoothly, then stir on the stove until quite boiling. Now take from the stove and work in 3 eggs, each one separately, make small balls of the paste on a greased baking sheet, two or three inches apart, brush them very lightly with well-beaten yolk of egg mixed with milk, and bake them with great care. When they are cold split them at the side and fill them with the following cream:—Make a gill of very good white sauce, using chicken stock, tammy, and cool. Pound 8 ozs. of cooked chicken, add the sauce, an ounce of butter, and pepper and salt, rub through a wire sieve. Mix in two tablespoonfuls of thick cream. Having filled the "Pains" dish them on a napkin garnished with mustard and cress.

PADDINGTON GREEN CHILDREN'S HOSPITAL, Paddington Green, London, W.
(With CONVALESCENT HOME for 20 Children at Fair View, Slough, Bucks.)
Dependent entirely on Voluntary Contributions. Free to the Sick Children of the poor without letter of recommendation. The Hospital provides forty-six cots. Average yearly number of in-patients, 730. Over 1,000 out-patients weekly. The work of the out-patient department having quite outgrown the existing accommodation, the Committee appeal for Contributions to enable them to make urgent and necessary improvements. About £11,000 WANTED for this purpose, and towards this sum the Committee have so far obtained nearly £7,000 (which includes a promised donation of £1,250 by the Council of King Edward's Hospital Fund, conditional on its approval of the plans), leaving £4,000 yet to be obtained. Funds are also needed to meet current expenses.

Christmas Appeals.

THE METROPOLITAN VISITING and RELIEF ASSOCIATION

Are now RECEIVING many APPLICATIONS from Clergy of the Metropolitan portions of the Dioceses of London, Southwark, and St. Albans, for GRANTS in aid of their POOR and SICK FUNDS.

The President (the Lord Bishop of London) and the Committee EARNESTLY APPEAL to all readers of this paper to enable them to adequately assist the Clergy and their District Visitors in their severe struggle with destitution, misery, and want by subscribing to the funds of the Association.

1. The aim of the Association is to Distribute such funds as may be committed to it in grants to the Local Committees of poor parishes proportionate to the needs of each.

2. The Clergy and District Visitors are the unpaid agents of relief, and possess the indispensable qualification of personal knowledge of the poor.

3. The overburdened Clergy are hereby greatly assisted in dealing with the distressing cases constantly before them. The religious persuasion of the poor is no obstacle to their relief.

4. Every penny contributed is devoted to the relief of destitution, all the working expenses being otherwise provided for.

Annual report will be forwarded on application to the Secretary.

SUBSCRIPTIONS to enable the Committee to carry on the work efficiently are GREATLY NEEDED.

Cheques payable to GRANT MARSTON, should be sent to the office, 45a, Pall Mall, S.W.; or to Lloyds Banking Company (Limited), 16, St. James's Street, S.W.

THE OPERATIONS OF THE COMPANY EMBRACE ALL BRANCHES OF INSURANCE.

DEATH DUTIES.—Special forms of Policies have been prepared by the Company providing for the payment of Death Duties, thus avoiding the necessity of disturbing investments at a time when it may be difficult to realise without loss.

INCOME TAX.—Under the provisions of the Act, Income Tax is not payable on that portion of the Assured's income which is devoted to the payment of annual premiums on an assurance on his life or on the life of his wife. Having regard to the amount of the Tax, this abatement (which is limited to one-sixth of the Assured's income) is an important advantage to Life Policyholders.

Full particulars of all classes of Insurance, together with Proposal Forms and Statement of Accounts, may be had on application to any of the Company's Offices or Agents.

"TRUTH" PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best Epigram, Conundrum, Lipogram, Bouts-Rimés, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this Journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the Truth Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a quarter to the same competitor.

7. All New Contributors are Required to Forward with their First Answers their Real Names and Addresses for Registration; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed twelve, and must under no circumstances consist of more than fourteen, letters.

9. Competitors must on no account change the noms-de-plume they have once assumed.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed:—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," Carteret Street, Queen Anne's Gate, S.W.

"TRUTH" PRIZE No. 1662.

It is now some while since I have invited competitors to try their hand at a rhymed Alphabet. And as the end of a year seems to afford a fitting opportunity, and such competitions are always popular, I have decided to set one this week.

The usual Prize of Two Guineas, therefore, is hereby offered for

The Best Alphabet in Twenty-six Lines of Rhymed Verse, each one of which shall deal with some Salient Feature of this Already Moribund Old Year—A.D. 1910.

As regards metre and general structure, competitors should base their alphabets on the well-known nursery model:—

A was an Archer who shot at a frog.
B was a butcher who had a great dog.
etc., etc.

I have nothing to add except that all alphabets must reach Truth Office, not later than by the first post on Monday, January 2, 1911.

Answers to Correspondents.

 The real name, with the address, of Cadi, winner of Truth Prize No. 1653, is C. A. Davis, Esq., 6, Manor Road, Salisbury.

 The real name, with the address, of Bombay, also winner of one-third of above, is A. H. Elder, Esq., 4, The Grove, Blackheath, S.E.

 The real name, with the address, of Dobbin, winner of one-fourth of Truth Prize No. 1654, is J. Arthur Watson, Esq., 7, Roseburn Cliff, Edinburgh.

F. D. E. (Ascot).—Many thanks for your suggestion.

Alpha Beta (Brixton).—I will communicate with your rival. Meanwhile please adhere to your nom-de-plume.

ENTRE NOUS.

THE award of prizes for doll dressing in connection with the Truth Toy Show will be found on page 1637. I give below a list of contributions received during the past week to the Toy Fund, but owing to the very reasonable objection of the printers to work on Bank Holidays, this list only includes amounts received up to Saturday last. I hope that many more contributions are on their way, and that my readers will among them make an effort to reduce the present heavy deficit on the Toy Fund before the end of the year.

I have also received from Mrs. Eliot Brooke, cigarette case, books, and scrapbooks.

It is probable that the arrangements for the visit of the King and Queen to India will be considerably altered, and that they will leave England early in November, which will be a month sooner than the date originally fixed for their departure for the East. It is now proposed to hold the Coronation Durbar at Delhi during the first fortnight of December, as January 1 is an unsuitable date for important reasons. The King and Queen would afterwards pay a short visit to Calcutta, and would be present at the military parade on New Year's Day. Their Majesties would get back to England by the end of January, 1912, and would be in London in time for the opening of Parliament.

There is not a particle of foundation for the report that the King and Queen contemplate a visit next July to the Court of the Netherlands at The Hague and Amsterdam. It is impossible to understand how this nonsensical tale can have been started. Their Majesties are not at all likely to pay any visits to foreign Courts, either State or private, during next year, as their time will be fully occupied at home. I have reason to believe that Queen Wilhelmina would have been well pleased to pay a visit to our Court at any time during the last two years, and if King Edward had lived it is quite likely that Her Majesty and the Prince Consort would have been entertained by the Court at Windsor Castle during the present winter. Queen Wilhelmina is said to be desirous of being invited to foreign Courts, but her husband is not a persona grata among sovereigns and princes, so that she has not received much attention in this way.

Large sums of the public money were wasted during the last reign on State visits to and from foreign Sovereigns, but in future there are not likely to be so many of these expeditions, inasmuch as the cost is to be defrayed out of the Civil List. The short visit of King Manuel last year actually cost £6,998, and it would be interesting to have the items by which this really outrageous bill was made up. Nobody can pretend that the country derived any sort of benefit from either this or any other Royal visit, and the expenses of such trips have always been scandalously large.

Queen Amélie and King Manuel recently paid a week-end visit to Queen Alexandra at Sandringham Hall, and it is rather startling to find it announced that the rumours as to the ex-King of Portugal's "matrimonial prospects" have been revived, and that he "is credited with the intention of choosing an English wife." These foolish fabrications went round the press a year ago, when Truth was alone in contradicting the nonsensical tales about King Manuel's impending betrothal to the elder daughter of the Princess Royal and the Duke of Fife. It is a pity that such rubbish should have been revived, for it is now palpably absurd. As to King Manuel being still "a parti," and "in munificent circumstances," the real truth is that he is wholly dependent upon his mother, who has luckily taken good care of her fortune, which amounts to about ten millions of francs.

It is understood that the Republican Government in Portugal will sell the pictures, china, old MSS. and books, furniture, and objets d'art in the various Royal Palaces at Lisbon and in the country. These collections are regarded as being the property of the country, as it is maintained that they were all purchased with public money. The late King of Portugal was for forty years an enthusiastic, but very discriminating, purchaser of pictures and objets de goût. It is believed, however, that a great deal of his property was removed out of Portugal after his death.

The Dowager Duchess of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha is to leave Coburg about the middle of January for the Riviera, accompanied by Prince and Princess Alphonso of Bourbon-Orleans, and they will reside for about three months at the Château de Fabron. The Grand Duke Cyril Vladimirovitch and his wife, the Grand Duchess Victoria Melita (formerly Grand Duchess of Hesse) are also going from Coburg to the Riviera, and they will spend two or three months at Cannes. The Dowager Duchess of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha will not visit Russia during the winter or spring months unless she is obliged to go to St. Petersburg for a short time.

A truly picturesque embellishment has been introduced into current fictions respecting Royal battues. An imaginative journalist informs his gaping readers that the Windsor and Sandringham pheasants enjoy a superlative reputation as "the plumpest and most tender birds in the kingdom." The reputation began with the paragraph and will doubtless end with it. George the Fourth was evidently not much impressed by the superlative merits of Windsor pheasants in his day, for he expressed the opinion that "a good fowl is better than any pheasant." His late Majesty considered that the most laudable accompaniment to pheasant was celery sauce, and a noted gourmet of the past generation delighted in boiled pheasant with oyster sauce or a suprême of pheasant with truffles. George the Fourth and his contemporary, the second Earl of Sefton, were fond of a soup the foundation of which was a very strong game stock, with which was mixed a rich purée of either walnuts or filberts.

My Dublin correspondent writes:—

In well-informed circles it is thought probable—notwithstanding the authoritative statements regarding his resignation—that Lord Aberdeen will in a little time give up office in Ireland. Apropos of his Home Rule pronouncement, our elders tell us that we must not fall into the error of imagining—political memories being short—that another Viceroy, Lord Spencer, showed, when in office, any of the pronounced Home Rule proclivities he afterwards developed. Lord Spencer left Ireland in bitter antagonism to the Nationalist party. As "Foxy Jack" he had the unpleasant experience of being hooted through the streets of Dublin, on the occasion of his public State departure from Dublin Castle at the end of his last tenure of office as Lord Lieutenant. Although then holding opinions which would have saved him personally from much unpleasantness, he gave no hint of them whilst he was the Sovereign's representative in Ireland.

Lord and Lady Aberdeen, who were abroad last week, spent Christmas at the Viceregal Lodge, where some members of their family are visiting them.

The Dowager Lady Dufferin and Ava is spending the Christmastide at Old Connaught House, near Bray, with her youngest daughter, Lady Plunket. Lord and Lady Plunket, with their family, have taken up their residence there. Lady Plunket, like her mother, is very active in benevolent and philanthropic undertakings. She has done much active good in her neighbourhood, and in addition to helping her poorer neighbours, has taught them to help themselves, especially in the matter of fresh air, the priceless boon which the poor—in that one thing on an equality with the rich—can have without any price to pay.

Many Christmas and shooting parties are assembled throughout Ireland, where the weather improved much last week. Lord and Lady Ashtown have a party at Woodlawn. Lord and Lady Oranmore and Browne are spending Christmas at Castle MacGarrett, in the Wild West, which, curiously enough, has not been as wild this autumn and winter as the quieter parts of the country. Lord and Lady Castletown, having let Doneraile House to Sir John and Lady Arnott, who have a Christmas party there, are not in Ireland. Lord Castletown has not been in good health, and will spend some time abroad. Colonel and Lady Eva Wyndham have taken an Irish residence at Carrick-on-Suir, in the south, where they will live. Colonel Wyndham Quin is Lord Dunraven's heir-presumptive, and his wife a sister of Lord Mayo's.

The number of marriages in society here have been exceptional this season, which seems to be in the fitness of things in a year of emotions and excitements like the present dying one. The leading marriage of last week was that of Miss Shaw to Mr. Cyril de Putron, of the Lancashire Fusiliers. The bride is the daughter of Sir Frederick and Lady Shaw, whose picturesque residence is in the neighbourhood of the Dublin mountains. The wedding was largely attended by the socially elect. This week the marriage of Miss Ross, the only daughter of Mr. Justice and Mrs. Ross, takes place at the Chapel Royal, Dublin Castle, the reception afterwards being held in the Shelbourne Hotel. Mr. Justice Ross is one of the strong men of the Irish Bench, with a genial and pleasant personality. He is an Ulster man, and enjoys a long friendship with the Abercorn family. Also he is a Nonconformist, like many who have lately found favour as officials in Ireland, and with different parties. He is unlikely to give up a non-combatant seat, in the judicial calmness of the Irish Bench, for an uncomfortable place in the ditch which looms so large on paper and in the bellicose speeches of Ulster as the sequel to a measure of Home Rule for Ireland.

Field-Marshal Sir Evelyn Wood, Colonel of the Royal Horse Guards, is to be the Gold Stick-in-Waiting on the King during January, replacing Lieutenant-General the Earl of Dundonald, Colonel of the 2nd Life Guards.

It is funny to read in a weekly journal that Sir Douglas Dawson "has been very happy in his choice" of an Assistant Comptroller in the Lord Chamberlain's department. I should think that any one except an absolute simpleton might surely know that the appointment in question was not made by the Comptroller but by the King, who no doubt conferred on the subject with Lord Spencer. The Household appointments are invariably made by the Sovereign, but in some cases the Great Officer in whose department the vacancy lies sends up a list of two or more names, one of which is selected by the King (or Queen).

Sackville Mechano-Therapeutic Institute.—Radiant Heat and Light Treatments. Electric Baths. Massage. Hospital-trained Nurses. Hours 10 to 7.30.—28, Sackville St., Piccadilly. Tel. 7402 Gd.

The secret histories of some of the Court appointments during the last two reigns were exceedingly curious. An important Household office became vacant during the latter half of Queen Victoria's reign, and the Lord Chamberlain then in office sent up to Her Majesty a list of four names, one of which she was requested to select for the post. The Queen knew practically nothing about the four individuals who had been recommended, so she sent the list to a confidential and trusted friend, begging that he would advise her on the subject. The friend knew really nothing either, but he had heard the name of one of the nominees mentioned (Mr. X) as understanding something of the subject with which the official would have to deal. He wrote a "secret and confidential" letter to a friend of his own, who was acquainted with Mr. X, asking whether he thought the appointment of X would "do." The friend was not unwilling to give X a lift, so he replied that no doubt he would be fully equal to the duties. Queen Victoria was therefore advised by her correspondent to appoint X, who was really indebted for the post to the action of two individuals whose names never appeared, and who were never suspected of having been in any way concerned in the appointment.

Sir Neil Menzies, who died the other day in Paris, was chief of the Clan Menzies and the owner of estates in the Rannoch and Strathtay districts of Perthshire, which extend altogether over nearly 100,000 acres. The family is one of the oldest in Scotland, and they have been settled in Perthshire since the early part of the fourteenth century. Sir Neil Menzies came prominently before the public about fifteen years ago in connection with a protracted litigation respecting his interest in the family estates, and he was ultimately successful in the action, which was carried up to the House of Lords. It is believed that the baronetcy now becomes extinct. It dates from the reign of Charles II.

Mr. Fitzherbert Wright, of Alfreton, who died last week, was one of the best known residents in Derbyshire, and he had been a prominent figure in the public and social life of the county for over forty years. He was a man of many activities, a leading Freemason, and a zealous churchman of the old Evangelical school. He was an excellent man of business, and had been for many years a director of Crompton and Evans' Union Bank at Derby, where the Midland Railway account is kept. He was a son of the late Mr. F. Wright, of Osmaston Manor, near Derby, a large country seat which now belongs to Sir Peter Walker.

---

Mrs. Leigh, who died last week, was a daughter of the famous Fanny Kemble, by her marriage with Pierce Butler, of Philadelphia. She was a clever woman, having inherited a fair share of her mother's ability, and a charming hostess. She was married in 1871 to Dr. Leigh, a younger brother of the late Lord Leigh, who was appointed by Mr. Gladstone to the deanery of Hereford in 1894, on the death of Dean Herbert.

The late Sir Walter Corbet was the head of one of the oldest families in England. They have been settled in Shropshire ever since the Norman Conquest. Thirty Corbets have represented Shropshire in Parliament, and over twenty of them have held the office of High Sheriff of the county. Sir Walter served for eleven years in the Coldstream Guards, and he took part in the Egyptian campaign of 1882. He was a generous and considerate landlord, a keen sportsman, and a great favourite among all classes in Shropshire, where he will be much missed. He hunted regularly with the Wynnstay and Shropshire packs. Acton Reynald, the family place, is beautifully situated on the slopes of Grinshill. Moreton Corbet, their old seat, has been a ruin since the Civil War, when it was garrisoned for Cromwell.

Lord and Lady Falmouth have left Mereworth Castle, near Maidstone, for Tregothnan, the family seat in Cornwall, which place is to be their headquarters until after Easter. Tregothnan is a handsome Tudor house, which is well situated in one of the largest and most picturesque deer parks in the west of England. The park occupies a range of wooded hills and is bordered by the Truro River.

---

The return of Christmas has once more brought to life the journalistic legend that Prince Albert "introduced Christmas trees into England," and that the first of them was set up at Windsor Castle in 1841. As a matter of fact Christmas trees were introduced half a century before Prince Albert was born by Queen Charlotte, and they were set up every year for the Royal children at Kew or at Windsor.

THE SEQUEL.

(After Lord Byron.)

Smith Minor loquitur:—

Fare thee well, and if for ever,
Festive Season fare thee well;
Though possessed by turkey, never
'Gainst thee can my frame rebel.

Would this form by thee inflated
Were relieved from awful pain,
Would that I were more elated,
And could eat a meal again!

Would that I might feel some ardour
When they pass me tempting pies,
And that my uneasy larder
Might resume its normal size!

Though the world for cheer do bless thee,
Linking thee with homely joys,
Could no other aim possess thee
Than to punish greedy boys?

Still, there's hardly any question
But that there are others with Deeper pangs of indigestion,
Others far more sick than Smith.

Yes, it is at least consoling
When I think to-day of such
On a bed of anguish rolling,
Though it don't relieve me much.

"Yet, oh, yet thyself deceive not;"
Greed may sink by slow decay,
But by biliousness believe not
Appetites are torn away.

No, for though I'm now complaining
And my Christmas leaves me vexed
I shall shortly be in training,
Getting ready for the next!

An esteemed Unionist friend writes:—

Dear Truth,—Many thanks for the consolation which you offer this week to the "under dog." I appreciate your Christmassy spirit, and would that it were more general. But when you suggest that we ought not to object to the repairing and redecoration of the Constitution until we have seen the beautiful effects of the Radical proletarian's handiwork, might I point out that we have every reason to believe that we should strongly object to the colour of the paint and the pattern of the paper; that we not only do not see the necessity for "having the workmen in the House," but strongly disapprove of their plans and specifications? If I sent men into your house to pull it to pieces and alter it to my satisfaction, would you be very civil to them—even at Christmas?

I may observe that my humble efforts were not intended to "offer consolation," but to inculcate a spirit of kindliness appropriate to the season. With regard to the repairs and redecorations, however, the analogy hardly seems to hold. It is not a question of my friend sending the workmen into my house, or my sending them into his. We are really part-owners. The difference between us is whose taste is to prevail in the execution of the work. We have settled our difference now in the legal and customary way, and after this I think my friend, if he is wise, will let the workmen get on with their job, and make the best he can of the new paint and paper.

Candidates are frequently put in an awkward dilemma at election times by statements falsely imputing that they are Jews, or that they are partly of Jewish origin. On the one hand, a man may possibly be prejudiced in the estimation of some voters by such a statement; on the other a denial of the statement, however delicately worded, may have the air of implying that Jewish blood is a discredit to a man, and this, again, is calculated to give offence to Jewish electors. One among several candidates who experienced this form of annoyance at the late elections was Mr. Mallaby-Deeley, who has as little about him suggestive of Jewish ancestry as any man of my acquaintance. He disposed of the soft impeachment very adroitly on the platform, and the poll shows that it did not prejudice him materially with the electorate. But it easily might have done; and in spite of his disclaimer the allegation is still being repeated in newspaper paragraphs.

---

Apparently Mr. Mallaby-Deeley is indebted for this to a gentleman named Banister, who wrote a letter to the Saturday Review just before the election calling attention to the alarming number of Jewish candidates in the field, and naming a number of them. I should think that he made more than one mistake in his lists. In common, I suppose, with most London editors, I know Mr. Banister as an anti-Semitic crusader of an extravagant type, completely obsessed with the idea that this country is insidiously ruled by Jews, who particularly dominate the press and politics. Probably if he reads these remarks he will conclude that the Jews are in possession of Truth Office. He ought by rights to have been among the Cranks in the Truth Christmas Number.

---

One of the most unseasonable manifestations of political rancour is the recrudescence of the old bragging about the desperate measures that the Orange malcontents will take in the event of a Home Rule Bill being passed. This fire-eating talk was a commonplace of the Home Rule controversy in Mr. Gladstone's time, but I doubt if it affected a single vote on this side of St. George's Channel. If Englishmen, whatever party they may belong to, are ever influenced by threats it is generally in the opposite way to what the threatener desires. And there is something peculiarly offensive in the vapourings of what Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman called "Ulsteria," threatening, as they do, armed rebellion against the authority of the Crown and the Imperial Parliament in preference to accepting the position which the minority has to occupy in every constitutional State.

---

The stories that have been put about of the secret arming and drilling of the Ulster braves should be treated as a joke, for even if they were true the performance would only be got up in order to make an impression on nervous Englishmen. The truth is that the sentiment in Ulster towards Home Rule has been transformed since 1886. There is now a large Protestant party in sympathy with the Nationalist movement, and there is a growing disposition among Irishmen of all creeds and all ranks to sink sectional differences and co-operate in a common effort for the ruling of Ireland by Irishmen. The evidence of this was seen before the last Unionist Government went out of office. Lord Dunraven and men of his pattern, who are growing more numerous every day, may not desire Home Rule in the same shape as Mr. Redmond and his party; but if it were once granted we may do them the justice to believe that they would accept the fait accompli and set themselves loyally to make the best of it. If a few irreconcilables were really found disposed to "die in the last ditch"—which I shall not believe till I see it—this fate would be the most suitable for them and most beneficial to their country.

---

Not a few worthy people seriously fear that war is necessary for the preservation among mankind of courage, coolness, self-devotion, and such-like qualities which the battlefield gives men an opportunity of displaying; and one has read from time to time disquisitions on the inevitable decay of the Western nations, and their ultimate displacement by new races of barbarians—coming it is not quite clear from where—unless they make a practice from time to time of flying at one another's throats and dealing out death and destruction just to keep themselves in training. A few of the stirring incidents of the last few days, such as the encounter of the City Poice with the armed burglars, the wonderful performance of the "Mauretania" and her crew, and the terrible colliery disaster in Lancashire, with its incidental deeds of heroism—ought to show how essentially false all ideas of that kind really are.

---

We often quote "Peace hath her victories as well as War," but we rarely, or inadequately realise that the qualities which make for victory are generally the same in both cases. Modern industrial life and modern social conditions generally, so far from leading men towards indolence, ease, selfishness, and unmanliness, make more and more imperative calls upon brain, muscle, nerve, energy, and self-devotion. Men are constantly engaged in a more and more strenuous competition with one another, and a keener and keener struggle with the forces of nature—even when these forces are harnessed and partially tamed for the service of man.

---

Consider the qualities demanded for driving a non-stop express from Paddington to Exeter in a blizzard; for racing a liner against time across the Atlantic and back, regardless of weather; for driving a motor-'bus 100 miles a day through the streets of London; for crossing the Channel on an aeroplane on a December afternoon; for controlling a power-house working and lighting half the underground railways of London; for holding in check the cosmopolitan criminal population in the metropolitan area; for dealing promptly with all the fires that break out every night in the same region. War! What is the discipline it imposes on brain, nerve, muscle, and character, from general down to private, compared with that which is borne all day and night by the myriad combatants of our industrial armies and the men who are for ever seeking and meeting some new danger for the mere fun of the thing?

It was, of course, inevitable that the Houndsditch murders should lead to a cry from certain quarters for the arming of the police. There is not much likelihood that the public will ever be so foolish as to assent to that, and fortunately the police themselves have the sense to see that it is an undesirable thing for them. But there is no good reason why they should not carry firearms when they are tackling criminals who are extremely likely to be armed in the same way. It must have been pretty well known when the house in Cutler Street was raided that the parties inside were of the class who "do not hesitate to shoot." In such a case the police ought certainly to be in a position to defend themselves.

---

There are points about the sensational Houndsditch murders which seem to me to lift the crime very much out of the common ruck, and the inability of the police up to the time of writing to secure the arrest of the murderers strengthens my impression that it was not, as has been generally accepted, the work of a loosely associated band of alien immigrants who lived in the Whitechapel district. The careful arrangements for carrying out the interrupted burglary, and still more the rapid and complete disappearance of the guilty parties, looks much more like the work of a practised and skilful band of criminals who had made plans to meet any eventuality than that of a local band of Lithuanians or Letts. I do not know what is in the minds and notebooks of the authorities at the Old Jewry and New Scotland Yard, but it does seem to me possible that in devoting attention to the alien colonies in the East End and Tottenham the police may be looking for the pea under quite the wrong thimble.

---

It is, of course, difficult to extract anything like evidence out of the hotch-potch of irrelevant information with which the newspapers have obscured the facts, but an interview with an acquaintance of one of the wanted men, known as Fritz, by a representative of the Press Association, supplies an interesting side-light on this member of the gang. Fritz, according to his acquaintance, was engaged in rehearsing a Russian peasant play, upon the theme of a young Socialist who flies from the police. The fugitive arrives at a house in the forest in charge of a small boy. He persuades the boy to hide him. The police arrive, and, with the bribe of a watch and chain, persuade the lad to disclose the hiding-place of the fugitive. Then, as the police are taking away their captive, the lad's father arrives, and, after hearing what he has done, shoots him for his treachery. So far from this being a Russian peasant play, it is the plot of a well-known short story by Prosper Mérimée, of which the scene is laid in Corsica.

---

A budding Sherlock Holmes might obtain perhaps from this literary clue the deduction that, so far from being an illiterate Lett, Fritz was a Russian of education. He might further deduce from the fact that the language spoken amongst themselves by members of the gang was not understood by Yiddish hearers, that they were not Russian provincials of the working-class type; he would see in the presence of a woman as an active participant in the crime further proof of the anarchistic nature of the group; he would gather from their swift and effective recourse to firearms evidence of cosmopolitanism; and if after this he did not designate the address where "Mr. Fritz" could be found, it would only be because that individual omitted to leave his visiting-card behind him at his temporary abode in Exchange Buildings. The amateur Holmes would probably be hopelessly wrong, but the literary coincidence upon which his deductions are founded are curious, to say the least.

---

A contemporary informs its readers that at a meeting of the Royal Agricultural Society, which was held a fortnight ago, "the interesting announcement was made that the King has accepted the presidency of next year's show, which will be held at Norwich." This "interesting announcement" was really made more than six months ago. King Edward had accepted the presidency for 1911, and shortly after his death King George consented to take his place. The arrangement for next year's show to be held at Norwich was made about two years ago. Several of the foreign princes who are coming to England for the Coronation will prolong their stay for a few days in order that they may visit the show at Norwich, and there will be a large Royal party at Sandringham during the week.

LAST THOUGHTS ON 1910.

The year is drawing to a close
With all its joys and pains—
More numerous these, methinks, than those—
Especially its rains.

Full many changes have we seen,
Some losses and some gains;
Eventful has its record been,
Especially in rains.

A King beloved to rest has passed,
His son the throne obtains:
There's nothing can for ever last,
Except, of course, the rains.

Elections twain therein we've had—
Both most confounded banes:
But as a thing to make one mad,
They couldn't touch the rains.

A comet we have seen appear,
A drama of Hall Caine's,
But still the feature of the year
Was everlasting rains.

Send, gods, next year what penalties
You like, send boils and blains,
Send war and famine and disease,
Send frogs and lice, send votes for shes,
Send what Egyptian plagues you please,
But do leave out the rains!

There is an insatiable craze at the present time among a section of Church people for the multiplication of bishops, and this mania is being run to extravagant lengths. The last proposal is to divide the see of Lichfield into three portions—North Staffordshire, South Staffordshire, and Shropshire. There is no reason to believe that the present diocese of Lichfield is beyond the powers of any ordinary man, if the bishop will not fritter away his time in all kinds of trumpery engagements after the usual episcopal practice in these days. Dr. Maclagan worked at Lichfield for thirteen years, and when he left the diocese at the age of sixty-five he was so far from being exhausted that he was afterwards Archbishop of York for seventeen years. The present bishop, who is in his seventy-first year, has held the see for over nineteen years, and it is clear that he does not find the work "overwhelming," as he declined to appoint another suffragan when the late Sir Lovelace Stamer ceased to hold that office, although there were no pecuniary obstacles in the way, as the rich rectory of Edgmond was to have been held by the new suffragan.

---

A stall in Bangor Cathedral has been placed at the disposal of Bishop Williams by the death of Canon Hughes. The stipend is £350 a year, with residence. Canon Hughes was rector of Barmouth for nineteen years, and he worked there with untiring energy. He was well known throughout the Principality as an eloquent preacher and effective platform speaker, and was in great request for meetings in defence of the Welsh Church.

---

Archdeacon Emery's death places a canonry in Ely Cathedral at the disposal of Bishop Chase. The stipend is £620 a year (reduced by agricultural depression from £800), with an excellent residence. Archdeacon Emery was not the doyen of cathedral dignitaries, as has been stated. Archdeacon Lear has held a residentiary stall at Salisbury since 1862, and Archdeacon Kaye has been a canon of Lincoln since 1863. Archdeacon Kaye is the son of one Bishop of Lincoln and the son-in-law of his father's successor in the see (Bishop Jackson, who was translated to London in 1868).

---

The Rev. J. E. M. Young, whose death was announced last week, became curate of St. Saviour's York, in 1852, and he succeeded his father-in-law in the living in 1866. He worked under six Archbishops. Mr. Young was an eloquent preacher, and his church was regarded as a stronghold of the Evangelical party, of which he was an active leader in the York district. He held several important public offices, and he was well known as a prominent Freemason. Since 1795 there have been only three rectors of St. Saviour's.

---

The living of Mamhead, near Exeter, has become vacant by the resignation of the rector, who has held it for only about six years. This is a very difficult benefice to fill up, and when it was last vacated Sir Robert Newman (the patron) requested the Dean of Exeter to find him a new rector. Mamhead is a beautiful place in a charming county, and the parish is a very small one. The difficulty lies in the fact that the stipend is about £100 a year, and there is a large house, with adequate stabling and extensive gardens, to be kept up. It is an ideal charge for a fairly wealthy ecclesiastic.

---

Canon Holland is to be in residence at St. Paul's Cathedral during January for the last time, and he will preach on Sunday afternoons throughout the month. It is possible that arrangements may be made for Canon Holland's successor to exchange residences for the month now allotted to Chancellor Newbolt. A similar arrangement took place when Canon Alexander was appointed, when he exchanged months with Archdeacon Sinclair.

---

The Archbishop of Armagh is about to resign his see, and he will take up his residence at Torquay. Archbishop Alexander has obtained world-wide fame as a most eloquent and scholarly preacher, and Mr. Gladstone warmly praised his Bampton Lectures on the Psalms, which were delivered in 1877. He was appointed Dean of Emly in 1863 by Lord Carlisle, and in 1867 he was promoted by the Duke of Abercorn to the see of Derry, which was then worth nearly £7,000 a year. After the disestablishment of the Irish Church the future endowment of the see was much facilitated by Dr. Alexander's generosity. He was translated to the Archbishopric of Armagh in 1896, and he is now in his eighty-seventh year.

Judge Emden has sent me an appeal in behalf of the Lambeth County Court Charitable Fund, whose institution as the first fund of the kind in connection with a civil court has been abundantly justified by results during the past three years. Many distressing cases come before the Court, and the fund is carefully administered to assist only those who are struggling honestly against adversity through no fault of their own. Subscriptions may be sent to Mr. D. Denney, hon. sec., Lambeth County Court, S.E.

A company officer sends me from India the proceeds of a collection made by his men for George Breton's Poor Children's Society, being under the impression that the Editor of Truth does not approve of Breton's philanthropic operations. Considering that the Poor Children's Society has been in Truth Cautionary List since its first issue, and that long before that the utter humbug of Breton's charitable pretences had been exposed in Truth again and again, this impression is certainly well founded. Accordingly, I am utilising the discretion given me of intercepting the cheque. At the same time I take the opportunity of exhorting soldiers generally to desist from sending their money to this rotten concern. For some years past I have made it a rule to caution regimental authorities at this time of year against Breton's solicitations, and I am sorry that by an oversight the usual notice was not published before Christmas.

---

As it is such a general rule for soldiers and sailors to get up collections for charities at Christmas time, commanding officers, both in the Army and Navy, might with advantage take a little trouble to ensure that the good intentions of their men are not imposed upon. It is not to be expected that the men themselves can exercise any effective discrimination between the various appeals that are made to them. The charity-mongers understand this well enough, and the consequence is that large sums are obtained from soldiers and sailors for the most worthless objects.

Motor Ambulance for Hire. Highly recommended by the medical profession.—The Daimler Motor Co., Hire Dept., 78, Marylebone Lane, W. Tel. 10223 Central.

---

The officer referred to above mentions that collecting sheets for the Poor Children's Society were sent a few weeks ago to all the pay-sergeants of his battalion, and if they were all as well filled as the one sent to me Breton will have drawn nearly £5 from this battalion. If he has similar luck with only half the units in the Service and half the ships in the Navy—and he probably favours them all alike—it is easy to see what a gold mine he is working in his Majesty's forces. There are—or used to be—others sharing the revenue from this source who deserve it no better; indeed, I doubt whether any genuine and deserving charity would directly appeal in this way to classes of men whose means are very limited, and whose relatives and friends have in most cases the strongest claims upon them. As long, however, as it is the custom to make Christmas collections in messes and canteens, every unit should, at least, have at its disposal a copy of Truth Cautionary List to prevent the charity of the men being abused.

My attention has again been called to the inequalities in regimental promotion, a good illustration being the case of two battalions serving side by side, in one of which there is a captain of less than seven and in the other a lieutenant with more than nine years' service. Both officers are commanding companies, but the captain is drawing 11s. 7d. a day pay, while the lieutenant only receives 6s. 6d. The remedy suggested for such a state of things is that length of service, not rank, should determine the rates of pay, and that all captains under and all lieutenants over nine years' service should receive 10s. a day. I do not think the proposed remedy would be good either for the service or for individuals. Pay must go by rank. The best way to prevent such a glaring anomaly as the one above mentioned is that regimental lists should be abolished and officers placed by arms on general lists for promotion.

In spite of all that has been said from time to time in Truth, the retention of N.C.O.'s with the colours after they have completed twenty-one years' service is becoming so often the rule instead of the exception that it is necessary to go on protesting. Take a typical case which has been brought to my notice—that of two staff sergeants serving in the same battery, neither of whom has a first-class certificate of education, and in consequence ineligible for further promotion, though both of them have been allowed to continue in the service after becoming pensionable. I am told that these two worthies love the Army so much as to wish to die in harness. This may be a laudable wish, but it should not be indulged at the expense of the young N.C.O.'s of the battery who have gained their first-class certificates to qualify for higher promotion, but now find the road blocked at the top.

For Mosquito Bites, Wasp or Bee Stings, nothing allays the irritation so quickly as Scrubb's Ammonia. Price 1s. per bottle. Beware of imitations.

Retention after twenty-one years' service is only justifiable under exceptional circumstances of public necessity. When, for instance, an N.C.O. is on the verge of promotion to warrant rank, or when, as sometimes happens, his retirement for whatever reason would upset the regimental coach, commanding officers are right to apply the powers which the Army Act confers on them; but it was never intended that a wholesale use should be made of a permissive authority for the personal convenience of time-expired N.C.O.'s, who, as a rule, are better out of the Army than in it after twenty-one years' colour service. Paragraph 270 of the King's Regulations should be amended so as to prevent commanding officers recommending retention except under specified conditions.

This suggestion is as much in the interest of the men as of the service. A non-commissioned officer generally completes twenty-one years' service before he is forty years of age, and if he takes his discharge at once and has an exemplary character, he can make sure of getting one of the Government billets reserved for ex-soldiers; but if he dawdles on in the Army for a further five or ten years his chances of civil employment grow less and less as each year goes by.

It is satisfactory from all points of view to know that what was lately said in Truth on the subject of native examiners in India is widely approved of by officers, for the contrary result would not have been surprising. An officer writes on this subject:—

> I was extremely glad to see that you sat on the anonymous officer who complained of being examined by natives. His allegation of unfair and partial examination at their hands is, as you say, an insult to an exceedingly able, courteous, and just body of men. I have been both passed and ploughed by them, but I recognise that I have never been unfairly treated. I think that India could easily dispense with your correspondent, more especially the men whose language he has endeavoured—obviously without success—to master.

I am very glad to learn from an official communication that a good effect has been produced by the remarks made in Truth a few weeks ago on the practice of making remittances to army pensioners in envelopes bearing indications of the nature of their contents. Instructions have been issued that after January 1 nothing but the pensioner's address is to appear on the envelope. This is, I think, the third time in the course of about ten years that I have been instrumental in bringing about this small but salutary reform. Seeing that the authorities are always so prompt in recognising the necessity for it when this is pointed out, it is not quite evident why it should have to be pointed out so often. But I suppose the subordinates who order office envelopes have a craze for getting them all up in the same style, and that two or three years hence it will again become necessary to get the same obnoxious inscription removed.

An advance copy of the "Naval Magna Charta" for 1911 has been sent to me. I have received this annual review of the grievances against which the lower-deck seeks redress for several years past. What chiefly strikes me is the steady shrinkage which has gone on in the proportions of the document. This may be taken as a very good testimony to the spirit of reasonable concession which has marked Admiralty administration since the "Naval Magna Charta" was instituted. There is no need to touch upon the points enumerated in this document; they are nearly all familiar matters which have been dealt with in Truth at one time or another.

---

In its December number, The Navy, the official journal of the Navy League, perpetuates the silly legend about the value of the wrecked Montagu. In support of the suggestion that the Admiralty might profitably undertake salvage work, it is stated that the company which bought the residue of this wreck cleared £10,000 profit in the first year, and that "there are from 10,000 to 15,000 tons of steel and iron to be raised and sold." A clear profit of £10,000 would necessitate the salving and selling of at least 7,000 tons of old iron—for the Lundy rocks are not a knacker's yard. The total weight of the hull and armour of the Montagu was 9,055 tons. Her machinery weighed 1,580 tons, and much of this was saved together with her guns before she was sold by the Admiralty. That there can be from 10,000 to 15,000 tons still left after a profit of £10,000 has been realised on what has already been sold is, therefore, contrary to all the laws of arithmetic.

But why does The Navy want to "encourage the Admiralty to undertake salvage operations on their own account"? Having lost over £80,000 in demonstrating their complete incapacity for salvage work in connection with this self-same ship, the Admiralty should rather be enjoined to continue their present policy, and entrust all their wreck recovery work to private salvage firms. One of these companies got the Gladiator from the bottom of the Solent into Portsmouth harbour—a task admittedly far more difficult than that presented by the stranded Montagu before the naval authorities, being unable to manage the job themselves, left it so that nobody else could possibly do it.

It is exceedingly probable that Sir Edmund Poë will succeed Sir Wilmot Fawkes as Commander-in-Chief at Devonport, and that he will be himself replaced as Commander-in-Chief on the Mediterranean by Prince Louis of Battenberg, who does not desire a position ashore, as he wishes to remain afloat as long as possible.

A Sydney correspondent informs me that there is a great deal of dissatisfaction in the Australian States because their Premiers have not been asked to attend the Colonial Conference next year, the Australian invitation having only included the Commonwealth Prime Minister. Seeing that the emigration question is to be raised again at the Conference, I should think the States ought to be directly represented by the heads of their Governments, as they have retained their Sovereign rights in regard to this and all matters except Defence and Customs, which have been surrendered to the Commonwealth Parliament.

---

The Commonwealth Government proposes to reaffirm the Immigration Resolutions of 1907, which were as follows:—

1. That it is desirable to encourage British emigrants to proceed to British Colonies rather than to foreign countries.

2. That the Imperial Government be requested to co-operate with any Colonies desiring immigrants in assisting suitable persons to emigrate.

It strikes me that as far as the Imperial Government are concerned these resolutions have been a dead letter, nothing having been done since 1907 to give the smallest effect to them, while passenger agents, commercial-philanthropic societies, and female leagues still hold the field without let or hindrance.

The recently formed Rural Development Society will find plenty of scope for its efforts to persuade or force local authorities into a more vigorous use of their powers with regard to such matters as housing, small holdings, and allotments. How necessary this is was strikingly shown at a Local Government Board inquiry under the Housing and Town Planning Act at Thorpe, a village in the district of the Chertsey Rural Council. Owing to the lack of any other accommodation a number of families are living under the most abominable conditions in small, overcrowded, insanitary cottages. The official witnesses admitted that the conditions were bad, and that some, at least, of these wretched hovels ought to be closed, but all that could be said for the Council was that they had "kept their eye" upon the matter, and that on October 18 they solemnly resolved to hold a meeting (apparently not yet fixed) for the consideration of the Act! It must have been a blind eye which has been turned upon Thorpe, but perhaps Mr. John Burns will now be able to make the Council see what should be done.

Otley must be an unsavoury sort of town to judge by disclosures made at a Local Government Board inquiry the other day. The sewers have been laid piecemeal and on no sort of system, and unprovided either with means of clearing or ventilating them. In addition to this the cleansing tanks at the outfall have been allowed to remain uncleaned for five years, with the consequence that the disposal works are blocked up. As a consequence in stormy weather the sewage backs into the houses and gardens and pollutes the river. To remedy this state of affairs the Otley councillors propose to purchase a refuse tip, which seems rather like trying to cram a quart measure into a pint pot. Nothing less than a typhoid epidemic will drum into the heads of some sanitary authorities a realisation of their responsibilities.

---

At the monthly meeting of the Swansea Town Council, the Corporation was labelled with an ugly reputation as a slum landlord. The revelation was made on a proposal that the medical officer of health and the chief sanitary inspector should attend a forthcoming congress of the Royal Sanitary Institute, a councillor objecting on the ground that their services were more imperatively needed at home. In the discussion which followed it was shown that the Council could very well have spared the officials in question, since the Corporation was still screwing rents out of the tenants of property which their own officials had condemned as unfit for habitation. It is time the Swansea Corporation set its own houses in order, if it does not want the Local Government Board to do so for it.

The Luxury of a Bath is incomplete without the addition of Scrubb's Ammonia, which refreshes and invigorates. Sold everywhere, price one shilling per bottle.

THE VANISHING GENTLEMAN.

(A Common Object of the Season.)

'Tis the voice of his victims; I hear them complain,
"This is really too bad; he has vanished again.
Just the time of the year when we wanted him most,
And now he's levanted and left us on toast.

"We miss him right sore; nor we miss him alone;
A further bereavement, alas! we bemoan.
We've been to inquire at the Bank, where they tell
How our hardly-saved shiners are missing as well."

Now, who is the vanished? And what is his name?
And who are the dupes who their sorrows proclaim?
He isn't one man; he's the type of a school
Who often skedaddle the week before Yule.

In London, in suburb, in country he's found;
Oh! never he's missing till Christmas comes round.
Then just when, at slate-clubs, he's most in request,
The gentleman, also the money, non est.

The Knottingley Urban Council applied last week to the West Riding Standing Joint Committee asking that Petty Sessions should be held at Knottingley owing to the inconvenience caused by those having business at the court having to go to Pontefract. It was pointed out that it was for the magistrates concerned and not for the committee to decide. The magistrates, however, have already decided that their own convenience is best served by taking Knottingley cases at Pontefract. I would suggest, therefore, that the Knottingley Council lay their plea before the Lord Chancellor, who may either persuade the local J.P.'s to change their mind or reinforce the Bench with new justices who have some consideration for the convenience of the public.

The Walsall Education Committee discussed last week statements made in the London press that men committed by the magistrates for failing to pay fines for non-attendance of their children at school were taken on a chain like a file of convicts to gaol. They decided that it was no business of theirs, and passed on to the next business. All the same, a suggestion to the Walsall police authorities from the Education Committee might have assisted the police to amend their methods. It is scandalous that for such an offence men should be submitted to public degradation, and as the Education Committee will not give the police the necessary hint, perhaps the Home Secretary will.

An example of how a ferocious sentence tends to defeat its object was well illustrated in a case heard at the Stranraer Sheriff Court. Three fishermen were charged with trawling on prohibited ground in the Bay of Luce. It was not the case of a steam trawler with its devastating beam trawl sweeping the floor of the sea, but of three small fishing boats working what are known as "otter" trawls. The offence did not call for heavy punishment, but Sheriff Watson fined each of the three £25, or 60 days' imprisonment, and ordered the forfeiture of the gear. The offenders were only poor fishermen. Time for payment of the fine was refused, and they went to prison. The result was that the amount of the fine was at once raised by public subscription and the men liberated. The men were in the wrong, and had undoubtedly earned punishment, but the sheriff merely succeeded in giving them the halo of martyrs.

The gang of tricksters who masquerade as the Kew Gardens Association, the Royal Card Co., and Philip Leslie and Co., have not been induced by their conviction at the Old Bailey last June to amend their ways. A Demerara correspondent sends me a circular which he has received from Leslie and Co. thanking him for a remittance which he had never sent, and asking him to kindly forward a shilling extra for postage, packing, and insurance of his gift. This method of collecting shillings is so simple that I wonder no one has thought of it before. Of course if simpletons can be persuaded to send shillings for gifts which do not belong to them, they deserve to lose their shillings, nor will they be disposed to make a fuss about their loss when they discover how they have been duped.

Mr. Robert Schroeder, 106, Calea, Victoriei, Bucharest, has made an extensive distribution of circulars (posted in London in defiance of the law) in reference to a Roumanian State Lottery, for which he offers tickets. Though he says that his firm has been in existence for over forty years, I think this is the first time Mr. Schroeder has favoured this country with his attentions, nor have I previously heard of anybody else hawking Roumanian lottery tickets here. Still, so long as this illegal business is tolerated through the supineness of our Post Office—which could snuff it out at once by obtaining power to stop letters directed to the ticket agents—Roumania is as much entitled as any other country to prey upon British greenhorns. I call them greenhorns because nobody whose love of a gamble is allied with a modicum of common sense and the skill to work out a few calculations would be attracted by lotteries in which the chances of a substantial win are so ludicrously remote.

---

Not only is the gamble itself a poor one, but there is always the risk that the Britisher will be cheated by the foreign harpies who unload upon him the tickets which their own compatriots are too wary to buy. As an instance of this, a correspondent relates his experiences with a firm of so-called "bankers" at Hamburg to whom he forwarded a remittance on October 17 for a ticket in the Royal Hungarian lottery. He never received the ticket, his letters to the firm have not been answered, and a complaint to the Hamburg police has been ignored. Before they part with their money to such gentry, people ought to consider that if they are swindled it is practically impossible for them to obtain any redress.

The bogus directory tricksters are particularly busy at this season of the year, and I am glad to see that two of them received three and two months' imprisonment from the Birmingham Stipendiary last week. One was named Pearce and the other Sharp. Pearce represented that he was an agent for "Bradshaw's International and Mercantile Directory," while Sharp produced bogus orders for advertisements in "Collingwood's Directory." Neither directory had any existence, yet the police gave evidence of nearly thirty cases in which the two men had successfully induced firms to pay them sums for the insertion of advertisements. I should have thought business men were brighter than that in Birmingham.

The consumption quack C. H. Stevens is still advertising his offer to present £10 to every sufferer from consumption whom he fails to cure if he undertakes to do so, in spite of Judge Gye's condemnation of it in the Basingstoke County Court as an "intentional and well-considered fraud." He is also still circulating a mangled version of an article which appeared in Truth in 1905 as a testimonial to the value of his cough mixture, and making no reference to the frequent exposures of his pretensions and methods which have appeared in Truth since. Another document which he sends to persons who reply to his advertisements is a lithographed copy of a "certificate of analysis" from a Mr. J. P. Lord, described in the heading as analyst and bacteriologist and consulting bacteriologist to the Councils of Carshalton, Cheam, Dorking, Epsom, Ewell, Leatherhead, Malden and Coombe, and Sutton, while attached to his signature are the qualifications "Natural Science Honours, Cantab., Ph.D., F.R.M.S., etc., late Professor St. Xavier's Coll., Calcutta."

For a certificate of analysis the document takes a most unusual form. Indeed, more than half of it consists of a fulsome puff of Stevens' wonderful discovery, while the analytical part is much more remarkable for what it conceals than what it discloses. Mr. Lord tabulates his conclusions thus:—

1. The drug combination contains NO POISON.
2. The drug contains no mineral or metal, but is purely a herbal or vegetable tincture.
3. It contains a very minute amount of tannin.
4. It contains NO KNOWN ALKALOID.
5. Its ethereal extract yields an amorphous body quite new to science.
6. Tested against living cultures of tubercle germs, at a dilution of 1/100, it kills both tubercle bacillus "Typus Bovinus, Nathan Raw, 1907," and T.B. "Typus Humanus, Nathan Raw, 1907," in a period of about ten minutes.
7. It contains 12.7 of alcohol as a preservative, the equivalent of 1 drop per dose, and a trace of essence of lemon as a flavouring agent. Both of these are negligible from a physician's point of view.
8. The active drug is unknown to the British Pharmacopœia, and to those of France and America.
9. The medicine contains NO Kino or Krameria, as, I learn, has been stated.

---

Primarily I suppose that this analysis is intended as a reply to the analysis of Stevens' cure made by the British Medical Journal and published in "Secret Remedies," and from the analytical point of view Mr. Lord, having been supplied with the raw material, may conceivably be more accurate than the B.M.J. analyst working in the dark. That is a question that one may very well let the analysts fight out between themselves. It is with No. 6 in Mr. Lord's conclusions with which I quarrel. What precisely is the "it" which kills living cultures of tubercle germs at a dilution of 1 in 100 in ten minutes? Is he referring to the mixture, or the active drug unknown to the Pharmacopœias of England, France, and America, or to the "amorphous body unknown to science"? The point is an important one, for there are no doubt many drugs which at a dilution of 1 in 100 would kill the tubercle bacillus in a test tube, but would have not the slightest effect on the bacillus in the lungs if administered to the patient. Mr. Lord owes it to himself and to his profession as bacteriologist to make known the whole chain of experiments by which he has arrived at his conclusions. Otherwise his vagueness, taken in conjunction with his testimonial to the value of Stevens' cure, is not likely to add to his reputation.

---

An interesting example of the way testimonials are faked by quack advertisers has been brought to my notice. A lady had given a testimonial to the value of Erasmus Colman's catarrh cure. At the end of last year she received a letter informing her that in consequence of failing health Colman was retiring from practice, but that exactly the same treatment would be obtainable from his "business friend and associate, Dr. H. H. Crippen, of the Aural Remedies Company, Craven House, Kingsway, London, W.C.," who for "copyright purposes" would describe the method as "the Crippen treatment." Accordingly, Colman suggested that if, as was possible, the testimonialist received inquiries from persons asking if she had derived benefit from Crippen's treatment, she might be good enough to answer them in the affirmative.

---

This proposal couples up Erasmus Colman with Marr, the proprietor of the Aural Remedies Company, for whom Crippen was working at the time he murdered his wife. Recent events have somewhat discounted the value of "the Crippen treatment," and this no doubt explains why the Aural Remedies Company has faded out of existence, and a new catarrh specialist and deaf quack has come into advertising prominence in the name of Elmer Shirley. Marr has, in fact, taken the place formerly occupied by the Drouet Institute as the largest advertiser amongst the deaf quacks. He no longer, it is true, advertises as Keith Harvey in this country, though he still does so abroad, but as soon as he has exhausted his deaf clientèle under one alias he starts a fresh attempt on their pockets under another.

---

A reader in New Zealand sends me a copy of the Maoriland Worker, containing what he asserts is the first article printed in New Zealand for the exposure of quackery. It deals with one of the hairgrowing gentry who advertise individual treatment for their bald customers, and ask for a specimen of hair for microscopical examination. Some clippings from the coat of a sheep dog were sent to the specialist, who promptly discovered that the owner was suffering from a disease of the hair follicles, which could be cured for 10s. 6d. Remedies for mange are cheaper in this country.

---

An officer has sent me a card with which he has been favoured by a Turf commission agent calling himself "William J. Griffiths (surnamed the 'Safe' Betting Man)," of 41, Great Queen Street, Kingsway, W.C. Griffiths intimates that "gentlemen holding commissions in his Majesty's Services may open weekly accounts without further reference," and experience shows that bookmakers soliciting business on those lines are best avoided. If they do not give references officers should at any rate require them, for it is obviously unwise to act upon a strange circulariser's uncorroborated description of himself as a "safe" man, even if he gives the name of Griffiths.

---

"The racing world of Europe has more than once been electrified with the foresight and perspicacity of this apparently inspired genius." This is a modest extract from "The True Story of Frank Curtin," who is "the greatest living judge of a racer's merits," and when I add that he hails from Birmingham most of my readers will guess at once that he is really yet another figment of the fertile imagination of the many-aliased E. W. Beston. The apparently inspired genius last Wednesday sent out, "with the greatest confidence," a tip for a race on the following day which he alleged that he had received from "a personal friend, a well-known trainer." Beston's dupes are necessarily fools, but can any of them be actually so credulous as to suppose that well-known trainers give away their good things in this manner? In the present instance the horse mentioned was not even a starter.

---

Apparently touting tipsters find that it pays to pretend that they have obtained their information by dishonest or dishonourable means. One of the fraternity, signing "Fred Johnson," and dating from the Poste Restante, Ludgate Circus P.O., sent out a circular the other day, in which he stated that being a member of a well-known sporting club, and happening to be seated at the same luncheon table as an eminent commission agent, he had the "good luck" to be able to read surreptitiously a letter which the commission agent dropped on the floor, "face upwards." The letter was from "the manager of one of our astutest stables," and contained the name of a certain winner, which "Fred Johnson" was ready to reveal in return for a remittance of £1. It seems to me that people who are swindled by such a story as that are as bad as the swindler himself.

The betting business being slack at this season, a bookmaker named Marcus J. Chapman, 170-173, Piccadilly, has turned his attention to politics. At the commencement of the general election he issued a circular in which he called upon "all sportsmen" to do "everything possible to secure the return of those candidates who pledge themselves to uphold the legitimate sports of the nation." In the jargon of the bookmakers the backing of horses is, of course, a sport. One recipient of the circular was a Cheshire gentleman, who replied ironically, thanking Chapman and asking, "as you take such a kind interest in my voting," for the names of the candidates he recommended for the Kirkdale division of Liverpool and Birkenhead. Chapman, whose sense of humour is defective, at once telegraphed, "Taylor and Bigland are the men we want." These were the Unionist candidates, and both were returned; but the idea that Mr. Bigland, who is a Quaker, or Mr. Kyffin-Taylor, a son of the late Archdeacon Taylor and a representative of the extreme Protestant party in Liverpool, would defend the sort of sport in which Chapman is interested is distinctly funny.

My old acquaintance "Bishop" McLaglen, no doubt combining pleasure, profit, and health in a truly episcopal spirit, is paying a visit to Bournemouth. A correspondent who has been afforded an opportunity of looking at his collecting book tells me that there can be no doubt about the profitable nature of the visitation. In return for the favour he submitted to the bishop a copy of Truth Cautionary List, marking the paragraph referring to him. The bishop's remarks were more a tribute to the value of the Cautionary List than to his Christian forbearance. They have made me realise more clearly than ever in regard to the List that no home ought to be without one.

The following letter, or one in practically identical terms, has lately been received by several people. This, taken with the fact that in no case were the recipients "thinking of buying a typewriter," suggests that the letter is not quite what it appears on the face of it. I am credibly informed that advertisements of the same machine at the same price by a similar prize-winner have appeared for some time past in the Exchange and Mart. I cannot say that I know the machine in question, but it is clear that there are plenty of them on the market at £10, and the circumstances hardly bear out the suggestion that they are an exceptional bargain at that price:—

Castledine, 78, Beeches Road, West Bromwich,
November 22, 1910.

Dear Sirs,—A friend of mine tells me that you are thinking of buying a typewriter. I have just been advised that I have won one in a prize competition; it is one of Salter's latest machines, which I understand they sell for about £17. I want £10 for it, and if you decide to buy it I can arrange for it to be sent to you direct from the makers' works, properly packed in one of their own cases, instead of being delivered to me. You would then get their ordinary twelve months' guarantee with the instrument.

I shall be glad to know by return if the machine is any use to you, as I want to dispose of it at once.—Yours faithfully,

R. Howard.

---

The gramophone is another article which is now being planted on purchasers by means of misleading advertisements in the Exchange and Mart. In an instance brought under my notice the advertiser was a Mr. Brookbank Harrison, of 1, Aberdeen Place, Maida Vale, London, W. He advertised his willingness to accept £3 15s. for a gramophone which had cost £10 10s. this year, as he was going abroad. When a would-be purchaser suggested that a deposit should be paid and the instrument sent on approval, he demurred on the ground that he and the purchaser were strangers, but as a token of good faith he enclosed a receipted invoice for £10 10s. The £3 15s. was thereupon forwarded. In due course the gramophone arrived, and turned out to be an entirely new instrument, but it was unaccompanied by the records promised, and applications for these have proved fruitless.

Since then advertisements from the same place have appeared with the same excuse for getting rid of the gramophone, while it is also worthy of note that the address is also that of a lady who will accept £2 2s. for furs which cost £8 15s. I must confess that I am rather surprised that a reader of the Exchange and Mart should have been caught in this manner. That journal prints a standing warning to its subscribers not to forward cash to persons unknown to them, and undertakes to hold deposits of cash against goods until the latter are approved by the purchaser. It is a simple safeguard to which no bonâ-fide seller can object, and when objection is made it is safe to assume that there is something fishy about the bargain.

---

The recent reference in Truth to a Welsh firm who were selling boots on the snowball system by means of coupons has proved to me that this illegitimate method of trading is more widespread than I imagined. A Clapham bootseller named B. Hulles is also engaged in disposing of coupons by this method, one of his circulars having been sent to me from Dundee. To all those engaged in extending his operations by purchasing and selling coupons I would remind them that if they want boots there is nothing like leather, and that there must come a time in the progress of the snowball when instead of boots the purchasers of coupons will find themselves possessed of worthless pieces of paper.

---

It is quite twelve months since Mr. W. J. Morgan, of the North British Academy of Arts, assured me that the Academy's Fellowship Roll was complete, and that he was not going to appoint any more F.N.B.A.'s. He is still, however, touting for Fellows and subscriptions. His latest invitation sets out that in order to give effect to one of the objects of the N.B.A., viz., that of "forming a Bond of Union between existing societies, a limited number of members of such societies will be admitted to the Fellowship-roll." Mr. Morgan, like the leader of a political party, is, of course, quite entitled to change his mind or his policy as often as he pleases. But, having done so in this respect, I wish he would do so in another, and furnish me with a copy of his balance-sheet. He announces in some of his advertising matter that he has published one, but I have neither seen it myself nor know of any one else who has done so. I presume that Lord Milner, Lord Roberts, Mr. Balfour, and the other notable F.N.B.A.'s who adorn Mr. Morgan's prospectus have satisfied themselves as to what becomes of the subscriptions, or they would not allow their names to be used for touting for fresh ones. This only makes me wonder the more why Mr. Morgan is so loth to give me the same information he has given them.

A good deal of money must be made in the course of a year by picking up worthless old prints and disposing of them by means of what are virtually begging letters to people who may be supposed to have some sort of personal interest in the subject of the picture. One is always hearing of this trick, and the other day it was actually tried at Truth Office, of all places! One H. B. Bussell, writes from Darlan Road, Fulham, to Mr. Henry Labouchere, enclosing an old print of Pope's Villa at Twickenham, with the information that he is a sadly afflicted old man. Having a large acquaintance among this class of afflicted persons, I made some inquiries about Bussell, and find, as I expected, that he has long been engaged in this particular line of business. I propose, therefore, to add to his afflictions by keeping his picture till he calls for it, hoping that this may also do something to check the affliction which he must cause to other people.

Ernest Gaskell's latest volume of notabilities and nonentities, "Norfolk Leaders," is now being sent out to subscribers. It is also being sent to non-subscribers with an intimation that a sum of £2 2s. for it will be gratefully accepted. Gaskell states that he has had to make himself "personally responsible for all the heavy costs this high-class publication has entailed," which is only natural when it is remembered that he is not only the author, but printer and publisher as well. As a further inducement he also remarks that "a work of this nature is likely to appear only once in a lifetime." Seeing that Gaskell has been turning out works of this nature at the rate of two or three a year for many years past, the claim appears lacking somewhat in accuracy.

A correspondent in Queensland inquires whether Mr. Mark Blow, of the Crown Bromide Enlargement Company, George Street, Sydney, is an old acquaintance of mine. If he is I do not recognise him under his present name, but he seems to be engaged in a line of business which is familiar. In commemoration of the ascent of King George V. to the throne he is proposing to compile a large medallion group, in which the portraits of Queensland J.P.s are to be ranged round that of his Majesty. The price of admission is a guinea, and each subscriber will receive a copy. Mr. Blow declares that the splendid picture will yearly increase in historical value and public appreciation, and copies of it "must beyond a shadow of a doubt become heirlooms of which the holders will be justly proud." If they knew the whole truth about the heirloom, I should say they are more likely to think what asses their ancestors were.

I hear from a gentleman who advertised recently for a secretaryship that the Count di Colonna y de Vere is still in search of a secretary for a first-class Anglo-French Company. I do not know whether it is the same company which wanted a secretary in May last when his quest was mentioned in Truth, but £300 is still the premium which the Count requires for the appointment, so that it looks as if secretaries with £300 at their disposal are either particularly rare or particularly cautious.

---

My correspondent in this instance in replying to the Count's offer mentioned that he was going to send it on to me. The Count, in his reply, suggests that if I want a change, am fairly well educated, and can provide satisfactory references, I can have the post. This is very obliging of him, but at the moment I have no desire to become the secretary of one of the Count's companies, much less pay £300 for the job. Apart from that, the Count may take it that I should in any case follow the advice that I always give to others in regard to the investment of money in speculative businesses as a condition of obtaining employment.

A POST-DATED POEM.

The claims of Christmas holidays
Are things we can't ignore:—
E.g. observe this issue's date,
It is December twenty-eight.
Which, as the Calendar betrays
Is after Christmas—three whole days;
And yet, the candid truth to state;
'Twas writ the week before.

Some verses I must now indite;
So says my Editor.
The forward date they've got to suit;
The question is how shall I do't,
To get the Christmas touch all right,
When Christmas scarce is yet in sight —
To pluck the after Christmas fruit
These several days before?

It means not merely bardic skill,
It means prophetic lore.
My mind I must precipitate,
And make what's early read like late—
Project myself ahead until
I feel as I opine I will
Upon December twenty-eight,
Though still some days before.

How will it be? How shall I feel—
Say, Muse, I now implore!—
Upon December twenty-eight?
The Devil drives; I cannot "wait
And see," till time the fact reveal;
From Editors there's no appeal.
And so I must anticipate
What lies yet far before.

I feel extremely overfed
With luxuries galore;
I'm swollen to a frightful size
With turkey, pudding, and mince-pies;
My chest sustains a load like lead,
I've got a liver and a head;
That's how I feel—in prophecies,
Describing it before.

My purse is void; I'm stony-broke;
Gone is my money's store;
Yea, everyone is in that state;
It is December twenty-eight.
(It's not, in fact—if truth be spoke;
'Tis just a harmless Christmas joke,
By which we journalists post-date
December twenty-four!)

SCRUTATOR.

MEMBER OR DELEGATE?

IN a recent article it was incidentally observed that some of the current methods of calculating the effect of the elections would, if sound, lead us to a House of Commons constituted on the principle of a Trade Union Congress, where each delegate casts, not his own vote, but the votes of so many thousand constituents. In reading this passage in print, I was reminded of a scheme of "proportional representation" which was seriously submitted by one of my readers just after the January elections, when the air was full of schemes of constitutional reform. Being unable at the moment to find an opportunity of discussing this communication, I dropped it into a pigeon-hole, but it seems none the worse for keeping, and it affords some seasonable matter for reflection at the present moment. The idea of my correspondent, if I may translate it into my own words, is something like this: Under present conditions the strength of parties in the House of Commons obviously does not reflect with any accuracy the strength of the parties in individual constituencies. One M.P. is elected by a majority of two or three thousand, a second by two or three hundred, a third by twenty or thirty, a fourth by only two or three. Yet in a division all these members count equally. Under such circumstances there is no security that the majority in the country will be adequately represented in Parliament. In order to ensure that, each member must have a voting power on a division equal to the majority of electors who return him. My friend suggests a vote for every 100 in his majority; but while you are about it, I don't see why you should not do the thing accurately and give him a vote for every elector in his majority. The effect of this would be that in the new House the Member for the Mansfield division of Notts would count as 7,183 on a division, while the Member for Tower Hamlets would only count as 2.

It may be objected, inter alia, to this proposal that it might still further aggravate the existing discrepancy between the representatives of small constituencies and large; for example, the representative of a constituency of 5,000 electors, returned member by a majority of 500, would have five times as many votes on a division of the House as the representative of a constituency of 15,000, returned by a majority of 100 only. "There is nothing whatever in that point," replies my friend. "It is the majority in the constituencies that is to be represented in Parliament. In the case of the 15,000 constituency, 14,900 votes are cancelled by the fact that they were equally divided between the two sides; there are only 100 votes left that count as majority votes for the purpose of obtaining representation in Parliament. On the other hand, in the 5,000 constituency only 4,500 votes were cancelled by being equally divided, leaving a majority of 500 entitled to representation." You see, there is a good deal of force in this argument. If you apply the principle to the whole kingdom, the effect is that the size of individual constituencies is no longer a matter of material consequence; the aggregate Liberal vote is balanced against the aggregate Conservative vote, and the strength of each party on a division in Parliament will be the surplus on one side or the other. Under this arrangement it would be possible for one party to hold a majority of seats, and yet be in a minority in the House. This may sound farcical, but is it really as absurd as the converse situation, which the present generation has witnessed—a party with a majority of votes in the constituencies holding a minority of seats, and being consequently in a minority in the House?

I think it must be conceded that this project for the constitution of a representative assembly would have the effect of reproducing in the division lists with mathematical accuracy the numerical proportion of parties in the electorate—at least, in the case of elections where there are only two candidates in the field; what is to happen in the case of a three-cornered or four-cornered contest, where no candidate secures a majority of the votes cast, the propounder of the scheme has not informed me. What, then, is the objection to the scheme? I take it to be this: that it carries to the most extreme point the conception of members of a representative assembly as mere delegates, making them delegates, not of their constituency as a whole, but of the majority by which they are elected whenever there is a difference of opinion in the constituency on the choice of a representative. It magnifies and accentuates the delegate status of the representatives by stamping them with different values, so that no two of them can stand in the assembly on equal terms, unless by a rare accident. One of them, possibly an obscure individual of no moral or intellectual influence in the assembly, may count for ten times as much in its decisions as the most distinguished man in the House or the country, simply by virtue of the electoral accident which puts the superior voting power into his pocket. A Pitt, a Peel, or a Gladstone may sway the mind of the House by the force of wisdom, logic, or eloquence, but when the question is put to the vote they may be mere insignificant ciphers beside the representatives of a few thousand miners and shoemakers.

All this is directly opposed to the theory of representative government as taught and understood for centuries in this country, and for less periods in most others. From that point of view it is worth looking at just now, when all sorts of sophistical arguments are drawn from electoral statistics in order to belittle the authority of the newly-elected House of Commons. It is not and never has been the theory of our Constitution that members of Parliament are delegates entrusted with a certain limited authority by their constituents. Parliament is a body of men called together for the purpose of using their collective intelligence in the performance of certain functions assigned to them by law and custom. The functions and powers of the House of Commons are not conferred on it by the voters at each election; they are permanent elements of the constitution of the State evolved during centuries of our history. It is true that the method of election is designed to ensure the presence in Parliament of men enjoying the confidence of their fellow-citizens, competent to represent their interests and voice their opinions. But a member, once elected, is the representative of his whole constituency, whether it has elected him unanimously or chosen him in preference to another after a poll; and the House collectively, when once constituted, is a deliberative assembly, in which every member is supposed to apply his own discretion and judgment to the best of his ability towards a collective decision on every matter of public business that arises for debate. As a matter of fact the majority of members still do so. Party discipline within the House and outside, in spite of the limitations it has imposed on the freedom of individual members, has not yet rendered the result of every debate a foregone conclusion. Argument and evidence still exercise a considerable influence upon the ultimate judgment of the House in many important affairs. If it were not so, if each member were in fact and theory a delegate holding a commission to express and vote for the opinions of a majority, greater or less, of his constituents, the House of Commons would no longer have any reason for its existence in its present shape. The telegraph and the telephone have rendered it unnecessary. A few paid officials at Westminster could easily arrange day by day the business it now transacts, and obtain and record the votes of 670 local party caucuses upon it. This is only a logical reductio ad absurdum of the idea of making every M.P. a delegate commissioned to deliver in the division lobby the votes of the majority by which he was returned.

When, therefore, a Parliament has once been constituted, it is idle to seek to limit its powers or whittle down its authority by counting up the votes that its members received at the polls, or setting off the significance of the votes of one constituency, or one group of constituencies, against another. The assembly is there to fulfil, for better or worse, the purposes for which it has been constituted; it is invested with all the powers which the law confers upon every House. Personally, I think the method by which it is constituted might be much improved, e.g., by limiting each elector to a vote for one constituency, by reducing the size of constituencies to something approaching equality, by making some provision for the better representation of minorities, and so on. The method of electing members cannot be too democratic for my taste. But the object of an election, whatever the method, is to form a legislative assembly of the best men who can be got, who are acceptable to the majority of the people; and as soon as such an assembly is formed the figures of the polls by which its individual members were chosen cease to be a matter of any consequence. The only legitimate ground there can be under existing constitutional arrangements for impugning the competence of Parliament for the performance of its constitutional functions is that owing to the effluxion of time and the alteration of circumstances it has fallen out of touch with the electors who returned it. There was never less ground for such a suggestion than at the present moment, when not only has a new House been elected, but the country has returned twice in the course of one year two successive Houses of practically identical composition. The House which has now been constituted has been summoned and elected for the express purpose of dealing with certain well-defined constitutional questions. Its composition is such as to enable it to deal with them decisively and authoritatively. It must be left to do its appointed work in the constitutional way; and those who would have liked to see it of a different composition must accept its proceedings with the best grace they can.

THE FRENCH PALACE DEBENTURES.

In spite of the threat addressed to me by Messrs. J. J. Edwards and Co., solicitors, on behalf of Mr. Charles Harrison, I find it necessary to return to the subject of the debenture prospectus of the French Palace Development Syndicate, Limited. It may be remembered that in the article to which Mr. Harrison has taken exception it was suggested that he, one of the directors of the F.P.D. Syndicate, carries on a bucket-shop in the City under the nom de guerre of Duncan Forbes and Co. Last week I published a letter from Mr. T. E. Crispe, K.C., chairman of the French Palace Development Syndicate, explaining that when he accepted that position he was absolutely ignorant of Mr. Harrison's connection with Duncan Forbes and Co., and I have now received the following further communication from Mr. Crispe:—

Dear Sir,—I am much obliged by the insertion of my letter, and beg you to permit me to supplement it.

Mr. Yelverton in his attack upon the directors has informed you that the use of his name and Sir Thomas Barclay's was entirely unauthorised. Since writing to you I have had the advantage of reference to certain correspondence and minutes, and I can now state, verifying my statements by documentary proof: (1) That Sir Thomas Barclay consented in writing to become trustee—that Mr. Yelverton saw his letter of consent, and that he himself consented; (2) That as to a circular which accompanied the prospectus, giving the names of the trustees, Sir Thomas (according to Mr. Yelverton) merely felt that it should have been submitted to him for approval before issue; (3) That, nevertheless, Sir Thomas expressed his willingness to act subject to the matter proceeding on the lines of the draft deed of trust prepared by Mr. Yelverton; (4) That when Mr. Yelverton attended a board meeting, and was instructed to prepare a draft deed of trust, he expressed no objection to the proposed issue of debentures as to which of the directors had had the benefit of a legal opinion; (5) That at the said meeting Mr. Yelverton was informed that there would be no allotment unless on an application of £50,000 or thereabouts.

Mr. Yelverton subsequently got a bee in his bonnet, and seems to have considered that the execution of a trust deed was necessary before the receipt of application money; if he had said before allotment he would have been right. It is manifest, however, that after the publication of the prospectus and circular both Mr. Yelverton and Sir Thomas were willing still to act as trustees on execution of the deed prepared by Mr. Yelverton.

In justice to Sir Thomas Barclay, I think it right to say that I am not aware that he has in any way adopted Mr. Yelverton's remarkable disclaimer.

As to the conduct of myself as chairman of the board, I trust that you will conclude by the copy of the minutes appended that I acted in perfect good faith and honour.—Yours faithfully, THOMAS E. CRISPE.

December 22, 1910.

With his letter Mr. Crispe encloses a copy of some correspondence and extracts from the minutes of the company. In regard to the question of the trusteeship, I gave Mr. Yelverton's statement, I have given Mr. Crispe's reply, and the matter does not seem to call for further discussion, especially in view of the appended minutes of a meeting of the company held on the 20th instant:—

The recent article in TRUTH was brought before the attention of the board, and Mr. Harrison, having regard to his proceedings against that paper, tendered his resignation as a director, which resignation was accepted.

Having regard to the fact that the board had decided not to issue debentures except on a subscription of £50,000 or thereabouts,

Resolved that the monies received from applicants be at once returned, and that cheques for the amounts received be drawn. Cheques were thereupon drawn upon the Capital and Counties Bank by two directors and the secretary with the instruction that he should at once forward same to the applicants.

Mr. Crispe's good faith in the matter has not been impugned in TRUTH, and the minutes of the company show that he has acted with perfect propriety. Nor did I attack the scheme for the development of the Aldwych site. What I did was to pass some severe criticisms on the proposed debenture issue from an investment point of view, and to call attention to the fact, which appeared to me to be one of considerable public interest, that a bucket-shop keeper was one of the directors of the company. As it turned out, the response to the prospectus was insufficient to justify an allotment, and the return of the moneys received disposes of the matter quite satisfactorily so far as the applicants for debentures are concerned. With regard to the company, I do not know what course it now proposes to take, but I think it is, at any rate, to be congratulated upon Mr. Harrison's retirement from the board.

In the course of the article in TRUTH on the 14th instant reference was made to an incident in connection with a trusteeship announced by Duncan Forbes and Co. some months ago. Perhaps it may be interesting now to give a few details, more especially as it was a matter in which Messrs. J. J. Edwards and Co., who have threatened me in the name of Mr. Charles Harrison, were acting for Duncan Forbes and Co. One per cent. cover gambles, styled "Complex Stock Deals," with "capital guaranteed against loss" and "dividends" of "over 414 per cent. per annum," constitute the main feature of the business of Duncan Forbes and Co. In May last, however, they sent out broadcast circulars inviting subscriptions for what they called "The Russo-Turkish War Claim Loan of £6,000." The object of this loan, it was explained, was to defray the legal and other expenses of presenting to the Arbitration Court at the Hague an outstanding claim against the Ottoman Government for £1,200,000, payable under the treaty of peace to Russian subjects in Turkey on account of losses sustained during the war of 1879. Duncan Forbes and Co. stated that the claim had been assigned to them, that they had "the conviction" that it would be successful ("the evidence," they wrote, "has been carefully examined by our legal advisers, Messrs. J. J. Edwards and Co."), and that they "guaranteed" to repay subscriptions to the loan with a bonus of 100 per cent. For the guidance of the class of people with whom they are accustomed to deal, they added that "if repaid" in two months this would work out at the rate of 600 per cent. per annum, if in four months at 300 per cent., and if in six months at 200 per cent. It was furthermore stated that "the deed of assignment and all securities in connection with the loan will be deposited at our bankers under a trusteeship consisting of Colonel Sir Charles Euan-Smith, K.C.B., C.S.I., Messrs. J. J. Edwards and Co., solicitors, Mr. Duncan Forbes (Duncan Forbes and Co.)." In the first edition of the circular the London City and Midland Bank was mentioned, but—possibly as the result of an objection by the management of that institution—revised versions referred simply to "our bankers." One result of my comments upon this matter was that the late Sir Charles Euan-Smith called at TRUTH office to tell me that the use of his name in the circulars was entirely unauthorised, and that he would not act as one of the trustees. Although ingeniously worded to convey the idea that the loan would be repaid in a very short time, the circulars did not say anything definite on that point; but in a telegram despatched on May 18 Duncan Forbes and Co. gave the specific undertaking that "for every sum subscribed we guarantee the return of double the amount within three months." On the strength of this a country clergyman forwarded £50, and a few days later he received a letter suggesting that the matter would be settled "within a month or so," and asking if he could "conveniently spare another £10 to £50." He did not increase his subscription, and when at the end of three months Duncan Forbes and Co. failed to return his £50 with the £50 bonus, he communicated with the City Editor of TRUTH, who advised him to put the matter in the hands of a solicitor. This was soon afterwards done, with the result that the clergyman obtained £73 in settlement of his claim to £100, and also recovered a small sum paid to Duncan Forbes and Co. for some rubber shares. At the beginning of September that firm informed subscribers to the Russo-Turkish Loan that the claim would come before the arbitrators early in October. In November, however, they circulated a copy of a letter from Messrs. J. J. Edwards and Co., in which the latter said they had been advised that the Hague Commissioners would not meet for the consideration of this matter until January, "owing, as we suppose, to the need of arranging Turkish finance, which, according to the papers, seems to be now practically assured." Messrs. Edwards added that "it would appear that a complete settlement of the claim . . . may now be looked upon as certain:" and Duncan Forbes commended this to the subscribers as "eminently satisfactory." I doubt, though, whether it will be so to those who counted upon the return of their money in two months with the bonus working out at the rate of 600 per cent. per annum.

One particularly interesting point in this Russo-Turkish Loan affair is the appearance of Messrs. J. J. Edwards and Co. as joint trustees with "Mr. Duncan Forbes." So far as I am aware Mr. Charles Harrison (who is a Dutch gentleman, though his name does not indicate that nationality) has not denied my suggestion that he conducts a bucket-shop in the character of Duncan Forbes and Co. Who, then, is the "Mr. Duncan Forbes" who, according to the above-mentioned circulars, was associated as a trustee with Messrs. J. J. Edwards and Co.? Perhaps Messrs. Edwards will throw some light on his identity for the information of the subscribers to the loan, in whose interest the trust was created.

WHERE WINTER IS.

The best that can be said of an English winter is that its bark is worse than its bite. This is a paradox which requires some thinking out, but its essential truth is every year made manifest by the increasing number of people who forsake the native article for that made in Switzerland. They profess to like a winter with some grip in it—a frost that hangs on, unmoved by any blustering south-wester which happens to drop in from the Atlantic. They even scoff at the idea of Yule-tide. They have made a season of their own, and they call it Lunn-tide. They might have been seen in their hundreds any day last week at Charing Cross or Victoria shaking off the mud of their native country as a testimony against its winter. The carriages of the Northern Railway of France are full of them. So are the buffets at the railway station at Bâle and Berne. After that the mountains swallow them up. They return, of course, in three weeks or a month, looking as if they had been domiciled for the preceding twelve months in the Sahara, aggressively hale, so that it scarcely needs the oft-proclaimed achtung to warn the anæmic stay-at-home Britishers to get out of their way. Naturally, their experience confirms them in their heresy that the new Lunn-tide is far and away better than the old Yule-tide. For one thing you can always arrange its incidence for yourself. It is not a fixed date in the calendar, but may come anywhere between December 1 and March 1, or if you like to spend it at Montana you may end it in April. But that is merely a busy man's reason.

Of course, if you are an ardent ski-runner you will not seek any excuse for being a Lunn-tider. If you pronounce the word properly you will begin to understand the fatal fascination of ski, and how ski lure one from the straight and narrow path of domesticity as exemplified in the Christmas hearth and the Yule-log. But even those who are not devotees of ski have no difficulty in finding excuses. There are plenty of people who have discovered that the flashing blade of a Mount Charles adds the finishing touch to a pretty ankle. Owners and observers of the ankle are equally aware of the fact. Hence the popularity of places where skating may be indulged in all day and every day. True, one may do so at Prince's or the Palais de Glace, but a waltz on the ice under the Alpine sky in brilliant sunshine at Villars with the Dent du Midi looking on is a much more exhilarating pastime than under the electric light at Prince's, and cutting rockers at Wengen with the full approval of the Jungfrau is a very different thing from winning the applause of spectators at the Palais de Glace. Skating is a legitimate excuse. So is toboganning. It has been said that if in his fall Satan felt anything like the thrill of the swoop on a skeleton down the ice run at Villars, the angels who have not fallen are to be pitied. Curlers from Scotland have been known to forsake the rinks of their own land for those of Kandersteg. Curling is not every man's pastime, however. The rink is a slippery place, as many a beginner has found when the skipper of the opposing team begins to express a liking for him. It is a minor excuse. Lugeing sounds like a child's reason until you have experienced the thrills of a run down the mountain path from Wengen to Lauterbrunnen. Bobbing offers just about as many chances of accident as aeroplaning, and may, therefore, legitimately be pleaded.

But whatever the plea put forward, those who make it know in their hearts that it is the call of the winter which lures them to Switzerland, the certainty of frost and snow with brilliant sunshine and mountain air. And nowhere can it be found with more certainty than in the Bernese Oberland. Of course, you may prefer to winter with the fashionable world at St. Moritz, or if you are a member of the Public Schools Alpine Sports Club you may swear by Montana as the right place to find the real thing. But the Oberland is earning for itself the title of the Englishman's winter playground. Though not geographically part of it, St. Beatenberg claims a more extensive view of its beauties than the Oberland itself possesses. It is the sunniest spot that a winter sun shines upon. Higher up amongst the mountains opposite are the new places and the old, where winter sportsmen gather. Grindelwald and Kandersteg, Wengen and—its hotels opened this year for the first time—Murren. Murren is the highest of them all as yet. At 5,500 ft. it is only 500 ft. lower than St. Moritz. It is here that the ski-runner who knows the ropes is making his way to spend his Lunn-tide, for the country round is one vast ski field.

THE PAVEMENT OF HEAVEN.

There is an absurd, disgusting, and immoral convention that at this season we shall all engage in renewing the pavement of Hell. No doubt it is well-worn and in need of repair by New Year's Day, but that is the business of the high-spirited tenant of the place. A long lease is always a repairing lease, and although his title-deeds are a matter of conjecture, many people suppose that he even has a freehold in the premises. In any case, his pavements are his own concern, and none of ours—as yet. To spend a part of New Year's Eve in making good resolutions, thus enrolling ourselves as Pluto's road-menders, is rather worse than futile. Why do it? A good resolution is a heavy burden with which to start the year; it is no better than a mortgage, whose interest falls due at the most inconvenient moments, and whose foreclosure is almost inevitable.

To break a good resolution is a double sin. It adds to wrong-doing the breaking of a pledge, and that a pledge made with the creditor who is always present and seldom forgetful—a creditor who never goes away on business or pleasure, but stays at home and rules the house—ourselves. Our guardian angels shake their heads over us, and regard us more in sorrow than in anger when we forswear our excellent resolves; and if one thing is more maddening than another, more calculated to ruin the sweetest temper, it is to be regarded more in sorrow than in anger, especially when we know we are in the wrong. And besides, what has Heaven done to be so neglected? Has its pavement no wear and tear at all that it never needs repairing? Gold is soft and wears away easily. Should we not turn our attention to celestial navvying for a change?

Then why not make bad resolutions on New Year's Eve? If we keep them we are at least not breaking our word in addition to our primary offence; if we break them it is a virtue, our guardian angels are delighted, and we are much encouraged by the happy smirk of our inward monitor (the same who never goes away on business or pleasure, as before stated), to do the same thing again. For example. Smith resolves to get drunk every day. Smith has hitherto been a moderately abstemious person, but now and then he has had a relapse which has worried him to death for days afterwards, spoilt his working capacity, made him unsociable and grumpy in the house, and generally lowered his standard of conduct. Well, Smith, instead of swearing off the drink, swears on. His guardian angel feels a bit uneasy, and says to other angels: "Do you think he really means it?" and the other angels say to her: "It'll be a pretty bad business if he does, dear, won't it?" He keeps it up for a day or two, it being New Year, and his resolve fresh in his memory, and plenty of facilities about for keeping it. Then he breaks it—breaks it day after day. His guardian angel is far more delighted than if he had simply resolved to keep sober, and was doing it with difficulty. If he had done that the New Year celebrations would have been sinful; but now his abstention is a positive, not a negative, virtue, and everybody is pleased. Instead of bearing a remorseful face about, and snapping at his wife (a common symptom of remorse), he is delighted with himself, goes about beaming. He has succeeded in making drunkenness officially his normal condition; consequently, sobriety is abnormal virtue; and it is much easier to be good abnormally than normally. There is no excitement about normality, and anybody except a confirmed drunkard soon gets tired of being drunk every day; while everybody, without exception, gets tired of being normally good, and either lapses into badness for a change or makes ill-shaped attempts at the heroic.

There is a an amusing story, no longer in its first youth, but redeemed by its illustrative value, about a lady who was giving a dinner-party, and had just arranged the dessert. She stood back in the window to observe the effect of the dinner-table, and was just about to move, when her small daughter, clad in the white night-gown of innocence, entered the room with determination, and clambering on a chair, selected, with the precision of a connoisseur, the nicest peach. She then departed swiftly. Her mother, aghast at this iniquity, was wondering what was the best way to punish her, when the sinner returned, got on the chair, put back the untouched peach, and said, in the determined voice of seven years, "That's one for you, Mr. Devil!" Exactly. She had resolved to have that peach—a thoroughly iniquitous resolution, a sin of the deepest and darkest sepia known to the paint-box of childish morality. She broke her bad resolution, thereby giving "one in the eye" to the Devil, instead of merely leaving him unmolested, enchanting her mother a hundred times more than if she had quietly stayed in bed, and giving herself a great impetus towards the commission of her next virtue. Moreover, certainly and without a doubt, she got that peach next morning—or else her mother was less than woman.

For all these reasons the only good resolution it is really advisable to make is a resolve to make bad ones and break them all. Instead of sending chipped chunks of damaged virtue down below, let us enrol ourselves under the Board of Works in Upper Street. It is a pleasing picture—Humanity laying on the streets of Heaven the macadam of sin, pouring melted praise between the flints, and doing the work with diamond pickaxes in garments of white samite corduroy!

NOTES FROM PARIS.

ANTOINE'S "ROMEO AND JULIET."

THE staging of "Romeo and Juliet," at the Odéon must cover Antoine with glory. It costs him, apart from the preparatory expenses, 4,000 francs a night and endless study and anxiety. There is talk of its making a tour of both Americas. Amable and Jambon furnished him with twenty tableaux and sought inspiration for the festive scene at Capulets' house in the painting of the Noces de Cana in the Louvre. The translator, M. de Gramont, has not presumed to give an adaptation nor to cut any of the tirades. In the letter and the spirit he is faithful to the original text. He furnished the same manager with translations of "Julius Cæsar" and "Coriolanus," which, it may be remembered, carried away Paris. The only fear now is that music may be overdone in interlinking the tableaux.

As nothing is abridged, there is but one entr'acte. It is placed between the twelfth and the thirteenth scenes. Joubé gives his own reading of the part of Romieu, and has "created" the rôle. But he must fulfil a short engagement at Monte Carlo, and so has formed an understudy, M. Morgan, a young actor of talent. Mlle. Ventura plays the part of Juliet. She has an arduous time in "Les Affranchis" as a matinée and a soirée piece, by a stone deaf authoress, Mlle. Leneru. It will be absolutely necessary to let her rest from time to time when "Romeo and Juliet" is on at the Odéon. To this end Mlle. Colonna Romano has studied the rôle of Juliet to slip into the place of Mlle. Ventura when her strength runs down. She gave full satisfaction to MM. Antoine and Caillard at the rehearsals, and Joubé found her inspiring. One must not compare her to the ideal Juliet one formed for oneself in reading the tragedy—the Juliet fresh as a dewy spring morning in its new bloom, and joyous as the lark that salutes the advancing sun. But she is an actress of a fine mind, has tact and grace, and, with the help of stage artifices, realises wonderfully the joy of life, the frank and yet refined heartiness of the heiress of the Capulets. This is not meant as damning faint praise, but as high eulogium.

Joubé is the star of the play. According to his reading Romeo is in love with love before he meets Juliet. This made him blaze like a dry fagot the moment a kindly glance fell on him from her eye. His perfectly set-up figure explains the tumult of admiration that sweeps over a naïve girl, who is a daughter of renascent Italy, where the cult of plastic beauty reigned. It may be supposed that she is a "spoilt child." Joubé insisted on being himself the designer and the tailor of his costume. To this end he studied the sixteenth century Italian in the Louvre, and did not neglect Botticelli. He then designed in water colours what he was to wear, cut it out, stitched it, and applied the very simple garnitures. Antoine had feared it might be too sumptuous, and cried out in agreeable surprise on hearing that the whole thing, silk tights, trailing mantle of the masker, specially made shoes à la poulaine, with long, pointed toes, and all, did not exceed in the bill 450 francs. The justaucorps, or short tunic and vest, is a skin fit, reminding one of the chain armour of old. It hugs a remarkably clean-built figure, and lends itself to all the movements of a supple body. The sleeves, quite tight at the guard of the arm and in the forearm, have a note of fancy in the crevés, or satin puffs, covered with wide meshed gold net, as they escape from the "slashes." A mask with pandean horns is pushed up over the skull cup. It gives a slightly diabolical suggestion. Is there not a ferment of demoniac contrivance in the tragedy that hastens on? To give unity to his part, Joubé wears throughout the same suit.

Berlioz was still under the influence of Miss Smithson as Juliet when he wrote the intermède symphonique that MM. de Gramont and Antoine adopted. This did not prevent him from leading with her, so long as they remained together in the fast-binding matrimony of their period, a cat and dog life.

I thought the Christmas Toy Fair on the Boulevards rather disappointing. The booths are, indeed, as numerous as before, extending in a double row, two or three miles long, from the Madeleine to the Place de la République, and attracting great crowds, especially in the evening. The force of habit accounts for much. The fair has, by degrees, altered in character. Toys are now what are least sold. The Préfecture de Police made an effort a few years ago to preserve the booths for bonâ-fide vendors of home-made articles, for the benefit of whom the fair was intended. But it has given up the task for lack of genuine stay-at-home artisans, and has allowed the advancing wave of industrialism to take its course. The occupants of the booths are now mere retailers of manufactured wares, such as shoe-blacking, lamps, bleaching powders, stationery, imitation leather wares, and other "notions" of popular bazaars. Among the toys, I noticed mechanical steam-engines working with real steam, and so cheap that I suspect they must be made in Germany, where they understand better than in France how to turn out an article by the myriad so as to reduce its cost.

I noticed, too, that you can get the same toys sold at the Fair cheaper by going to the bazaars, the reason being that crowds flock to the Boulevards in hopes that they will pick up bargains, and vendors take advantage of this fond belief. Their conduct reminds me of certain Japanese exhibitors at the 1900 Exhibition. I had made notes of the prices of certain little works of art in that section, and, returning there during the last week, I found to my surprise that prices had increased all round. I pointed this out to an intelligent little Jap behind a counter. He smiled, and acknowledged the accuracy of my remark. "You see," he explained, "this is a clearance sale."

A revolution is feared in Toy Land: the dethronement and exile of the doll with the porcelain head, chubby cheeks, and big, staring blue eyes. She is dressed in flaunting style with a full outfit intended for the young daughters of rich families. But they think her trop bête. Her stupidity irritates them. They want dolls of the period—dolls that might have gone through a Camille Sée girls' lycée, passed the "bachot" examination, and become hospital or red cross nurses, or lady doctors or lawyers. You see, since the Sacré Cœur, Augustines, Oiseaux, and other conventual schools for the daughters of the wealthy have disappeared these dots have imbibed the spirit of the age. They have learned a lot about the Tanagra figurines, and can now see why they are about the most precious relics of antiquity. The present standard of doll beauty strikes them as hateful. I have just heard a small lass to whom a doll with a head made in Germany had been given say that she expected it would bleat like a sheep instead of saying papa and maman. The dots who go to board schools are still satisfied with the stupid, staring doll. What they most value is the bright raiment. It is a feast to poor young eyes used to dismal surroundings and it excites, shapes and directs deep-lying instincts. By-and-by the Thursday visits to the Salons and museums and cinéma shows will make them more critical and hard to please.

The sentence passed on Mann, the faith healer, is severe, and ought to be blighting. It puts on record the ruling that even if witnesses in evident good faith believed themselves either cured or relieved by the practices of Mann, the failures, lies, habitual fraudulent manœuvres (tricks, we should say) by means of which he swindled his correspondents out of part of their fortune are not lessened by their declarations on his behalf. The faith healer goes to prison for six months and has to pay a fine of 3,000 francs. The health officer, Carrique, under cover of whom Mann operated, is judged to be a poor creature, assimilable to a typewriting secretary. He was brought out to be shown to a Commissioner of Police to mask the illegal practice of medicine. The court, acquitting him of swindling intent, sentenced him to a fine of 500 francs for complicity in the medical practices of William Mann.

Mann seems to me to have been trying to fill the void caused by the illness and the death of Mrs. Eddy. If a woman, she was the Mahomet of the faith healing professors. Every conscientiou doctor preaches self-denial as a means to the recovery of health, but it is a hard doctrine to half-evolved men and women who can afford themselves all the enjoyments of luxury and have no idea of the good things that money cannot buy.

The diplomatic events of the week have been the reception at the Elysée of the new Russian Ambassador, our old friend Count Isvolsky, and the exaltation of our far older friend the Marquis del Muni to the Golden Fleece. You may remember that he served here as Spanish Ambassador for an unbroken period of eighteen years. His Golden Fleece is to make up for his recall by the Canalejas Ministry—in short, une fiche de consolation. It may, too, be a sign of favour from the Court. Count Isvolsky is a successful man, though he has had his failures. In Scotland they would would think him a "douce man." It is his way to proceed by hints and timely observations gently made, rather than by arguments. I forget what Pole—an enemy, of course—likened him and his method to the dead man's grass that grows in deep water. This grass sways about with every eddy. It strikes a swimmer unused to it as a harmless and almost a good-natured sort of plant. But let him attempt to pass through it and it will coil round his limbs, holding him fast. If a man in a boat, armed with a hook, do not come to the rescue he has but a poor chance of breaking away. Some years ago Count Isvolky brought the Vatican round from the Polish side into a friendly attitude towards Russia. He had laid himself out to accentuate points of similarity between the Greek and Russian Churches and to convey in a non-committal manner his notion that the Czar as head of Russian orthodoxy and the Pope as head of Latin orthodoxy were the right and left ventricles of the same Christian heart. The Cardinals, if not convinced, thought him a nice man, and credited him with good intentions. He obtained of the Holy See more than any other Russian agent had ever done. The views favourable to a union of the Eastern and Western Churches, which have drawn down censure on the Rev. Father and Professor of Theological History, Prince Max of Saxony, strike me as analogous to those which Count Isvolsky tried to palm off. They are not new. Does not Gibbon or Guizot tell us that a Pope having called a Council to bridge over the rift between Greeks and Latins, the Emperor Alexis Paleologus attended, and that his dog flew into a state of rabid fury, barking and howling when the Greeks seemed desirous of compromise? But what brought blame on the Saxon Prince brought reward to the Russian Count. His Imperial master gave him the post of Minister to St. Petersburg It gave him opportunities to become the diplomatic persona grata to the Empress Dowager. She fills a situation analogous to that of Sultan's mother at Constantinople in virtue of a custom derived from the Tartars, who for a time once formerly reigned at Moscow.

To return to Prince Max of Saxony. He preached here at Saint Laurent's Church and at Montmartre, and drew an auto-driving public. We did not think him eloquent, but heard he had acquired a mine of science, and had had to learn a lesson of humility in seeing his old tutor preferred before him to the See of Strasburg, which he had wished for. He is a grandson of Maria da Gloria and Dom Ferdinand of Portugal, née of Saxe-Coburg-Kohary, looks in the eyes like the late Emperor of Brazil, is remarkably fair and conscientious as a professor, and is not likely to fill long the chair of theological history at the University of Freiberg. A secularised Jesuit tells me that "this is not the first time the Rev. Prince's Saxon frankness made him put his foot in it," and that "he will never learn que toute vérité n'est pas bonne à dire, or how to gloze an awkward truth without telling a lie. He worked for three years in the slums of East London. Before he published his now censored article in a Roman review, he gave it as his opinion that the supremacy of the Church of Rome is without historical basis. Of the two Churches that he stands between, he thinks the Greek claim is best justified. The Prince submits to the Pope, but submission, with his Lutheran straightness, can only be a pure formality The present Pope wants Catholics to move en bloc. Prince Max would have them act according to the light that is in them, that is, according to personal conscience, save in regard to dogma necessary to salvation. He is very near the late Father Tyrrell as a theologian, and to Lord Acton as a historian.

I am not fond of a raking press fire, but the public sometimes like it. That broadside of La Lanterne aimed at Republicans in authority who do snobbish obeisance to the Prince of Monaco gives widespread satisfaction. Why go into the motives which the Monagasque clique say sharpened the writer's pen? The great point is whether or not this attack was deserved? That set would make believe that every paper showing Monte Carlo to be a plague spot is a blackmailer. At the same time, with a sly wink, they cry up the Prince of Monaco as a savant, and his Oceanographic Institute as a noble monument of philanthropy. A past Minister of Agriculture who appeared at the Longchamp, St. Cloud, and other race-courses as the courtier of M. Edmond Blanc, incurred a similar charge. Aix les Bains accused the Ministry that prepared a Bill three years ago to limit gaming tables of a covert understanding to secure a monopoly of roulette to Monaco. La Lanterne heads its article "Etrange Nouvelle," the strange news being that the President of the Republic will go to congratulate the Grimaldi princelet at his laughable Institute, where he exhibits the molluscs he trawled up in his amateur voyages. It is not for the President to risk the dignity of his office and of the nation he represents by lending himself to a scientific farce that too well serves to advertise the roulette of Monte Carlo, et ainsi de suite.

THE NEW PEPYS.

(Extracts from his Diary for 1910.)

December 21 (Feast of St. Thomas): Shortest day. I shopping with my wife and buying Yuletide gifts, which is, in truth, a silly thing—for a man to lavish money which he can ill afford in loading his acquaintance with things which they would liefer be without. Yet, for all that, if a man do omit the customary offering to a former recipient, then is the omission taken for a slight, and much bad blood engendered thereby. And this should be a lesson not to embark lightly on the giving of Yuletide gifts in the first instance; since, having once begun, a man do forge a chain round his own neck for ever afterward, which is what I have done myself to my bitter repentance, and cannot now escape. So naught remains but to discharge the horrid burthen with what economy I may compass. Moreover, I have by me some gifts given me by my friends last Christmas still as good as new; and these will help now to serve my turn, an I do but apportion them discreetly, taking heed not to unload them on the original givers.

Home by taxi with our purchases, and mine are as followeth:—

A monstrous sum methinks is this for a man to expend upon his relatives. Nor is this the end, for there yet remain General Wigg, whom I cannot in decency omit, he being a dear and useful friend to me, and moreover the cook at his club, as also the old liqueur cognac, be among the best in London. But methinks the fountain-pen sent to me by Tom last Christmas will meet the case of the General; which indeed leaketh, yet I cannot be presumed to know of that. So I packt it and despatched it to him with a mighty friendly letter—to my great content.

December 22: Called this day on Rhoda and gave her the seed-pearls, I craving permission to clasp them round her neck myself, since the fastening is something complicated and I would fain be sure that all is in order. While I was so doing, her chin toucht my ear; and it is a soft chin, whereof methought the contact wondrous grateful. I have not told my wife of this gift, nor shall I, for I would not have her pain her heart by the thought of my having been at this expence out of my desire to please her by being civil to her relatives; moreover it do ill become a man to boast of his own generosity.

While I was with Rhoda came in a youth whose name I discover is Tapper and he a subaltern of the Coldstreams. A callow boy, whom some might deem well-favoured. But I do not, having no taste for his foolish, immature type of face, however fairly featured, and add to the imbecility of his appearance by parting his hair in the middle; which is a fashion I have ever detested. Catcht him making impudent eyes at Rhoda, looking the while as much like a sick calf as any man I did ever behold. And she, who should have set him down smartly, did the rather encourage him; which vext me that she should comport herself thus unmaidenly; soe I left in a tosse.

December 23: A Christmas gift this morning from my Aunt Tabitha—to wit, a tortoise pen-wiper, which do seem somehow strangely familiar to me. And for that I can soon account; for I do recognise it as my own gift to her last year; and cost me 1s. 9d. at the Stores. So she is fairly catcht out. But Lord! The pitiable meanness of it, thus to foist her old presents on a man in the guise of new ones. Which is a woman all over; and she do aggravate the offence by a hypocritically affectionate letter.

To the club and chatting with General Wigg; he telling me a pretty story of a young friend of his who not long since did espouse one Mistress * * * *, whose father is senior partner in a prosperous firm of biscuit makers. But soon after his marriage the happy bridegroom did encounter an old acquaintance of his, who accost him (not 'twould seem in the nicest taste) with this greeting: "Hulloa, old man! So you have married the biscuits." "Aye," quoth the other, "and the tin too!"

Which methinks is mighty neat repartee, if 'twere ever made. But that I take leave to doubt. For 'tis seldom indeed that those things do come to us in the nick of the crisis, but more generally on mature reflection afterwards, when the witty words are too late to avail us. Wherefore, that they be not lost, we do (in telling the story) date them back to the psychic moment, thus bringing the two points, of wit and of time, into their proper co-relation, which is good art, if it be bad veracity. But the veracious wit is yet to seek.

December 24 (Christmas Eve): I washt Pinch so he should be white for Christmas, whose coat have been, these several weeks past, of a reasty yellow, like ill-cured bacon.

December 25 (Lord's Day and Christmas Day): To God's house with my wife, where a sermon from the vicar on goodwill and charity in our dealings with our fellow men. Which is good Christian teaching, and I do hope that all who hear it will act upon it at this blessed season; and may the Lord confound any who do harden their hearts thereto.

We dined on a turkey and mince-pies, but the bread-sauce curst lumpy, nor have the currants in the pies been chopped to a seemly fineness. So I am resolved to see to it that Martha have notice to-morrow.

HISTORICAL VIGNETTES.

QUEEN ANNE.

A ROOM square and lofty, its dark panels laced with stems of gold which ran up into fronds curling under a painted ceiling; within a rail like an altar's a massive bedstead hung with heavy embroidered curtains and plumed, hearse-wise, on each of its four posts; a carpet on the floor as soft as turf; chairs, sofas, an escritoire all loaded with gilding; two tall windows of many little panes looking out on a staid Dutch garden—such was the setting to a "situation" in history as momentous as any which had occurred since the voice of Elizabeth, issuing from out a deathly stupor, faintly named her successor to the anxious Cecil. That moment and this held between them the whole fortunes of a dynasty.

A man and a woman stood together in one of the windows, both silent, both with an expression of intense waiting expectation on their faces; by the bedside another man and woman stooped in a like listening attitude. These might have been thought the sole inmates of the apartment, had it not been for the solitary voice. It issued from the bed itself, snoring, monotonous, like the hoarse bubbling pant of a subterranean boiler. A royal apoplexy speaks in very much the same tone as a plebeian, and Queen Anne dying at Kensington Palace was only announcing her succession to the majority in the language common to all. That was fully understood by the cynical quartet attending her, but whose interest in another succession kept them hovering near in the hope of wringing yet from those blue lips a last expression of prerogative. They wanted her to name her heir; for the rest, their concern in the death-bed scene was already a posthumous one.

The lady in the window, wife to the Duke of Buckingham and bastard sister to the Queen, stared into the garden with eyes that had no speculation for its clipped hedges and glowing sunflowers. Handsome and ambitious, her sympathies were, perhaps naturally, with a brother about whose birth also scandal had had its say. Her companion, a full-featured, black-browed man, with a present expression on his face of tense emotion, and his rich clothes in some disorder, was the Secretary of State, Lord Bolingbroke.

Suddenly the couple at the bedside rose and came softly towards them. The man, leading as by right of office, was in undress canonicals of gown and band. He was Doctor Atterbury, no less, bishop and dean, and in and ex-officio the most pugnacious member of the High Tories. The structure of his face was square and strong, its forehead puckered, its eyes dark and stormy. Rather mincing in his lordship's wake followed Lady Masham, the Queen's favourite, a plain, defiant-looking woman, with a frosty smile and an exceedingly red nose.

"Well?" whispered Bolingbroke, with an agitated moistening of his lips.

"Ineffective to the last, I fear," said Lady Masham, taking the answer upon herself. "What was one to expect of a queen who could bear seventeen children and die childless?"

"Let us seek in that tragedy rather, madam," said Atterbury, "the design of the Almighty, who but cleared the ground of weeds for the lineal succession of the true grain."

"Oh, my dear, dear mistress!" sobbed the Masham, resentful of the implication of a grievance she had really felt. "I shall be lost without you."

"We shall all be lost, madam," said Bolingbroke bitterly, "failing that nomination from her hand." He looked at Atterbury imploringly. "Is it hopeless, my lord bishop?"

"It must not be; it shall not be," said the dark duchess, clinching her little fists. "She has sane intervals. If I have to guide her hand she shall sign the testament."

Appointing James Francis Edward to the succession, she meant. She was a thoroughgoing partisan; they called her the Queen of the Tories.

These were the nucleus of a pretty widespread conspiracy, which embraced Anne herself and most of the principal Ministers of State. Three days earlier had seen the disgrace of Oxford, the appointment of Atterbury to Lord Privy Seal, and the triumph of the Jacobite party. And then, at the critical moment, had come the Queen's illness, unhinging all, literally at a stroke. Bolingbroke was distracted; the Pretender eagerly awaited at Bar his summons to a throne; the opposition was alive and active; all appeared to depend at last on this question of a royal nomination. If they could only get the Queen to put her signature to a document designating her choice of an heir!

And the Queen was just a voice—a moan of inarticulate suffering.

But she might rally; such cases often did towards the end; there might ensue a period of strength and lucidity. They still desperately clung to that hope—to the belief that, were her mind to reawaken, it would instinctively return to the business whose pressure had snuffed it out. She had been much excited and overwrought; her swoon was only a temporary anæsthesia; Nature might yet be induced to join in the conspiracy.

As the duchess spoke a groom of the chamber made his noiseless entry. He came with an urgent message to the Secretary of State to join the council, which sat in the next room. Startled, indefinably uneasy, Bolingbroke, with one look at his confederates, left the apartment. He was absent a full hour.

The others in the meanwhile gravitated, soft-footed, between the bed and the window-embrasure. The significance of the occasion loosened the bonds of punctilio. Here, robbed of her accessories of State—for the attendants were excluded for the time being—was just a moribund old woman, grown valueless but for her hold on a single last thread of prerogative. In a little the great officers of the household must be readmitted and the solemn farce played out.

They judged her old in those full, feverish times, but she was no more than fifty. Her hair was still black and abundant; there were no wrinkles on her fat, smooth skin; she had looked the picture of opulent comfort until an over-gorged brain had burst its conduits and stained the white flesh as with veins in marble. She lay with mouth and eyes wide open, staring, but seeing nothing, whispering, but no human speech. And the Masham oscillated between the bed and the window, her lids at last almost as red as her nose with weeping.

"She will never speak again," she sobbed; "never recognise her dearest Abigail; and our hopes are destined to die with her."

Her voice rose to a squeak; there was no doubting her intense sincerity. With the Queen's death, especially if it spelt the ruin of the Jacobite cause, her position was lost, and those gratifying little emoluments she had enjoyed so long must cease.

As she wailed Bolingbroke returned suddenly. Leaving the moaning, ineffective figure, the others pressed about him. He looked quite spiritless and dejected. He constantly wiped his lips with a handkerchief, as if to conceal their trembling.

CANNES.—GALLIA PALACE. Built in 1900. 40 apartments with private baths. Garage for 30 Motor-cars. Orchestra.

"It was my lord Dukes of Argyll and Somerset," he said. "They broke into the council uninvited, pleading the Queen's danger and the critical times. My lord Duke of Shrewsbury applauded their patriotism, and—and in return he is made Lord Treasurer, and——"

He was interrupted by the council itself, attending in form to procure the Queen's sanction to the appointment. The figure snored and whispered without ceasing. Something which exigency construed into a nod was accepted for approval, and in a few minutes the conspirators were left alone again. Bolingbroke stood in a gloomy pallor; Atterbury uttered under his breath something very like an oath.

"Slids!" said the duchess; "if that was considered warrant enough for their purpose, why not for ours?"

The Secretary shook his head, staring before him and biting his finger.

"We are among the breakers," he said, "and they are on the shore. I know not where to seek for a pilot in this sudden mad confusion. The Whigs are up in force. The Privy Council will be summoned, the troops called out, and every port guarded. My lord, I feel quite stunned and broke. This cursed set-back when our ship was running into port! I fear that all is lost."

"My lord! a faint heart!" cried Atterbury, aghast and disdainful. "This is not the spirit for a crisis. We must rally our forces; be bold, and strike at all hazards; if only on the merits of the case, proclaim the King James III. Look, my lord: I will accompany the heralds myself in lawn sleeves."

But Bolingbroke still shook his head, in a way which made the other grind his teeth.

And it was at this moment that the Masham uttered a screech:—

"My mistress! My own darling, royal, loving mistress!"

The Queen was sitting up in bed. Her head rolled a little; her hands plucked at the sheet. But there was an obvious consciousness returned to her eyes, and she appeared to recognise her company.

The great, the momentous, the ardently-wished-for rally had occurred. They hurried to come about her; one with another, in the emotional urgency of the occasion, they gave tongue. She must signify her successor; she must put her hand to the testament which proclaimed her choice. To the soft babel of entreaty, breathless, excited, which stormed her hearing she answered not a word. She was unable. Speech, it was evident, was yet denied her.

But she seemed to realise the situation, and, if she could not talk, her movements were voluntary. Her fingers travelled as if to imply the action of writing. Bolingbroke tore a document from his pocket, and with shaking hands placed it before her.

"A pen!" he gasped. "It is all here, Madam, and lacks nothing but your sign-manual."

Lady Masham flew, and returned with quill and inkhorn. The Queen feebly accepted the instrument, and prepared to write. A sudden intelligence filled her eyes. They all, in an intensity of agitation, stood away while she shaped her characters, and, having finished, sank back, the pen sliding from her nerveless fingers.

Bolingbroke, with a sigh of heart-wrung relief, seized the paper, while the rest gathered about him. It was done. His white face knew a spot of returned colour. This kingdom which had hung in the balance! The bias was declared at last, and the game promised to be his. Confidence came back—enthusiasm, transport. With this in his hand he could face the Council, and retort upon their decision with the whole force of a regal testament. That at least would gain him time, and a little time in which to mature his plans had been all that he needed. The conspiracy, at the moment of its blighting, had been almost ripe; it should rush to its sure fruitage in this Indian summer of hope renewed. Brushing a sudden film from his eyes, he looked for the coveted signature, and saw——

He fell back with a gasp. The Queen, relapsed into the lethargy from which she had momentarily awakened, was sunk down, the shadow of approaching death on her face.

"The Testament!" whispered Atterbury, almost suffocating.

Bolingbroke, utterly speechless, held out the paper for the three to examine. They crowded together, stooping eagerly over it. And this, instead of the royal signature, was what they read, scrawled in faint, crooked characters:—

"I want my supper."

LETTER FROM THE LINKMAN.

SYDNEY SMITH, dear Lady Betty, once wrote to a friend: "The London failings assume possession of me the moment that I get to Piccadilly; I am already heartless, selfish, insolent, frivolous, and worldly." The country has for the time adopted the Christmas virtues, and most men and women are now amiable and benevolently inclined. If the transition to comparative excellence is so easily effected it is not obvious why a less satisfactory condition prevails throughout the rest of the year.

* * * * * *

The English resemble the Chinese in many particulars. One Wang was in command of a fort which was captured by us when we were at war with China, and the Emperor ordered that officer to be beheaded in consequence. Wang, however, having assured his Majesty that the English had fought unfairly, was pardoned. The Unionists now insist that the victory of the Radicals at the general election was a defeat, and consequently that the verdict of the country should be disregarded.

. . . . .

It is not the "Moderate man" who can turn the scales at an election, but the indifferent, and how to arouse the interest of the latter is the main problem of the moment in this direction. There are many thousands of electors who are convinced that the lines in the Biglow Papers apply with equal force to British as to American politicians, to wit:—

"I don't find Whigs and Democrats so Different as is thought,
They both act pooty much alike, and Push and scrooge and cuss;
They're like two pickpockets in league
For Uncle Samwell's purse."

The ordinary English member of Parliament certainly takes himself far more seriously than he does the principles he advocates, and this attitude is discouraging to supporters.

. . . . .

One man stands for Parliament because his father stood before him; another, because he wishes for a title; a third, because as a member he will be better able to obtain well-paid directorships; and a fourth, because it will facilitate his elevation to the Bench—how few enter Parliament for the sole purpose of furthering a cause. It would gravely thin the ranks of candidates were it decreed that no member should accept any additional directorship after election, have a title conferred upon him, or be appointed a judge.

. . . . .

The most curious circumstance of the past year has been the inability to arouse the interest of the nation on any subject. "Scares" and "Crises" have been created and engineered with exceptional ingenuity, and the ordinary public has remained almost apathetic. The Crippen case, however, caused widespread excitement! The fact is that, since the German Emperor despatched the ill-advised message to the late President Kruger, the English Press has produced so many sensations in continuous succession that the once-sensitive British public has become hardened. This will eventually lead to a lowering of the pitch of sensational journalism—a not regrettable consequence.—Believe me to be very truly yours,

CONSOLS FOR THE MILLION.

A Hint for Mr. Lloyd George.

IN Truth of November 2 I dealt at some length with the fall in Consols. My object at the time was confined to proving that the drop in the Funds from the high level of the nineties, a matter that was being seized upon so eagerly by the partisan press, was due to a number of clearly defined causes quite outside the scope of party politics, and that instead of Consols now being extraordinarily cheap it was rather a case of the stock in the high record days having been too dear. Accepting the theory that 2½ Consols must be expected in normal times to remain at a considerable discount, which ipso facto implies that the Goschen Conversion Act has been a failure, I quoted as a feasible plan the reconversion scheme advocated some time ago by Mr. Mackworth Praed, under which a new stock carrying interest at 3 per cent. was to be created ranking pari passu with the present 2½ per cent. Consols, to the holders of which was to be given the option of exchanging £100 of their 2½ per cent. stock for £87 10s. of the new 3 per cent. stock. While, however, the reconversion of Consols to a dividend basis that would give reasonable promise of the quotation standing at about par has much to recommend it, I believe a great deal might be done in other ways as well to make Consols more popular. What is wanted is a change in the methods of transference and ownership, and a great increase in the facilities for buying and selling in small amounts. At present the transfer of Consols can only be effected by the personal attendance of the transferor at the Bank of England in London or the Bank of Ireland in Dublin, or by the expensive and troublesome means of a power of attorney.

To illustrate how this tends to discourage investment in Consols by the small man, take the case, say, of an English artisan living some distance from London who wishes to dispose of £20 of Consols. He must either face the expense of a journey to the metropolis (with the attendant loss of a day's work) in order to transfer his stock, or he must give a power of attorney. The latter has to bear a 4s. stamp (if the amount involved were over £100 the stamp would be 10s.), and is executed with more formalities than a deed, requiring two witnesses. If he attend at the Bank personally he must first get into touch with a broker in order that the broker may identify him to the Bank officials, and it is hardly necessary to say that the number of people belonging to the working classes who are in touch with stockbrokers is very few. Then again, the system of issuing Consols in the form of Inscribed stock is not popular. The buyer has no certificate to prove ownership—nothing that he can lodge if the need arise as security for a loan. If a man dies intestate the absence of a certificate may even entail the loss of the holding; the administrator may be unaware that there is any stock standing in the name of the deceased, in which event the unclaimed dividends after accumulating for ten years would be put to dormant funds account. The percentage of cases where the principal is sacrificed may be very small, but under the present system difficulties in finding out the exact amount held and other details are certainly frequent.

It will help materially to further the plea for making Consols more easily purchasable and negotiable by the masses if I compare the British system just outlined with that existing in France. Although the holding up of foreign ways and customs as things superior to British is an action I seldom indulge in, it certainly seems to me that the wonderful success with which France has encouraged her peasant population to put its savings into the national bonds is a matter that should arrest the earnest attention of British statesmen, especially at the present juncture, when the need for extending the support accorded to Consols has, through the competition set up by a variety of other stocks, become urgent. Mr. C. A. Stanuell, in a paper read before the Statistical and Social Inquiry Society of Ireland, three years ago, estimated that the British debt of £750,000,000 was held by only 200,000 persons—an average of £3,750 each, whereas the French debt of £1,000,000,000 was held by 4,000,000 persons—an average of £250. This striking difference is not the result of accident; it is the outcome of a deliberate plan that has been in operation for many years to make Rentes as accessible to the poor as to the rich. In France the national bonds may be had in nineteen different denominations—beginning with a bond of only 2 francs; of these nineteen denominations there are no fewer than ten different classes having face values of from two to twenty francs. The public may purchase without fee at 400 public offices, and cash the coupons at 6,000 different offices. The objection sometimes raised against bearer bonds, namely, the risk of loss, is met by the creation of "mixed" bonds. These are bonds registered in the owner's name, but the coupons belonging to them are payable to bearer in the ordinary way.

The advantages which a country reaps by getting its securities widely distributed amongst its own people are not such as can be lightly regarded. The broader the market for any stock the steadier the price. For years the steadiness of French Rentes has been proverbial. The ease with which France shouldered the huge war indemnity placed upon her by Germany after 1870 was at the time the wonder of Europe, and there is no doubt that the secret lay chiefly in the thrift of the French peasantry and the readiness with which they subscribed to the war loans. The French Government thus earned the reward of its enterprise in making Rentes easy of access to the people. Again, a wide distribution of a national debt must tend towards soundness in national finance. The statesman who introduces any practical means of making the masses of his countrymen shareholders of the nation is taking out insurance policies against Jingoism and Socialism. I have referred particularly to France because the success of the French Government in creating machinery for the purchase and sale of its national obligations stands out most conspicuous. But a word might be added in regard to Italy, which for twenty years past has been wisely following in the footsteps of her neighbour. At the beginning of the period named a very large proportion of the Italian public debt was held abroad, chiefly in France. Thanks largely to the facilities given to the Italians to purchase their own bonds the debt has now pretty well all come back, and as proof of the popularity of the Rentes amongst the poorer classes the small denominations of bonds are quoted at a higher figure than the large.

[I must reserve until next week discussion of the means which our Government might adopt in order to make Consols a popular investment.]

ROUND THE MARKETS.

New Year Anticipations—Bright Outlook for Fixed Interest Stocks and Home Rails—Heavy Yankees—Mexicans and Trunks.

In the past week holidays and holiday considerations have put the Stock Markets into partial eclipse. Members of the House entered with more than usual gusto into the fun of decorating their building, of engaging in raffles and practical joking. Their cheerfulness was timely, for, on the whole, the year ending has not been a bad one for business. As usual at Christmas time the Stock Exchange did not forget the claims of charity, and its donation to the Salvation Army Fund and to many other deserving institutions show that the reputation which the House has attained for open-handed generosity is not misplaced.

Generally speaking, the tenor of markets accorded well with the season of good cheer. More often than not the Stock Exchange at this time indulges in a little boom in anticipation of active business in the new year. On the present occasion there are one or two solid reasons why the future may be regarded with assurance, especially as regards domestic securities. The new year ought to instal a period of easy money, and coupled with the large amount of dividend money seeking a home, ought to give a fillip to investment stocks of the fixed interest variety. Home Rails should continue to derive benefit from the activity of trade and from a batch of dividends that will rank as the best for a good many years. The extent to which the rise will go will be governed largely in the case of fixed interest stocks by the rate at which new business appears, and in the case of Home Rails by the class of buying. A ragged bull account is the chief thing the Railway market has to fear; and that is why I would urge those who buy to pay for and take up their stocks. New loans by public authorities are bound to be launched in fair number, but so long as the competition they offer to older securities is not overdone the Stock Exchange need not fear them. Already preparations are understood to be going on for new issues on behalf of Norway (£800,000 in 4 per cents.), Chili and Persia, while Argentina has just come to Lombard Street for a £2,000,000 loan raised in the form of two-year notes on a 4½ per cent. basis.

The American market has remained in a limp and halting state. Reports of price cutting by the independent steel makers and of slack times in most of the leading industries have spread a rather depressed feeling. Wall Street tries to convince itself that it has already discounted bad times, and attempts every now and again to put stocks higher on the theory that any change in trade conditions must be for the better. But it gets no following, which is scarcely a matter for surprise. A better demand has been experienced for bonds; this is doubtless due in the main to anticipations of the January dividends. For the present the public is inclined to put its money into bonds rather than into stocks, owing to the uncertainty of the outlook. Mexican Rails have been a good market. I am still a believer in both the 8 per cent. first preference and the 6 per cent. second preference stocks, preferring the former. Grand Trunks after their recent sharp turn up have been inclined to go back. Unless the monthly statements to date are no criterion of the company's position, it is hard to see the justification for a bull movement in Trunks just now.

RAILWAYS.

Barsi Light Railway Progress—Vera Cruz Terminals—A Sound Debenture.

In Truth of June 15 last I drew attention to the prospects for the Barsi Light Railway, one of the minor lights of the Indian railway market, whose shares struck me as cheap. The report of the company for the year ended June 30 last was of an even more favourable character than I had estimated. The net revenue, after deduction of debenture interest (£5,600), amounted to £22,008, comparing with only £9,256 for 1908-9. Thus the line last year earned as much as 11 per cent. on its capital of £200,000. Including the balance brought in of £4,561, the total available balance was £26,570. Of this sum £11,021 was applied to the payment of a dividend of 6 per cent., compared with 4 per cent. for the previous year, £10,000 was put to reserve for the equalisation of dividends, and a balance of £5,548 carried forward. The distribution is the best since 1905-6, when in addition to a dividend of 6 per cent. the shareholders received a bonus of 2 per cent. However, the fact that a sum equal to 5 per cent. has this time been put to their credit has to be borne in mind when considering the position. The general outlook for the line remains good, and the extensions recently made and those pending should mean an important addition to revenue as time goes on. Owing to a temporary shortage in labour—the outcome of last season's exceptional crops—and also to heavy rains in September and October, the progress of the Latur extension has been retarded. But the board states that every possible step is being taken to get the line opened early in the coming half-year. This extension will largely augment the traffic of the Barsi-Tadwala section, which has been the least paying section of the line. The company's 4 per cent. debenture stock, standing at 92, is an excellent investment to yield 4⅜ per cent. On the basis of last year's earnings interest was covered five times. The £10 ordinary shares, standing at 10½-11, give a yield on last year's 6 per cent. distribution of 5½ per cent. They may be regarded as a promising purchase for mixing purposes.

Among Foreign Railways an interesting report was that issued the other day by the Vera Cruz Terminal Company. This concern was formed by four different railways, including the Mexican and Interoceanic, and all four jointly and severally have guaranteed interest on the Terminal Company's debentures. These debentures, which I recommended to my readers at the time of their issue as an excellent investment, bear interest at 4½ per cent., payable by coupon on January 15 and July 15. They are a first charge upon the undertaking of the Terminal Company. The present amount is £800,000, the total authorised being £1,000,000. Redemption by drawings at par begins in 1913. The present price is 104 cum a full half-year's interest. The net revenue of the Terminal Company in its last financial year amounted to £37,500, as compared with £32,800 in the previous year, and the total available, including the balance brought in, was £45,000. This was sufficient not only to cover the debenture interest, but to wipe off the balance of preliminary and organisation expenses account (£11,000) and to leave £700 to go forward.

RUBBER.

New Year Prospects—Batu Caves—Java Rubber Plantations—The Crude Rubber Washing Co.

The rubber share market has been devoid of important interest, and all hopes are centred on New Year prospects. Many factors of late have helped to clear the air. Liquidation has run its course; speculation has been eliminated; the raw article has ceased to move erratically; and intrinsic considerations are on the side of a broader and more interesting market as one of the strong probabilities of the early future. As has been shown by the recent move in tea shares, any improvement in basic conditions soon brings fresh vigour to the market. P.P.K. have been dealt in up to 3⅛, and there has been a good demand for Pelmadulla, another Ceylon company whose interests in tea are combined with a strong backing of rubber.

In declaring their third interim dividend of 35 per cent. the Batu Caves directors have issued a timely warning that in view of the lower prices which the company is now obtaining for its output shareholders should not count on the final dividend for the year exceeding the rate at which the last three interim distributions have been made. A total distribution for the year of 140 per cent., as against 50 per cent. for 1909, should go far towards satisfying the most exacting holder. The results obtained for 1910 approximate very closely to Mr. Parry's standard estimate, and a realisation of the official forecast of 250,000 lbs. for 1911 should enable the company, on Mr. Parry's estimated profit basis of 4s. per lb., to add to its present excellent dividend record an announcement of 185 per cent. next year. There are, indeed, few companies in Mr. Parry's list which, on the basis of 4s. per lb. profit, will not be able to pay a higher dividend in 1911 than in 1910, and in the case of the smaller producers many will be able in 1911 to double this year's dividend rate. The rapid strides which some of the promising younger companies are making is already apparent in their monthly output returns. Tremelbye, which in the spring was reporting monthly outturns of about 2,000 lbs., closes the year by contributing four times that quantity, and United Serdang is progressing at much the same rate. The halting tendency disclosed by the output statements of Vallambrosa and of one or two other large producers may not, it is whispered, be unconnected with a relaxation of the strenuous pressure for big returns which the temptation of high prices induced directors at home constantly to keep up on managers abroad. On some estates it is not unlikely that after experiencing the harassing ordeal of a rubber boom, many of the trees are being given a much-needed and well-earned rest. Fortunately, in the countries of its adoption as in its native habitat, the Para rubber tree will stand much harsh treatment without exhibiting signs of permanent injury, and although considerable damage may result from careless tapping, under-tapping is, in the economy of estate management, regarded by many planters as almost as great an evil as over-tapping. In view of the proved excellence of the results which the Para tree is giving in Malaya—early maturity, large yields, and comparative freedom from disease—it is difficult to understand the attitude of the investor who, disregarding the important factors of cheap labour, easy transport, and skilled management, allows himself to be inveigled into sinking money in highly speculative schemes for exploiting in untried districts trees of a description which are known to give results far less satisfactory than those obtainable from Para. The directors of the British Honduras Rubber Company, to take a case in point, in a recent circular to their shareholders, made the pitiful admission that having, after Colonel Wyllie's departure, received certain conflicting information from the estate, the board had come to the conclusion that "it was necessary that someone with knowledge of Castilloa rubber" should be sent out. Surely any right-minded board would have been alive throughout to the necessity of not leaving the property in the charge of an individual whose knowledge of Castilloa was open to the slightest doubt.

The island of Java offers, of course, many advantages for the cultivation of rubber, not the least noteworthy being its abundant supply of cheap labour. Want of conformity to the British standard of cultivation by local planters not infrequently gives rise to some early difficulties when a Dutch-planted estate passes into the hands of a London company, but the report recently issued by the Java Rubber Plantations is an excellent record of the progress made on a property which promises to be brought into bearing at an unusually low figure. The area under Para is now 1,663 acres, which stands in the company's books at only £13 per planted acre. There are on the estate some 400 acres of Ficus (Rambong) and Castilloa rubber, to which no importance is attached, and which are being gradually replaced by Para. The interplanting of Robusta coffee as a catch crop appears to be justified by local conditions, and the manager hopes to have 500,000 bushes in the ground by the end of the coming planting season.

Shareholders who took advantage last week of the invitation to attend the opening demonstration of the Crude Rubber Washing Company's new works at Edmonton must have been impressed with the speed with which the company's washing operations are carried out. In the space of a few minutes unsavoury-looking lumps of raw rubber were, by the use of practically automatic machinery, freed from foreign impurities, such as bark and dirt, and transformed into a finished clean article ready for the hands of the rubber manufacturer. The machines are of the two well-known types—the Guiguet and the Murac-Dessau rubber-washing machines—driven electrically by power supplied by the North Metropolitan Electric Power Supply Company. A large storage reservoir capable of holding 30,000 gallons of water has been erected, and a 250 horse-power boiler fitted with calorifiers having an output capacity of about 200 gallons per minute, supplies the company with the considerable volume of heated water which it requires for its operations. Warehouse accommodation for about 300 to 350 tons of rubber has been provided, and the company is erecting a number of rubber sheeting mills. The whole plant is well arranged, and is a model of organisation, which redounds very highly to the credit of the designers. It is claimed that the ability of the company to standardise its various products and to supply at short notice large quantities of rubber uniform in quality and of any given description will free individual manufacturers from the necessity of locking up capital in large stocks, and that the possession of the last word in rubber washing machinery will enable the company to carry out washing operations more economically and more satisfactorily than has hitherto been possible. Heretofore the Crude Rubber Washing Company's operations have been limited by the extent of its plant. It is understood that its finished product is well received by the trade, and now that its larger works will provide it with larger opportunities there seems every reason to believe that the company is entering upon a very profitable stage of its existence.

The Most Complete List of Rubber and Oil Share Quotations will be found in every Saturday's issue of "The Financial Times." 1d. daily. On sale everywhere.

MINES.

Champion Reef (India) Position Improving.

Shareholders in more than one of the well-known gold mines which have been among the steadiest of the world's gold producers and dividend payers have been prepared by their directors during the current year for some curtailment of annual income. Such incidents have a disturbing effect upon the minds of speculative investors who put their money into mining propositions mainly for the sake of the comparatively high rate of yield obtainable, whereas incidents of exactly the opposite character are apt to be disregarded. In this connection it is worthy of note that one famous mine, which experienced a considerable shrinkage in its income, has, during the last twelve months, made a step towards regaining something like its old position.

The mine referred to is the Champion Reef of India, which has been in the dividend list for about fifteen years, and has distributed over three and a-half millions sterling among its shareholders. High-water mark was reached several years ago, when for two years in succession a sum of £416,000 was divided. Then set in a decline, which instead of being quickly arrested continued until the financial year which ended September 30 last, as will be seen from the appended table:—

| Financial Year. | Dividends. Amount. £ | Per Share.* |
|---|---|---|
| 1903-4 | 416,000 | 4s. 0d. |
| 1904-5 | 416,000 | 4s. 0d. |
| 1905 6 | 234,000 | 2s. 3d. |
| 1906-7 | 104.000 | 1s. 0d. |
| 1907-8 | 52.000 | 0s. 6d. |
| 1908-9 | 52,000 | 0s. 6d. |
| 1909-10 | 60,666 | 0s. 7d. |

* Half-crown shares.

The recovery so far as dividends are concerned is not great, but the condition of affairs disclosed by the latest report holds out the prospect of further progress in that direction eventually, though not perhaps in the early future.

Twelve months ago the directors were able to give information which suggested that the poor zone of ore which was the chief cause of the fall in dividends had at last been passed through. A decided improvement was then noticeable in the deeper workings of the mine, which improvement has been more than maintained. Considerable lengths of valuable ore ground have been proved during the last twelve months; recently the returns have been steadily increasing, and the directors observe that "it is evident that a decided advance towards better results is in progress."

In the past, on more than one occasion, I criticised the directors' financial policy in that profits were divided practically up to the hilt and capital expenditure was met by fresh issues of shares, but of late years a much sounder course has been pursued. For instance, out of the profits of the last three financial years over £100,000 has been written off in respect of the expenditure on shaft sinking. Besides, there have been allowances for depreciation of machinery, plant, and buildings, and the expenditure on the Dharwar option property (now abandoned) has also been written off out of earnings. Altogether these allowances have amounted to a sum largely in excess of £50,000 per annum, as will be seen from the subjoined table, which contrasts the company's results for the last three years:—

| | 1909-10. | 1908-9. | 1907-8. |
|---|---|---|---|
| Ore milled (tons) | 186,680 | 172,378 | 172,006 |
| Yield | £441,255 | £436,097 | £466,172 |
| *Profit | £132,007 | £120,789 | £145,489 |
| Depreciation, taxes, etc. | £72,788 | £68,387 | £91,715 |
| Dividends | £60,666 (22½%) | £52,000 (20%) | £52,000 (20%) |
| Brought forward | £4,123 | £3,721 | £1,947 |
| Carried forward | £2,676 | £4,123 | £3,721 |
| Ore reserves (tons) | 322,513 | 306,772 | 341,948 |

Although so large a sum has been expended in connection with the shafts, a heavy expenditure has still to be faced. The circular shaft, which is to become the main shaft of the mine when greater depths are attained, needs equipping with machinery for the rapid hoisting of ore from the deeper levels. The cost of this will be spread over the next two or three years, and a portion of the outlay will have to be met during the current year. Consequently, the directors state, some increase in the capital expenditure may be expected. So that while the output is increasing no material further recovery in the dividend rate may be experienced until this heavy expenditure has been met, though eventually, of course, it is anticipated that the shareholders will benefit from the work in question. This prospect is already allowed for by the market, as may be gathered from the fact that on the 1909-10 dividend basis, the yield at the current price of 10s. is under 6 per cent., which is a very low return for a quartz mine.

Kaffir Dividends Past and Present—Rand Results Month by Month.

The dividends which have been declared by Kaffir companies during the current month, most of them in respect of the half-year now nearly at an end, make a mixed showing. There are several which compare unfavourably with previous distributions by the same concerns, while one or two undertakings which had figured in the list have not put in an appearance this time. On the other hand, evidences of expansion are not lacking, and there is, at any rate, one newcomer.

"Queer Stories" from Truth. Now ready, Series XVI. Price 1s., at all booksellers, and from the Publisher, 10, Bolt Court Fleet Street. "They are one of the wonders of the world, these stories, and people are never tired of asking who writes them."—Bystander.

The newcomer, it will be noticed, is the Knight Central, which makes its bow with a modest 5 per cent., a return which it should eventually improve upon, especially when the capacity of the plant is increased. Its near neighbour, the Knights Deep, is distributing more this time, as readers of Truth were informed last month would probably be the case. New Modderfontein, that great Eastern Rand proposition, also shows expansion, while the New Primrose comes forward with a substantial bonus in addition to a dividend. The Consolidated Main Reef distribution is in respect of six months, whereas the previous dividend was for a year. The Glencairn, however, is paying for a year what it previously distributed for half that period. Still, this is better than the case of the New Rietfontein, whose shareholders have again to go without reward. The West Rand and Roodepoort United, whose profits have been adversely affected by difficulties of a temporary character, are also absentees on this occasion, while the Nigel, whose mine, it will be remembered, is outside the Witwatersrand, has been obliged to suspend dividends mainly on account of a serious shortage of labour. Durban Deep, which passed its dividend at the middle of the year, has just rejoined the list. The small decline in the New Kleinfontein distribution should occasion no surprise, having regard to the fall in the grade of the ore, which was commented on in Truth some time ago. Attention was also called in these columns earlier in the year to the fact that the Crown Mines was not living up to expectations, but the reduction in this company's dividend rate should be only a temporary matter. A considerable increase in this company's tonnage is officially expected to occur in a few months, and the position will be further improved when certain technical arrangements have been completed. Shareholders may find some consolation for the reduction in the dividend in the announcement that the ore reserves have been largely augmented, and their average grade has been raised.

As showing the results of the Rand mines month by month during the current year, the following table is interesting:—

| Month. | Tons Milled. | Yield per Ton. | Costs per Ton. | Profit per Ton. | Total Profit. |

The results of the mines of the outside districts are not included in this compilation. It will be observed that the average profits have remained fairly steady, although costs have tended to increase. But for the labour shortage the tonnage would probably have expanded further, and the average working expenses would have been lower. In contrasting the monthly totals the length of the working period should be taken into consideration.

The Anglo-American Telegraph Deal—Imperial Bank of Persia—A Share that is Worth Putting Away—River Plate Bank Results.

An event in the miscellaneous market has been the official announcement of the long-expected deal between the Western Union Telegraph Company and the Anglo-American Telegraph Company. Subject to confirmation, the former concern will give to the English company an absolute and unconditional guarantee of 3¾ per cent. on its capital of £7,000,000. If this means that an equivalent sum will be available for distribution, Anglo-American Preferred would get its due 6 per cent., and the Deferred 1½ per cent. The companies will apparently preserve their separate identities, and the £1,000,000 renewals fund possessed by the Anglo-American Company will be retained for its original purpose. The terms look good enough, for in the past ten years the average dividend on Anglo-American Ordinary has been only 3¼ per cent., or ½ per cent. less than the proposed guaranteed rate. Whether, if earnings permit, a higher rate than 3¾ per cent. will be paid is not made clear. If 3¾ per cent. be the limit, then Anglo A at 29 is too dear compared with the 6 per cent. B stock. The latter, which is the prior security, yields about 5¼ per cent., or a couple of shillings more than the A, the junior stock. In any event the Preferred at 115 looks an attractive purchase.

A report of progress and promise is that issued by the Imperial Bank of Persia for the year ended September 30. This institution, which has as its chairman Sir T. Jackson (who is also chairman of the highly successful Hong Kong and Shanghai Banking Corporation) was incorporated in 1889, and has an exclusive concession granted by the Shah for sixty years, which carries with it the sole right to issue notes, exemption from native taxation, and other privileges. The Government in return is entitled to 6 per cent. on the annual net profits of the bank. The shares were originally of the denomination of £10, but in 1894 £3 10s. was written off, and the present nominal value is £6 10s. fully paid, while the shareholders are liable for an extra £10 per share. The past year was not a favourable one for business in Persia, owing to political disturbances, but the bank has managed to make substantial headway. Gross profits were £134,364 against £115,130 in the previous year, and the net profit was £67,267, as compared with £56,113. Deposits now amount to £746,000, which is some £200,000 more than in 1906, while the note circulation at £683,000 is the highest yet reported. Bills discounted, loans and advances stand at £1,426,000, as against £1,123,000 a year ago. The directors have added £15,000 to reserve, making the total of that fund £200,000, as compared with a paid-up capital of £650,000, and they are paying 9s. for the year on the shares, or 1s. more than for 1908-9. The dividend is equal to £6 18s. 6d. per cent. on the shares of £6 10s. denomination, which are quoted at 7⅛. The latter, therefore, give a substantial present return, and there is good reason for expecting a steady expansion in the business of the bank, and a consequent increase in the dividend in the course of the next few years. While dealing with the Imperial Bank of Persia it is amusing to recall the remark made by the late chairman, Sir Lepel Griffin, that it was physically impossible for a run on the bank to occur. The circulating currency of the country is almost entirely silver, and owing to the heavy depreciation in the white metal the silver kran has now fallen to about 4d. Therefore, if a depositor with the bank wished to withdraw, say, £1,000, he would require a couple of carts to take the money away, and a couple of days to count it.

The London and River Plate Bank shows some remarkable figures in its report to September 30. Deposit and current accounts have risen from £18,611,670 to £21,144,693, and bills discounted, advances, etc., have increased from £18,950,896 to £22,976,861. The net profit is the record total of £360,772. No change has been made in the dividend, which stands at 20 per cent., the same as for some years past, but the carry-forward is no less than £229,752. The reserve fund at £1,500,000 already exceeds the share capital by £100,000. The £25 shares of the bank having £15 paid are quoted at 62. On this basis the yield is £4 16s. per cent., and on prospects they are not over-valued.

MISCELLANEOUS NOTES.

A Sailor among the Sharks.

Here is a letter showing how an unfortunate sailor fell into the maw of the sharks trading as the National Share Exchange:—

I am taking the liberty and beg to call your attention to a case of the National Share Exchange of London.

Being led away by the fine advertisement of the above in John Bull's Newspaper as a good chance to make money, and to my great dismay I tried the game and invested the sum of £72 in £18 cheques, in all four deals, and in addition a further sum of £6 10s. as contango, making in all £78 10s., and all I have received as a final balance is a cheque of £4 10s., making a loss of £74.

I am a poor seafaring man, having trotted all over this globe all my life and managed to put a little money away, and to lose it in such a way is very hard indeed.

And should you be good enough to expose my business in the interest of the deluded public you will be doing a great justice.

Comment seems almost superfluous, but I may add that the writer of the letter has sent me correspondence and documents bearing out his story. Misleading circulars and telegrams from the so-called Exchange beguiled him into two "triple combinations"—a flat-trap of an exceptionally gross description, which I have often exposed—and two other cover deals in which he confidingly gave the bucket-shop keepers a free hand to use their "best judgment" on his behalf. He never understood, poor fellow, that the whole object of these gentry is to involve their customers in the losses which form their own gains. The National Share Exchange is one of the most mischievous of the cover-snatching concerns, and it is an abominable thing that the law permits such a business to be carried on.

Another Case of Cover-Snatching.

A flagrant example of the cover-snatching methods of Francis Ellis, 8, Union Court, E.C., is disclosed in some correspondence and documents which have just been submitted for my inspection. By means of a persistent bombardment with circulars and telegrams Ellis persuaded the victim to send him £24 as a 3 per cent. cover—he calls it "banker's margin"—on forty Canadian Pacifics. This was on October 1, and the shares were "sold" at 200. In the course of three weeks they went over 205, but needless to say the innocent customer was not advised to take his profit. On the contrary, he was exhorted to find money for fresh transactions, and when these incitements failed he was at last induced to open a 3 per cent. cover deal in Southern Pacifics, Ellis alluding vaguely to his "cash balance in hand," and saying that he would not require any further margin for the new deal. This was on November 18, and Southern Pacifics were sold at 121¼. On November 29 Ellis wired twice that he must "close" unless £20 additional cover was forwarded at once. Very wisely the customer declined to part with any more money, and he was then notified that both deals had been closed, and that he was indebted to Ellis in the sum of £9 2s. 6d., this adverse balance being due to the impudent inclusion of a contango item of £16 12s. 6d. In the contract notes and the account rendered Southern Pacifics were closed at 118¼, but Canadian Pacifics which had been opened on a 3 per cent. cover at 200 were coolly closed at 199½! It is obvious from the whole transaction that Ellis is a cover-snatching trickster of the worst type, and I have advised the customer to ignore any demands for the balance of £9 2s. 6d., for which, of course, he is not legally liable. My correspondent remarks that he would probably have been "deeper in the mire" if he had not happened to see a warning against Ellis in Truth soon after he forwarded him the £24. If he had become a reader of Truth a little earlier he would have been kept out of "the mire" altogether, for I cautioned the public against Ellis the moment he commenced business.

Ashton's Competition Flat-trap.

The new competition flat-trap of the Industrial Development Corporation (otherwise H. A. Ashton) is quite the most amusingly audacious thing of the kind that has been devised for a long time past. When I made a casual reference to it a few weeks ago the corporation had not divulged the details of the scheme, which it has now spread abroad by means of a lavish expenditure on newspaper advertisements, circulars, booklets, etc. Besides the £500 motor-car there are ninety-nine other prizes in the form of shares, making up a total distribution (as estimated by the corporation) of upwards of £5,000. Evidently conscious that this remarkable generosity needs to be "explained away" (his own incautious phrase), Ashton has compiled a special booklet, in which he compares the competition with the advertising schemes of soap manufacturers and other trading firms. Of course, the argument will only impress readers ignorant of the fundamental principle of the bucket-shop business. Trading firms seek customers to whom they can sell goods at a profit. Bucket-shops seek customers from whom they can win money in more or less foolish and one-sided gambles. Like many of the fraternity Ashton suggests that the corporation gets its own profit from "the jobber's turn" and from a commission "only charged on the net profit" made by the customer. All this is the veriest nonsense. In the cover transactions, which constitute its chief business, the bucket-shop simply bets with its customers and pockets what they lose, and if their losses were not on balance vastly in excess of their winnings the game would come to an end at once. It is this fact which makes this competition dodge a really brilliant conception from the corporation's point of view. To qualify as a competitor it is necessary to have at least three "speculative investments" with the corporation, and the prizes are to be awarded to those who receive back the largest amounts during an unknown period, the end of which will be fixed at the discretion of the corporation! In short, the usual illusory twaddle about probable profits is supplemented by the offer of the prizes as a further bait to lure simpletons into cover gambles in which they are pretty certain to lose their money. The real value of the prizes, which are to consist of shares, can perhaps be judged from the trick this bucket-shop has lately practised in connection with Wassau Bankets. These shares are practically unmarketable on the Stock Exchange at 3d. each, but the Industrial Development Corporation has been unloading them on greenhorns at 2s. 6d. and upwards on the impudent pretence that this is a special favour, and that they are actually "priced at 7s."

Schwindelfirma.

I am indebted to a reader at Zurich for a recent issue of a local journal called Sudafrikanische Minen Rundschau, whose existence is an indication of the extent and keenness of German interest in Kaffirs and Rhodesians. What has particularly attracted my notice in the paper, however, is an article on "Londoner Bucket-shops," which latter expression is tersely explained as "Englisch-Amerikänischer Ausdruck für Schwindelfirma." There are in London a considerable number of bucket-shop concerns whose business is mainly done on the Continent, and this article mentions half a dozen or so which the German public are specially advised to avoid. Some of these concerns are not unknown to me, and though they boast of English or Scottish names I think inquiry would show that they are run by foreigners. For that matter most of the City bucket-shops with similar names which practise their arts at the expense of the British public are likewise carried on by aliens.

African Amalgamated Lands.

In the early part of the year shares in a company styled the African Amalgamated Lands, Limited, were being peddled out by the bucket-shop keeper who trades as "Allison and Co., managers of the Anglo-American Investment Trust." The misguided buyers of these pieces of paper have lately received a remarkable communication from Mr. John W. Gallienne, who, writing from 57, St. Paul's Churchyard, in the capacity of managing director of the African Amalgamated, intimates that an action is being brought against Allison and Co. for the alleged non-fulfilment of their contract with the company. His version of the matter is that in order "to raise the flotation expenses" it was agreed that Allison and Co. should take up 25,000 vendors' shares of £1 each "at less than 2s. per share," but that although they succeeded in disposing of 21,000 at 6s. 8d. per share (there being 379 different purchasers) the company has not so far benefited from these sales. Hence the pending lawsuit, and for the purpose of obtaining funds, first, to fight the case, and, secondly, to advertise a prospectus, "which will ensure the provision of working capital,"

Mr. Gallienne invites the investors in the 21,000 shares at 6s. 8d to purchase a similar quantity at 3s. 4d. each. "The vendors," he says, "have generously placed at our disposal a further 21,000 shares," and by acquiring them at 3s. 4d. the patrons of Allison and Co. will average their holdings to 5s. per share and furnish the company with about £3,500. It seems to me that they will prove themselves doubly foolish if they do anything of the kind. Mr. Gallienne speaks of the company as having been registered on May 4 last, but it is only registered at Somerset House in the "abroad list," and such vague information as he has vouchsafed about "valuable concessions in the Gold Coast of West Africa containing rubber and mahogany in vast quantities and rich gold deposits" (!) is the reverse of satisfactory. Neither the names of his fellow-directors nor any other definite particulars about the company are given, and Mr. Gallienne's liberal proposal to throw in "by way of bonus" fifty shares "in a new West African rubber and timber and gold company which will be floated early in the New Year" is really, of course, another good reason for looking askance at African Amalgamated Lands.

"The Stock Exchange Year Book."

Mr. Thomas Skinner has sent me the new edition of that invaluable annual "The Stock Exchange Year Book," which, growing with the growth of joint stock enterprise, is now a portly volume of 2,580 pages. Particulars of nearly one thousand additional companies and loans have been included in this edition, and the work is, as usual, most carefully compiled as well as most comprehensive in its scope. It fully justifies the claim that its information embraces all the public securities and joint stock companies known to the markets of the United Kingdom. In the preface, in which he gives a brief review of the financial year, Mr. Skinner, who speaks with high authority, makes a notable observation upon the fall in Consols. "We are inclined," he writes, "to largely attribute it to the gradual breaking up of old trusts, with funds invested in British Government securities, and their re-employment, under the extended powers granted to trustees by the 1893 Act, in other high-class investments, yielding a better rate of interest than British funds." The price of the "Year Book" is 35s. net, and it is published by Mr. Skinner at 76-81, Gresham House, Old Broad Street, E.C.

"VIGILANT'S" LETTER BOX.

1. Inquiries addressed to me, which must be accompanied by a Coupon, can only be replied to through my "Letter Box." A coupon will always be found at the foot of the third page of the cover of Truth.

2. Three different stocks or shares are the limit for an inquiry covered by one coupon. If it is desired to make an inquiry respecting a larger number of stocks or shares an additional coupon or coupons (one for every three stocks or shares) must be forwarded. Inquiries in regard to Rubber shares must not be included in letters relating to other classes of securities.

3. Name and address, which must accompany all inquiries, should be written on the communication.

4. A nom-de-plume or initials (the former preferably) should be given if it is desired that the real name shall not appear in the paper.

5. Inquiries should be put as briefly as possible, plainly written and numbered. Correspondents should state whether or not they are holders of the securities upon which an opinion is desired.

6. Communications received after Friday may not be replied to in the following issue.

Mines.

Admiral.—Better sell on a moderate recovery.

Berry Head.—The shares appear to have fair lock-up chances, but there is not much of a market in them.

Doxton.—1. A fair speculation with a view to a rise when business becomes more active. 2. I am not attracted by them. 3. A hopeful speculative lock-up.

Holder.—The shares seem a fairly promising speculative lock-up.

I.O.U.—The output has been reduced, but this it is hoped will be only a temporary matter. A change of management has taken place, and providing, of course, that developments are not unfavourable the company should do better eventually. I would hold the shares rather than sell at the present low price.

Rex.—1. No. 2. A purchase would be an absolute gamble. 3. A fair speculation for a small profit.

W. E. N.—Thanks for the papers, which shall be returned later.

Mixed Securities.

Albemarle.—1. Midland deferred and Great Central 1891 preference are promising. 2. Argentine Navigation preference is cheap, also Mexican Railway first preference. Metropolitan Electric Trams 5 per cent. debenture stock is a sound 5 per cent. purchase.

Bishop.—1. The lottery is genuine, but the ticket touts often prove themselves to be unprincipled tricksters. You may be able to realise the Rhodesians to somewhat better advantage in course of the next week or two. The Railway market is a hopeful issue to put away for a year or so, but I would not continue carrying over.

Cadzow.—1. A hopeful speculative lock-up for dividends and possible appreciation. 2. I do not recommend a purchase. Cockscomb.—1. Thanks. 2. Some improvement in the mining sections named is not unlikely, but I cannot say whether they will "boom" in the near future. Tea shares have already improved. 3. Talked higher, but a purchase would be very speculative.

Guardian.—I would select Japanese and Russian Fours, Merchants Trust 4 per cent. debenture stock, and Canadian Pacific Preference.

Rechab.—Patent companies are notoriously risky investments. I cannot recommend the shares at present. Better await some commercial results.

R. W. G. B.—1. Anglo-Argentine Tramways 5 per cent. debenture stock. 2. British Insulated and Helsby Cables 5 per cent. debenture stock. 3. I do not recommend them. Revil.—1. Metropolitan Electric Trams 5 per cent. debenture stock, Royal Mail Steamship 5 per cent. debenture stock, and New York Telephone 4½ per cent. bonds. 2. Mexican first preference, Argentine Navigation preference, and Midland Railway deferred.

Trustee.—1. At present price better hold and await events. 2. The company has just entered the dividend list. See reference in my notes this week.

Xmas.—1. The shares look high enough. 2. Yes. 3. Argentine Navigation preference possesses scope for a levelling up.

Zosimus.—1. You could make a more attractive selection at present. 2. Hold, awaiting terms of the suggested amalgamation. 3. I do not look for any substantial rise in the stock at present.

Rubber.

Albion.—1. Sound, but the company is too heavily capitalised to promise any very great rise. 2. Bukit Mertajam is more moderately capitalised, and is a sound holding for steady appreciation. Aasham.—1. Cannot say until I see the prospectus. 2. Strathmore. 3. Quite right. Aletheia.—1. Is developing slowly. Instead of averaging, buy Taiping. 2. Worth holding. 3. Strathmore. Anxious (Dublin).—1. You would probably do better in the end by exchanging for Tremelbye. The company is now earning a satisfactory dividend, and should make substantial progress next year. 2. Hold Sumatra Para. Aaro...—A good list. Hold them all for substantial improvement. A. C. D.—A cheap share. Well worth holding.

Beppo.—1. Hold for 50s. Reinvest in a cheaper dividend-payer, such as Tremelbye, with a view to capital appreciation. 2. A good speculative holding which should improve in value. See my Notes. Buckingham.—1. Disregard the criticism. The property is sound and in good hands. Hold your shares. 2. Now producing in a small way, and dividends will be small for a year or two. Boor.—1. Strathmore is a Malayan company. Issued capital £37,620 now being increased to £50,000. Planted area 925 acres Para, including 400 planted in 1907. The position was examined in detail in Truth November 16. 2. Telogoredjo (Java). Issued capital £135,000. Planted area 6,000 acres, chiefly Ficus and Castilloa. Ballyverigan.—1. Hold Malacca. 2. See my Notes, and hold your shares. 3. Likely to improve after the holidays. Hold for 50s. Then re-invest in a cheaper share, such as Tremelbye. 4. The acreage valuation is high. Exchange for Strathmore.

Chob.—a. A very fair speculative holding. Instead of averaging, buy Taiping, now relatively cheaper. b. The company is now producing balata, but it would perhaps be as well to defer a further purchase until the cost of production has been definitely ascertained.

Dorchester.—Hold Malacca. The cost of production on No. 2 is higher than was anticipated. Exchange for Strathmore.

Erin.—A sound holding, and there is room for improvement. For present purchase I prefer Strathmore. Ena.—Hold Nos. 1, 2, and 6. As to No. 3, see third reply to "Ballyverigan." Exchange Nos. 4 and 5 for Strathmore.

Fairleigh.—One of the best of the Ceylon tea companies. Hold for a good profit in 1911. Finborough.—1 and 2. Kajang. 565 acres planted, 1,575 unplanted. 22 acres 4 years old; 35 acres 3; 37 acres 2½. 3. Capital authorised, £75,000; issued, £50,000; under option, £10,000. 4. Inch Kenneth management.

Hythe.—I quite agree. The argument has often been used in my Notes, and the suggested exchange is a good one.

J. B.—1. An outside broking concern. Do your business through a broker who is a member of the Stock Exchange. 2. A respectable company, but the shares have no particular attraction at present price.

Lossanna.—Strathmore. Present price represents roughly five years' estimated dividends.

Mooray.—A sound list. Hold for recovery. I see no reason for suggesting an exchange at present.

Noswad.—1. Speculative, but a further purchase to average should turn out well. 2. Tremelbye, Lumut and Strathmore. Nyassa.—1. There have been no difficulties of any serious character. Active arrangements for development are in progress. The shares are, of course, speculative, but a purchase to average is advisable. 2. A good speculative lock-up. The company has some promising business in hand. 3. An early dividend is expected. Hold for improvement.

Retreat.—Speculative, but there is a reasonable probability of their going higher. The estates are in Bahia. Write to the secretary at 30, Mincing Lane, E.C. Rougon.—Your attitude is reasonable. The fall in the price of rubber affected the company to an extent which was not foreseen, and sufficient allowance was not, I am afraid, made for initial difficulties. Recent progress has been satisfactory, and I look for a steady recovery in the quotation. Rialto.—Both shares are somewhat speculative, but should eventually do well. Hold them both. Regent.—1. A good purchase as a lock-up. Dividends will be small for a year or two. 2. A cheap Java share. Not first-class, but likely to improve in value. 3, 4, and 5. Yes. 6. Not overvalued at present price.

Soldier.—A purchase would involve some risk. Taiping would probably suit you better. Sailor.—1 and 2. Hold for steady appreciation. 3. Should earn a dividend in 1912. 4. Quite sound, and in very good hands. Staffie.—Nos. 1 and 2 are sound. No. 3 is promising, but more speculative. Instead of averaging, buy Taiping.

The Cause.—Strathmore. £1 shares. Now quoted at ½ premium. Truro.—A sound share. Add to your holding while the market is weak.

Zosimus.—1. The shares of the parent company are the better purchase. 2. I prefer Taiping. 3. Cheap at present price.

Miscellaneous.

A. B. K.—The low price is strange. Having regard to the fact that the purchase price was taken in cash, I do not feel overconfident about the concern, and would be inclined to sell.—Abner.—1. A good industrial, but do not put too much into any one share of the kind. Trade fluctuations have to be faced. 2. With a view to spreading risks select, say, Argentine Navigation preference. A Reader and Loser.—Of course, it would be throwing good money after bad to proceed against a trickster of this class, though the account rendered is obviously wrong in regard to the cover. See note in another column.

Cambridge.—The individual you name figures in the Truth Cautionary List; the company is a hopeless proposition. Canad.—I know nothing of the agency named. No doubt such investments can be advantageously made by people on the spot, possessing local knowledge, but it is quite another thing to purchase "town site" plots in Canada solely on the recommendation of those who are interested in selling them. That is, in fact, a most imprudent proceeding.

Gib.—1. Better hold and await developments. 2. Keep as an investment.

Lamb Ruin.—I am afraid the concern is hopeless. Whether you have any case for the return of your subscription is a matter upon which you must take legal advice, though unless your holding be fairly substantial, I question whether it would be worth while spending the money.

M. J. G. (Dublin).—It is fairly clear that you have no ground of action against the alleged buyer, and in the absence of a contract note it is doubtful whether you have one against the outside broker, but that is really a question for a solicitor. Whether the shareholders have any remedy is a matter upon which it is impossible to express a definite opinion without the full facts, but probably they have none. M. R. (Brighton).—I do not advise dealings with the firm or recommend the shares.

S. P. U.—It emanates from a bucket shop firm dealt with in last week's Truth. South Atlantic.—I was unable to carry out your suggestion, and, in any case, I fear that it would have been of little use for a few isolated shareholders to object.

Zabula.—1. A favourable statement was lately published, but I should certainly reduce the limit. 2. I rarely read it, but it is generally an ingenious mixture of good, bad, and indifferent. Obviously it is not advertised in the newspapers out of pure philanthropy, and, as you know, I recommend my readers to avoid all such outside concerns.

Owing to the Holidays, this issue of TRUTH has had to be sent to press earlier than usual, and at the same time the Christmas pressure on the Post Office has probably delayed the delivery of many of my letters. Replies to inquiries not dealt with above shall appear next week.

INSURANCE.

Law Car and General—Compulsory Winding Up—The Marine Insurance Business.

A MEETING of the shareholders of the Law Car and General was held last week, at which thirty-five of those present voted for a voluntary winding-up, and one hundred and forty were against this course, and apparently in favour of compulsory winding-up. The directors, however, had proxies for over 100,000 shares, and on a poll being taken proxies and votes representing 116,734 shares were in favour of voluntary winding-up, and 13,786 against. On the same day Mr. Justice Neville made an order for the compulsory winding-up of the company.

Sir Henry Cotton, the chairman of the company, addressed the shareholders, and the proceedings at this meeting deserve notice, as giving a good indication of how the company came to be in its present plight, and of the way in which the business of new and inferior companies is sometimes conducted. The chairman considered there was no need to go back beyond September 30, 1909, up to which date the last annual accounts were published. The chairman regarded these accounts as showing that the company was then in a most flourishing position, an opinion which I for one find it very difficult to share. The chairman added that "the directors honestly believed that the company was then in a most flourishing position, and they had no reason to form any different opinion until the spring of the current year. They then found that immense claims were falling in, mostly under the head of marine insurance." To a shareholder who said, "You were insolvent in March, when the last issue was made," Sir Henry Cotton replied, "At the time they issued the last prospectus the company was in a solvent and excellent position." The share prospectus was dated February 25, 1910, £1 shares being subscribed for at 30s., of which 5s. was payable on application, 10s. on allotment, and 15s. one month after allotment. "The spring of the current year" is a vague date; it may have been later than March 4, when the subscription list was closed, that the directors discovered some of the facts about the business they were supposed to be directing, but it was certainly very shortly after the fresh share capital was subscribed at a 50 per cent. premium that this belated discovery was made.

A shareholder said that in his opinion the directors were liable for the amount of money subscribed as capital on the last issue, inasmuch as there was no mention in the prospectus that the company were undertaking marine insurance. The accounts of the company for the year ending September 30, 1909, show that the premium income, less re-insurances, was £367,877; this item was not divided up in the statement of accounts issued to the shareholders, but the various classes of business had to be shown separately in the return to the Board of Trade. From these it appears that the premium income for the different classes of business for the two years 1908 and 1909 were as shown in the following table, which also gives the percentage of increase for 1909 over 1908.

When the last issue of share capital was made in March, the directors thought it advisable to mention in the prospectus that it was their intention to recommend the commencement of life assurance business, suggesting that the new share capital was required for this purpose, but they gave no hint that the chief feature of their business was the enormous increase of 265 per cent. in the amount of marine insurance, and the second most notable feature an increase of 75 per cent. in their employers' liability business, which also is of a hazardous nature and only too frequently unprofitable. Sir Henry Cotton said at the meeting that the directors found that a number of important treaties and contracts had been entered into by their managing director without the sanction of the directors. Doubtless these contracts referred in part to marine insurance, which was largely, if not entirely, carried out through brokers, who very shortly after the new share capital was subscribed put in a claim for a very substantial sum. Manifestly the directors must have been aware of the extent of their marine insurance business, since the returns to the Board of Trade up to September 30, 1909, were signed by three directors, and it can scarcely be supposed that they could see this marine business increasing far more rapidly than any other branch, and be aware that by September, 1909, it was their second largest department, without satisfying themselves as to the conditions under which it was being conducted and the nature of the contracts affecting it. Sir Henry Cotton went on to explain that the directors entered into negotiations for an amalgamation with one or other of four or five insurance companies, which, however, came to nothing. I have reasons for thinking that they could have obtained a substantial sum in cash had they decided wisely at the proper time. It will be remembered that they ultimately obtained an offer of payment in shares of another company, which offer was withdrawn a few days afterwards.

I am glad to see that the directors welcome the wish that an exhaustive and complete inquiry should be made, and the chairman hoped that the blame would be apportioned fairly; he added, "The directors were personally interested in the company, and, although somewhat to blame, their actions were perfectly clean, and they were prepared to justify themselves before any liquidator, or even at the Courts if necessary." I believe it is the fact that most, if not all, the directors are large shareholders in the company, and that some of them hold many shares, upon each of which only 1s. has been paid, leaving a liability of 19s. a share. There is a probability, therefore, that the failure of the company will involve the directors personally in heavy financial losses, quite apart from any possible results of proceedings to make the directors personally liable in connection with the issue of the last share prospectus, or for dividends paid, but not in fact earned, at which proceedings both the chairman and Mr. H. H. Wells, the vice-chairman, seemed to hint. I do not suppose any one will suggest lack of good faith and good intentions on the part of the directors, but I respectfully doubt whether this is all that should be demanded from a board of directors. Their names appeared on various prospectuses, they were recognised as men of some standing, and gave the company an air of respectability. Probably the bulk of the shareholders at the time they subscribed their money knew nothing at all about Mr. Fowler, who was appointed managing director for ten years, and who was apparently allowed by the board a free hand to do what he liked without any adequate control. It is a small matter that the directors drew their fees, but it is a big matter that through sheer ignorance, incompetence, lack of control, and the ignoring of expert advice when tendered to them, they have lost not merely their own money, but that of all the other shareholders who trusted them. This evil of directors who do not direct is far too prevalent; it would not be difficult to name several companies who stand a very good chance of finding themselves in a similar position to that of the Law Car. The case of this company is perhaps an exceptionally bad one, since the directors, when they knew the company was in difficulties, drifted, and hesitated, and muddled, when they might at least have minimised the disaster.

I have no consolation to offer to the shareholders, who must pay up, and who will probably take to heart a maxim I have long been preaching, which is to abstain from subscribing for shares in new insurance companies.

There is something of some use to be said to the policyholders; they are entitled to claim for the unexpired portion of their premiums. If they paid an annual premium three months before the commencement of the winding-up they are entitled to be entered as creditors for three-fourths of the premium paid; in any case they should at once effect insurance in some sound company, since they are no longer insured by the Law Car, even supposing the assets were sufficient to meet claims that might now arise. There is a further lesson for all policyholders, which is to shun all these newly established inferior concerns as they would the plague. Here and there one may succeed in the long run, but why bother with them? What is the use of saving a few shillings or a few pounds in premiums when buying insurance which is supposed to insure? People seem to forget entirely that the meaning of insurance is "making sure," and they do not come anywhere near making sure when they take policies in companies whose own future is at the best a toss-up, with the probabilities on the side of failure.

R. L. B.—The Association is sound, but I do not like the class of business it transacts. H. H. A.—I do not regard the company as one in which I can advise people to invest. You would do far better to obtain a slightly smaller return with better security. Jason.—The company you mention is, of course, quite sound, but you would do better with the Scottish Widows' Fund, Australian Mutual Provident, or United Kingdom Temperance. C. L. S.—Apply to the Atlas Assurance Company for particulars of double-endowment assurance; if this does not suit you write to me again. X. Z. Y.—Apply to the Eagle, North British and Mercantile, or English and Scottish Law Life. You would have to find at least two people who would guarantee the interest on the loan and the premium on the policy. M. D. C.—I do not recommend the company you mention. The advice given by the other office is perfectly sound. Your daughter should certainly wait. B. L. C.—If the companies I suggested will not do what you want, I am afraid no other company will, and your only chance would seem to be some underwriters at Lloyd's. Nemo.—The company is sound and respectable, and for the particular scheme you mention is about the best office there is, but I certainly should not advise you to take a policy that you do not want in the way that has been suggested. You can doubtless do business for them without any such condition.—Other answers to correspondents are unavoidably held over.

QUEER STORY.

LADY MAGGIE'S LEAP.

SUPERSTITIOUS, sir? Now there you 'ave me. Don't look like it, don't I? And yet—well, I s'pose every man's 'eard or seen summat 'e can't altogether explain, at one time or t'other. Fond of a yarn, are you? You be right welcome to mine, then, such as 'tis; though to tell 'ee the truth, I've given up mentioning it 'ereabouts, owin' to folks a-tappin' of their foreheads and a-shruggin' of their shoulders if I do. No man likes to be thought a fool, even at my age!

Do I ever go out with the 'ounds now? Lor' bless your 'eart, no! I 'aven't crossed a horse these twenty years. Oh, yes, I'm 'ale and 'earty enough, as far as that goes; but I shouldn't have the nerve for even a knacker's stud now-a-days. But I daresay you've 'eard, bein' a huntin' gent yourself, that in my prime I was whipper-in to Lord Daverell's pack, in the time of the late Earl's uncle; and though I say it, there's few could show you a straighter line from find to kill than Dick Rudd. . .

Bein' only a visitor to these parts, sir, I don't suppose you've ever 'eard tell of the Lady Margaret Daverell? "Darin' Daisy" folks called 'er behind 'er back—though I'm for respectin' the quality myself—and she's never been less than "Lady Maggie" to me—no, nor never will be. The Earl was a widower, and Lady Maggie being his only child was the mistress of Daverell. Sakes upon us! we'll never see her likes again in this country, or any other country, I'm thinkin'. 'Andsome, did you say? No, she wasn't 'andsome; Lady Maggie just wanted a word made on purpose to describe 'er. 'Andsome—beautiful—pretty—she was neither; and yet, she was all three, and more besides.

Good, sir? No, God forgive 'em! I don't think any of the Daverells was ever what you'd call good exactly—at least, not with no Bible-goodness. 'Aughty, they was, and overbearin', and reckless; never known to forget an insult, or to ask a pardon; and if once their pride was hurt they'd find a way to get even with the offender, if they went through 'ell-fire to do it. And Lady Maggie—she was just one of 'em. Yet she and me was very good friends. She'd got 'er fancies, and my little gal, as is dead and gone this thirty year, was one of 'em. Bless you, she'd sit up with that little creature (she was a cripple, my little girl) night a'ter night, when the pain was at its worst, and never take a thank you for it. And yet I couldn't call her a good woman, though perhaps I might where another couldn't.

But she come as nigh perfection in one particular thing as any one did in this world. She sat a 'orse as I've never seen no woman sit afore and as I never expect to see no woman sit again. You see, she sprang of an amazin' tough race. I've 'eard there 'adn't been a Daverell for generations who 'adn't been first in everything rough an' tumble, from a civil war to a tavern squabble. And my lady herself was just as full of mettle as a clean-bred two-year-old, and there being no civil wars or such like that she could mix herself up with, she chucked 'erself 'eart and soul into the excitement of fox-hunting. It was a real pleasure only to see 'er mounted. She seemed to grow in her saddle, bless you! And to watch 'er jump nasty bits that most people wouldn't look at—jump 'em just to shame the more timid ones—well, it fairly give you the creeps along your backbone.

Lady Maggie was cold by nature, but she had her idols, and 'er 'ome was one of 'em. She worshipped it with a wild kind of passion that was part of 'er. And no wonder, for it's a grand old place, and she'd always been brought up to believe that it was hers for as long as she should want a home at all. But one summer a lot of curious happenin's come along, a treadin' on each other's 'eels. First of all, the Earl died, quite sharp and unexpected, and then, just when everything was settled and his affairs straightened out, came a strange lawyer's letter to Lady Maggie a-laying claim to the entail for no less a one than a nephew of Lord Daverell's—when she didn't even know that such a person existed. . .

At first she just laughed at it, for 'er father never 'ad no more than one brother—older than 'isself, and no sister at all, and the brother was a ne'er-do-well who 'ad drunk hisself to death as a youth. But by-and-by things began to look a bit nasty, for it turned out that this same brother, lad as 'e was, had really married in Paris—lawfully married some low French play actress. He died six months afterwards, and the Frenchwoman never found out who 'er son was till 'e was a man grown. When this came out Lady Maggie stopped laughin', and she threw back her 'ead and flashed her eyes instead, for by-and-by it was all proved straight and right in open court.

There's an old saying that the Daverells were three-parts pluck and one pride, and it's not far short of the truth. Look 'ee, sir, what it must have meant to the young thing, brought up in the lap of luxury, as she was, to find herself, all in a moment, with nothing left but a little bit of money that she'd come into from her mother—for everything being entailed went with the property. But whatever she felt, bein' true to 'er name, she never let a body so much as guess at it.

To every one's surprise, tho' she moved out of 'er own 'ome directly the new cousin's claim was made good, she didn't leave the place altogether. She took a small house at the top of the village. I fancy she must 'ave sold a lot of 'er trinklets, for she went about very plainly dressed. But she stuck to one luxury—perhaps she went short in other ways to do it—she still kept her favourite hunter, Demon, sending him to a livery stable in the town.

Pretty soon rumours got around that the new cousin was a-going to take possession in the fall, and nice goin's on there was about it in the village. For though Lady Maggie wasn't popular, folks was used to 'er, and they didn't fancy a Frenchman instead. So they were very angry and very curious, too, and there was nothing else talked about for long enough. "He'll be here for the first meet of the season," people said, for everything has happens in this place is dated by the huntin' fixtures, as none knows better than yourself. And, sure enough, havin' learnt on the quiet, I s'pose, what they expected of him, he did arrive—the very day before.

There was a tremendous field for the occasion. Every man, woman, and child a'most turned out on summat or other. Ever since her father's death Lady Maggie had been "Master o' 'ounds" by common consent, and there she was a-sittin' Demon like some splendid disdainful statute. As for me, sir, I'd got Jacob and Esau fairly in my head, and I couldn't hardly crack a whip for wondering what the meetin' of them two would mean. Lord! Lord! Lord! shall I ever forget the stir as ran through the field when the new Earl arrived. You could almost feel it. He was a bit late to begin with, an' that flustered him, I reckon, and, anyways—well, sir, he weren't all English, though there was English blood in his veins, and his ridin' weren't English ridin.' In fact I don't think he 'ad much more than a nodding acquaintance with a 'orse till that there morning—unless it might a been inside of a French ridin' school. And in a place like Daverell, where well nigh every one—noble and simple—springs out o' their cradles into the saddle and back from their saddles into their coffins—he didn't make a good impression.

Beyond givin' 'im a distant bow I don't think my lady took any notice of 'im at all. But 'e stared at 'er, sir, more than once when we was drawing cover—as most men did in spite of 'er 'aughty ways. As for 'imself, I never was good at describing a face, and I'm blessed if I could give my missus any account of 'im when I got 'ome, which aggrawated her considerable. But he wasn't no ordinary man, that I do know. 'Is skin was clear and palish, and 'is eyes were soft and dark and a bit sad-looking, like a tired woman's, and under 'is small moustache 'e 'ad very white teeth, more like a woman's again. He wasn't a Daverell, being altogether foreign in build and shape, and yet there was a something about him, too, as was familiar. P'raps it was a trick 'e 'ad of cocking back 'is 'ead when 'e spoke, which was like 'is uncle.

All the field 'cepting her ladyship was a smiling inside theirselves at his awkward seat and his mount, which some bla'guard horse dealer must 'ave palmed off on his inexperience as the very article to put before a set of critics like the Daverell Hunt.

By-and-by, after a longish delay, we got off on terms with a tricky little vixen. She made towards Barrows Hollow—you know it, sir—and we made arter 'er. The French earl 'e scrambled along with us somehow, lookin' the strangest, clumsiest figure you ever did set eyes on. I think he was a trying to remember all that 'e mustn't do. In the intervals when he wasn't a wrestling with 'is 'orse, they told me afterwards he was a gazing dazed like at 'is cousin. It was a fastish bit of running, but nothing extra exciting, and, to cut this part of my tale short, the Frenchman made a regular downright exhibition of hisself—got off for every jump, even little hedges what a Shetland would have winked at, and led his 'orse through gates in a place like this where straight riding is a point of 'onour. It tried the patience of the best of 'em.

By Dibley's Mill we got a check, when up he comes last of the field, white and miserable-looking—how 'e'd ever kept up at all nobody knows. He was pretty well shaken to death. We were all in a close group looking out for the next move, when Lady Maggie, her cheeks scarlet with fury, rode suddenly up to her cousin and looking at him set and square between the eyes, she cried in a voice so loud and angry and slow that the whole field couldn't be off hearing, "It's hard to give up one's birthright, but it's harder still to give it up to a—a coward." And then before anyone could so much as gasp, she raises her whip and cuts him straight across the face with all the strength of her arm. Sakes alive, sir, that was a moment! It was like the quivering pause 'afore an earthquake. I believe we well-nigh, hounds and all, forgot the vixen. It seemed as if 'orses and riders were paralysed, a-waiting breathless for what was to happen next.

Every eye was on the Frenchman. What did he do, sir, did you say? He just did—nothing. 'E only went a shade whiter, and the big weal showed up across 'is face, like a sign as was to cut him off from 'is own for ever. He seemed kind of bewildered, as if 'e didn't rightly understand, and then slowly such a look came a flashing into his dark eyes as told us that, even in Paris, they know the meaning of Lady Maggie's word, and they don't fancy it neither. There weren't so much anger or shame in his face as a furious determination—a sort o' set purpose if you mark me. He gazed at his cousin for an instant, and—all noticed that in that instant the two faces looked exactly alike. Then he cocked his head back and his eyes flashed, and without a word to her—he just glanced round at the field. "I beg your pardon, ladies and gentlemen," he said, in his foreign English. His face changed back to the Frenchman's face once more. He raised his 'at and turned 'is horse's 'ead round and rode slowly away, leaving us all 'cepting 'er ladyship, whose face was still aflame, to feel somehow small and foolish.

Now comes the odd part of my story, and as like as not you'll tap your forehead when I tell you, sir. Whether 'e couldn't meet folks after that terrible moment with his cousin, or whether it was on account of his cousin herself, I can't say, but the new Earl went off at once to India for a visit, leaving Daverell to itself. And so it fell out that we 'eard nothing of 'im all the following spring and summer, and there came the first meet late the next autumn—just a year had gone by, you see. Again there was a biggish field, and again Lady Maggie was there on Demon. But she'd changed, sir, oddly changed. All the spirit had gone out of her, and she looked pale and tired. Perhaps she'd seen her mistake too late, and was just lonely for one of her own kith and kin, even if 'is mother had been a play actress.

Anyhow you can fancy my amazement when, as we waited to start to cover, who should canter up, late as before, but no less a person than the Earl hisself. I was struck all of a heap, for we fancied him thousands of miles away. He was settin' a magnificent dun mare—a mare, mind 'ee, that gave 'erself all the airs and graces of a teasin' lass, and was as full of blood as an egg of meat. Yet there he was as much at home on her as any Daverell as ever I watched—and that's sayin' a deal. I felt a feelin' of triumph, sir, a feelin' of triumph, and I kep' repeatin' and repeatin' over in a whisper to myself, "He's found his seat, and he's found his pluck, and he's come back to show us what's what—has the Frenchman."

I saluted him, of course, but it struck me as rum that no one else so much as gave him good morning, nor they didn't seem surprised to see him neither, which was more curious still But when Lady Maggie saw him she flushed suddenly, and I thought for the first time in her life she looked scared. Without looking right or left the Earl rode straight to her side. What he said I couldn't hear, for just then I had to be off with the hounds; but his eyes—they looked blacker than ever, sir—seemed to challenge her.

Ah, well, it's no good a-dwelling on the events of that run, for I've done it at times till I'm brain giddy and not a bit less puzzled do I get. All I will say is that it was a quick find, and the fox carried us off across a good open country at first, and the field was soon in full cry. From the very beginning, sir, the Frenchman led, closely followed by Lady Maggie, and with me almost beside 'em. I don't know how it was, but I had an odd feeling that I mustn't let 'em out of my sight. So there I found myself, with one eye on the hounds and one eye on them, a-goin' at a pace I'd never known in forty years. There! It wasn't hunting—not for us three leastways—it wasn't hunting at all. We kep' to no rules, and we heeded nothing. It was just a sickenin' mad steeplechase from the first between the two cousins, each trying to outdo the other. In next to nothing we'd left the field—even the smartest riders—far behind. On we went—on and on. The scent was red hot and the hounds were going at full tilt and silent as the dead. There was some fine jumping ahead, and it 'peared to me that the Earl's pace got more crazy each minute. If he seemed to pause and Lady Maggie got past him and leapt a high hedge, he'd pick his bit where the hedge was a bit blind or higher and fly it, smiling a mocking sideways smile as he overtook her in a way that someway made me feel cold inside.

By-and-by my lady began to pant—I'd never heard her pant before, but she was panting now—loud and painfully, and her eyes seemed to be starting mad like out of her head as they strained after her cousin. "Lady Margaret!" I holloaed out, pulling myself together as well as I could, "this pace ain't fit for a lady, ma'am. Let his lordship go on alone." But, lor, she never heeded me—never heeded me at all.

You know "Lady Maggie's Leap," sir, bein' a hunting gent yourself; but maybe you don't know why it is so called. It's just in the middle of that stone wall as divides two fields midway between here and Sibwell. There's a nasty bit of a quarry on the Sibwell side. They use it now and then on account of the value of the stone, so they are obliged to keep it open; but the wall, which is all loose rough stone, is made high on purpose to inform new hands what don't know the country and to remind old 'uns, too, of the danger. What was my feelin's then when I sees the Earl a-heading straight for the very worst bit, exactly where the quarry lay! Now, no human mare that was ever foaled could clear that, I knew, and that no one had ever dreamt of tryin' it I knew likewise. It was suicide—simple suicide—and murder, too, into the bargain. My head began to swim and my mouth got dry. I drove my spurs into poor old Don till he fairly bounded into the air. "To your left," I bellowed, thinking the Frenchman couldn't see the danger. "Turn her to your left, for God's sake, or 't's certain death!" But, bless yer, I might have spoken to the wind. At the pace he was goin' he could not have stopped the mare supposin' he'd been wishin' to do so. Even as I shouted he was already there, putting the dun at the wall as if it was a simple four-footer. I sent up a kind of prayer in my 'eart that she'd refuse it, but she didn't. She just did what no mare of flesh and blood has ever done—no, nor ever will do. She rose and soared it like a swallow. It was an uncanny sight, and a shiver ran through my poor Don from head to tail. I just saw the smoke from the dun mare's nostrils and caught the look his lordship threw over his shoulder and 'eard 'im laugh, and then I really did go sheer off, I think, and something in my head seemed to snap, and I laughed with him. For it wasn't the Frenchman any more; it was the Daverell's face—white and set and grinning like a death's head, and right across it from the brow to the chin had come up all suddenly a great, hideous red weal. It hadn't been there when we started—the weal—that I could swear. The taunting laugh—the scorn in the grinnin' face—I knew what they meant, though my head was swimming. I knew what they meant now. He'd come to taunt Lady Maggie on to her doom—she who'd never owned herself beaten by any one. She was close behind him, for she had lost control of Demon altogether now, and I was near on her 'eels. And suddenly I felt myself a-goin', sir, with the horror of it all; I d just sense left to turn Don sideways, and then I must have pitched off insensible.

Did Lady Maggie follow, sir? Merciful God, she did! When I came to, there was blood on the wall where her poor head had struck, for she must have been jerked off her saddle as Demon rose and carried her over hanging by her habit. No, of course, no living rider could 'a' done it—every one said afterwards. Yes, sir, poor Lady Maggie was stone dead when I got to her, with her beautiful head crushed like an eggshell—an awful sight! Demon, too, was dead—his back was broken.

The Earl? Ah! he was nowhere to be seen. Some long time after we 'eard o' 'is death—'e'd won a big steeplechase in India, and 'is 'orse had thrown 'im at the winning post. That was strange, wasn't it? And it's still stranger that it must have been, as near as I could make out, at about the very identical time as he led Lady Maggie in that mad, awful rush to destruction. Of course, not a soul believed me afterwards about 'is hunting with the Daverell pack on the day Lady Maggie met her death. Some say she just tried the leap out of bravado—some say the loss of Daverell turned her brain, and she was mad. Mad she may have been at the end, but she was sane enough when we met that morning, and lesser sights have turned a brain than what she saw, poor soul! Ah! well—ah! well.

BOOKS.

LORD ROSEBERY'S "Chatham" (1) gives you an extraordinarily vivid portrait of its hero and picture of his times. Such times! Abroad we spent millions of money in subventions and thousands of men in the field for what?

"Why that I cannot tell," said he,
But 'twas a famous victory."

Leslie Stephen, as quoted approvingly by Lord Rosebery, speaks of "that complicated series of wars which lasted some ten years and passes all power of the ordinary human intellect to understand or remember. For what particular reason Englishmen were fighting at Dettingen or Fontenoy or Lauffield is a question which a man can only answer when he has been specially crammed for examination, and his knowledge has not begun to ooze out." To be sure, these Continental entanglements were part of the big price we had to pay for the Hanoverian succession, since the first and second Georges exploited England for the benefit of their beloved Hanover in every possible way and on every possible occasion. They detested England with a detestation which was heartily reciprocated, but this mutual detestation paled its ineffectual fire before the hatred of England for the Stuarts. Indeed, Lord Rosebery makes English endurance of these Georges the measure of our national horror of Popery. How we must have hated Popery, he says, in explanation of our endurance of the Georges. Indeed I might say that we endured them for a like reason to that O'Connell assigned for siding with one of the two English parties. "I support the Whigs," he said, "for the same reason that the Kerry omedhawn stuck his caubeen into a broken pane, not to let in the light but to keep out the rain." George II. naturally enough, as Lord Rosebery admits, knowing that he was endured in England only as the less of two insupportable evils, and that he would continue to be endured so long as the greater evil of the two—the restoration of the Stuarts—was the sole alternative possible, was lavish of English blood and treasure in the interests, or the supposed interests, of the only country he cared for—Hanover. "It is now too apparent," cried Pitt in Parliament in the days when it appeared to him to be to his political advantage to beard the King, "that this powerful, this great, this mighty nation is considered only as a province to a despicable electorate and that, in consequence of a plan formed long ago and invariably pursued, these Hanoverian troops are hired only to drain us of our money." But the payment of Hanoverian troops was the least of the drain due to the Continental complications in which this "despicable electorate" involved us. It is sickening to read of the wicked waste of British blood and treasure in causes wherein we had no conceivable interest, and for kings who detested us and whom we detested with equal intensity. "One may wonder in passing," says Lord Rosebery, "at the callous wickedness that sent out raw boys and decrepit pensioners to die of fever and exhaustion, or at the strange fortune by which those who prepare such expeditions—ministers, commissaries, contractors and the like—escape the gallows." Escape the gallows! They were all enriched or ennobled. For while England abroad was bled white in these senseless wars, at home she was preyed upon by a host of crawling parasites. For England could not transfer all her parasites—as she did most of them—in those days to Ireland. Everyone then that could be was put upon the Irish pension list, I suppose upon the principle of the inelegant Spanish proverb, "The starved cat is all fleas," or upon the principle which makes the rich Buddhist, whose religion forbids him to kill his fleas, transfer these creatures to the body of a poorer brother. Pitt's own sister, Ann, was placed by Lord Bute on the Irish pension list for £1,000 a year—for what conceivable service to that or any other country? Pitt himself shared for a short time with Walpole's son-in-law the sinecure place of Vice-Treasurership of Ireland, and the appointment was aptly celebrated in a contemporary poem:—

"Hibernia smile
Thrice happy isle.
On thy blest ground
Twelve thousand pound
For Stanhope's found,
Three thousand clear
For Pitt a year.
So shalt thou thrive
Industrious hive,
While these and more
Increase thy store!"

That greedy, arrogant, and despicable gang, the Grenvilles, with whom Pitt was politically associated in the years of his struggle for power, drew in such sinecures as the Irish Tellership of the Exchequer—"a place of vast emolument"—nearly a million of money in half a century. "Nor was it need that drove them thus to live upon the public, for the private wealth of the family was commanding. Richard Grenville, by the death of his mother, was said to have become the richest subject in England, and as time went on his possessions swelled and swelled." The truth is in those days these gangs, or gangs hardly less despicable, held the whole country in the hollow of their hands. "In some Continental countries," says Lord Rosebery, "a general election always returns a ministerial majority; there are mysteries connected with the proceeding of which only ministers have the key. This to some extent was the case of England at this period." Every man, whether voter or member, had his price, and the price having been paid, they delivered the goods, that is the country, into the hands of such a gang as that of the Pelhams or of the Grenvilles, who could recoup themselves by sinecures, etc., for what the corruption of the House or of the constituencies had cost them. It was the most vicious of vicious circles from which in those days there seemed no escape. Pitt certainly did not escape from it, nor from the taint of years of political alliance with these unscrupulous and greedy Grenville intriguers. "On all that sordid scramble for place and power he kept," says Lord Rosebery, "the fierce, unflinching eye of a hawk, and of a hawk fastened by the talon." In fact, of the three methods described by Swift in the "Voyage to the Houyhnhnms," "by which a man may rise to be chief minister," Pitt chose the second and third. "The second by undermining his predecessor; and the third by a furious zeal in public assemblies against the corruptions of the court." "Then these men, having become ministers," adds Swift, "and having all employments at their disposal, preserve themselves in power by bribing the majority of a senate or great council." Do you wonder that Burke should describe the politics of days near these and like these as "always connected with the ideas of cruelty, tyranny, treachery, and fraud"? It is unfortunately with these early days alone of his crawl or climb to power that Lord Rosebery has to do in this admirable volume, and if you are more disgusted than edified by his methods, it is the time rather than the man that is to blame.

What Lord Rosebery says of Pitt's self-advertisement, "his was a real but not a retiring purity; a white column rather than a snowdrop," is, as Mr. Norwood Young shows in his "The Growth of Napoleon" (2), more true of that demiurge than perhaps of any other great man that ever lived. No doubt Napoleon owed much to brazen self-advertisement, but it is upon his debt to his environment that Mr. Norwood Young chiefly dwells, at least in the early part of his suggestive book. Towards the close he crowds together such a host of favouring circumstances and conditions to account for the supremacy of Napoleon that you begin to think his genius might be left altogether out of the account! Indeed, Mr. Norwood Young is so little of a Bonapartist that he regards the industrious biographer and disparager of Napoleon, Dr. Holland Rose, as "a great admirer of the superhuman hero"! You see that "The Growth of Napoleon" will grate upon hero-worshippers, but it will be an invaluable help to those who wish to see the men and matters of that stupendous era in their true perspective.

For myself I prefer the advocatus dei view of a delightful book I have just laid down, Mr. Charles Warwick's "Napoleon and the End of the French Revolution" (3), to Mr. Norwood Young's advocatus diaboli estimate of the man of destiny as a resultant product of environment, opportunity, and luck generally. Read both books and you will be in the best possible position to decide whether Napoleon was right or wrong in his own estimate of his life. "It would have been better for the repose of France that Rousseau had never been born." "Why, First Consul?" asked Stanislas Girardin. "Because he prepared the French Revolution." "Surely it is not for you to complain of the Revolution?" "Well, the future will show whether it would not have been better for the world that neither I nor Rousseau had existed." What will especially delight you in Mr. Warwick's book are the many and admirable illustrations from the collection of engravings and etchings belonging to Mr. Latta, of Philadelphia, from original sketches, hitherto unpublished, made by artists contemporary with Napoleon.

The illustrations by Mr. Thomas Fogarty are not the least of the charm of Mr. Le Gallienne's very slight but very bright "October Vagabonds" (4). It is the story of a tramp towards New York with "Colin," whose breakdown interrupted the romantic journey, but not at the cost of the illustrations, which surely are by "Colin." Mr. Le Gallienne occasionally and happily drops into poetry, but the drop is not far, since his prose is hardly less poetic.

Mr. William Caine's "The Revolt at Roskelly's" (5) and Mrs. Barclay's "The Mistress of Shenstone" (6) have one thing only in common—in each case a nobleman incog. plays a principal part. In "The Mistress of Shenstone" the heroine also is incognita, and this and her furiously striking the hero with a fan are the only original things in a commonplace story. On the other hand, "The Revolt at Roskelly's" is the reverse of commonplace, being a thoroughly Christmas story, admirably and humorously told, of snobbery brought to confusion.

DESMOND O'BRIEN.

The end of the year always brings for review the biggest book in the form of "The Post Office London Directory" (price 40s.). For 1911 it runs to over 3,500 pages, yet it contains not a superfluous word, but is, on the contrary, a masterly example of conciseness, setting forth an incalculable multitude of facts—its rigid adherence to hard facts would have gladdened the heart of Mr. Gradgrind—in the briefest form and classifying them in the most skilful way for ready reference. Most works of reference have competitors, but Kelly enjoys a supremacy which it would be vain for any one to challenge so long as he maintains his own high standard of efficiency and accuracy. Besides this monumental volume the wonderful organisation of Kelly's Directories, Limited, produces a number of other well-known annuals. Here, for instance, is "Lodge's Peerage, Baronetage, and Knightage," which has long been a standard work, the present being the eightieth edition. One of its special features is the fulness of its information—including armorial bearings, lineage, and collateral branches—in reference to baronets, and considering the handsome style in which it is turned out the price of one guinea, at which this annual of 2,408 pages is issued, is surprisingly low. Another of the same firm's publications is "Kelly's Handbook to the Titled, Landed, and Official Classes" (price 15s.), which is now in its thirty-seventh year. It has been carefully revised, and now contains about 30,000 brief biographical notices of persons included in the classes described in its title.

Lord Rosebery recently declared that the House of Lords is dead—dead, that is to say, as an hereditary Legislature. This was decidedly premature, and now some champions of the still living institution are exhorting it not to commit suicide even if its resistance should involve the actual creation of five hundred new peers. Let us hope it will not come to that. For one reason, imagine how shocking it would be to see volumes sacred to the old nobility profaned with the names and pedigrees, if they could be traced, of these five hundred intruders. One shudders at the bare thought of such a desecration of the pages of that famous work "Burke's Peerage, Baronetage, and Knightage" (Harrison and Sons, price £2 2s.). In his preface to the new issue the editor, Mr. Ashworth P. Burke, makes a dignified allusion to the question of the reform of the House of Lords. "The hereditary principle," he writes, "has, we are told, been surrendered in a great measure, yet it will be difficult for constitution-makers to devise a second chamber whose members could rival in independence, personality, services, and qualifications those who now sit and vote in the House of Lords. Nothing in any case can destroy the glorious traditions which the present peers directly represent." Every one recognises the comprehensiveness and accuracy of "Burke" as a genealogical and heraldic history of titled families, and the new edition—the seventy-third—gives the usual carefully revised guide to relative precedence.

"Debrett's Peerage, Baronetage, Knightage, and Companionage" (Dean and Sons, Ltd., price 31s. 6d. net) is the oldest of all such volumes. Since John Debrett, the publisher, of Piccadilly, first gave his name to the work it has seen the reigns of six British sovereigns, four coronations, and the whole of the twenty-nine Parliaments which have sat since the union with Ireland took place. "Debrett," in fact, is a venerable institution, but one which is kept thoroughly up to date, with the result that it can always be relied upon for complete and correct information regarding the thousand and one matters for which it is constantly consulted. The volume is illustrated with no fewer than 1,800 armorial bearings, and among the contents is a brief description of the ceremony of the coronation.

"Who's Who" (Black, 10s. net) has this year grown to a volume of 2,246 pages, packed, of course, with pithy biographies of everybody who is anybody. It is an invaluable—for many purposes, indeed, an indispensable—work of reference. The same publishers issue "The Writer's and Artist's Year Book" (1s. net), which is particularly useful to contributors, or would-be contributors, to the press.

Messrs. Cassell and Co., who have been for many years the sole publishers of the original "Letts's Diaries," have again issued an ample variety of these well-known diaries. They are procurable in sizes and shapes to suit every taste and purpose, and with each diary is given an accident insurance coupon for £1,000.

The "Onoto" diaries, published by Messrs. Thomas De La Rue and Co., include some particularly dainty specimens, which can be carried easily in the waistcoat pocket. An accident insurance coupon is supplied with each diary.

ORIGINAL PRINTS AT MESSRS. OBACH'S.

IN spite of the many facilities for picture reproduction at the present time, in spite of the fact that great masters are in a sense available to any one of moderate financial status, there are many reasons why an exhibition of original prints by old masters, such as that now at Messrs. Obach's, provides a sense of unmitigated pleasure such as is lacking in the others.

The truth is that the whole charm of black and white lies in its severity and reticence; the beholder is allowed free play of imagination and for the time is freed from compulsory colour obligations. To look at black and white in the most profitable and delightful way is easier than to look at both form and colour in a similar way. The modern reproduction, or even original, however, because of its greater mechanical facilities of every kind, is apt to attempt too much. The suggestion of colour—in prints as well as in the soft monotone reproductions—is not only confusing, but it spoils the true colour sense. I have known visitors to picture galleries who, having admired a particular picture in, say sepia, found the original "crude" and "harsh" in colour. With the prints of the old masters such as Dürer, Rembrandt, Cranach, such confusion of ideas is impossible, because these masters recognised at once the extent and the limitations of black and white work whatsoever.

One of the most interesting of the prints from a personal point of view is "La Gloire couronnant la Vertu" of Tiepolo. Here the etcher could hardly be mistaken by the veriest tiro, so entirely does he retain the ultra-dramatic convention of his painting. Another peculiarly personal woodcut is Lucas Cranach's "St. John the Baptist Preaching." Here you can see the slightly awkward and wholly delightful girlish figure, which no doubt inspired in Aubrey Beardsley some of his best work. Cranach, working in the fifteenth and sixteenth century, was a realist of the realists while painting a naïve but real beauty, instead of the studied ugliness that so often passes for realism. "Le Tombeau d'un Evêque," by Antoine Canale, has all the spaciousness and rich brightness of his work; Lucas van Leyden and A. Van Everdingen are also well represented. The body of the exhibition consists, however, of a number of Rembrandt prints, including the famous "Three Trees" and "The Portrait of the Burgomaster Jan Six," and Dürer prints, including the great "Adam and Eve." In others you can study the wonderful effects gained by Rembrandt by his omissions—the unfinished, so-called, portion of the "Faust," for instance. These are prints rather to be seen than to be written about.

The Leicester Gallery Exhibition of "Water-Colour Drawings of Majorca and Minorca" shows that for full appreciation Mr. Anning Bell should be compared only with himself, and, further, that he might with advantage devote a good deal more time to landscape painting. In such beautiful, imaginative works as "Port Mahon" or "The Mills of Palma in Summer" there is such complete absence of the self-consciousness that sometimes attaches to his classic nymphs as to make them pure joy both to look at and to possess. "The Meeting of the Virgin and St. Anne" has caught some of the old Italian piety, and, while derived somewhat from his nymphs, has more point or purpose. In "The Great Cloud" you get both elements—the hurrying figures and the naturalistic and wholly charming little boy. It is not only the small number of exhibits that lend to Mr. Anning Bell's work a pleasing sense of rarity. At the same exhibition may be seen Mr. Edmund Dulac's rather florid illustrations to "The Sleeping Beauty" and other fairy-tales. Mr. Dulac places no confidence at all in the imagination of his beholders. But in telling them everything he fails in such points as lending his Bluebeard Fatima anything like the necessary suggestion of fear. One of the best of these drawings is the back-view of all the company returning to the Royal Palace. In the next room may also be seen Mr. Arthur Rackham's illustrations to some of the Ring. On the whole, I much prefer Mr. Rackham in the less terrific story, such, for instance, as "Peter Pan" or "Grimm's Fairy-Tales." In the Ring his delightful humour has less scope, and here his best pictures are in lighter vein—the Rhine-Maidens teasing Alberich, the pretty Freia tending the golden apples of everlasting youth. "The Valkyrie" displays all Mr. Rackham's skill, but, for the same reason, has much less of his charm.

Of the various exhibitions at the Baillie Gallery, Mr. Norman Wilkinson's "Cotswold Landscapes" strike the most wholly satisfactory note, and of these eight I prefer the rich tone of the two tempera paintings. Mr. Wilkinson has not only in a small way hit upon something new, but it is difficult to imagine his subjects in any other medium. The shadows on the Down above "Nailsworth," the evening glow light on "Minchhampton Common" are wonderfully pleasant truths. Mr. Wilkinson is also showing some effective flower-painting.

At the same gallery Miss Jessie Bayes is exhibiting some gorgeous paintings and illumination, "The Battle of Beaucaire," showing an excellent sense of design. The one drawback to this kind of work is the difficulty of realising its particular function, except as a somewhat self-conscious revival. To say that the age of faith is passed, were, in these days of every kind of credulity, no doubt a half-truth, but if Miss Bayes succeeds in divesting her beautiful work—and incidentally that of possible other artists—of the museum-and-glass-case suggestion she will have performed a greater service even than in producing it.

Professor Unno Bisei, of Tokio, is also showing excellent fish and flowers at the Baillie Gallery, Mr. Frank Galsworthy some water-colours of the "Loire," and there is the usual exhibition of quaint toys, upon the anatomy of which learned professors have exercised their cunning.

At Carfax Gallery Miss Vera Waddington is showing some unusually clever Chinese studies, and her gift of characterisation is amply supported by her admirable drawing. Whether in studies of ordinary Chinese characters—"A Young Mandarin," the "Scholar," or the "Singing Girl"—whether in the admirable suggestion of pose that seems to affect Chinese actors as well as our own, Miss Waddington has in each case attempted something well within her power, and has produced it with exquisite sympathy and humour.

MUSIC.

A LETTER of complaint about the libraries, otherwise the theatre ticket agencies, is common form at this time of the year. Paterfamilias wants some tickets for a play or a pantomime, and on applying at the box-office finds all the best places gone, and has to go to Bond Street, where he has to pay a premium on each. He takes the tickets, and then writes a furious letter of complaint to the Times. Agents who put up prices like this, wrote one complainant the other day, are not agents at all, but principals; and a second correspondent was quick to back him up: "In no other business with which I am acquainted does the agent make the customer pay extra for the privilege of dealing with him." If, the writer continued, managers find it convenient to sell blocks of seats to the agencies they should sell them at a discount enabling them to be resold without extra charge to the public.

But this is just what managers do. Libraries buy their seats at a discount and charge a premium on their face value as well, and, of course, they are quite entitled to do this. The truth would seem to be that the function of the libraries is often misunderstood. Certainly many fail to realise what an important part these establishments play in the entertainment business of to-day. There is no obligation to patronise the libraries, but for those who need their offices they are very useful institutions, and considering the extremely speculative nature of their business their charges, as a rule, can hardly be considered excessive. The point to be borne in mind is that, though they usually get their seats at a discount, they have to take them outright and pay for them whether they re-dispose of them or not. No wonder, therefore, that when the demand justifies the step they put their prices up. It is the only way in which they can recoup themselves for their losses on those unsold. Also they have very frequently to allow long credit.

There is another aspect of the matter sometimes overlooked. The libraries are not only a convenience to the public, but also of material assistance to the theatres. They play, in fact, the part of underwriters, and it is easy to understand their usefulness in this respect to the entrepreneur. Thus when Mr. George Edwardes produces a new piece at the Gaiety or Daly's he will have sometimes as much as £10,000 assured towards the cost of his production before ever the curtain goes up. And this is a consideration obviously not to be despised. Altogether, therefore, the libraries have a stronger claim to existence than is sometimes imagined.

The subjects being discussed at this year's conference of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, which opened at Edinburgh on Monday, are scarcely characterised by startling novelty, but doubtless Mr. Charles Manners on "National Opera" and Mr. J. A. Rodgers on "Musical Festivals" will be duly instructive, and the discussions may conceivably throw some fresh light on topics in question, both of which are rather in the nature of lost causes at the present time. The principal chairman of the conference this year is, I notice, the veteran Professor Niecks, who has his home in Edinburgh as Reid Professor of Music at the University.

A good deal of interest will attend the experiment of giving the so-called "potted opera" performances at Mr. Walter Gibbons's fine new music-hall, the Palladium, with which Mr. Beecham is associated. The purists and pedants will raise hands of horror, naturally, but this need not stand in the way of an excellent scheme. Half a loaf is better than no bread, and an operatic ox in a tea-cup will probably make a strong appeal to many whose musical digestions are not powerful enough to enable them to tackle with comfort a more substantial meal. Even some superior folk may possibly be brought to confess (secretly, if not openly) that in opera, as in other things, the half is occasionally preferable to the whole. It is not as if popular opera on legitimate lines has been such a howling success. The "potted" variety will at least have the justification of a pis-aller.

An event of note early in the New Year will be the farewell visit of Sousa and his band, who will occupy Queen's Hall every afternoon and evening for a week from January 2. Superior folks scoff at Sousa and his methods, but there is a good deal to be learned from them none the less. His orchestra, for one thing, is trained to a remarkable pitch of excellence, while he never bores his hearers. He appreciates the fact also that a popular audience is almost as much interested in the movements of the conductor as in the music itself, and provides for their needs accordingly. Sousa might be defined, in fact, as the De Pachmann of the conducting world. No conductor is so amusing to watch. His programmes this time contain a number of quite serious works, including such things as Liszt's "Les Préludes," Sibelius's "Finlandia," the "Tannhäuser" overture, the "Tristan" prelude and Liebestod, and even "Til Eulenspiegel." It will be a novel experience to hear such works given by Sousa's men.

The first performance of Dr. Frederic Cowen's new work, "The Veil," which made such an impression at the recent Cardiff Festival, has now been definitely arranged for February 21. The artists will be Mme. Agnes Nicholls, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Walter Hyde, and Mr. Herbert Brown, and the chorus will be the Cardiff Festival Choir, who will then make their first appearance in London, Dr. Cowen himself being the conductor.

"Clara Novello's Reminiscences" (Edward Arnold) though somewhat fragmentary, make a very readable volume of musical recollections. One of the greatest singers of her day, Clara Novello retired as long ago as 1860, but lived on till 1908, when she died at Rome. A woman of much strength of character and irreproachable name, she expresses herself freely concerning men and things, often in very pungent and racy fashion. Of her fellow artists she writes for the most part very appreciatively, though she can be critical on occasion. Jenny Lind, for instance, was evidently no great favourite of hers. Thus one reads:—

> Her voice was not spontaneous, and produced only with great effort; a peculiarity in her singing was the effect it gave of her doing it alone, separately, as it were, from the rest, a solo, ever accompanied by others, never amalgamating together. . . . . In manners also Jenny Lind was peculiar; at a State concert once she would not enter with or sit near us, nor have her accompaniments played by Costa, so her husband played to her singing of Chopin's pianoforte compositions, to counter-balance which whim he played a derangement from "Norma," she between whiles sitting behind the window curtains and speaking to no one.

In 1843 Clara Novello married Count Gigliucci, and thenceforward resided mainly in Italy, identifying herself completely with her husband's affairs. She even, we are told, denied herself a piano for two years after her marriage purposely to convince her husband that she did not regret the musical career which she had abandoned, though at her husband's own request she subsequently reappeared intermittently before finally withdrawing into private life. Many good stories enliven her pages. Here is one going back to the now long-forgotten days when Florence Nightingale was criticised by the ignorant and malicious:—

> Among the most censorious, as usual, were the clergy; but one of these received once a rebuke which he found unanswerable. Speaking of her the rev. gentleman said in disparaging tones, "She is not a Churchwoman; what sect may she belong to?" "To the extremely rare one of the 'Good Samaritan,'" was the answer.

A Memoir by Mr. Arthur D. Coleridge serves as preface to the volume.

THE THEATRES.

CHRISTMAS ENTERTAINMENTS.

I DO not know whether the number of children who go to the theatre is on the increase, but year by year it seems to me that more Christmas fare is provided for them. At the time of writing the glories of Drury Lane are yet to come, but house after house has burst out with fairy or fanciful plays such as will delight the hearts of youngsters during the holidays. The Gaiety, for instance, is given up to a capital schoolboy romance in Messrs. Fred Mouillot and Judge Parry's "Captain of the School," and though some people have handled it severely the audiences for whom it was specially written revel in it. The school may be like no school, and the headmaster may behave strangely, but the wild humours of the piece are infectious, and the chequered careers of dramatists may always be illuminated by the thought that the majority of playgoers (particularly youthful Christmastide playgoers) go to the theatre to enjoy themselves and not to be critical. Mr. Anstey's "Vice Versâ" at the Comedy is another piece that has settled down into what might be called a sound holiday attraction. It is a very humorous little play, and Mr. Spencer Trevor's clever acting as the unfortunate Bultitude, senior, who finds himself back at school in his son's body while that son plays ducks and drakes with his City business, is exceedingly funny. If you want to enjoy these plays properly you must not go alone; you must take young people with you.

"Our Little Cinderella," which Mr. Cyril Maude has staged for a series of matinées at the Playhouse, comes in quite a different category. With words by Leo Trevor and music by Hermann Lohr, it sets forth very simply but very charmingly the pretty old tale, and though there is plenty of humour in it, the merit of the little play lies in the fact that the story is faithfully adhered to, and not lost sight of in a mass of extraneous matter. Mr. Cyril Maude is very droll as the impoverished Baron, Lord Punterfield, with the two inevitable unattractive daughters as well as the fascinating Cinderella, and he sings his songs with great neatness and point. It is something of a novelty to find Mr. Maude coming out as a singing comedian, but every one will want to hear him give "Oh, the British Peerage isn't what it used to be." Mr. Wimperis, who is responsible for the lyrics, has done his work excellently. There is an uncommonly pretty and poetic touch in some of his best efforts, while the peerage song above alluded to and quoted below is capital:—

Once I did things rather well:
I had chambers in Pall Mall
(With a window overlooking Beerbohm Tree).
And I lunched with all the wits
At the Carlton or the Ritz,
But to-day I find the writs come round to me!
I'd a stable and a shoot,
And a fair estate to boot
(With a hen roost for my lawyer friends to rob).
Then some Johnny brought a Bill up,
And I had Form Four to fill up:
Since then, of course, I've never had a bob!

Miss Maidie Hope scores greatly as a bright but vulgar little widow with designs on Lord Punterfield for Number Two, while Miss Margery Maude is a most attractive Cinderella. Without being anything great, she is very charming and unaffected—in short, she is Cinderella.

About "Peter Pan," which started upon its seventh annual season at the Duke of York's on Saturday, I have really nothing more to say. It is the dramatic equivalent of Alice in Wonderland, and its popularity will survive as surely. Miss Pauline Chase is again a winsome Peter, but there is a new Wendy, for Miss Hilda Trevelyan is still wanted in "A Single Man," while Mr. Holman Clark now plays the redoubtable Captain Hook in place of the late Mr. Robb Harwood, whose wonderful performance still lingers in my memory. It is a remarkable tribute to the merits of the play that no matter what the changes in the cast may be it should hold its own like this year in and year out.

"The Blue Bird," which has settled down for a second Christmas season at the Haymarket, is the only piece which promises to run Peter Pan at all hard as a Christmas annual, and I fancy I am almost alone in thinking it a vastly over-rated play. There is much that is beautiful in the story of the two children's quest for the blue bird of happiness, but much also to me that is gloomy and depressing. The fact is, I suppose, that I have a commonplace mind that does not grasp the inward spiritual beauty of the fantasy. I took a small friend to see the piece the other day because I was anxious to note how it struck him. All I could get out of him afterwards, however, was that he liked the dog, and there I am heartily with him. His comment was that if only there were a screen between you would not know that the growls and moans did not come from a real dog. This loyal, devoted dog is beautifully played by Mr. Ernest Hendrie. His howls and his sentiments are alike irreproachable, while excellent, too, is Mr. Norman Page's wily, untrustworthy cat. The two children are played quite charmingly by Master Eric Rae and Miss Pauline Gilmer, and Mr. Edward Rigby is a delightfully humorous "Bread." Indeed, the whole thing is well played and most exquisitely staged. The new act, "The Palace of Happiness," I do not care for much. The scene where the Luxuries indulge in gluttonous revels is too pantomimic, and though the purer Joys in a later scene provide a feast of delicate colouring, I was not much interested in hearing them introduced and catalogued. They were all a little too pure and good for human nature's daily food, and I could not help feeling that the boy Tyltyl would have been more interested if the fairy had introduced him to a personification of the "Joy of Birds' Nesting" or the "Joy of Scouting," or even a "Joy of Football." I am sure my young friend was rather bored with the beautiful "Joy of Maternal Love" and the "Joy of Being Just."

Though not strictly a children's play I fancy children will enjoy "The Piper," which Mr. Alexander has arranged with Mr. E. F. Benson to produce for a series of matinées at the St. James's Theatre. This is the play for which a £300 prize was awarded to Josephine Preston Peabody (Mrs. Lionel Marks) last summer when it was produced at Stratford-on-Avon. It is a romantic version of the old Pied Piper of Hamelin legend, and Mr. Benson has a very effective part as the mysterious musician who steals away all the children (out of revenge for the treachery of the burghers of Hamelin), and then repents and brings them back. With its crowds of children and charming staging the piece is certain to attract, particularly as Miss Marion Terry is repeating her beautifully pathetic performance as one of the heartbroken mothers.

* * * * * *

I do not think Mr. H. G. Pélissier has scored an unqualified success with his 1910 revue, "All Change Here," at the Alhambra. He begins with a street scene showing the poor old year being buffeted by all those who have suffered through it from "Form 4, two elections, no summer, and Lloyd George," and there are one or two excellent subsequent scenes. For instance, Primrose Hill in the streaming rain which changes to glad sunshine is excellent, so too is the Embankment scene. Here you have a wonderfully realistic vision of a wet night which changes instantaneously to a really beautiful snow effect. Messrs. Bull and Son, who painted this scene, deserve the utmost credit. Very funny, too, is the travesty of Dr. Straus conducting "Elektra," where you see a section of Covent Garden and the distracted performers and audience. The latter part of the revue, however, falls off sadly, and I think most people were bored and irritated by the political business. Every one is heartily sick of politics. Some of the dances are good, but Mr. Herman Finck's music is undistinguished. There are practically no acting chances, but Mr. Shiel Barry, who plays The Year 1910, delivers his lines excellently. I fancy this revue will be reviewed and revised, and in a very little while will emerge in a much more amusing form.

SPORT.

RACING NOTES.

THE preposterous list of "winter fixtures" has been well described as "appalling," and it is certainly impossible to conjecture where horses are taken from to furnish even small fields at one-third of the meetings which are announced. There is scarcely a vacant day until the flat-racing season begins again at Lincoln on March 20. At some of these wretched winter fixtures the sport is a melancholy but instructive burlesque, for plunder is the aim and end of the whole affair, which is a vile welter of knavery, and only the most infatuated of mooncalves will concern themselves with such meetings. It would be a very good thing if some legislator would bring in a Bill to prohibit absolutely all racing whatever during the months of December and January.

A sporting writer, referring to the Netheravon successes in the Cambridgeshire, states that Captain Machell "was the cleverest of all stable managers in working great handicap coups." The fact is that Captain Machell was by no means such a genius as has been made out by people who really knew nothing about him and his doings. He thoroughly understood steeplechasing, but in flat racing he made many and grave mistakes. Captain Machell had the chance of winning a large fortune over the Cesarewitch of 1873. King Lud was a real good thing for that race, and his owner,

Lord Lonsdale, seldom backed a horse for more than £10. The betting over this race in that year was tremendously heavy. Captain Machell, however, backed King Lud for only a trifle, as he went to win a great stake over Fevre, a beast of his own about whom he was perfectly infatuated. It would have been well for Captain Machell if Fevre had never been foaled, for in the following year he again backed this horse heavily for the Ascot Stakes, which race the stable won with Lord Lonsdale's Coventry, who was a complete outsider. Captain Machell's operations were often guided by sentimental considerations. He took strong fancies to some horses, while he violently opposed others, and over and over again these apple-blossom prejudices most disastrously affected his betting transactions. Captain Machell's pecuniary position was never satisfactory, and on several occasions it was only the assistance of Lord Calthorpe which prevented a smash. His circumstances were desperate when Disturbance won the Grand National, and the £30,000 which he won over that race came in most seasonably. Lord Calthorpe was really "the capitalist" of the Bedford Cottage stable for a quarter of a century. Some doddering noodles still believe that Hermit's Derby victory was "engineered" by Captain Machell to his great profit. The fact was that he won next to nothing over that race. He could not afford to back Hermit for any money at short odds, and he was, of course, afraid to support the horse after he had broken a blood-vessel. Marksman ought to have won the Derby, as matters turned out, but that race would have been a good thing for The Rake if he had kept all right.

Baron E. de Rothschild's colt Bay Cherry, by Bay Ronald, who won the Prix de Sant Fermin at Chantilly with great ease, was originally engaged in the Derby and in the St. Leger, but he was struck out of both races on March 29, very unluckily for his owner, as he is exceedingly smart.

I see that hopes are expressed that Bachelor's Double will be kept in training because he bids fair to be a good Cup horse. This is a flagrant example of the skimble-skamble twaddle with which some writers bewilder their unfortunate readers. Bachelor's Double is a high-class handicap horse, but he, most assuredly, has no pretensions whatever to be regarded as a Cup horse. He collapsed ignominously at Ascot in the race for the Gold Cup, which might be regarded as his real trial for events of this description. Bachelor's Double would stand but a poor chance for the next Ascot Cup if the field included Lemberg, Swynford, Bronzino, and Charles O'Malley. He would probably be beaten by Verney over that course.

A nonsensical fuss was raised over Magic after he had beaten Bayardo in the Goodwood Cup, but many good judges considered that the four-year-old ought to have won, and that the race was lost because he was injudiciously ridden. In any case, however, it was no very wonderful achievement to defeat Bayardo over this course when in receipt of 36 lbs. When Magic was being recommended as a good thing for the Cesarewitch it was pointed out in Truth that Mr. Beddington's horse really represented Bayardo at an impossible weight. With much less to carry the St. Leger winner would certainly have been no catch for a race over this severe course.

The Brocklesby Stakes at Lincoln is a race which has lost all its old importance, but it is still generously supported by owners. One hundred and eight yearlings are engaged in next year's race, which will be run on March 22. The fund will not be drawn upon for any part of the added money (£200), as the entrances amount to £216. Two-year-olds are not now so generally prepared for the early events of the season as formerly, which is a very good thing. Many animals have been ruined through being hurried on so as to be fit to run at one of the spring meetings. The Woodcote Stakes at Epsom or one of the Ascot events are the first object of owners of smart two-year-olds.

I see it is stated that Lord Derby has expressed the opinion that Swynford is not so good a horse as Cocksure II. was. It is exceedingly probable that Cocksure II. would have won the Derby of 1908 if he had been left in for this race, but no very high form was required for success at Epsom on that occasion, considering that Signorinetta was the winner. Cocksure II. won several races easily, but defeating only moderate horses, whereupon he was extolled as a flier of high class, as is usually the case under such circumstances. It is curious that so few people recognise that the class of the animals beaten is the first consideration when estimating the form, rather than the style in which a race has been won. The running of Cocksure II. with Dean Swift in the Select Stakes at Newmarket (R.M.) does not justify the rhapsodies of which Lord Derby's horse has been the subject. Dean Swift gave 5 lbs. and won by a head. This was certainly not up to St. Leger form. There was so much laudatory cackling about Cocksure II. during the autumn of 1908 that he started first favourite for the Cambridgeshire with 8 st. 5 lbs. on his back, but he failed to finish in the first three, and this performance strengthened the belief entertained by most sensible people that his merits had been extravagantly overrated. It was very unlucky that Cocksure II. failed to stand training as a four-year-old. He started a great favourite for the Queen's Prize at the Kempton Park Easter meeting, but was beaten by Wuffy, and he never ran again. Cocksure II. was not considered promising during the early part of his two-year-old career, as he was then struck out of the Derby and St. Leger and of several other valuable races, in some of which he had large breeding allowances. His remaining engagements became void by the much-lamented death of Lord Derby.

It is curious to read in a morning paper that "the handicapping of to-day is not a crying evil." Most people whose opinion is of the value of an oyster-shell are quite convinced that a great deal of the handicapping of the last two or three years has been abominably bad. Many of the most important handicaps have been most jumble-jamble productions, and the results have fully justified the savage criticisms which were to be heard and read. Such indifferent handicaps have seldom been produced in the whole history of the Turf—worse ones, never; for some of them have exhibited every imaginable fault.

LADIES' GOLF UNION—REFEREES AND FOOTBALL.

From what I have read there seems to be every prospect of trouble in the world of lady golfers. There is to be a secession from the Ladies' Golf Union, and the rival body is to be known as the National County Golf Alliance. The title has no distinguishing sex mark. But it is very high sounding, and only needs the words "insurance corporation, limited," to be added to secure any number of adherents. Well, the cause of friction alleged is that there was a discussion as to the propriety of players taking part in the county championship receiving hotel and travelling expenses. The hon. secretary of the competition defended the practice, and the hon. secretary of the Union, it was said, objected. Then, as the matter was to be put to the vote, the hon. secretary of the county competition resigned, and for that reason and others I gather the fat was in the fire. The Alliance has issued a proclamation breathing independence and defiance. It might have been penned by Nationalists or Ulstermen. "Unjust treatment has been meted out by the Union, and unless serious steps are taken the end of county golf is in view." Perish the thought! Devonshire to the rescue comes and offers new trophies if the Golf Union will not hand over existing ones. "The Alliance stands for payment of hotel and travelling expenses, the Union would abolish them, the club delegates legislate on county affairs, county officials cannot and the counties have no voice in the election of their own honorary secretaries." The banner of freedom is raised. Home Rule for the counties. Long live the Alliance! Now I feel that some harmless remarks of mine on this question of the payment of expenses may have helped in this trouble. Of course, I am very sorry. But it is simply absurd to object to the payment of expenses. If they are refused the competition goes under, or it becomes one for the wealthy. The dispute is too utterly ridiculous. The competitions do the game good. The payments are similar to those made to mere males in representative sports. There is absolutely no harm in them. A certain golfing journal wrote a lot of nonsense on the subject and received practically no support. It dodged about from pillar to post. And now the ladies are fighting like a lot of Kilkenny cats. People talk about votes for women. They get on the "I won't play in your yard" tack as soon as there is a squabble. It is utterly absurd. If the seceders are in a majority in the Union let them reconstitute it. That is the proper proceeding. As reformers they would command sympathy; as seceders they make the whole affair laughable. I have not the book of the constitution of the Ladies' Golf Union before me. If the effect is truly stated in the fiery proclamation its constitution must be something like Lord Lansdowne's new House of Lords. But the fiery flame of Devon shall not serenely burn. For behold the hon. secretary of the Golf Union has proclaimed, and that lady says the Union could not if it would, and would not if it could, put a ban on those expenses, and so she said at the meeting. Wherefore it would appear that the first accounts of that meeting were as accurate as the usual tattle after a tea-party. Wherefore I know not what they fight each other for. Nevertheless it is all vastly amusing. Especially at Christmas time. It removes us above the sphere of party politics, and teaches us mere men once again that no man ever understood a woman any better than the women understand each other.

The Football Association has issued a list of instructions to referees which is no doubt necessary, but at the same time indicates the game is not handled as it should be. The truth of the matter is that these referees, after passing wonderful examinations, imagine that they are the most important people on the ground. They forget that their primary duty is to be seen and not heard. Many of them are bumptious to a degree that a provincial mayor might envy without any possibility of being able to emulate. The F.A. has done really good work in issuing this list of elementary instructions. Surely those who find it necessary to promulgate these orders might reflect that such incompetence went some way to cause the split which resulted in the formation of A.F.A. For instance, it is only an offside offence if a player touches the ball or interferes with an opponent or the play, and yet referees give free kicks merely because a player is in an offside position. Charging an opponent who intentionally obstructs is permissible, and yet referees penalise it when it is neither violent nor dangerous. No distinction is made by referees between accidental and intentional handling of the ball. The latter is an offence, and the former is not, and yet if the ball is kicked against a player's arms or hands the whistle-carrier blows away to his heart's content. Then as to linesmen, they signal for touch when the ball has not gone entirely over the line. The explanations are clearly and accurately given on most elementary points. They point, as I have said, if not to ignorance, at all events to gross incompetence. Perhaps the referee will not consider himself a superman in future. The Football Association, in looking into this matter, has done some thoroughly good work for the game. If those in authority would only approach the amateur question in the same proper spirit the boycott would soon be a thing of the past.

While the Amateur Rowing Association is passing rich on less than forty pounds a year the stewards of Henley Regatta are struggling hard for funds. A special appeal to old oarsmen has helped them to swell a declining balance from £148 to £263, but this is not enough. Wherefore the stewards have resolved to adopt the flag system that was so successful at Molesey. Boats that have subscribed a minimum fee carry a flag. This is not mere ostentation. The object is to show that the boat crew has given its quota to the regatta expenses. Thus by the force of public opinion it shall come to pass that he or she shall be deemed no sportsman or sportswoman unless his or her craft flies the ensign of exacted tribute. The next move will be for the Thames Conservancy to acquire powers whereby they may prevent pleasure craft not carrying flags from coming behind the piles during the hours of racing. Perhaps the Conservancy might not like to ask for such powers, but their acquisition would not seem to be unreasonable. However, the public by buying flags may avert the necessity for such an application. As a further means to a great end, and that is filling the treasury, the regatta is to conclude on a Saturday. It will be held on July 5, 6, 7, 8, and the first day will not be regarded as a mere preliminary day. The Saturday racing should certainly raise the number of visitors considerably. It should be good for the town and for the oppressed publican. The local people should certainly support the regatta fund generously now that there is every prospect of their own pockets being filled by the foreigner and colonial visitor to Henley.

It looks as though there were every prospect of trouble brewing in Rugby International football. The cloud on the horizon may become very big, and then there will be a big storm and a lot of thunder and lightning. The trouble will be as to what amounts to an International qualification. As I understand the matter there is an unwritten law that close and continuous identification of a player with the club football of any country gives that country a claim on his services. At the same time such identification does not prevent him playing for the country of his birth or undoubted descent. For example, O'Callaghan, the old Merchant Taylor, could have been selected for England, and if the selectors had been wise he would have been. He was not. Being of Irish ancestry, he was invited to play for Ireland, and he did. The affair will or may become acute if Williams plays for England at full back. He has been associated with Welsh football. Monmouthshire is for football purposes part of Wales, and there will be trouble.

"WILL YOU HEEL HER?"

[After Matthew Arnold's Philomela.]

What ho! The shrill half-back!
The brawny-throated!
Hark! from yon steaming scrimmage what a burst!
What language! Hark—what lungs!

O Wanderer on a surging fringe,
Still, spite of all thy plaints, in different keys,
Still nursing in their stubborn hinder rank
That wild, grime-darken'd, melancholy egg—
Say, will they never heel?
Must thou to-night behold,
Large in the limelight of the evening press,
The unfriendly comments of a sham expert?
Must thou again regard,
With splash'd breeks and blear'd eyes,
Thine idle "threes," and thy dumb brother's shame?
Must thou once more essay
Thy plea, and one more seem to make resound,
With "Left!" and "Right!" "Heel it!" and "Take it on!"
Yon grand-stand and the cheap, plebeian parts?

Listen, good stranger—
How thick the cries come crowding through the mist!
Again—thou hearest!
"Now, forwards, heel her!
Heel, will you!"

MOTORS AND MOTORING.

THE Isle of Man's passion for motor racing seems to be insatiable, though whether the Manxmen will succeed in organising the race meeting which they have projected for the coming summer is a trifle doubtful, seeing that neither the R.A.C. nor the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders is disposed, apparently, to touch the scheme officially. The truth of the matter is that the balance of expert opinion is against any revival or further continuance of motor racing. From the trade point of view it is a very expensive and speculative form of advertising, while considered more generally it involves tremendous difficulties in the way of organisation, and has the further drawback of entailing very grave risks to life and limb. At the same time, there is no doubt that racing has been the means of greatly furthering the development of the car. Designers and makers learn much in the stress and strain of these contests.

Some one has been arguing that however this may have been in the past, racing is no longer likely to help much in this way. Such remaining improvements as diminished engine vibration, lessened wear and tear and cost of repairs, increased quietness, and so on, he contends, are not likely to be promoted in the slightest degree by racing, which makes mere efficiency its one and only end. This is rather superficial reasoning. Whatever improvement is effected under any head must make in the long run for the betterment of the car of all kinds. None the less, it is quite an open question if, in view of the present state of efficiency which has been reached, racing is any longer necessary to expedite the process of improvement.

In reference to the delicate question of choosing the owners to represent the R.A.C. in the competition for the Prince Henry trophy next summer, the suggestion that the members should select their own representatives seems quite a good one. All those members anxious to take part in the contest would hand in their names with particulars of their cars, and by means of a postal plébiscite, or in some similar fashion, the members as a whole would then nominate the fifty that they reckoned most fitted to represent them. In this way the club authorities would be relieved of a very difficult and invidious task, while the mode of election substituted would be a guarantee against partisanship or favouritism of any kind. One thing may be pretty certainly taken for granted, and this is that the German team will be a fine one, with all lame ducks carefully excluded. It behoves us, therefore, to see to it that we are equally well represented if we want to emerge with credit from the contest.

A writer in one of the motoring papers makes a sound point in urging that the traffic conditions in London might be greatly improved if the police applied their powers to a fuller extent by compelling slow vehicles to keep close in to the kerb instead of allowing them to block up the middle of the road. It is no uncommon thing to see a whole line of traffic in a narrow street like the Strand held up in this way by some coal cart or brewer's dray, while the police look on without the smallest attempt at bringing the offender to book. I suppose it is not recognised as part of their functions at present to do this, and that without express instructions on the subject they cannot take action, but if this is the case the sooner a more vigorous policy is adopted by the authorities the better. It is not much good regulating the traffic, however skilfully, at crossings if it is allowed to regulate itself elsewhere.

The cheap French car, designed on very individual lines, giving somewhat the effect of a sort of coffin-shaped box on wheels, which has attracted a good deal of attention during recent months, can now be obtained in London through the Sabella Motor Car Company, of 28, Budge Row, E.C., who have secured the sole agency. The car, which is known as the Bedelia, is a sort of development of the quad, the aim having been to combine the utmost simplicity of construction with high mechanical efficiency, comfort, and low cost of production. The drive is partly by belt, there is neither gear-box nor, I believe, differential, the total weight is under 300 lbs., and the cost of the most expensive model is less than eighty guineas; yet the Bedelia takes two passengers comfortably, is said to be wonderfully speedy, and costs next to nothing in upkeep.

The police are apparently not disposed to accept the suggestion of Mr. Charles Jarrott and others that the steering arrangements on the existing motor-'buses are radically wrong, and in need, therefore, of drastic amendment; and many motorists probably will be disposed to agree with them. Doubtless in the case of racing cars going between seventy and a hundred miles an hour a raked steering pillar and a large steering wheel are an advantage, but it does not follow that they are called for in the case of vehicles like motor-'buses, never travelling much above fifteen miles an hour, and usually less.

A good deal of exaggeration has indeed been indulged in on the subject, and the motor-'bus driver has been represented as one performing prodigies of skill under the most handicapping conditions. Ask him himself, however, and you will find that he is equally unconscious of the disabilities under which he is alleged to be labouring and of the incredible feats of skill which he is supposed to accomplish. I think, however, that the companies would be well advised to provide their drivers with some more efficient, or at any rate more seemly looking, protection against the weather than the improvised apron held up by a piece of string, with which the men usually shelter themselves at present. A properly fitted wind screen, even if only one of the half shield type fitted to the taxi-cabs, would certainly be an improvement in point of appearance on the exceedingly slovenly looking arrangement referred to.

But then it is a matter of constant astonishment to the intelligent foreigner that while paying so much regard to appearances in some matters in this country we are so careless about them in others. In Germany every railway official, 'bus driver, conductor, and the like wears a suitable uniform, and the practice is one which has much to commend it. We seem, however, to be improving a little in this respect. Although it is still possible at many railway stations for a duke to be mistaken for the stationmaster, as once actually happened, all taxi drivers are suitably attired for their work, while more recently the London General Omnibus Company have put their conductors into uniforms. Now they might go a step further and do the same by their drivers, whose appearance at present can certainly not be said to add to the amenities of the London streets.

I was amused to read in one of the motoring papers the other day a long screed by a well-known writer, who unfolded to a wondering public the astounding discovery that ever since overcoats were invented mankind has been foolishly buttoning them in the wrong way—namely, the left side over the right. Hence, he explained, at great length and with much picturesqueness of language, the rain in bad weather tended to drive inside the coat between the buttons, whereas if the coat were only buttoned the other way this could not happen. With much gravity, therefore, the writer proceeded to commend his epoch-making discovery to the tailoring world with the expression of the hope that they would read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest his words of wisdom Unless I am much mistaken that intelligent fraternity must have been highly amused. May it be gently pointed out to this sapient scribe that tailors some centuries ago perceived the difficulty in question, and solved it by the simple expedient of the double-breasted coat, which can be buttoned either way?

The Car does good service in calling attention to the quality of the sand, so-called, which is put down on the streets in London with a view to affording a foothold to the horses and preventing skidding in muddy weather As is pointed out, it consists, more often than not, not of sand at all, but of small, sharp flints, which until they have been broken up by the traffic, are of little value for the purpose intended, and are at the same time destructive in the last degree to rubber tyres, whilst being anything but beneficial to the wood pavement itself. What should be used is proper sand. It may be added, too, that the method whereby the sand is distributed might be greatly improved. Some better means must surely be possible than having it flung from a shovel, as at present—not infrequently in a manner suggestive of considerable risk to the eyes of every one in the immediate vicinity of the operator. What is surprising is that it should be left to outsiders to point out these things. One would think that the authorities responsible would see them for themselves.

WOMAN.

THE THIRTY-FIRST "TRUTH" DOLL AND TOY SHOW.

AWARD OF PRIZES.

WERE it not for the simple fact that the object of the ladies who dress dolls for the doll show is to bring joy to the hearts of the little ones in workhouse and hospital, and not the winning of prizes, I should really feel some compunction about printing the following prize list. The work of the judges is always a difficult task, but this year it has been exceptionally arduous. Both amongst the large dolls and the small the standard of the work was so high that to attempt a selection became an invidious task. Particularly was this the case with regard to the many groups of small dolls, arranged, selected, and dressed with such skill that discrimination seemed to be hopeless. But the task had to be performed, and after much anxious examination, in which every point was carefully weighed, the judges have arrived at their decision. The points are many. Not only the general tastefulness of the costumes has to be taken into account, but the accessories which do not meet the eye at first glance such as the quality of the work, and the suitability of the doll as a plaything for children. And here a word must be said of general praise for those ladies who clothed the natural dolls. Without exception they seem to have been inspired to the happiest result, and the judges felt themselves compelled to award prizes specially for some of these groups of smaller dolls. The total number of prizes presented by the Editor of TRUTH has been limited to forty-one, and in addition there are the gold watch presented by the Goldsmiths and Silversmiths' Company, Ltd., and the two autotype signed proofs presented by Mr. E. Douglas. I am the more grateful for these pictures since their presence amongst the prizes enables me to find a suitable award to Mr. Duncan for the wonderful doll's house which he sent to compete amongst the home-made toys. It is remarkable in these days of male decadence that he should have succeeded in holding his own against such strenuous feminine competition. Yet when all is said and done I am unhappily conscious that many ladies whose names do not figure in the prize list have well earned the right to appear there. Short, however, of making every competitor a prize winner, which would, of course, reduce the competition to an absurdity, it is impossible adequately to do justice to the taste, skill, and patience which made the recent show the most effective of any in the long series. The line had to be drawn somewhere, and I am sure the competitors will believe that if it seems to be drawn somewhat arbitrarily, it is due to the fact that their own efforts left practically an almost unobservable margin for selection.

In awarding the prizes the same system has been adopted as in preceding years. The prizes are first given in the order of their value. The winners are then

Each lady is requested to write to the Editor specifying a certain number of articles which she would like, and placing them in the order of her choice, and her prize will be allotted as far as possible in accordance with this order. In addition to the forty-four prizes the Editor of TRUTH will, as usual, present a souvenir of the occasion in the shape of a silver-gilt pin-brooch of new design to every lady who has dressed one large or twelve small dolls, the names of these ladies being given in a special list at the end.

LETTERS TO MY MOTHER-IN-LAW.

DEAR MRS. P.,—To say I was gratified at the beautiful car that came round for me on Christmas morning would ill express my pleasure in your present; rather must I tell you that at last I feel really appreciated. Even mamma was taken aback at the removal of a cherished grievance, and when I told her that the chauffeur was included, said she was glad to see some reward for her self-sacrifice—by which I think she means her providing of James with me. It is quite remarkable how much kindlier the possession of a car makes one. I don't mind now how fast other cars go, and I am sorry when they are fined; also for the last fortnight I have been grumbling at the motor 'buses for not wearing petticoats, as do the Paris and some of the Kensington 'buses, but now I don't mind a bit how much they splash. And it is all due to you and to my father-in-law, dear Mrs. P.

I am so thankful, too, that it arrived after the elections, though, it is true, the damaged state of their cars seems to have formed a common ground of reconciliation between deadly political enemies. One man told me that his cushions had been absolutely ruined by dockers, who stood on them in their hob-nailed boots on the way to the poll, and he fell on the neck of a rival who had had his tyres cut; more election playfulness necessitated the entire repainting of a third car. And of course you can't say anything lest you so hurt the feelings of your voter as to make him vote Daimler instead of Panhard.

James and I got late with our shopping on Saturday, because we had made a vow to get no "Yule-tide present" that was either "appropriate" or "desirable." Despairingly we went through one department after another, and finally arrived exhausted and empty-handed at the pharmaceutical section. James asked the man whether bilious beans could anyhow be construed into being "appropriate" or "desirable." He said he wasn't sure. "Well, prussic acid, then?" said James at random. "I should rather say it could," retorted the attendant, with a twisted smile. So we broke our vow.

No, I didn't go to "Salome." Having seen her at a music hall with the head, I felt that the opera with only a dish would be rather a Barmecides' feast. In point of fact a lot of people are grumbling at not getting their money's worth. The "prophet's" rôle would no doubt have thickened the plot if, as the undergraduate put it, when questioned by the examiner, he had been beheaded because he would dance with Herodias' daughter. But as he wouldn't, the opera was so lacking in body as well as head that it could by no means be spun out to the regulation length. It was suggested that "Salome" and "Elektra" should be given on the same night, ostensibly to afford opportunities of psychological and musical comparison—really to appease those of the opera-loving public who felt it wasn't getting enough for its money. I too feel with you that "Salome" isn't quite nice, but the luridness of "Elektra" might have toned it down to seem more like our ordinary home-life.

The Duchess of Sutherland's black satin cloak at her exhibition of work done by the Cripples' Guild was certainly very pretty, but as there is eight inches' difference in their heights, I don't think, if I were you, that I should get one just like it for Emily. There were a lot of pretty things—bowls, trays, flagons, enamels, and the number of pleasantly opulent buyers made one realise the real function of arts and crafts generally.

I met a number of young Indians at a tea party last week. Quite a lot of people, including Mr. and Mrs. Gerald Ritchie, are looking after their moral welfare, and soon no tea-party will be complete without a sprinkling of them. I find, too, that people are buying up those little shilling text-books that give you in a nutshell all the philosophies and religions of the East, from Shintoism to Manu. Of course, you have to be careful to get the right one. I know a woman who armed herself with a yellow-bound "Extracts from Confucius," and, firing them off at a perplexed young Hindu, declared afterwards that she had confounded him on his own ground. Mistakes also occur sometimes, proud Brahmins being introduced to obsequious Sudras on the common ground of tea and hot cake. One of my friends went so far as to invite some Anglo-Indians to meet a Hindu at dinner on the ground that as they had both been in India it would be so nice for them to meet. But these little "contretemps" are so well meant that the difference between England and Anglo-India must sometimes occur to the budding young Indian.

Mrs. Holman Hunt, I hear, has just gone to Burmah for three months to visit her son, who is in the Woods and Forests Department. Until recently, Mrs. Hunt was always distinguishable in society by her famous gold bonnet, which she adopted as a hall-mark, much as did Mrs. W. F. Stephens her Paisley shawl. At a sale of Russian needle-work, at which a good number of people were wearing Russian costume, I heard a woman say to her in a highly gratulatory tone: "How well the Russian head-dress suits you, dear Mrs. Hunt."

We shall come for Emily in the car next week—and for Caroline, too, if you like.—Always your loving

VERITY.

A COOL PROPOSAL.

Were I able to sing of the charm that allures,
  Of your cheek with its delicate pink,
Of the graces of mind that I gather are yours
  I should use too much ink;
So I merely explain why I drop into rhyme, too,
  As I drop in a heap at your toes;
With the flight of the year I've been told it is time to Propose.

I have fluttered around you, a love-stricken man,
  As a moth when it makes for the gas;
I've behaved from about the beginning of Jan.
  Like a palpable ass.
I have wooed (not in words) with a passionate fervour,
  But somehow I've always got stuck
When I've wanted to speak, for I hadn't the nerve or The pluck.

Still, I'm here on my knees (which are sore) as you see,
  And I take it the pose is correct,
But I doubt if the words I shall utter will be Quite what you expect.
As a matter of fact with the effort of posing
  My courage is ready to fall,
And there's someone who almost prevents my proposing
  At all.

For of late, I must own, I have met with a maid
  Who has cheeks of a rosier hue
Than the ones that I see, and I'm really afraid
  She is nicer than you.
Yet my mother will be most excessively snappy
  If I fail in my duty, my dear,
But I trust you'll refuse me, and give me a Happy
  New Year!

MRS. A.'S DIARY.

Thursday.—Florence, obviously deeming it blessed to receive, insists that the whole family shall spend their Christmas with her in the country. Incidentally she mentions that the flooded condition of her district renders it doubtful whether we shall get enough to eat, while she suggests that this might be a pleasing change from the usual seasonable order, or disorder, of overfeeding. She reports that there are some sounds of strife in her kitchen boiler, and that most of her servants are at their own homes visiting their sick relations. She boldly hints that it would be as wise as kind to defer my arrival until Christmas Eve, and then to call en route on some worthy caterer, who would endow us with such palatable properties as smoked salmon, pâté de foie gras, a barrel of oysters, a peach-fed ham, a game-pie or so, and some oddments in the golden sprat and olive line. My rural sister has great domestic talents, and some tact and foresight. Into her hospitable hands I commit myself blindly; and dumbly too if I can, concerning her little failures in the art of frocks and the hairdressing idiosyncrasies of her débutante daughter.

I believe I am to be consulted as to the details of a frock which shall grace a fancy-dress ball. It is particularly requested that this be entirely original and contrived from elderly garments long in stock. "Only with your help can we arrive at a triumph" is the last disturbing sentence in Florence's letter which has wrecked my day's rest. With sufficient smoke grey gauze I might place an attractive damsel in a definite fog, or with gold tissue and jewels and spangled chiffon I could make a Cleopatra fit to conquer any number of Cæsars and an Antony or so. Perchance the available fabrics will be more like to create a perfect Cinderella in perfect rags, or mayhap a fully fledged Lady Macbeth will emerge triumphant over Empire velveteen in the black degree. In any case, however destitute of material, I'll raise a picturesque edifice, and the pretty minx shall be left reflecting proudly, I fancy me, in fancy dress.

Friday.—I spent the morning reading Malcolm Salaman's book, "Old English Mezzotints," and turning the pictured pages to realise that the more fashion changes the more it is the same thing, even as the political situation. The illustrations would inspire any one with ideas for the impromptu carnival, and no country house party should be considered complete without it. Florence's shall include it, I vow. Those dames of long ago were very confiding about the details of the bed-chamber. Coquettes, old and young, appear to have much favoured the custom of being painted while dressing. An ancient, labelled "Pride," is revealed, supplying her withered cheeks and chin with a veritable smallpox of black patches; a plain damsel, marked "Lady at Her Toilet," is tying a flower-pot on to her head, and contemplating the effect with a far too evident satisfaction; and a young coquette is to be seen having some miles of hair added to her store by an obsequious hairdresser, while a much-bedizened maid is offering a mob cap for her inspection.

This volume is greatly cheap for the price of 7s. 6d., and every one needing instruction in the art of engraving or mezzotinting might well digest its contents. A good digestion waits upon an appetite for information. "If we only knew more, how much less we should say," as some other empty, careless cynic observed.

My dearest friend thwarted my ambition for further educational improvement by coming to show me her new hat, which I was forced to admire, despite the hateful osprey which decorates one side. It is of thimble shape, of dark sapphire velvet lined and banded with amethyst, and this, I hear, is a combination of colours much patronised in Paris; the illuminations outside the Automobile Show having first thrown light upon its charms.

Virginia's fur coat.

Saturday.—Never put off till to-morrow what you can put on to-day was always one of my favourite proverbs, and I have been living up to it by wearing my new gown for luncheon. It is an excellent new gown, made of dark olive green crêpe météor draped round the figure, the top cut into a pointed corselet filled to the neck with black net embroidered in gold thread and jet and green beads; the transparent neckband is lined with flesh-coloured chiffon, and the sleeves, which extend almost to the wrist, are treated in a like fashion, while the skirt hangs a couple of inches on the ground. I propose to crown it with a close cap of black and gold brocade, with a narrow green kilted frill headed by a band of sable and a gold rose at one side. It is a costume totally unsuited for morning wear, so Virginia informed me, when she called in all the glory of a new long coat of fine broadtail decked with a thick silk cord, and netted buttons, with a turban hat of black velvet close about her ears, and looking almost, if not quite, equipped for Arctic exploration.

After devouring an eighth of my excellent plum-pudding she conducted me to visit her latest friend, a clever American sculptor, Mrs. Lester Ralph, whose father-in-law was the well-beloved Julian Ralph of fame. We drove to the studio in Kensington and found the bright-eyed little lady decoratively gracing a grey linen overall, while upon her dark wavy hair was poised a cap of silver net with a frill of silver lace and two little rosebuds nestling in the front. She was hard at work on the bust of a prominent American politian, and in the intervals of pinching the clay with her delicate little fingers she walked around to nail up a mask of Victor Hugo taken from the famous Rodin inspiration. She has a bewitching personality, and we stayed talking to her until it was almost too late to catch my country train, and I carried away with me a pleasant memory of her simplicity and charm, an abiding conviction of her great talent, and a desperate envy of an Empire bureau which set snugly in a corner of her dark-blue-walled sitting-room, where we had tea under the influence of a score of lighted candles, to say nothing of some excellent buttered scones and a black cat that could a Persian tail unfold.

I arrived at Paddington just in time to meet my faithful messenger-boy with the provender, and I was greeted at my destination by my amiable sister Florence, who vowed that nothing so well became me in my town life as the leaving it to pass Christmas with her. Under these circumstances I propose to behave with an unvarying courtesy, to admire continually her gowns and her girls, her husband, her house, her garden, and all that in them is.

And so to my Christmas cheer! substantially assured by the presence of an entirely cured Nita and—those delectable parcels!

Mrs. A's Letter-Box.

Black Cat.—Fur dresses are so hot and uncomfortable, especially when tight, as they must be to represent successfully any animal. A cheap and easy if not very novel frock is of scarlet cashmere of very narrow dimensions, with the hat shaped like a pillar-box; and the opening and times for posting can be painted or embroidered on bodice and skirt.

Guelder.—There is the smartest new skating cap (quite fit, too, for ordinary wear) at Jay's, Regent Circus. They will send it you on approval if you are a customer or well known there. It is made of dark red and green striped gauze, outlined with dark oblong jewels with double tassels at either side; most quaint and original. I am delighted with it. They will recognise this description if you forward it to them.

Queen Eleanor.—The latest hair ornament is a black velvet ribbon, thickly powdered with diamonds.

Mrs. J. D. (Bayswater).—Buy a hyacinth blue net tunic oversewn with beads and bugles to match, and wear Parma violets. Very many thanks for your kind wishes.

UPSTAIRS AND DOWNSTAIRS.

I was walking up the Tottenham Court Road the other day when it flashed upon me that we own a national tyrant in the Suite, especially the Magnificent Dining-room Suite at something fifteen and ninepence. The furniture displayed in shop after shop was of a sameness which dictated to the imagination inevitably a picture of a room in which it would be placed. Perhaps it would be better to say the room in which it would be planted and allowed to take root, for who has ever heard of a respectable English family that owns a Suite (capital S, please) moving its portions about at anything but the longest intervals and under the strictest necessity.

A red wall-paper is the only colour permissible for a dining-room if the Sunday afternoon nap is to be at its best. A red carpet naturally follows, and the pictures must represent people with curtains behind them, called ancestors if one has the cheek, and never an out-door scene. Hobbema's "Avenue" would be an insult to any householder who wanted to eat heavily and snore sweetly. Its delicate, inviting trees, the deceptive quietness with which it covers its incitement to the open road have nothing to do with the processes of Sabbath digestion.

The Suite reigns all over the British house, but its autocracy is supreme in the dining-room. There is only one way to treat it. It must be bullied. It must be chivvied. Chase the sideboard from wall to wall, the table from fire to door, be brave about a new wall-paper, and the spell is broken. The heavy atmosphere of the average dining-room is due to the furniture, which has stood so long in the same places that it has become somnolent.

We are far too conservative in the arrangement of our houses. The revived taste for old furniture is helping to remove this fault, because a fine old piece of furniture is a delight to the eye, and one week we think it looks best with the light on the front, and the next we find that that does not show the wholly charming curve of the legs. As a natural consequence we move it. In this way we learn it all round, and it helps to give us a sense of freshness when we enter the room. The plupart of modern furniture, except the most expensive, is such that no sane and healthy being can take a real pride in it. At least, he ought not. Good modern furniture, as one finds in all the best shops, usually takes the form of honest, self-respecting copies or adaptations of the old. Fumed oak can be bearable, even pleasing, too; but it is frequently the tool of those who think they are artistic when they cut star-shaped

Sykes-Josephine's "Haute Nouveauté" Corsets are ideal; being built on anatomical principles an elegant and graceful contour is created. holes in every panel, and break every straight line with some maddening angular projection.

Moving our furniture about is healthy; it ensures cleanliness more securely, by exposing unexpected tracts of carpet; it presents familiar things in new aspects; and it does much to promote tidiness. Even the most careless person is tidy for a few days after a re-arrangement. This is an unconscious tribute to the value of a fresh point of view. Besides, it keeps the suite in its place by moving it out of it. This was sometime a paradox.

The cause of domestic harmony is likely to be furthered by a new invention in the safety razor line. It is of the same shape, and used in exactly the same way as the ordinary razor, which recommends it to mankind very strongly; and it averts those wrestles with what I have heard called "the damnability of things inanimate" which occasionally result in the appearance of the head of the house late for breakfast, looking like a German student after a duel, and in a mood which impresses his wife with the fact that her strength is to sit still. A man ill-shaven is uncomfortable; a man unshaven, according to the words of one of them, "feels a beast and knows he looks it;" but a man just shaven is usually wondering why on earth he does not grow a beard. Now let us have a collar-stud which never breaks, cuff links which slip through the stiffest cuffs as if they were sixpences, and a machine for cutting hair while the patient is asleep, and women will rise up and bless the inventors.

Only one hopeful remark did I hear about the weather when the glorious sunshine of Sunday week lost itself in the renewed gloom and rain of Tuesday and Wednesday. "Aha!" said a voice out of the recesses of a dyer and cleaner's shop, a voice, which I afterwards discovered to belong to a commercial traveller in cheap china (a dream-like conglomeration of place and person and speech which reminded me of Alice's journey in the railway carriage). "Aha! Plenty of cheap turkeys this year!"

The glory of the turkey is no less that of the kitchen than the farmyard, as it submits itself to a variety of preparations, and is indispensable at the festive season. The following recipes will afford a little change from the familiar "Alderman in Chains":—

Turkey à la Grand Duc.—Make ½ lb. of veal into quenelle, in which mix 4 ozs. of chopped red tongue, a cold, cooked, minced sweetbread, a tablespoonful of chopped truffle, and an egg. With this farce fill the breast of a small turkey, which secure with trussing needle and fine twine. Lard the breast with bold lardoons of fat bacon, and put it, with a greased paper over, into a braising pan. Add stock to reach the wings, a tumbler of sherry, an onion, celery, two cloves, a blade of mace, and a small bouquet of herbs. Braise the turkey for two hours, then remove the paper to dry the larding. Strain some of the stock and, after removing the grease, convert it into sauce. Glaze the larding of the turkey, dish the bird garnished with turned and braised celeriac, pour a little of the sauce round, and serve the remainder separately.

Sauce for the Turkey à la Grand Duc—Sautez a large minced onion and 2 ozs. of minced lean bacon with 2 ozs. of butter in a stewpan until on the point of changing colour, then add a large stick of celery, previously blanched. When it is cooked mix in two spoonfuls of flour and a pint or more of the broth; stir until boiling and simmer for twenty minutes. Rub the sauce through the tammy and return it to the stewpan to heat with a little cream, salt, pepper, a spoonful of chopped red tongue and truffle.

Those who find turkey dull will have a glorious moment of surprise when they taste it prepared as follows:—

Galantine of Turkey.—Cut a turkey down the back and take out all the bones, without cutting the skin. Make 2 lbs. of veal into quenelle, with which spread the inside of the turkey half an inch thick. Trim half a dozen cooked sheep's tongues and place them at equal distances on the farce; fill the intervening spaces with sliced truffles. Sprinkle with blanched and chopped pistachios, cover with the remainder of the farce, draw the sides together, and sew it along. Wring a napkin through hot, then cold, water, spread it with butter, on which place the galantine, tie the ends securely, and sew the length. Braise the galantine with stock and vegetables for two hours and allow it to cool in the braise, after which remove the cloth, wring it through hot water, fold the galantine in it, and press it with a 3 lbs. weight until next day; then remove the thread, glaze the surface, and decorate it with cut aspic. Arrange the galantine on a dish with a border of chopped aspic, making an outer border of triangular-shaped pieces of jelly.

An excellent farce is made in this way:—Scrape 2 lbs. of raw veal, pound it thoroughly, and rub it through a wire sieve, return it to the mortar and pound again with half its weight of scraped fat bacon and 4 ozs. of butter. Season with salt, pepper, and a little cayenne, and thoroughly work in three whole eggs.

A good dish to serve for luncheon with cold or réchauffé turkey is:—

Rondelles de Veau à la Milanaise.—Cut thin slices from the lean part of a loin of veal, which flatten slightly. Sautez half a dozen chickens' livers, and, when cold, pound them with 4 ozs. of the white trimmings of the veal, adding an ounce of butter, salt and pepper, and an egg. Rub the farce through a wire sieve and with it coat one side of the fillets. Sprinkle each with chopped truffles, roll them tightly, and secure each with a thread. Pack them closely in a stewpan and braise them with stock and vegetables, after which strain the stock, remove the fat, and reduce it to a demi-glaze, which mix with a gill of brown sauce and two spoonfuls of tomato purée. When serving, take the thread from the rondelles, brush them with glaze, and dish them in a circle with tomato rice in the centre; pour round a portion of the sauce, and serve the remainder in a boat.

¶ "They are one of the wonders of the world, these stories, and people are never tired of asking who writes them."

This is the comment of the Editor of the Bystander on the SIXTEENTH SERIES of

QUEER STORIES

3rd Edition] FROM "TRUTH." [3rd Edition.

The Justice of this Criticism is fully borne out by the following Extracts from Reviews of this Latest Volume :

SCOTSMAN.—"Have long enjoyed well-deserved favour."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"A selection from this well known and deservedly popular feature in our popular contemporary. All its stories are wide awake."

REFEREE.—"It contains thirty stories, all of which are interesting, and some of which are very good indeed."

THE JEWISH WORLD.—"A splendid exchange for a shilling."

WESTERN DAILY PRESS.—"Very engrossing. They are 'queer' stories in that practically every one ends in an unexpected way, and contains a good surprise."

BAZAAR.—"This latest series should have as large a circulation as those which have preceded it."

SPORTSMAN.—"We need not commend them; they are well known to be entertaining."

ULSTER GUARDIAN.—"There are no short stories to compare with those which appear weekly in TRUTH, and we cannot think of a better shillingsworth of holiday fiction than one of the volumes. . . . which contain thirty of the brightest and best of these famous stories."

SUSSEX DAILY NEWS.—"A brilliant shillingsworth. Practically every one of the thirty stories it contains is of much more than ordinary interest. They are of that happy magnetism which compels the reading of the whole story once the first page has been scanned."

WORCESTER HERALD.—"Brighter reading for the railway carriage or the odd half-hour anywhere cannot be found."

THE NORTHERN WHIG.—"244 pages of true enjoyment."

CORK EXAMINER.—"Extraordinary value for the modest sum charged for the book."

NOTTINGHAM GUARDIAN.—"Comes opportunely to serve for holiday and seaside reading."

SPORTING LIFE.—"Better holiday fare it would be difficult to find. The stories are, needless to say, varied and bright, and form an exceptionally good shillingsworth."

FINANCIAL TIMES.—"May be recommended to those who are taking their holidays."

HOSPITAL.—"We strongly recommend this excellent shillingsworth."

FINANCIER.—"Well up to the level of excellence established by the first volume of this always entertaining series."

THE OPERATIONS OF THE COMPANY EMBRACE ALL BRANCHES OF INSURANCE.

DEATH DUTIES.—Special forms of Policies have been prepared by the Company providing for the payment of Death Duties, thus avoiding the necessity of disturbing investments at a time when it may be difficult to realise without loss.

INCOME TAX.—Under the provisions of the Act, Income Tax is not payable on that portion of the Assured's income which is devoted to the payment of annual premiums on an assurance on his life or on the life of his wife. Having regard to the amount of the Tax, this abatement (which is limited to one-sixth of the Assured's income) is an important advantage to Life Policyholders.

Full particulars of all classes of Insurance, together with Proposal Forms and Statement of Accounts, may be had on application to any of the Company's Offices or Agents.

THE METROPOLITAN VISITING and RELIEF ASSOCIATION

Are now RECEIVING many APPLICATIONS from Clergy of the Metropolitan portions of the Dioceses of London, Southwark, and St. Albans, for GRANTS in aid of their POOR and SICK FUNDS.

The President (the Lord Bishop of London) and the Committee EARNESTLY APPEAL to all readers of this paper to enable them to adequately assist the Clergy and their District Visitors in their severe struggle with destitution, misery, and want by subscribing to the funds of the Association.

1. The aim of the Association is to Distribute such funds as may be committed to it in grants to the Local Committees of poor parishes proportionate to the needs of each.

2. The Clergy and District Visitors are the unpaid agents of relief, and possess the indispensable qualification of personal knowledge of the poor.

3. The overburdened Clergy are hereby greatly assisted in dealing with the distressing cases constantly before them. The religious persuasion of the poor is no obstacle to their relief.

4. Every penny contributed is devoted to the relief of destitution, all the working expenses being otherwise provided for.

Annual report will be forwarded on application to the Secretary.

SUBSCRIPTIONS to enable the Committee to carry on the work efficiently are GREATLY NEEDED.

Cheques payable to GRANT MARSTON, should be sent to the office, 45a, Pall Mall, S.W.; or to Lloyds Banking Company (Limited), 16, St. James's Street, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLES.

RULES.

1. The sum of £2 2s. will be given every week for the best Epigram, Conundrum, Lipogram, Bouts-Rimés, or whatever the announced subject of the competition for the week may be.

2. The Puzzle Editor reserves the right, however, of dividing the above sum between two or more competitors, or of withholding the prize, should exceptional circumstances render such a course desirable.

3. The decision and award of the Puzzle Editor must be considered final and irrevocable, and for obvious reasons no appeal from his critical judgments can be entertained.

4. In every instance the prize will be given in money, subject to no condition whatever, except the publication of the winner's real name and address in this Journal.

5. Competitors will be allowed eleven days for the composition and despatch of their efforts; but all such communications must, at the latest, be received at the Truth Office by the first post on the morning of the second Monday succeeding the publication of the subject for competition.

6. Not more than one Prize will be given a quarter to the same competitor.

7. All New Contributors are Required to Forward with their First Answers their Real Names and Addresses for Registration; such names and addresses will not be published except in the case of Prize-winners.

8. The nom-de-plume chosen by competitors should not exceed twelve, and must under no circumstances consist of more than fourteen, letters.

9. Competitors must on no account change the noms-de-plume they have once assumed.

10. On the announcement of the Prize-winner's nom-de-plume, the successful competitor must write and make formal application for the Prize, stating the address to which the cheque must be sent. Any competitor failing to do so within three months of winning the Prize will forfeit all claim to the same.

11. No communications can be received on post-cards, by telegraph, or by hand. They must all be sent by the time named above. All post letters addressed:—

PUZZLE EDITOR OF "TRUTH," Carteret Street, Queen Anne's Gate, S.W.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1,663.

The usual Prize of Two Guineas is offered this week to that competitor who shall prove most successful in naming

THE THREE BEST NOVELS IN THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE THAT HAVE BEEN PUBLISHED DURING THE PAST YEAR—i.e., BETWEEN JANUARY 1, 1910, AND JANUARY 1, 1911.

The Prize award will be by plébiscite.

No competitor may submit more than one list of three best novels; and all lists must reach Truth office not later than by the first post on Monday, January 9.

VARIOUS PRIZE AWARDS WILL BE ANNOUNCED NEXT WEEK.

"TRUTH" PUZZLE No. 1660.—ASSORTED SPECIMENS—GOOD AND OTHERWISE.

SUITABLE CHRISTMAS GREETINGS TO MR. ASQUITH AND MR. BALFOUR.

To Mr. Asquith:
Though politics our minds estrange,
Accept my wish in form quatrain:
May Christmastide record "no change,"
Unless it be a "Liberal gain"!

To Mr. Balfour:
Whate'er your thoughts upon Home Rule
Or Asquith's dissolution,
May nought occur this coming Yule
To hurt your "constitution."

Cercueil.

To Mr. Asquith:
"Many happy returns" you have already had;
The people have given you those.
So now may your Christmas be happy and glad
And your New Year bring well-earnt repose.

To Mr. Balfour:
Although disappointment the best of us grieves,
May you yet be at Christmas light-hearted and gay,
And next year turn over as many new leaves
As you have in the year that is passing away.

Vox.

To Mr. Asquith:
Return'd again, but with diminished power,
You are yourself a living referendum;*
Now make the most of this your lucky hour
If you would be the people's præferendum.†
* To be brought back.
† To be preferred.

To Mr. Balfour:
To you and Unionists we look to save
The freedom demagogues would soon destroy;
That against which they ignorantly rave,
Our envied Constitution, Britain's joy.

J. McGrigor Allan.

To Mr. Asquith:
A "Liberal" share of festive joys
Greet you on every side;
With victory won, and duty done,
Comes peace at Christmastide.

To Mr. Balfour:
When o'er the eastern sky there gleams
The light of Christmas Day,
May party snares and bogy scares
Take wings and flee away.

Marguerite.

To H. H. Asquith ("Toeing the line").
May joy surround you with the Christmas dawn;
Though cant of tyrants' "veto" makes us bored,
When your "woe too" must touch a line that's drawn
By dynamiter Ford.

To A. J. Balfour ("Faint, yet pursuing").
The best of luck if not the victor's crown,
Be yours this Christmastide;
May fickle fortune soon relax her frown
And fight upon your side.

Sapper.

To Mr. Asquith:
When David with Goliath meets not only giants fall;
David may catch the loud applause, but what becomes of Saul?
And though your ragged regiments collectively prevail,
It is the tail that wags the dog, and not the dog the tail.

To Mr. Balfour:
'Twas lawful—and none said the Captain had sinned,
As he mournfully jettison'd Jonah;
But "Lawless"—and all your antagonists grinn'd
When you recklessly threw over Bonar.

Ballantrae.

To Mr. Asquith:
Greetings sincere and many happy years
To follow your attempt to shear the Peers;
May peace of Christmastide upon you fall,
With rest from speech. "Address" none but—the ball.

To Mr. Balfour:
A happy Christmas, free from enmity.
Nor "flu." nor Referendum trouble thee;
Free politics' Peers' veto, naught recall
To mar the time of peace, good-will to all.

Korah.

To Master A.
Now home for Christmas, Herbert. Hark, the merry peal!
But soon, my boy, you must go back to school.
The master then will let you hear—or, rather, feel—
What he means by the mystic term "Home Rule."

To A. J. B.
Now Christmas comes, and puts to shame
Untruth and all that will not bear the light.
All hail to him who keeps his honour bright
And plays the game.

Gartree.

To Mr. Balfour:
Dear Sir, on this our Festal Day,
I ask God's blessing on your way,
That 'mid the din and stress of strife
His Peace may sanctify your life.

To Mr. Asquith:
Once more, sir, you are given pow'r
To rule our land in dang'rous hour.
See to it that nor force nor fear
Wrest from you all we hold dear.

Louma.

To democratic "Arthur James"
I send this Christmas Box:
A new addition to his names,
"The King of Weathercocks"!

To Asquith, thrice elected.
A Merry Christmas, too.
While Tories, thrice rejected,
Are looking very blue.

Darby.

To Mr. Asquith:
Tear up our Constitution clause by clause!
Annul the Veto, grant Home Rule instanter:
Yet, ere you make an end, one moment pause,
And leave us just one Clause—the children's Santa.

To Mr. Balfour:
Your Christmas presents you will get, no doubt, from Gamage;
But, ere by "Sutton" or by G.P.O. you send 'em,
Bethink yourself, you might save nearly half the "damage"
By putting "Present-giving" to the Referendum!

Amuinn.

To Mr. Asquith:
A Liberal share of Christmas grace
Be yours; and then, beyond all question,
Your Christmas budget will not place
A tax upon your own digestion.

To Mr. Balfour:
A Merry Christmas be your lot,
Now the elections' cries are still.
You've 'scaped a legislative knot,
And may find peace, if not goodwill.

Almaviva.

To Mr Asquith:
You've done it, and so now square up,
Home Rule's the ticket; drain the cup
To Ireland's gain and England's loss.
Good luck from Redmond (now your boss).

To Mr. Balfour:
A mess you've made, dear Arthur B.,
'Tis time that you turned out for me.
Tariff Reform will rout the foe;
A Merry Christmas, from friend Joe.

Mister James.

To Mr Asquith:
Hail, Premier! All true Christmas joys
May you and yours this season find;
Relieved from party strife and noise,
When God gives peace to all mankind.

To Mr Balfour:
Arthur we greet thee, courageous and true.
All man could do you have done for the peers
Never say die! There are destined for you
Happier Christmases, brighter New Years.

Ilama.

To Mr. Asquith:
The season's greetings, Asquith! Liberals true
To-day in concert bless their stars, and you,
That Christmas next will see, by Heaven's grace,
Of all its foemen robbed Another Place.

To Mr Balfour:
Merry Christmas Prince Arthur! What though your heart burns,
That Fate didn't grant you more "happy returns"?
O'er the time-honoured tariff you'll "gallantly
For one effort supreme—to eclipse Cinq-vaill!

Dobbin.

To Mr. Asquith:
A doubtful gift this year has Christmas brought
'Tis hard to be in place without authority—
And Santa Claus has not improved your lot
By giving you a composite majority

To Mr Balfour:
Better (said Solomon) a plain and peaceful meal
Than feasting lavishly with a contentious crew;
You, with no philosophic doubts just now, must feel
That Christmas pudding's better far than Irish stew

Tony.

To Mr. Asquith:
May women in your hour of ease
Your every whim and fancy please,
Who nothing know of Suffrage Bill
And think a vote the greatest ill.

To Mr. Balfour:
No referendum need delay
The homage of our Christmas lay.
On troublesome times thy bark is cast,
May it have a haven find at last.

Dabster.

To A. J. Balfour
The coalition ship comes proudly in—
Dost hear the Liberal cheers?
While the bark you hoped the race would win
Is adrift behind the piers.

To Mr. Asquith:
Oh, noble head and generous hand!
You've held the Liberal flag on high;
"This land is now the promised land
This time, the righteous by and by"!

Northlander.

To Mr. Asquith and Mr. Balfour:
Health and long life to you, King's Prime Ministers,
No more new taxes or policy sinister!
Don't give us again in one year two elections;
Make friends of your foes: of allies, new selections.

"Courage, mon ami, le diable est mort,"
Quoth a cheerful philosopher—not Bernard Shaw—
Tho' your handicap's low, yet before long the cup
Will be yours (easy win), eight to play and ten up.

Piers Teniles.

To Mr. Asquith:
The exiles in the desert are crying their grief,
On your spear you are resting, brave Radical chief;
The banquet is ready, the rich feast is spread,
Invoke the blessings of mercy when the sweet grape is shed.

To Mr. Balfour:
There is joy in the hearts of the sons of Ishmael
Since the standard you carried has sunk in the gale;
But heed not their howlings, for the Christmas is here;
A toast for our martyrs—for our Arthur a cheer.

Crank.

The season is merry, and bright be the laurels our Cæsar must modestly wear,
And, like Ceres rejoicing in the rich golden harvest, from angry feelings forbear;
Unmindful of feuds in your victories won, let the joys of the season your good nature swell
With the hopes that are blissful of peace and goodwill responsive to the chimes of the old Christmas bell.

Let hope revive within your breast, for you are still but young;
Heroes may fall and rise again, though by misfortunes deeply stung.
Oh, Arthur, dear, our saviour brave, if you were to the nation lost,
The glory of our happy land would be into limbo tossed.

Sophia.

To Mr. Asquith:
Oh! May your farc at Christmas be
A feast of joy—why not?
Although, dear sir, it seems to me
The "fair" may prove too hot!

To Mr. A. J. Balfour:
Dear sir, the "links" that bind us
Will never severed be;
At Christmas you will find us
Still faithful—wait and see.

Iris.

To Mr. Asquith:
Asquith, may Christmas find you hearty
Within the bosom of your party.
But may we ask, whate'er its name is,
You'll tell us what its little game is?

To Mr. Balfour:
Balfour, the best of Christmas greetings.
We soon shall have some merry meetings.
And tho' your star's not in th' ascendant,
At any rate, you're no dependant.

Malignant.

To Mr. Asquith:
Kind greetings, friend Asquith, let Christmas time lend you
The peace and the calm that is surely your due:
Assured that the kindest of thoughts will attend you,
You've rung out the false may you ring in the true.

To Mr. Balfour:
'Tis Christmas time, Balfour, let's banish all rancour,
And rest from the strife of political gales:
The voyage has been stormy, but now you may anchor,
You've finished your "Locking" and "trimmed" your last sails.

Ephesca.

All hail to our Prime Minister,
The champion of the Veto,
And let his motto ever be
"Altiora Peto."

Whilst greeting Balfour raise the cry,
You must save the Lords, but mend 'em;
And let his motto ever be—
People's Referendum.

Maid of Lea.

To Mr. Asquith:
True Christmas wishes, oh Asquith, from me,
Would not be exactly polite,
So I'll bottle my wrath and wait and see
The drift of your latter-day flight.

To Mr. Balfour:
Here's a wish for your strength, and courage and speed,
'Tis shared by far-off lands;
With the Christmas bells may you wake to our need,
The Empire's in your hands.

Petite.

To Mr. Balfour:
The best of good wishes, dear Balfour, I send 'em,
With a new little toy which is called "Referendum."
If Tariff Reform you are anxious to shirk
Touch the spring. Oh, confound it! the figure won't work.

To Mr. Asquith:
Christmas greatings, dear A., but it's just infra dig
For you to be dancing a rale Irish jig.
If Mr. Redmond with the Tories combine,
Oh! what is the use of your "toeing the line."

Chris.

To Mr. Asquith:
May Christmas joys in social life
Take place, pro tem., of party strife.
From Veto squabbles now set free,
Enjoy the present—"Wait and see."

To Mr. Balfour:
You have bravely fought for what you deem is Britain's best;
A happy Yuletide bring you joy and rest.
May friendship's smiles and kindly greetings
Beat out all thoughts of stormy meetings.

Zieta.

To Mr. Asquith:
Great statesman—worthy of a great renown,
Whose "faith unfaithful" keeps you "falsely true."
Break with the party that has dragged you down,
And with the New Year boldly start anew.

To Mr. Balfour:
True namesake of that knight of chivalry,
Arthur the King. Fight on—we follow thee—
And wield through storms of protest, and demur
The Referendum—thine Excalibur.

Klondyke.

To Mr. Asquith:
May peace be yours this Christmastide,
And nought your pleasures mar,
For nobly you have steered our craft
Inside the harbour bar.

To Mr. Balfour:
Let not defeat or doubt disturb
Your philosophic mind;
Convince yourself, then you'll convince;
Leave Garvin's tricks behind.

Yes-Tor.

To Mr. Asquith:
Your "shades" are not "falling fast,"
Nor with this year your power past;
But, Asquith, oh beware of that!
The weapon in the picture hat!

To Mr. Balfour:
Arthur! for I can call you "dear" no more,
Seeing your lowly pose at Demos's door—
May the New Year bring back your olden heart!
As "Bloody B." you played a nobler part.

Sissie.

To Mr. Asquith:
Dear Asquith, I'm thinking that sometimes you're joking when interests so many appeal to your head,
And promises given on all sides so easy are words without meaning good-naturedly said.
'Tis well known your desire all parties to please, and for this the temptation is strong,
But St Peter himself and the rest of the Saints in your place would most surely go wrong.

To Mr. Balfour:
The pride and pet of Primrose dames, the inspiration of the peers,
Your flowery fame a glory is when washed with martyr's tears.
Oh, Arthur, dear, too bright for life, for a higher dwelling made,
In paradise with angel's wings should bloom your holy shade.

Mary.

To Mr. Asquith:
You can rest on your laurels though curses are pending,
And the language of flowers are scattered in vain;
You can bless and forgive the Amalakites rending,
And the Philistine terrors from mischief restrain.

To Mr. Balfour:
What wisdom can disclose the mysteries of your breast,
Or the hidden secrets of your nature find:
Ever shifting, and by dismal doubts oppressed,
Freedom is frozen in a generous mind.

Milliner.

Friend Asquith, of the Coalition,
How parlous now is thy condition.
Two masters hard claim thy obedience,
Obey thou must, or lose allegiance.

Balfour, we want a strong man at the helm,
To guide the ship of State and guard our realm
From those [illegible] threat'ning revolution,
And hearts disloyal seeking devolution.

Bel Demomo.

To Mr. A. J. Balfour:
While our land is passing through this time of turmoil and unrest
We trust in thee—of leaders, the purest and the best.
We wish thee years of strength and power to guide our nation's will
Into the higher planes of thoughts, upwards and onwards still.

To Mr. H. H. Asquith.
I wish thee a Christmas free from "dictation,"
A strong hand to lead our tottering nation,
Back to the old paths where noblesse obligo
Was the proud motto of People and Liege.

Owen.

To Mr. A. J. Balfour:
Here's to you, Arthur, though promote in vain
Could all the compliments the Referendum;
Still, you've most gallantly led them "out" a-gain,
To muse upon the Country's Preferendum!

To Mr. H. H. Asquith.
The Oracle, good Harry, now has spoken:
"Good deeds are more than coronets, a sight!"
And liberty-in-glory, by that token,
'S the only true hereditary right!

Rihler.

To Mr. A. J. Balfour:
Dear Balfour, I'm sorry but it is the talk of the town,
That your courage is oozing and you look very down.
For that to the harbour ahead you're unable to steer (Stear); till, here's a right merry Christmas and a happy New Year.

To Mr. H. H. Asquith.
Friend Asquith, I think, you were a little bit frisky
When you put a tax on my tobacco, also my whisky,
For which I, as a poor man, cannot find a reason,
But, I must wish you the full compliments of the season.

Fairy Glen.

Arthur Balfour, although at the polls you've got "beans," You've, I hope, stomach left for plum-pudding.
Pray don't brood in the blues, hatch revenge on the greens,
Putting paid to foes' bills by plumb-putting.

Asquith, cheer up! as joyous Christmas nears,
Think not upon your hapless Bills, in tiers,
Rejected by the vetos of the peers,
Nor shanks exposed to feet-toes of the "dears!"

Tim.

To Mr. Asquith:
We greet you, Mr. Asquith, this Christmas with delight;
You've fought a noble battle for liberty and right.
Among the many Britons who have acquired fame,
In history recorded will be your brilliant name.

To Mr. Balfour:
May Mr. Balfour enjoy Christmas with glee.
He is a true Briton and ever will be.
If he fails in his project is true all the same;
Recorded in history you'll yet find his name.

Cardiffian.

To Mr. Asquith:
Cheer up, Sir! Fife; dance Irish jogs. Gain, loss,
Short Commons, Crown, Welsh harp, forget! with past
Elections that have made the voters X;
King Christmas guarantees "Home" rule at last.

To Mr. Balfour:
Good Santa Claus may fix you up a tree,
But veto purple loosestrife while you're able;
Re-form new parties round your lib'ral table;
Plain diet change; for Yule enjoy high "tee."

Chaffcutter.

To Mr. Asquith;
Christmas is come, and a rest from the fray,
So Asquith don't think of the Peers
Nor Home Rule, but let peace and goodwill stay;
Cheer up and cast away your fears!

To Mr. Balfour:
Far, far away, good Sir, let dull care flee,
And don't muse on Tariff Reform.
Let Referendum now forgotten be
This Christmas and election's storm.

Simplex.

To Mr. Asquith:
The polling's all over and Christmas is here;
What the next move's to be doesn't seem very clear.
The men-voters, it seems, don't half know their minds,
Let us Suffragettes in aid we'll pull up the blinds.

To Mr. Balfour:
Come, Arthur, here comes Christmas Day!
Now cease awhile your wanderings on the stump
And leave it to the parish pump
To spout, and spout, and spout away.

Amber.

To Mr. Balfour:
A Merry Christmas, Mr. Balfour, and a wish sincere and hearty
From all who know your prowess on the links;
So long as you can "drive" the Tories may survive,
But there's a vacancy just now for one who thinks.

To Mr. Asquith:
Mr. Asquith, the best of good wishes we send,
And it's really the most we can do,
For the turkeys and geese are five dollars a piece
And Premiers at a premium, too!

Georgina.
